According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī wrote to his governor of al-Kūfah about the victory, in a letter concerning al-Kūfah, while the governor was in Mecca.

> From ʿAllāh's servant ʿAlī, Commander of the Faithful. After greetings. We fought in the middle of Jumādā II in Khuraybah, one of the open areas in al-Baṣrah. Almighty and Glorious Allāh gave them the sunnah of the Muslims.[1059] There were many killed from our side and theirs. Among those killed from our side were Thumāmah b. al-Muthannā, Hind b. ʿAmr, ʿIlbāʾ b. al-Haytham, Sayḥān and Zayd, the two sons of Ṣūḥān, and Maḥdūj. ʿUbaydallāh b. Rāfiʿ[1060] was the scribe. Zufar b. Qays was the messenger who brought the good news to Kūfah, still in Jumādā II.

[3229]

ʿAlī Accepts Allegiance from the People and the Account of Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān[1061] and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah

These words were said in the allegiance: "The fulfillment of Allāh's promise and covenant is obligatory on you. Our peace will be your peace, and our war will be your war. You will restrain your tongue and hand from attacking us."

Now Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān was one of those who withdrew and did not take part in the battle. He stayed back in the house of Nāfiʿ b. al-Ḥārith. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah came with those seeking protection after ʿAlī had finished with the allegiance and gave himself up. ʿAlī asked him, "What about your father's brother,[1062]

1059. I.e., put an end to their deviation by trying to reason with them before taking up arms (Glossarium, CCCLXVII, and p. 73, above).

1060. For the text's ʿAbdallāh, following Ibrāhīm, although there is no entry in Caskel, while there is one for an ʿAbdallāh (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 195, II, 117). De Goeje suggests ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Rāfiʿ (Addenda, DCXXXV).

1061. Settled early in al-Baṣrah with Abū Bakrah, probably a brother by the same mother, Sumayyah (*EI*², s.v. Abū Bakrah; and Prym's n. c to the text); later Muʿāwiyah's viceroy in Iraq. See *EI*¹, s.v. Ziyād b. Abīhi.

1062. I.e., Ziyād.

the one who held out and refused to join me?"[1063] "By Allāh, Commander of the Faithful!" he replied. "He loves you and is very eager to please you, but I heard that he's ill. So I'll find out his news and come back to you." He was keeping his whereabouts a secret from ʿAlī until he had consulted him, but [Ziyād] ordered him to tell him, so he did. "Walk in front of me!" said ʿAlī, "and lead me to him!" He did so, and when he reached where he was he said, "You refused to join me and held out [on me]!" and ʿAlī put his hand on his chest and said, "There's a sharp pain here." Ziyād then made apologies to him, and he accepted them. ʿAlī then consulted with him and wanted him to govern al-Baṣrah. But Ziyād said: "Let it be a man from your close family, and the people will be content with him and more likely to be reassured or easily led. I will support him for you and advise him." So ʿAlī and Ziyād parted, having decided on Ibn ʿAbbās, and ʿAlī returned to where he was staying.

The Appointment of Ibn ʿAbbās as Governor of al-Baṣrah and Ziyād over the Kharāj Tax

ʿAlī appointed Ibn ʿAbbās governor of al-Baṣrah and Ziyād over the [3230]
kharāj tax and the treasury, and he ordered Ibn ʿAbbās to listen to Ziyād's advice. "I consulted him about some small thing concerning the people," Ibn ʿAbbās used to say, "and he replied, 'If you know you're in the right and that your opponent is in the wrong, I'll give you proper advice; if you don't know, I'll give you proper advice just the same.' 'I'm in the right,' I replied, 'and they're in the wrong.' So he said, 'Use those who obey you to beat those who disobey you and go against your orders! And, if it brings more strength and benefit to Islam that their heads be cut off, then cut them off!' I asked Ziyād to write this down, and when he left I looked at what he had done and realized that he had given me a well thought out opinion.'"

The Saba'iyyah set off without ʿAlī's permission, which caused ʿAlī to leave in haste and set off on their tracks to foil any plan they might be making. He had stayed in [al-Baṣrah] a while.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad

1063. Al-mutaqāʿid bī or, in Ibrāhīm, al-muqāʿid bī.

and Ṭalḥah: The people of Medina learned about the Day of the Camel before sunset on the Thursday from a vulture that circled around Medina with something hanging down. They were staring at it when it fell. To their surprise, it was a human hand wearing a signet ring engraved with the name of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb. All Baṣrans between Mecca and Medina, whether near al-Baṣrah or far, then became frightened, having learned of the battle from the hands and feet carried to them by vultures.

[3231] ʿAlī Equips ʿĀ'ishah to Leave al-Baṣrah

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī equipped ʿĀ'ishah with everything she needed in the way of riding beasts, provisions, and other baggage and sent with her all those who had fought on her side and had survived, except for anyone who wished to stay behind. He also selected forty prominent Baṣran women to go with her. "Get ready for the journey, Muḥammad!"[1064] he said, "and see that she arrives."[1065] So on the day she was to set off he came to her to stand and bid her farewell. The people were there so she went out to them, and they said their farewells to her and she to them. "My sons," she said, "some of us criticized others of us, saying they were slow or excessive.[1066] But don't let any of you hold it against any others over anything you might hear about this. By Allāh! There was never anything in the past between me and ʿAlī other than what usually happens between a woman and her male in-laws. In my opinion he has shown himself one of the best of men, despite my criticism." "By Allāh, men!" replied ʿAlī. "She has spoken the truth and nothing but the truth. That was all there was between us. She's the wife of your Prophet now and forever."[1067]

The day she left was Saturday 1 Rajab, 36/December 24, 656. ʿAlī escorted her some miles and then left his sons to accompany her for a day.

1064. Ibn Abī Bakr.
1065. At Medina.
1066. In dealing with ʿUthmān.
1067. I.e., ʿAlī has forgiven her.

Accounts of the Carnage on the Day of the Camel

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl b. ʿAṭiyyah al-Khurāsānī—Saʿīd al-Quṭaʿī: We used to recount the number of dead at the Battle of the Camel as exceeding 6,000.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh—his father— [3232]
Sulaymān b. Ṣāliḥ—ʿAbdallāh—Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt[1068]—Abū Labīd Limāzah b. Ziyād: I asked him,[1069] "Why do you curse ʿAlī?" He replied, "Should I not curse a man who killed 2,500 of us by the time the sun was over our heads?"

According to Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Ibn Abī Yaʿqūb: On the Day of the Camel ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib killed 2,500 men—1,350 of them were from Azd, 800 from Banū Ḍabbah, and 350 from the rest of the people.

According to [ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh]—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Jarīr: When Al-Muʿarriḍ b. ʿIlāṭ[1070] was killed on the Day of the Camel his brother al-Ḥajjāj recited the verses

Never did I see a day when more men hastened to fight with only a left hand, because they had lost their right.

According to Muʿādh—ʿAbdallāh—Jarīr: When Al-Muʿarriḍ b. ʿIlāṭ was killed on the Day of the Camel his brother al-Ḥajjāj recited the verses

Never did I see a day when more men hastened to fight with[1071] only a left hand, because they had lost their right.

What ʿAmmār b. Yāsir Told ʿĀ'ishah When the Battle of the Camel Was Over

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Abū Yazīd al-Madinī: When the 1068. Following Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXV, for the text's Ibn al-Ḥurayth.

---

1069. I.e., al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt asked Abū Labīd.
1070. Of Sulaym. Only his brother al-Ḥajjāj is mentioned in Caskel and Strenziok, I, 122, II, 291). Al-Ḥajjāj was involved in the expedition against Khaybar (Ibn Hishām, 770 ff.; tr., 519 ff.; see also Watt, 97).
1071. Bi-kaffi shimālin for li-kaffi . . . in the preceding version. Prym points out that in the ms. this line comes at the end of the next khabar, but it appears that it belongs here.

people had finished fighting, ʿAmmār b. Yāsir said to ʿĀ'ishah, [3233] "Mother of the Faithful, how far this march is from the pact that was made for you!"[1072] "Abū al-Yaqẓān!" she replied. "Yes?" he asked. "By Allāh! As I always knew, you're a great speaker of the truth!" "Praise be to Allāh!" he replied, "Who has judged in my favor by your tongue!"

1072. Not to leave her house (Qur'ān 33:33).

ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib Sends Qays b. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah to Be Ruler of Egypt

In this year—that is, 36—Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah[1073] was killed. This was because, when the Egyptians had left to go to ʿUthmān with Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, he stayed in Egypt, expelled ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ,[1074] and took control of the country. There he remained until ʿUthmān was killed and allegiance was given to ʿAlī. Muʿāwiyah then rebelled, and ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ gave him allegiance. The two of them then went to Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah before Qays b. Saʿd reached Egypt. They tried without success to enter Egypt, so they continued to practice deceit on Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah until he came out with 1,000 men to ʿArīsh of Egypt and set up fortifications. ʿAmr then went to him there and set up mangonels against him. This made Muḥammad come out with thirty of his men, whereupon they were captured and put to death, may they rest in peace.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad[1075]—Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd b. Mikhnaf b. Sulaym—Muḥammad b. Yūsuf[1076] al-Anṣārī of Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj—ʿAbbās b. Sahl[1077] al-Sāʿidī: It was Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah b. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. [3234] ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf who sent the Egyptians to ʿUthmān b. ʿAffan, and then, once they had gone to ʿUthmān and besieged him, he (back in Egypt) seized ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ, one of Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy[1078] of Quraysh and ʿUthmān's governor of Egypt at the time. Muḥammad then expelled him and made himself leader of the prayer. So ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd left Egypt and encamped at the border between Egypt and Palestine, awaiting the outcome of the business over ʿUthmān.

A rider appeared and ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd asked: "What's your news, ʿAbdallāh?[1079] Tell us what's been happening to the people

---

1073. Ibn ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf, a paternal cousin of ʿUthmān but against him; Caetani, IX, 307–8.

1074. A scribe of the Prophet and a milk brother of ʿUthmān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 27, II, 117).

1075. Al-Kalbī (Caetani, IX, 308–9).

1076. Ibn Thābit Abū Yūsuf (U. Sezgin, 212).

1077. Ibn Saʿd (U. Sezgin, 212).

1078. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 27.

1079. ʿAbdallāh is the address to a Muslim whose name is not known.

where you came from." "I will," he replied. "The Muslims have killed ʿUthmān." "'We belong to Allāh, and to Him we return,'"[1080] said ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd. "And then what did they do, ʿAbdallāh?" "Then they gave allegiance to the paternal cousin of the Messenger of God, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." "'We belong to Allāh, and to Him we return,'" said ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd again. "It seems that you think that ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's becoming ruler is as bad as the killing of ʿUthmān," the man said to him, [astonished]. "That's right," he replied. The man then gave him a searching look and realized that he knew him. "You look like ʿAbdallāh [b. Saʿd] b. Abī Sarḥ, ruler of Egypt," he said. "That's right," he replied. "If you've any desire for life left," the man said to him, "then escape fast! The Commander of the Faithful's opinion about you and your followers is bad. If he overcomes you, he'll kill you or banish you from Muslim territory, and here on my heels is a new ruler[1081] coming instead of you." "What ruler is this?" asked ʿAbdallāh. "Qays b. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah al-Anṣārī." "May Allāh expel Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah from His mercy!" said ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd, "for he has committed an outrage against his pater-[3235] nal cousin[1082] and worked against him, when ʿUthmān had been his guardian and brought him up and done him so much good. But he abused his protection and set upon his governors and equipped men against him until he was killed. Then someone who was worse than himself was appointed over him,[1083] someone to whom ʿUthmān had not granted power over his lands for a year or even a month, because he did not consider him fit for it." "Escape and save yourself, and you won't be killed!" the man told him. So ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd left and fled until he reached Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in Damascus.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] added, "This report from Hishām proves that Qays b. Saʿd became governor of Egypt while Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah was still alive."

In this year ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib sent Qays b. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah al-

---

1080. Qur'ān 2:156.
1081. Sent from ʿAlī.
1082. ʿUthmān.
1083. I.e., ʿAlī.

Anṣārī to govern Egypt, and about this we have the following account.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Thābit—Sahl b. Sa'd:[1084] When 'Uthmān was killed and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib became caliph, he called Qays b. Sa'd al-Anṣāri and told him: "Go to Egypt; I've made you its governor. So go and get ready to travel, and gather your trusted followers to you[1085] and those you want to go with you, so that you arrive there with a force. That will be more alarming to your enemies and more encouraging to your friends. If Allāh wills that you get there, then treat the good doer well and be severe with those you suspect. Be lenient with newcomers and early comers;[1086] leniency brings success." "May Allāh have mercy on you,[1087] Commander of the Faithful!" replied Qays b. Sa'd. "I appreciate what you say, but, as for your advice, 'Go out to it with a force,' by Allāh! If I can enter Egypt only with a force brought from Medina I'll never enter it at all. So I'll leave that force for you. Then if you have need of them they'll be near at hand, or if [3236] you want to send them on some mission of yours they'll be there ready for you. I and my household, however, will go on our own. As for your advice about leniency and good treatment, I will ask help for that from Almighty and Glorious Allāh."

So Qays b. Sa'd left with seven of his followers and went to Egypt, where he mounted the minbar, sat down, and ordered that a letter he had with him from the Commander of the Faithful be read out to the people of Egypt:

> In the name of Allāh the Merciful, the Compassionate. From the servant of Allāh 'Alī, the Commander of the Faithful, to all Muslims and believers who hear this edict of mine. Peace be upon you! I praise Allāh to you, apart from Whom there is no deity.
>
> After greetings. [I tell you!] Almighty and Glorious Allāh, by the goodness of His actions, His plans, and His 1084. Al-Shahrazūrī (U. Sezgin, 123, 226); Caetani, IX, 318 ff.

1085. Reading ilayka for ilayhi, after Ibrāhīm and IA.
1086. Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 354.
1087. Polite introduction to a contradiction.

direction, has chosen Islam as His Own religion, that of His angels and of His messengers. He has sent the messengers with it to His servants and has specially ordained for it those of His creation whom He elected. Then one of the things by which Almighty and Glorious Allāh has ennobled this community and singled it out for excellence is His sending Muḥammad to it. In this way he taught them the Book, the wisdom, the ordinances, and the sunnah, that they might be guided right. He united them that they might not split into factions, he purified them that they might be clean, and be made life good for them[1088] that they might not oppress. When he had accomplished his mission, Almighty and Glorious Allāh took him, may Allāh's prayers and mercy and blessings be upon him! The Muslims then appointed two leaders as his deputies who were devout and acted according to the Book and the sunnah. They conducted themselves well and did not go against the sunnah. Almighty and Glorious Allāh then took them also to Himself, and a governor[1089] succeeded them who introduced innovations, so the community found a way to talk against him, so they talked and then criticized and reviled him.[1090] Then they came to me and gave me allegiance, so I pray for guidance from Almighty and Glorious Allāh and ask Him to help me to fear Him. Indeed, I am obliged to you to act according to the Book of Allāh and the sunnah of His messenger [3237] and to govern you according to His proper manner and to implement His sunnah and to be honest with you when you are absent.[1091] 'Allāh is the One from Whom help is sought!'[1092] 'Allāh is sufficient for us; He is an excellent guardian!'[1093] Now I have sent Qays b. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah to you as ruler, so help him, support him,[1094] and assist him 1088. Reading wa-raffahahum after Ibrāhīm for the text's wa-raffahum.

1089. 'Uthmān.
1090. Following the text's fa-'ayyarū, rather than Ibrāhīm's fa-ghayyarū.
1091. Cf. Qur'ān 12:53.
1092. Qur'ān 12:18, 21:112.
1093. Qur'ān 3:173.
1094. Reading either wa-kānifūhu with the text or wa-kātifūhu with the ms.

toward right. I have ordered him to do good to those of you who do good, to be severe with those of you who are suspect, and to be lenient with newcomers and latecomers.[1095] He's among those whose guidance I'm well satisfied with and whose goodness and sincere advice I always expect. So I request for you and for us from Almighty and Glorious Allāh right action and bountiful reward and far-reaching mercy. Peace be upon you and Allāh's mercy and blessings! Written by ʿUbaydallāh[1096] b. Abī Rāfiʿ in Ṣafar, 36.

Qays b. Saʿd then stood up to make a speech. He praised Allāh and magnified Him, asked Allāh's blessings upon Muḥammad, and said, "Praise to Allāh, Who has brought truth and destroyed falsehood and has prostrated the oppressors. Men! We have given allegiance to the best person after Muḥammad our Prophet we know, so arise all of you and give allegiance over the Book of Almighty and Glorious Allāh and the sunnah of His Messenger, for if we don't apply them over you, you won't owe us any allegiance." So the people stood and gave allegiance, and Egypt settled down under his command, and he sent out his provincial governors. However, there was one village there called Kharbitā,[1097] where there was a group that had taken ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān's murder very seriously, among them[1098] a man from Banū al-Ḥārith b. Mudlij[1099] from Kināna called Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith. These sent a message to Qays b. Saʿd: "We shall not fight you, so send out your governors; the land is yours. But let us remain as we [3238] are until we see what the people do." Then Maslamah b. Mukhallad al-Anṣārī[1100] of the clan Sāʿidah,[1101] one of Qays b. Saʿd's group, rose up and lamented the death of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān and called for revenge for his blood. But Qays b. Saʿd sent a message back to him: "Shame on you! Are you rising up against me?

1095. Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 354.
1096. See Addenda, DCXXXIV for the text's ʿUbayd.
1097. See p. 27, above.
1098. "Leading them" (IA).
1099. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 44, II, 310.
1100. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 187, II, 401.
1101. Thumma min Sāʿidah. Ibrāhīm has thumma man sāʿadahu "and so did his supporters."

By Allāh! I wouldn't want to kill you even if I were given the rule of Syria as well as Egypt." Maslamah sent back this message: "I shall not fight you as long as you are governor of Egypt."

Now Qays b. Sa'd had resolve and good judgment,[1102] so he sent a message to those at Kharbitā: "I am not going to force you to give allegiance. I will let you be and not fight you." So he made a truce with them and with Maslamah b. Mukhallad and collected the kharāj tax[1103] without anyone's resisting him.

It was while Qays was governing Egypt that the Commander of the Faithful went out against the army of the Camel, and he was still in his post when 'Alī went back to Kūfah from Baṣrah. Because of his closeness to Syria he was Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān's greatest problem. Mu'āwiyah was afraid that 'Alī would advance against him with the Iraqi army and that Qays b. Sa'd would advance against him with the Egyptian army and that Mu'āwiyah would be caught between the two.

Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān therefore wrote to Qays b. Sa'd. At this stage 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was at al-Kūfah, prior to his setting out for Ṣiffīn.

> From Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān to Qays b. Sa'd.[1104] Peace be upon you! After greetings. If you were resentful against 'Uthmān b. 'Affān for any preferential treatment you thought he was making, or for whippings he gave, or for verbal abuses against anyone, or for expulsions of others,[1105] or for putting youths in authority, you nevertheless knew—if you know anything—that to take his life > [3239] was not lawful for you. You have therefore perpetrated a heinous crime and done something shocking.[1106] So Qays b. Sa'd! If repenting for the murder of a believer can have any effect, then repent to Almighty and Glorious Allāh, for you were party to the crime against 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

1102. He was known as one of the seven duhāt.

1103. The land tax, EI[2], s.v.

1104. Note the absence of a basmala here and in the next two letters (but not the fourth).

1105. Like Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī.

1106. Qur'ān 19:89, said of those who say Allāh had a son. The ms. has amran for the Qur'ān text's shay'an.

> As for your companion,[1107] we have no doubt whatsoever that it was he who incited the people against ʿUthmān and urged them on to kill him until they did so. The majority of your own people are now implicated in his blood. So Qays, if you can join those demanding revenge for ʿUthmān's death, then do so.[1108] Follow our lead, and if I gain the victory you shall be given authority over al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah[1109] as long as I live. Authority over the Ḥijāz shall be given to any of your close family you wish, as long as I hold power. Ask of me also anything in addition to this you may want. You will not request anything without receiving it. So write and let me know your reaction to what I have written. Peace!

When Muʿāwiyah's letter reached him, he wanted to hold him off[1110] and not disclose his position to him and not to be in a hurry to make war with him, so he wrote to him:

> After greetings. I received your letter, and I understand what you say about the murder of ʿUthmān. But I did not commit it, nor was I in any way connected with it. You also say that it was my companion who incited the people against ʿUthmān and secretly urged them on until they killed him. This also I did not witness. You say, too, that the majority of my people are implicated in ʿUthmān's blood, but the very first group to stand up and demand retaliation for him was my tribe. Concerning your request to me to join behind your lead and your offer to me for doing so, I have understood it. It is something I will have [3240] to look into and think about. It is not something that should be rushed into. Meanwhile, I will not fight you, and nothing distasteful to you will come to you from my quarter until, Allāh willing, both you and I have considered the matter. Almighty and Glorious Allāh is the One 1107. ʿAlī.

1108. As a sort of repentance.
1109. Al-ʿIrāqayn.
1110. Cf. the next letter of Qays.

from Whom protection is to be sought. Peace be upon you, and the mercy of Allāh and His Blessings!

When Muʿāwiyah read his reply he realized he was trying pull-push tactics,[1111] and he was not sure that it would not end up as push-deceive.[1112] So Muʿāwiyah wrote to him again:

After greetings. I have read your letter, but I do not see you making approaches that lead me to recognize you as [offering] peace, nor do I see you distancing yourself in a way that leads me to recognize you as [offering] war. By taking such a position you are like the chin of the camel for slaughter.[1113] Men like myself, who have large numbers of men and fighting cavalry,[1114] do not make up to a deceiver, nor do they incline to a trickster. Peace be upon you!

When Qays b. Saʿd had read Muʿāwiyah's letter and realized that holding off and playing for time would not get anywhere with him, he wrote to him revealing his true intentions:

In the name of Allāh the Merciful, the Compassionate. From Qays b. Saʿd to Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. After greetings. I am astonished how you try to deceive me, how you desire to overcome me, and how you try to make me change my mind for the worse. Are you obliging me to renounce obedience to the most qualified of all people for the leadership, whose words are truest, whose actions are most rightly guided, and whose connections to the Messenger of God are closest? Are you then commanding me to enter into obedience to yourself—obedience to the most unqualified of all people for this rule, most ready of all to speak falsely, whose actions are most astray, and whose connections to Almighty and Glorious Allāh and [3241] His Messenger are most distant, a son of those who are astray and those who lead astray,[1115] one of the devil's

1111. Muqāriban mubāʿidan.
1112. Mubāʿidan mukāyidan.
1113. "Moving this way and that to try to trick the slaughterer"?
1114. Lit., "the reins of horses in his hand."
1115. Abū Sufyān, a major opponent of the Prophet.

> own devils? As for your statement that you will fill Egypt with horses and men to fight me, by Allāh! If I do not keep you concerned with yourself so that your very survival becomes the most worrying thing for you, you will be lucky. Peace!

On receiving Qays's letter, Muʿāwiyah lost hope for him; his being there in Egypt was a big impediment to him.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—[his father,][1116] Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Yūnus—al-Zuhrī: Egypt during ʿAlī's time was governed by Qays b. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah, the holder of the banner of the Anṣār alongside the Messenger of God. He was one of those of sound judgment and strong character. Now Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān and ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ were making great efforts to get him out of Egypt and take control of it, but he defended it with cunning and strategems. They had neither gained control of him nor captured Egypt until Muʿāwiyah tricked him through ʿAlī.[1117] When Muʿāwiyah was talking with some tribesmen of Quraysh, respected for their good judgment, he said: "I never devised a trick that pleased me more than the one with which I tricked Qays b. Saʿd through ʿAlī while he was in Iraq and Qays was resisting me. I said to the Syrians: 'Don't speak roughly to Qays b. Saʿd and don't put out any call to invade him. He supports us; his shrewd advice comes to us secretly. Don't you see what he has done with your brothers from the men of Kharbitā who are there under him? He pays them their allowances and provisions, he gives them security,[1118] and he treats any rider well that goes to him from you. They never find fault with him in any way.' So I made a point [3242] of writing to my Iraqi followers about all this," continued Muʿāwiyah, "so that ʿAlī's spies with me here and over in Iraq should hear it." From them it got back to ʿAlī—by Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib—and when ʿAlī heard of it he became suspicious of Qays and wrote to him, ordering him to go and fight the people of Kharbitā. The people of 1118. Lit. "their flocks" (Lane, 1341c), as also in Qays's letter to ʿAlī, p. 184, below.

---

1116. Cf. p. 187, below, and Addenda, DCXXXV.

1117. By the speech that follows and by a fabricated letter; see p. 185, below.

Kharbitā at that time numbered 10,000. Qays refused to fight them and wrote to ʿAlī.

> They are Egyptian notables and noblemen. Loyal men are among them. They agreed with me, provided I give them security and give them their allowances and provisions, although I am fully aware that their sympathies lie with Muʿāwiyah. So I see no way of maneuvering them that would be any easier for me or for you than what I am already doing with them. Were I to attack them they would be my match. They are lions of Arabs; among them are Busr b. Abīʿ[1119] Arṭāh, Maslamah b. Mukhallad,[1120] and Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj. So let me do things my way; I know how to cajole them.

The only course of action ʿAlī would accept was to fight them, but Qays refused and wrote again to ʿAlī, "If you suspect me, then remove me from your governorship and appoint someone else to it." ʿAlī therefore appointed al-Ashtar ruler of Egypt, but at al-Qulzum[1121] he drank a honey drink and died.[1122] News of this reached Muʿāwiyah and ʿAmr [b. al-ʿĀṣ], and the latter remarked, "Allāh has an army in honey!"[1123] On hearing of al-Ashtar's death at al-Qulzum, ʿAlī sent Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr as ruler of Egypt.

Al-Zuhrī said that ʿAlī sent Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr as ruler of Egypt after the death of al-Ashtar at Qulzum. But Hishām b. Muḥammad [b. al-Kalbī] in his account said the opposite—that ʿAlī sent al-Ashtar as ruler of Egypt after the death of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr.

1119. Addenda, DCXXXV and Ibrāhīm. A bedouin of Banū ʿĀmir of Quraysh and a fiery opponent of ʿAlī (*EI*², s.v.).

1120. Al-Anṣārī.

1121. The port at the top of the Red Sea (*EI*², s.v.).

1122. Poisoned by the local jāyastār, perhaps at the instigation of Muʿāwiyah (*EI*², s.v. al-Ashtar). Cf. Hawting, First Civil War, 145.

1123. Freytag, I, 10; *EI*², s.v. al-Ashtar. Cf. Qurʾān—lillāhi junūd al-samāwāt wa-al-arḍ. Muʿāwiyah is said to have done this on other occasions, e.g., by means of al-Jaʿdah bt. al-Ashʿath, who is said to have poisoned her husband, Ḥasan b. ʿAlī, for a large sum of money and the hand of Muʿāwiyah's son Yazīd (*EI*², s.v. al-Ḥasan).

Return to the account of Hishām [b. Muḥammad b. al-Kalbī] from Abū Mikhnaf [3243]

When Muʿāwiyah gave up hoping that Qays would comply with his authority, it made him very anxious, for he was well aware of Qays's determination and strength of character. So Muʿāwiyah feigned to the people around him that, "Qays b. Saʿd is on your side, so say prayers for him to Allāh!" He then read out to them the letter in which Qays had been compliant and accommodating toward Muʿāwiyah. He further fabricated a letter from Qays b. Saʿd and read it aloud to the Syrians:

> In the name of Allāh, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To the ruler Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān from Qays b. Saʿd. Greetings! I praise Allāh to you. There is no god but He! After greetings. I have considered the situation and I now realize that I can no longer support a party that killed their imām, a Muslim, unlawful to be killed, who was fulfilling his duties and was God-fearing. We therefore beg Almighty and Glorious Allāh pardon for our sins and ask Him to preserve our religion from error. Here I come in peace to you, responding to your call to fight the killers of ʿUthmān, the unjustly killed imām of guidance.[1124] So ask my assistance regarding whatever money and men you would like, and I will expedite them to you. Peace!

At this the news spread among the Syrians that Qays b. Saʿd had given allegiance to Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's spies conveyed it back to ʿAlī, and when he heard it he was distressed, shocked, and very surprised. He called his sons and ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar and told them. "What did you think?" he asked. "Commander of the Faithful," replied ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar. "Leave what you suspect for what you don't suspect! Remove Qays from Egypt!" "By Allāh! I cannot credit this from Qays," ʿAlī answered them. "But Commander of the Faithful," replied ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar, "remove him! Then, by Allāh! If this news is true he will not step down for you when you remove him."[1125] They were [3244]

1124. Reading imāmi . . . with Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXV) and Ibrāhīm.

1125. I.e., if he really has gone over to Muʿāwiyah, he will refuse to give up Egypt and simply rule it under Muʿāwiyah.

talking in this way when a letter from Qays b. Sa'd arrived, containing the following:

> In the name of Allāh, the Merciful, the Compassionate. After greetings. I inform the Commander of the Faithful, may Allāh ennoble him! that there are men facing me here who are abstaining.[1126] They have asked me to hold off from them and leave them alone until matters between the people have been put in order, at which time we may come to a decision and they may. I therefore thought it wise to hold off from them and not to rush into battle with them, but in the meanwhile to try to win them over. Perhaps Almighty and Glorious Allāh will make their minds more favorable to us and separate them from their error, if He wills.

"Commander of the Faithful!" said 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far. "I'm very afraid that this means he is in fact joining forces with them. Order him, Commander of the Faithful, to fight them!" 'Alī therefore wrote to him: "In the name of Allāh, the Merciful, the Compassionate. After greetings. Go to these people you mention! If they make allegiance to me as the Muslims have done, all well and good. But, if they do not, then fight them, God willing!"[1127]

When the letter reached Qays b. Sa'd and he read it he could not but write back to Commander of the Faithful:

> After greetings. Commander of the Faithful, I was astonished at your order. Are you ordering me to fight people who are holding back from you and leaving you free to fight your enemy? They will support your enemy against you if you go to war with them. Follow my advice, Commander of the Faithful! Hold back from them! Leaving them alone is the best thing to do. Peace!

When this letter reached 'Alī, 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far said to him, "Commander of the Faithful! Send Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr to rule Egypt! He will take care of it for you. Remove Qays! By Allāh I have heard that Qays says: 'By Allāh! A rule that is only established by killing Maslamah b. Mukhallad is a bad rule indeed! By Allāh I have no wish even to rule Syria along with Egypt as the killer of Ibn al-Mukhallad.'" [3245]

---

1126. From giving you/me their allegiance.
1127. Cf. the ḥadīth al-khārij 'alā imām zamānih kāfir.

Now ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar was the brother of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr by the same mother.[1128] So ʿAlī sent Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr as governor of Egypt and removed Qays.

Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr's Governorship of Egypt

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb[1129] al-Wālibī of Wālibah of al-Azd—his father:[1130] ʿAlī wrote a letter for [Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr] to take to the Egyptians. On his presenting it to Qays, Qays said to him: "What is the Commander of the Faithful doing? What has changed his mind? Has someone been saying things to him against me?" "No," replied Muḥammad, "this rule is yours." "By Allāh! Not even for a single hour will I stay in the same area as you," said Qays. So when ʿAlī removed him from office, he became furious, left Egypt, and headed for Medina. When he arrived there Ḥassān b. Thābit (who was one of the ʿUthmāniyyah) came up to him, pleased at his misfortune, and said: "'ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib has dismissed you. You killed ʿUthmān, and you're still guilty of the crime, and ʿAlī hasn't given you much thanks!" "It's not just your eye that's blind but your mind as well!" replied Qays b. Saʿd. "By Allāh! If it wouldn't be the cause of a war between my tribe and yours, I would break your neck! Get out of my sight!" Qays, accompanied by Sahl b. Ḥunayf, then left Medina for ʿAlī. Qays then told ʿAlī the whole story, and ʿAlī believed him. Qays and Sahl later accompanied ʿAlī at Ṣiffīn.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad [al-Marwazī]—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Yūnus—al-Zuhrī: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came to Egypt, so Qays left to stay in Medina. Marwān and al-Aswad b. Abī al-Bakhtarī[1131] then made Qays fear that he would be captured or killed. So he mounted his travel camel and [3246]

1128. Asmāʾ.
1129. Ibn Fuqaym (U. Sezgin, 206).
1130. U. Sezgin, 151–52.
1131. One of the 'Uthmāniyyah, like Marwān.

went and joined[1132] ʿAlī. Muʿāwiyah then sent an angry letter to Marwān and al-Aswad: "The two of you have reinforced ʿAlī with Qays b. Saʿd, with his good judgment and with his respected position. By Allāh! If you had reinforced him with a hundred thousand soldiers it would not have angered me more than your expelling Qays b. Saʿd to ʿAlī!"

Qays b. Saʿd came to ʿAlī and apprised him[1133] of what had happened. The killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr also reached him. All this made ʿAlī realize that Qays b. Saʿd had been contending against powerful plots and that those who had urged him to remove Qays b. Saʿd[1134] had been giving him poor advice. So from then on ʿAlī listened to Qays b. Saʿd at every turn.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb al-Wālibī—his father: I was[1135] with Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr when he came to Egypt and read out his commission to them:

> In the name of Allāh, the Merciful, the Compassionate. The commission of the servant of Allāh ʿAlī, the Commander of the Faithful, to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr on his appointment as ruler of Egypt.
>
> He commands him to piety toward Allāh and obedience personally and publicly; to fear of Almighty and Glorious Allāh regarding things unseen and seen; to le-> [3247] niency toward Muslims and harshness toward the dissolute; to justice toward the dhimmis; to establish the rights of the oppressed and to be severe with the oppressor; to forgiveness toward the people and to do good as far as he is able—Allāh rewards those who do good and punishes those who do wrong.
>
> He commands him to call those around him to obedience [to the imām] and to the community [of the imām].[1136] For the final issue and huge reward for them in so doing are incalculable and unfathomable.

1132. Reading fa-ṭamara or fa-ẓahara (cf. Prym's n. b); see pp. 5 and 43, above.

1133. Reading bāththahu (Addenda, DCXXXV).

1134. Like ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar.

1135. Following the correction to the ms. (kuntu maʿ for kataba).

1136. Ilā al-ṭāʿah wa-al-jamāʿah; cf. the Prophet's saying Ilzam al-ṭāʿah wa-al-jamāʿah (Wensinck, IV, 42a).

He commands him to collect the kharāj tax on land at the rate at which it was taxed before, neither to reduce it nor make new amendments to it; then to divide it among its recipients as they divided it before; to be gentle[1137] with them and to treat them equally in his meetings with them and his regard for them;[1138] and to let those near and those distant have equal rights.

He commands him to judge people with truth and to establish equity, not to follow personal desire or to fear the blame of others when following Almighty and Glorious Allāh. For Allāh, may His praise be magnified, is with those who are pious and who give priority to obeying Him and His commands over all others.

Written by ʿUbaydallāh[1139] b. Abī Rāfiʿ, mawlā of the Messenger of Allāh, this 1 Ramaḍān/February 21.

Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr then stood up to preach a sermon. He praised Allāh and glorified Him. "The right path of action has been disputed, but praise Allāh!" he said, "Who guided us and you and Who made us and you perceive much the ignorant are blind about. The Commander of the Faithful has placed me in charge of your affairs and has given me a commission, as you have just heard. ʿAlī gave me many instructions by word of mouth, and as far as I am able I will never neglect to do what is good for you. 'My success is from Allāh alone; on Him I have relied, and to Him I turn in repentance.'[1140] If you see that my leadership and deeds are in obedience and piety to Allāh, praise Almighty and Glorious Allāh for that, for He is the guide. But if you see any governor of [3248] mine governing wrongly and deviating, then bring him to me, and complain to me about him without fear. I prefer it that way, and it is your right. May Allāh through His mercy give us and you success in good works." Then he sat down.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Yazīd b. Ẓabyān al-Hamdānī:[1141] On being appointed ruler [of Egypt], Muḥammad b.

1137. Lane, 469b.
1138. Lane, 60b.
1139. Addenda, DCXXXV.
1140. Qur'ān 11:88.
1141. Following Prym, Ibrāhīm, and U. Sezgin, 225.

Abī Bakr corresponded with Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. He[1142] mentioned this correspondence that had passed between the two of them, but I am loath to detail it because it contains matter that most people could not tolerate.

Now Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr did not even wait a whole month before sending a message to that party that had withdrawn and with which Qays had made an accord. "Men!" he said in it. "Either you enter into obedience to us, or else you leave our territory!" "We will not do that," came their reply. "Leave us alone until we see how our situation turns out, and don't hasten to make war with us!" But Muḥammad insisted, so they resisted him and kept on their guard. They were therefore afraid of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr at the Battle of Ṣiffīn. But when news came that Muʿāwiyah and the Syrians had held out against ʿAlī, that ʿAlī and the Iraqis had withdrawn from Muʿāwiyah and the Syrians, and that their case had been referred to arbitration, they became bolder toward Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and openly came out to fight him. Seeing this, Muḥammad sent al-Ḥārith b. Jumhān al-Juʿfī to the men at Kharbitā (among whom was Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith of Banū Kinānah). He fought them, but they killed him. So he then sent a tribesman from Kalb called Ibn Muḍāhim, but [3249] they killed him too. Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] said, "It is said that in this year Māhawayh [Abrāz], the marzubān[1143] of Marw,[1144] came to ʿAlī to confirm the peace treaty concluded between himself and Ibn ʿAmir."

The account of this[1145]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī—Abū Zakariyyā' al-ʿAjlānī—Ibn Isḥāq—his teachers: After the Battle of the Camel Māhawayh Abrāz, the marzubān of Marw, came to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, confirming peace. So ʿAlī wrote a letter for him to the *dihqān*s[1146] of Marw, to the asāwirah,[1147] to the jundsalārīn,[1148] 1142. Probably Hishām.

1143. The warden of the march, i.e., the provincial governor (*EI*², s.v. Marzpān).
1144. The capital of Khurāsān at the time (*EI*², s.v.).
1145. Ibrāhīm has "The account of those who say this."
1146. The lesser feudal nobility of Sasanian Persia (*EI*², s.v.).
1147. The heavy mailed cavalry, which constituted the core of the Sasanian army (Morony, 198, 207–8, 528; *EI*², s.v. Asāwera; I, Humphreys, 80.
1148. An unusual expression, probably meaning officers, corps commanders, local military leaders, or the like, sālār being Persian for commander.

and to anyone else at Marw: "In the name of Allāh, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Peace to those who follow divine guidance! After greetings. Māhawayh Abrāz, the marzubān of Marw, came to me, and I am satisfied with him."

This was written in the year 36, but subsequently they reneged[1149] and locked the gates of Abrashahr.[1150]

ʿAlī Despatches Khulayd b. Ṭarīf to Khurāsān

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī—Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥanẓalah b. al-Aʿlam[1151]—Māhān al-Ḥanafī[1152]—al-Aṣbagh b. Nubātah al-Mujāshiʿī:[1153] ʿAlī sent Khulayd b. Qurrah al-Yarbūʿī—some say Khulayd b. Ṭarīf—to Khurāsān.

ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ Gives Allegiance to Muʿāwiyah

In this year, 36, ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ gave allegiance to Muʿāwiyah[1154] and made an agreement with him to fight ʿAlī.

The reason for this

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUthmān: When ʿUthmān was surrounded ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ left Medina and headed for Syria. "By Allāh! People of Medina!" he said. "Anyone who stays here until this man is killed[1155] will be smitten by Almighty and Glorious Allāh with ignominy. Anyone who cannot help him had better flee!" Off he then set, accompanied by his two sons, ʿAbdallāh and Muḥammad. Ḥassān b. Thābit also left a little later, and many others followed suit. [3250]

According to Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUthmān: While ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ was camped at ʿAjlān with his two sons a rider passed. "Where have you come from?" they asked. "Medina."

1149. Or "disbelieved": kafarū.

1150. The arabicized form of Aparshahr, i.e., Nīshāpūr, the district capital of western Khurāsān (*EI*², s.v. Abarshahr).

1151. U. Sezgin, 205.

1152. U. Sezgin, 205.

1153. Abū al-Qāsim al-Kūfī, ʿAlī's ṣāḥib al-shurṭah (U. Sezgin, 205).

1154. I.e., as caliph.

1155. Reading qatl, following Addenda, DCXXXV and Ibrāhīm.

"What's your name?" asked ʿAmr. "Ḥaṣīrah." "The man[1156] has been besieged,"[1157] retorted ʿAmr. "What's the news?" "I left the man surrounded," replied the rider. "He'll be dead," said ʿAmr. They waited a few days; then another rider passed. "Where have you come from?" they asked. "Medina." "What's your name?" asked ʿAmr. "Qattāl." "The man has been killed,"[1158] retorted ʿAmr. "What's the news?" "The man has been killed," replied the rider, "but nothing else occurred before I left." They waited a few more days; then another rider passed. "Where have you come from?" they asked. "Medina." "What's your name?" asked ʿAmr. "Ḥarb." "It's war,"[1159] retorted ʿAmr. "What's the news?" "ʿUthmān b ʿAffān has been killed," replied the rider, "and allegiance has been given to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." "I am Abū ʿAbdallāh!"[1160] said ʿAmr. "There will be a war, in which whoever scrapes a wound in it will open it right up! May Allāh have mercy on ʿUthmān. May He be pleased with him, and may He forgive him!" "Men of Quraysh!" spoke up Salāmah b. Zinbāʿ al-Judhāmī. "By [3251] Allāh! There was a door[1161] between you and the other Arab tribes. You must take on another door because the first one is now broken." "That's what we want to do," replied ʿAmr, "but the door will be mended only by augers that can drill out the truth from the root of the problem,[1162] so that men will be equal before the law." Referring to the situation ʿAmr then recited:

I am heartbroken over Mālik, but can grief deflect what has been stored up by divine decree?
Is it heatstroke that has felled them?
    If so, I excuse them, or is it that my people are drunk?[1163] 1156. I.e., ʿUthmān.

1157. Ḥuṣir, playing on the man's name, as again twice in what follows. The ms. adds, "and has been killed."

1158. Qutila.

1159. Ḥarb.

1160. Is he reminding those around of his fame and important position?

1161. ʿUthmān.

1162. Ḥāfiratu al-ba'r. The image is of something having to be dug out from the hoof of disaster, from the very bottom of a difficult situation.

1163. ʿAmr is referring to the Muslims who did not support ʿUthmān (Mālik in the poem). He would excuse them if it were due to circumstances beyond their

Then he set off on foot, weeping like a woman and saying: "I mourn for ʿUthmān! I lament for modesty and religion!" He went to Damascus, for he had received some information about what was going to happen and acted on it.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh—Abū ʿUthmān: The Prophet had sent ʿAmr to ʿUmān, and when he was there he heard a prediction from a Jewish scholar. Then, when he saw it come true while he was still there, he sent a message to this scholar: "Speak to me about the death of the Messenger of God, and tell me who will come after him!" "The man who wrote[1164] to you will come after him, but he will only rule for a short time," he replied. "Then who?" asked ʿAmr. "A fellow tribesman of his of a similar standing." "How long will he rule?" "For a long time, but then he will be killed." "By assassination or in front of the community?"[1165] asked ʿAmr. "By assassination." "Who will then rule after him?" asked ʿAmr. "A fellow tribesman of his of a similar standing." "How long will he rule?" "For a long time, but then he will be killed." "By assassination or in front of the community?" asked ʿAmr. "In front of the community." "That's far worse," said ʿAmr. "So who will rule [3252] after him?" "A fellow tribesman of his but behind whom Muslims will not unite and in whose time a fierce civil war will break out. He will then be killed before they can reach agreement about him." "By assassination or in front of the community?" asked ʿAmr. "By assassination, and his like will never be seen again." "Who will then rule after him?" asked ʿAmr. "The ruler of the Holy Land,[1166] and his kingdom will last a long time. Those who formerly differed and failed to unite will agree about him. He will die a natural death," replied the scholar.

According to al-Wāqidī—Mūsā b. Yaʿqūb—his uncle: When the news of ʿUthmān's murder reached ʿAmr, he said: "I am Abū ʿAbdallāh![1167] It was I who killed him, even though I'm in Wādī al-control, but the implication is that they were fully responsible for losing their senses.

---

1164. Abū Bakr presumably wrote on behalf of the Prophet. Abū Bakr was of Taym.

1165. I.e., will the killer(s) not be afraid to kill in front of everyone?

1166. Al-arḍ al-muqaddasah. A Jewish scholar is narrating.

1167. See p. 192, above.

Sibāʿ. Who will succeed to this authority after him? If it's Ṭalḥah, then he's the foremost Arab in generosity.[1168] If it's ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, then I can't see him giving anything more than he will be obligated to. For me he would be the very worst person to succeed."

News then reached him that allegiance had been given to ʿAlī. This was extremely serious for him, so he lay low for a few days to see what the Muslims would do. He then heard of the departure of Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, and ʿĀʾishah, so he said, "I will wait and see what they achieve!" But when he was told that Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr had been killed he became confused. However, someone then said to him, "Muʿāwiyah is in Syria; he doesn't want to give allegiance to ʿAlī, so why not ally[1169] with Muʿāwiyah?" He did prefer Muʿāwiyah to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Someone said, "Muʿāwiyah is taking the murder of ʿUthmān very seriously and is agitating for revenge for his blood," and ʿAmr said, "Call Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh to me."

They were called to him, and he said: "You have heard about the murder of ʿUthmān and the Muslims' allegiance to ʿAlī, and [3253] Muʿāwiyah's plans to oppose ʿAlī, so what do you both think? As for ʿAlī, there will be no benefit with him. He is a man who takes full advantage of his Islamic precedence. He is not going to delegate any of his authority to me."[1170] "The Prophet died pleased with you," ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr replied. "Abū Bakr died pleased with you; ʿUmar died pleased with you. My opinion is that you should not do anything. Just wait at home until the Muslims have agreed upon an imām. Then you may give him allegiance." "You are one of the most important Arab chiefs," said Muḥammad, "so this affair should not be agreed upon without your having a vote or say in it." "What you are recommending[1171] me to do, ʿAbdallāh," replied ʿAmr, "is better for me in the hereafter and safer for my religion. What you are recommending me to do, Muḥammad, is

1168. Fa-huwa fatā al-ʿArab sayban (Glossarium, CCCII). Dots added to the ms. give nasaban, "in lineage."

1169. Reading qārabta with Ibrāhīm, rather than the text's qāranta, "join forces."

1170. ʿAmr became Muslim much later than ʿAlī.

1171. Lit., "ordering"; cf. pp. 48, 51, above, where Ḥasan orders ʿAlī (but is disobeyed).

more glorious[1172] for my life here on earth but worse for me in the hereafter."

ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ then left with his two sons and went to Muʿāwiyah. He found the Syrians urging Muʿāwiyah to seek revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān. "You are in the right," ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ said to them. "Seek revenge for the blood of the unjustly killed caliph!" Muʿāwiyah, however, did not pay any attention to ʿAmr's words. So ʿAmr's two sons said to their father: "Don't you realize that Muʿāwiyah isn't paying any attention to what you say? Leave him for someone else!" But ʿAmr did go to Muʿāwiyah, and said: "By Allāh! What you're doing is very surprising. I have given you my support, and here you are ignoring me. I swear by Allāh! If we fight alongside you in revenge for the blood of the caliph, there will still be something that goes against the grain, for we will be [3254] fighting someone whose Islamic precedence, virtue, and close relationship to the Prophet you know well. But in fact all we're really after is this world." At this, Muʿāwiyah made up with him and was friendly toward him.

ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib Sends Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī to Call Muʿāwiyah to Acknowledge ʿAlī's Authority over Him

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī said:[1173] In this year, as ʿAlī was leaving al-Baṣrah for al-Kūfah, having finished with the Battle of the Camel, he sent Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī to call Muʿāwiyah to give allegiance to him. Now, when ʿAlī set out for al-Baṣrah to fight his opponents there, Jarīr had been in Hamadhān[1174] as its governor. ʿUthmān had appointed him to this post. Al-Ashʿath b. Qays[1175] was governor of Ādharbāyjān,[1176] also appointed by ʿUthmān. So, when ʿAlī came to al-Kūfah from al-Baṣrah, he wrote to these two men, commanding them to get allegiance to him from their subjects and to come to him. Both then got allegiance and set off to see ʿAlī.

1172. Anbahu (Glossarium, D).
1173. Following the ms.
1174. In central Iran, 48° 31′ E, 34° 48′ N (*EI*², s.v.).
1175. Abū Muḥammad Maʿdīkarib b. Qays, a chief of Kindah in the Ḥaḍramawt, d. 40/661 (*EI*², s.v.).
1176. West of the Caspian (*EI*², s.v.).

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—ʿAwānah: Then, when ʿAlī was looking for a messenger to send to Muʿāwiyah, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh said: "Send me, for he likes me. When I get to him I will call him to acknowledge your authority." Al-Ashtar said to ʿAlī, however: "Don't send him! By Allāh! I suspect he's inclined toward Muʿāwiyah." "Let him go," replied ʿAlī, "and we shall see what he comes back to us with." So he sent him and wrote a letter for him to take. In it he informed Muʿāwiyah of the agreement of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār to give allegiance to ʿAlī, of Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's going back on their allegiance, and of his war with the two of them. He went on to call him to acknowledge his authority, as the Muhājirūn and Anṣār had done.

Jarīr therefore set off to see Muʿāwiyah, but when he arrived [3255] Muʿāwiyah put him off and kept him waiting. [Muʿāwiyah] then called ʿAmr and asked his advice about ʿAlī's letter to him. ʿAmr advised him to send a message to the Syrian chiefs, implicating ʿAlī in ʿUthmān's blood and so get them to fight for him against ʿAlī. Muʿāwiyah followed his advice.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr[1177] came to the Syrians with the bloodstained shirt ʿUthmān was wearing when he was killed, and with the severed fingers of Nāʾilah,[1178] his wife—two with the knuckles and part of the palm, two cut off at the base, and half a thumb—Muʿāwiyah hung the shirt on the minbar and wrote to the Syrian garrison towns.[1179] The people kept on coming and crying over it as it hung on the minbar, with the fingers attached to it, for a whole year. The Syrian soldiers swore an oath that they would not make love to women or undertake the major ablution[1180] unless obligated by seminal discharge during sleep or sleep on beds until they had killed the killers of ʿUthmān and anyone who might prevent them in any way, unless they should 1177. Al-Anṣārī, later governor of Kūfah and Ḥimṣ, a follower of ʿUthmān and then of Muʿāwiyah; killed after Marj Rāhiṭ, 65/684 (EI[1], s.v.).

1178. Bint al-Furāfiṣah of Kalb; she had tried to defend ʿUthmān. Cf. Abbott, Aishah, 126, 135.

1179. Ajnād. Lane, 470a; EI[2], s.v. Djund.

1180. As far as men are concerned, apart from washing the dead, this is only obligatory after ejaculation; Lane, 466c, 2259a; EI[2], s.v. Ghusl. It is only mustaḥabb or sunnah after Friday prayer. The soldiers' oath was urgent—they abjured pleasure, cleanliness, and comfort.

die meanwhile. They remained around the shirt for a year. It was placed each day on the minbar; sometimes it was made to cover it and was draped over it, and Nā'ilah's fingers were attached to its cuffs.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—ʿAwānah: Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh then came to ʿAlī and told him what Muʿāwiyah was doing and how the Syrians had agreed with him to fight ʿAlī. He told him how they were weeping over ʿUthmān and saying that ʿAlī had killed him and was sheltering ʿUthmān's killers and how they would not stop until he had killed them or they had killed him. So al-Ashtar said to ʿAlī: "I was warning you strongly[1181] against sending Jarīr. I told you he was an enemy and a deceiver. It would have been better if you had sent me rather than this man, who stayed with Muʿāwiyah [so long] that he opened every door that [Muʿāwiyah] wanted open and closed every door that [Muʿāwiyah] feared." "Had you been there," replied Jarīr, "they would have killed you. They actually named you as one of ʿUthmān's killers." "By Allāh! If I had gone to them, Jarīr," retorted al-Ashtar, "I would always have found an answer for them, and I would have forced Muʿāwiyah to act before he had time to think. Had the Commander of the Faithful followed my advice[1182] concerning you, he would have thrown you and those like you into a jail you would not get out of until these matters were sorted out properly." [3256] Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh then left for Qarqīsiyyā'.[1183] He wrote to Muʿāwiyah, who replied, ordering him to come to him. The Commander of the Faithful also left and encamped at al-Nukhaylah.[1184] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās[1185] joined him there, accompanied by a number of Baṣrans who had responded to his call to fight.

1181. Kuntu nahaytuka; cf. note 1171, above.
1182. Lit., "obeyed me"; cf. note 1171, above.
1183. A town in al-Jazīrah on the left bank of the Euphrates, close to the confluence with the Khābūr (*EI*², s.v.).
1184. About one days' ride from al-Kūfah for an army.
1185. ʿAlī's governor of al-Baṣrah.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XVII

The First Civil War

TRANSLATED BY G. R. HAWTING

The Events of the Year 36 (cont'd) (JUNE 30, 656–JUNE 18, 657)

The Departure of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib for Ṣiffīn[1] [3256]

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Mu'āwiyah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Abū Bakr

1. For the background to the following reports about the prelude to the Battle of Ṣiffīn and the fighting there, see Translator's Foreword to the present volume. For further information, discussion, and references to sources and secondary materials, see *EI*², s.vv. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, Ṣiffīn, etc.; Caetani, Annali dell'Islam (henceforth Ann.), vol. IX, 36A.H., §346ff.; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 75–112; Hinds, "Banners and Battle Cries," 3ff.; idem, "The Siffin Arbitration Agreement," 93ff. For parallel versions and other accounts, in addition to the materials compiled and translated into Italian in Ann. (including references to the editions and manuscripts used), see especially Naṣr b. Muzāḥim al-Minqarī, WṢ; and Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, SNB. Material relating to the Battle of Ṣiffīn is scattered throughout the twenty volumes of SNB, but see especially vol. III, 165ff., 244ff.; vol. IV, 13–32, 175–258; vol. V, 302–17; vol. VIII, 9–102; vol. IX, 301–3; vol. X, 102–7; vol. XV, 104, 12–24. WṢ is frequently cited in SNB. Material from the relevant part of al-Balādhurī's Ansāb al-ashrāf is available in Italian in Levi Della Vida, "Il Califfato di Ali secondo il Kitāb Ansāb al-ašrāf di al-Balāḏurī" (see pp. 449ff. for the events narrated here), as well as scattered throughout vols. IX and X of Ann.

al-Hudhalī:[2] When 'Alī had appointed 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās as his deputy over al-Baṣrah,[3] went from there to al-Kūfah, where he got ready to go to Ṣiffīn. He asked for advice about that. Some advised him to send his forces but remain in al-Kūfah himself, whereas others recommended that he go with the men. He insisted on taking command himself, and he prepared his men.

[3257] News of that reached Mu'āwiyah, who summoned 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ[4] and asked his advice. 'Amr said, "Since you have heard that 'Alī is on his way, set out yourself and be sure to confront him with your views and your strategies." Mu'āwiyah replied, "In that case, Oh Abū 'Abdallāh, prepare the men!"

'Amr proceeded to work them up and to disparage the strength of 'Alī and his followers, saying, "The men of Iraq have split among themselves, sapped their own strength, and blunted their cutting edge. Moreover, the Baṣrans are opposed to 'Alī, who has done them harm and dealt death to them.[5] Their leaders and those of the Kūfans wiped each other out at the Battle of the Camel, and 'Alī has set out with only a band few in number, among whom are those who killed your caliph. Fear God, lest you forfeit your right to claim vengeance and allow the blood of 'Uthmān[6] to go unavenged."

Mu'āwiyah conscripted men into the armies of the Syrians[7] and tied his banner for 'Amr,[8] and 'Amr in turn tied one for, among

---

2. The chain of transmission from al-Marwazī to 'Abdallāh [b. al-Mubārak] (d. 181/797; see GAS, I, 95) was frequently cited by Ṭabarī; for Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī (d. 167/783–784), see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 46, no. 180.

3. For 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās, cousin of the Prophet and ancestor of the future dynasty of 'Abbāsid caliphs, see *EI*², s.v.; for his appointment over al-Baṣrah following 'Alī's victory at the Battle of the Camel, see Ṭabarī, I, 3230.

4. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ (Abū 'Abdallāh) was the conqueror of Egypt and had been its governor for a time. In the struggle between Mu'āwiyah and 'Alī, 'Amr appears as Mu'āwiyah's right-hand man (see *EI*², s.v.; and, for the historical image of 'Amr in this struggle, Petersen, 'Alī and Mu'āwiya).

5. The Baṣrans generally had fought against 'Alī and his Kūfan supporters at the Battle of the Camel (see *EI*², s.v. Djamal).

6. Literally, "your blood," but see Gloss., s.v. b-ṭ-l.

7. Wa-kattaba fī ajnādi ahli al-Sha'm; the preposition fī suggests this translation, rather than "he formed troops into katā'ib." See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. k-t-b, forms 2 and 8.

8. 'Aqada liqā'ahu li-fulān, "he tied his banner for so-and-so," is a stock expression for "he appointed so-and-so to the command." On the use of banners among the Arabs, see *EI*², s.v. 'Alam; and the literature cited in Hinds, "Banners and Battle Cries," p. 8, nn. 28, 29; and Athamina, "Black Banners," 307–26, esp. p. 316.

others, his attendant (ghulām) Wardān[9] and his two sons 'Abdallāh and Muḥammad.[10] 'Alī appointed his ghulām Qanbar. Consequently 'Amr said:

Will Wardān suffice me against Qanbar, and the Sakūn against the Ḥimyar,
When the men of courage don the armor?[11]

'Alī heard that and replied:

I shall meet al-'Āṣī b. al-'Āṣī[12] with 70,000 men ready for war,[13]
Riding the horses and the young camels side by side and tying to their hind parts the links of the chain mail.[14]

When Mu'āwiyah heard that, he said (to 'Amr), "It seems to me tht Ibn Abī Ṭālib is a match for you (qad wafā laka)," and he began to proceed more cautiously. He wrote to everybody he thought was [3258] afraid of 'Alī or had spoken evil of him[15] and to everybody who considered the shedding of 'Uthmān's blood to have been a grave matter, and he asked for their help against him. When al-Walīd (b. 'Uqbah)[16] saw that, he sent to Mu'āwiyah,

Indeed tell Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥarb:
"You are held to shame by a man of trust.

---

9. Wardān is often referred to as the mawlā of 'Amr (e.g., Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 215).

10. For 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, noted transmitter of ḥadīth and specialist in apocalyptic tradition, see Wensinck, A Handbook of Early Muhammadan Tradition, s.v. For Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, see al-Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 411.

11. For the Banū al-Sakūn (of Kindah), see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; for the Banū Ḥimyar, ibid., s.v.

12. Al-'Āṣī b. al-'Āṣī is a pun. In its full form the name of 'Amr's father was al-'Āṣī (generally shortened to al-'Āṣi and thence to al-'Āṣ), which can mean "the disobedient one" or "the rebel."

13. or, "full of anger"; see the expressions 'aqada liḥyatahu and 'aqada nāṣiyatahu in Lane, Lexicon, s.v. 'aqada.

14. Possibly the camels were ridden to the place of battle to conserve the horses, which were then used in the fighting.

15. The Arabic could be read to mean that Mu'āwiyah wrote to all those who thought that he (Mu'āwiyah) was afraid of 'Alī and who had said evil things about him. Possibly he was writing to Iraqis in an attempt to deflect them from supporting 'Alī.

16. Al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ was a cousin of Mu'āwiyah and former governor of al-Kūfah (see al-Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 138ff.).

You have wasted time like the stallion camel of arousal,[17] confined and bellowing in Damascus but unable to move.
You and your writing to 'Alī are like a woman tanning a hid that has become worm-eaten and useless.[18]
Each band of riders for the emaciated camels of Iraq, tripping along, excites in you the desire for the rule.[19]
But he who seeks revenge does not hang back but seeks it relentlessly.
If you were the slain one,[20] and he ('Uthmān) were alive, he would have drawn his sword, not turning aside, unflagging,
And not shirking from seeking vengeance until he had slain in retaliation for it, not weary or sticking in one place.
Your family in Medina have been wiped out, cast down like chaff."

Narrators other than Abū Bakr (al-Hudhalī) say that Mu'āwiyah summoned his secretary Shaddād b. Qays[21] and told him, "Find me a scroll to write on." When he had brought him one, Shaddād took up the pen and began to write, but Mu'āwiyah said, "Do not rush! Write:

"How surprised (he is) by what he sees of our deliberateness, but, if war had buffeted him, he would not have said a word!"[22]

He then told Shaddād, "Roll up the scroll," and he sent it to al-Walīd (b. 'Uqbah), who, when he opened it, found only this one verse inside.

---

17. For al-sadim al-mu'annā, see Lane, Lexicon, s.vv. It refers to a stallion camel that is led among females to arouse them then, having done so, is not allowed to couple but is taken away and tethered apart, bellowing in frustration.

18. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥalima; Freytag (tr.), Arabum proverbia (= al-Maydānī, Majma' al-amthāl), II, 346.

19. I find the sense of this line elusive. It perhaps continues the imagery of line 2, but, if so, the metaphor seems to obscure the meaning.

20. The text reads "if I were slain," but see Add. et emend.

21. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to him.

22. The verse is attributed to Aws b. Ḥajar (Dīwān, ed. Muḥammad Yūsuf Najm [Beirut, 1960], no. 48, verse 25 [p. 121]).

According to Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī, when 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib marched to meet Mu'āwiyah, one of the men of Iraq wrote these two verses:

Tell the Commander of the Faithful [3259] when you arrive, O brother of Iraq,
"Iraq and its people eagerly await you, so come."[23]

According to 'Awānah (whose account is now resumed)[24], 'Alī sent Ziyād b. al-Naḍr al-Ḥārithī[25] ahead with 8,000 men as an advance guard and with him Shurayḥ b. Ḥāni'[26] with 4,000. 'Alī set out from al-Nukhaylah[27] with his men, and, after he had entered al-Madā'in,[28] the fighting men stationed there left with him. He put Sa'd b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī, the paternal uncle of al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd,[29] in charge of al-Madā'in and sent Ma'qil b. Qays[30] on from there with 3,000 men, telling him to go by way of al-Mawṣil[31] and then join him.

---

23. The verses do not seem to fit in with the events as reported: they make it appear that 'Alī was somewhere else and that the Iraqis were calling him to come (to lead them against Mu'āwiyah?). It might be possible to read "Commander of the Faithful" in the vocative and understand something like "O Commander of the Faithful, when you arrive tell any Iraqi (on the side of Mu'āwiyah) . . .," but the second verse would be more suitably addressed to 'Alī than to any ordinary Iraqi.

24. For 'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī, an important Kūfan collector and transmitter of tradition (d. ca. 153/770), see EI², s.v.; and GAS, I, 307–8. 'Awānah's material here is cited by Ṭabarī from 'Umar b. Shabbah from al-Madā'inī (see n. 401, below.) Ṭabarī's previous citation of the material from this source broke off at the point where this volume of translation begins. The story had reported how, following his unsuccessful sending of Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī to demand Mu'āwiyah's allegiance, 'Alī had moved out to the army camp at al-Nukhaylah, where he had been joined by Ibn 'Abbās and the men from al-Baṣrah.

25. For Ziyād b. al-Naḍr (of the Banū Madhḥij), see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

26. For Shurayḥ b. Hāni' (also of Madhḥij), see ibid., s.v. Šuraiḥ.

27. The usual place for the gathering of the Kūfan army, apparently northwest of al-Kūfah on the road to Syria.

28. Al-Madā'in was the Arabic name for the former Sasanid capital, Ctesiphon, on the Tigris south of the subsequently built city of Baghdad (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 33ff.).

29. For al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd al-Thaqafī, a major figure in the subsequent history of al-Kūfah, see EI², s.v. He had been brought up by his uncle Sa'd, following the death of his father during the conquest of Iraq.

30. Of the Banū Tamīm (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.); for his subsequent role in the suppression of the revolt of al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid, see pp. 181ff., below.

31. That is, Mosul in Mesopotamia.

'Alī Orders the Construction of the Bridge over the Euphrates

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī—'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār b. 'Abd Yaghūth al-Bāriqī:[32] When 'Alī reached al-Raqqah,[33] he ordered the Raqqans, "Build me a bridge so that I can cross from this place to Syria." They, however, refused, having seized control over the boats (which would be used for the bridge). 'Alī therefore departed from them to cross from Jisr Manbij,[34] leaving al-Ashtar[35] behind over the Raqqans while he himself went to move on with his men to cross with them at Jisr Manbij.

Al-Ashtar summoned the Raqqans and addressed them: "People of this fortress! I swear to you by God that if the Commander of the Believers goes on without your having made a bridge for him by your town so that he can cross, I will bare the sword among you [3260] and kill the men, devastate the land, and seize your possessions." The Raqqans met one with another and said, "Does not al-Ashtar fulfill what he swears or perpetrate something even worse?" "Yes." Therefore, they sent to him, saying, "We will make a bridge for you, so approach." 'Alī came, they made the bridge for him, and he crossed over it with his baggage and footsoldiers. Then he ordered al-Ashtar, and he move up with 3,000 horsemen, until all of the men had crossed. Finally, al-Ashtar, the last of the men, crossed on foot.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī—'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār b. 'Abd Yaghūth: When the cavalry crossed they were all jostling together and the hat (qalansuwah)[36] of 'Abdallāh b. Abī 32. For Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, important Kūfan scholar, d. ca. 206/821, see *EI*², s.v. Kalbī; and GAS, I, 268–71; for Abū Mikhnaf, Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā, d. 157/774, see *EI*², s.v.; GAS, I, 308–9; and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf.

---

33. For al-Raqqah, on the east bank of the Euphrates at approximately the same latitude as Mosul on the Tigris, see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 101ff.; and *EI*¹, s.v. Rakka.

34. That is, "The Bridge of Manbij," considerably to the north of al-Raqqah; from there the road went to Manbij (ancient Hierapolis), northeast of Aleppo (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 107f.).

35. For Mālik (b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakha'ī) al-Ashtar, 'Alī's right-hand man, see *EI*² s.v. al-Ashtar; and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Mālik.

36. For the qalansuwah, a tall Persian headpiece, see Dozy, Vêtements, s.v.

al-Ḥusayn al-Azdī[37] fell off. He dismounted, picked it up, and rode on. Then the qalansuwah of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Azdī fell off, and he dismounted, picked it up, and rode on. He said to his companion:

If, as is said, the augur's idea is true,
I shall be killed shortly and so will you.

'Abdallāh b. Abī al-Ḥusayn said, "Nothing that could happen would be dearer to me than what you have mentioned." And they were killed together at Ṣiffīn.[38]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Khālid b. Qaṭan al-Ḥārithī: When 'Alī had crossed the Euphrates, he summoned Ziyād b. al-Naḍr and Shurayḥ b. Hāni' and sent them ahead toward Mu'āwiyah as a vanguard in the same role in which they had left al-Kūfah. Having been sent by 'Alī from al-Kūfah, Ziyād and Shurayḥ had followed [3261] the (west) bank of the Euphrates from the desert ajoining al-Kūfah as far as 'Ānāt.[39] There they heard that 'Alī had taken the road to al-Jazīrah and also that Mu'āwiyah had set out from Damascus with the forces of the Syrians to meet 'Alī. They said, "By God, we do not think it good that we should go on, with this expanse of water between us and the Muslims and the Commander of the Faithful. It would be bad for us if we were to meet the armies of the Syrians with our few men, cut off from reinforcement and support." They went out to cross the river from 'Ānāt, but the people of that place prevented them and stopped them getting boats, and they had to go back and cross from Hīt.[40] Then they joined up with 'Alī at a settlement below Qarqīsiyā'.[41] They had intended to attack the

37. On 'Abdallāh b. Abī al-Ḥusayn al-Azdī and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Azdī, see further (p. 51, below); and for the latter, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

38. The Arabic yawm Ṣiffīn, literally "on the day of Ṣiffīn," recurs frequently throughout Muslim tradition. Yawm ("day") is a common word for "battle," but it is clear from the narrative that the events at Ṣiffīn occupied several days. I have generally translated, therefore, by the less specific "at Ṣiffīn" or "the Battle of Ṣiffīn."

39. 'Ānāt on the west bank of the Euphrates (virtually due west of Takrīt on the Tigris) was counted by the medieval Muslim geographers as the most southerly major settlement on the Euphrates in al-Jazīrah (Mesopotamia) (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, index, s.v. 'Anah).

40. For Hīt, also on the west bank and considerably south of 'Ānāt, see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and 65.

41. Qarqīsiyā' (Circesium), at the junction of the Khābūr and Euphrates Rivers about 200 miles below al-Raqqah, is far to the north of 'Ānāt; see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and 105.

people of 'Ānāt, but the latter fortified themselves, so they withdrew.

When their advance force joined up with 'Alī, he said, "My vanguard has come to me from the rear!" Ziyād b. al-Naḍr al-Ḥārithī and Shurayḥ b. Hāni' approached him and told him what they had thought when they heard about what was happening, and 'Alī said, "You acted rightly." Then 'Alī went on, and, having crossed the Euphrates, he sent them ahead toward Mu'āwiyah.

Reaching Sūr al-Rūm,[42] they met Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī 'Amr b. Sufyān[43] with an army of Syrians. They, therefore, sent a message back to 'Alī: "We have encountered Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī with an army of Syrians. We have appealed to them, but not one of them has responded. Tell us what we should do." In response 'Alī sent to al-Ashtar, saying:

> Oh Mālik, Ziyād and Shurayḥ have sent informing me that they have encountered Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī with a body of the Syrians, and the messenger tells me that he left them confronting one another. Hasten to save your companions.[44] When you reach them you are in charge, but do not begin fighting the enemy, unless they attack > [3262] you first, before meeting with them, appealing to them, and having been heard. "Do not allow their hatred to provoke you"[45] into fighting them before you have appealed to them and given them every chance, again and again, to change their views. Place Ziyād over your right wing and Shurayḥ over your left, and put yourself in the middle of your men. Do not approach close to them as if provoking war but do not keep at a distance as if fearing harm, until I come to you, for, God willing, I shall be hurrying on behind you.

---

42. This is, apparently, Ṭabarī's only reference to Sūr al-Rūm, which is not mentioned by Yāqūt or Le Strange; the name occurs in the same form in the parallel passage in WS, 153—apparently its only occurrence in that work.

43. For the military activity of this man in the time of the Prophet and during the conquest of Syria, see Lecker, The Banū Sulaym, index, s.v. Abu 'l-A'war; and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Amr b. Sufyān.

44. See Gloss., s.v. n-j-w.

45. See Qur'ān, 5:2, 8.

Abū Mikhnaf said that the messenger was al-Ḥārith b. Jumhān al-Ju'fī.[46]

'Alī wrote to Ziyād and Shurayḥ: "I have appointed Mālik (al-Ashtar) over you. Take heed of what he says and obey him. He is someone from whom neither rashness,[47] nor erroneous conduct is to be feared, and neither slowness regarding what is best done quickly nor rushing into what is best held back from. I have given him orders similar to those I gave you—that he should not begin an attack before meeting them and appealing to them and giving them every chance."

Al-Ashtar departed and came to the enemy. He followed 'Alī's orders and refrained from fighting, and they continued confronting one another. Then, at evening, Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī attacked them, but they stood firm and swapped blows for a while, and the Syrians withdrew.

The next day Hāshim b. 'Utbah al-Zuhrī[48] went out against the Syrians with a troop of horsemen and footsoldiers, many in number and well-equipped. Abū al-A'war came out to meet him, and they fought for that day, the horsemen attacking the horsemen and the footsoldiers attacking the footsoldiers. The Syrians held firm, man to man, and then they withdrew. Al-Ashtar attacked them, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Mundhir al-Tanūkhī[49] was killed. Ẓabyān b. 'Umārah [3263] al-Tamīmī,[50] who was only a raw youth, killed him, while al-Tanūkhī was the leading horseman of the Syrians. Al-Ashtar started saying, "Woe to you! Show me Abū al-A'war!"

Abū al-A'war called his men, and they went back to him, and he took up position behind the place where he had been at first. Al-Ashtar came and organized his men in lines in the place that Abū al-A'war had occupied. He told Sinān b. Mālik al-Nakha'ī,[51] "Go to

46. See (p. 44, below). Of the Banū Madhḥij (see n. 174), he sometimes appears as al-Ḥārith b. Juhmān (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. al-Ḥārit̲ b. Ǧuhmān).

47. Rahaq; see Qur'ān 72:6, 13.

48. For Hāshim b. 'Utbah al-Zuhrī, al-A'war, al-Miqdāl, who had lost an eye at Yarmūk and been present at Qādisiyyah, see al-Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 263–64; and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Hāšim; and see further later (p. 70ff.)

49. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to 'Abdallāh b. al-Mundhir al-Tanūkhī.

50. Cairo has Ẓabyān b. 'Ammār; see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ẓabyān b. 'Umāra.

51. The following seems to be Ṭabarī's only mention of Sinān, who does not appear in Ibn al-Kalbī. Al-Ashtar's subsequent address of him as "my nephew," if it is to be taken literally, could indicate that a name had been omitted from his nasab.

Abū al-A'war and challenge him to single combat." Sinān asked, "With me or with you?" Mālik (al-Ashtar) said, "If I told you to fight him singly, would you do it?" Sinān replied, "Yes. By God, if you asked me to go against their line with my sword, I would not come back until I had struck their line with my sword." Al-Ashtar said to him, "Oh my nephew, God give you long life! By God, my love for you has increased. I am not ordering you to fight him in single combat, but to challenge him to fight me. He would not come out to fight—if he agrees—unless against someone with the right seniority, equality of status, and nobility. You, may your Lord be praised, are of a family who have equality of status and nobility, but you are a raw youth in years, and he will not undertake single combat against young men. Call on him to fight against me." Sinān went and called out, "Give me safe conduct, for I am a messenger!" He was given safe conduct and he went on until he reached Abū al-A'war.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ Abū Zuhayr al-'Absī—Sinān: I drew near him and said, "Al-Ashtar summons you to fight against him in single combat." He gave me no answer for a long while, but then he said, "It was al-Ashtar's lack of sense and bad judgment that led to his driving out the officials of Ibn 'Affān—may God be pleased with him—from Iraq and his insubordination to him and thus his losing the fruits of his own good deeds. It was a result of al-Ashtar's lack of good sense and his bad judgment that [3264] he went to Ibn 'Affān in his house and dwelling place and joined in with those who killed him, and he has become liable for his blood.[52] Indeed I have no need to fight him in single combat." I told him, "You have had your say. Now listen while I answer you," but he replied, "No, there is no need for me to listen to you or for you to answer—get going!" His men shouted at me, and I left him, but, if he had given ear to me, I would have told him of my master's explanations and arguments.

I went back to al-Ashtar and told him that Abū al-A'war had declined the challenge, and he said, "He is concerned to save himself."

52. For details of al-Ashtar's role in the anti-'Uthmān movement, see *EI*², s.v. al-Ashtar: "Liable for his blood" = muttaba'an bi-damihi (see Qur'ān 2:178 for ittibā' in a similar context).

We stood facing them until night drew its veil between us. We passed the night taking turns at guard duty, but the next day we saw that they had withdrawn under cover of night. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib joined us early in the morning. He sent al-Ashtar on ahead with those who were with him in the vanguard, and the latter came to Mu'āwiyah and took up position facing him. 'Alī came along behind him and quickly joined up with al-Ashtar. He took up position, and the two sides faced one another for a long time.

Then 'Alī sought a camping place for his army. Having found it, he ordered his men to lay down their baggage. When they had done so, the youth and young men went to get water, but the Syrians prevented them, and they fought one another by the water.[53] Previously al-Ashtar had said to 'Alī, "The enemy has beaten us to the drinking place, the most comfortable spot, and the pleasant camping ground. If you think it sound, let us go on. We shall pass beyond them to the settlement from which they came, and they will set out after us. When they catch up with us we shall have camped and we shall be on equal terms with them." But 'Alī disapproved of that, saying, "Not all the men are able to travel on," and he had them make camp.

The Battle "by the Water"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Tamīm b. al-Ḥārith al-Azdī—Jundab b. 'Abdallāh: When we came upon Mu'āwiyah, we found that he had set up camp in a flat and broad space, which he had chosen before we arrived, alongside a watering place in the Euphrates. In that area there was no other place to obtain water, and Mu'āwiyah had put it under his control and sent Abū al-A'war to deny access to it and to guard it. We went farther up the Euphrates in the hope of finding some other drinking place that would do for us, but we did not and so went back to 'Alī. We told him about the thirst the men were suffering and that we had found no other place in which to get water but that of the enemy, and he said, "Fight them for it."[54] [3265]

53. 'alā al-mā', i.e., by the Euphrates. It is possible to understand 'alā as indicating the object of or motive for the fighting, rather than where the fighting occurred, but in what follows it seems generally to have the latter sense; compare the phrase jalasa 'alā al-nār, "he sat by the fire."

54. Qātilūhum 'alayhā: here 'alā must indicate the object of the fighting rather than where it should take place (see preceding note).

Al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī[55] came to him and said, "Shall I go against them?" and 'Alī said, "Do so." He did, and we went with him. When we approached the water, they rose up ahead of us and showered us with arrows while, by God, we loosed arrows at them for a while. Then we thrust at each other with spears for a long time, and finally we and they had recourse to swords and fought with them for a while. Next Yazīd b. Asad al-Bajalī[56] came to reinforce the enemy with cavalry and footsoldiers, and they advanced toward us. I said to myself, "Will the Commander of the Faithful not send anyone to us to cancel them out?" I went and turned around and saw a number of men similar to that of the enemy, or more, whom 'Alī had sent to us to counteract Yazīd b. Asad and his men. Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Riyāḥī[57] led these new troops, and the fighting increased in intensity.

'Amr b. al-'Āṣ came out against us from Mu'āwiyah's camp with a large force, and he began to give support to Abū al-A'war and Yazīd b. Asad, but al-Ashtar came from 'Alī with a mighty body of men. When al-Ashtar saw 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ reinforcing Abū al-A'war and Yazīd b. Asad, he sent help to al-Ash'ath b. Qays and Shabath b. Rib'ī and our fighting became fiercer. I will never forget what 'Abdallāh b. 'Awf b. al-Aḥmar al-Azdī[58] said:

[3266] Give us access to the flowing waters of the Euphrates, or stand fast against a host many in number, Defying death against every warrior and selling themselves dearly, thrusting with their lances and wheeling to the attack, Striking their enemies' skulls and full of daring.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—a man from the family of Khārijah b. (al-Ṣalt?) al-Tamīmī:[59] Ẓabyān b. 'Umārah kept fighting on that day while saying:

---

55. The leader of the Banū Kindah in al-Kūfah (see *EI*², s.v. al-Ash'ath b. Ḳays; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ma'dikarib b. Qais; and Crone, Slaves on Horses, 110).

56. Leader of the Banū Baǰīlah in Syria and grandfather of the future governor Khālid al-Qasrī (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 102).

57. A leader of the Banū Tamīm in al-Kūfah (see Ibn Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Šabaṯ b. Rib'ī al-Riyāḥī; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 118).

58. A participant in many of the events of the period and often cited as an authority by his fellow Azdī Abū Mikhnaf (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

59. The name of Khārijah's father, missing in the text, is suggested by the editor, referring to I, 3214, l. 14; WS, 172, has Khārijah b. al-Ṣalt.

Can you, Oh Ẓabyān, endure life without water among those who inhabit the earth?
No, by the God of earth and heavens—so strike the faces of the faithless enemies
With the sword in the ferocious clamor until they render you equality.

Ẓabyān said: "By God we smote them until they gave us access to the water."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father, Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd—his paternal uncle, Muḥammad b. Mikhnaf: At that time I was with my father Mikhnaf b. Sulaym. I was seventeen years old and not yet enrolled for pay (lastu fī 'aṭā').[60] When the men were denied access to the water, my father said to me, "Keep close to the encampment!" But when I saw the Muslims going toward the water I lost patience, took up my sword, set out with the men, and took part in the fighting.

Then I saw a slave lad of one of the men of Iraq, and with him he had a waterskin. When he saw that the Syrians had left open the way to the watering place, he pushed forward and filled his waterskin. Then he headed back, but one of the Syrian soldiers attacked him and threw him to the ground, so that the waterskin fell from his grasp. I assailed the Syrian, struck him, and laid him [3267] low, but his companions fought hard and rescued him. However, I overheard them saying to him (as they took him away), "We are not sure about your chances." I went back to the slave and carried him, and he could talk to me, even though he had a gaping wound. Quickly his master came, and he went off with him, while I took his waterskin, which was full, and brought it to my father, Mikhnaf. He asked, "From where did you get this?" and I said, "I bought it," for I did not want to tell him the story and make him angry with me. He said, "Let the men drink!" I did that, and he was the last to drink.

By God, my soul urged me on to fight, and I hurried forward with those who were fighting, and we battled with the enemy for a while. Then I saw that they had left the way to the water open to us, and by evening we could see our water carriers and theirs crowded together at the watering place without harming one another. I turned back and came upon the master of the lad who had had the waterskin, and I said to him, "We have your waterskin with us—send someone to get it or tell us where you are so that I can send it to you." He replied, "God's mercy on you, we have enough with us." I then turned away, and he went off. Next morning he passed by my father, stopped and greeted him, and saw me by his side. "This young man is not yours?" he said; and my father replied, "It is my son." The man said, "May God show you joy in him. Last evening God through him rescued my lad from death, and the young men of my clan told me that he was the bravest of the men at that time." My father gave me a look, and from his face I could see that he was angry. He kept quiet, and then, when the man had gone on, he said, "Is that what I instructed you?" and he made me swear that I would not go out to fight without his permission. So that was the only engagement I took part in until a later time.

60. On this system of payment in the early Muslim armies, see *EI*², s.v. 'aṭā'

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī—Mihrān, client (mawlā) of Yazīd b. Hāni':[61] By God, my patron, [3268] Yazīd b. Hāni', was fighting "by the water" with the waterskin in his hand. When the Syrians withdrew from the water I turned around to drink, fighting and firing arrows in between.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—'Abdallāh b. 'Awf b. al-Aḥmar: When we reached Mu'āwiyah and the Syrians at Ṣiffīn, we found that they had chosen an even, wide, and spacious position. They had seized the watering place, and it was in their possession. Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī had lined up horsemen and footsoldiers by it, and he had placed the archers in front of his men. He had formed a row with spears and shields, and helmets on their heads, and they had resolved not to let us reach the water.

In alarm we went to the Commander of the Faithful and told him about that, and he summoned Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Ṣūḥān.[62] He told him, "Go to Mu'āwiyah and say this: 'We have come to you like this but are reluctant to fight you before exhorting you by all possible means. But you have advanced your horsemen and footsoldiers against us and have attacked us before we attacked you. You began the fighting against us while we considered that we should hold back from fighting you until we had appealed to you and put before you our arguments. And this is another thing that you have done—you have barred our men from the water, and they will not stop fighting unless they have drunk. So send to your men to allow mine access to the water and to hold off from fighting until we consider our dispute and what we have come for and what you have come for. But, if you prefer that we should give up what we came for and leave the men to fight at the water, so that only the victors drink, we will do so.'"

61. See p. 80, below, for Yazīd b. Hāni'.
62. Of the Banū 'Abd al-Qays/Rabī'ah (Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

[When he heard that] Mu'āwiyah said to his men, "What do you think?" Al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah[63] answered, "Keep water from them, just as they kept it from 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, may God be pleased with him. They besieged him for forty days, allowing him neither the [3269] coolness of water nor the comfort of food. Make them die of thirst. May God make them die of thirst!" But 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "Let them get to the water, for surely the men will not thirst when you have drunk sufficiently. But, leaving aside the water, consider the dispute between you." Al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah repeated what he had said, and 'Abdallāh [b. Sa'd] b. Abī Sarḥ[64] said, "Keep them from the water until night, for if they cannot get to it they will go back. If they go back, their return will be a flight. Keep them from the water, and may God keep it from them on the day of resurrection."

Ṣa'ṣa'ah ('Alī's messenger) retorted, "God will keep it on the day of Resurrection only from the infidels, the wanton ones, and the drinkers of wine—like you and this wanton one (meaning al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah)!" They rushed at him, verbally abusing him and threating him, but Mu'āwiyah said, "Keep away from the man, for he is simply a messenger."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—'Abdallāh b. 'Awf b. al-Aḥmar: Ṣa'ṣa'ah came back to us and told us what he had said to Mu'āwiyah, what the answer had been, and how he had replied. We asked him how Mu'āwiyah had responded to that, and he said, "When I desired to leave his presence, I asked, 'How do you answer me?' and he answered, 'You will learn of my decision.'"

---

63. See n. 16, above.

64. The name of 'Abdallāh's father, Sa'd, is missing from the text. It is generally accepted that this former governor of Egypt, who joined Mu'āwiyah upon the murder of 'Uthmān, died before Ṣiffīn and was not present there (see further *EI*², s.v.).

By God, the next thing we knew, Mu'āwiyah was sending troops of horsemen to Abū al-A'war to stop our men from getting to the water. 'Alī sent us against them, and we fired arrows and thrust with spears and then gave blows with the swords. We were granted victory over them, and the water came into our hands. We said, "By God we will not allow them to drink from it," but 'Alī sent to us, saying, "Take what water you need and return to your camp. Leave them alone, for God has given you victory over them because of their evil and oppression."

[3270] 'Alī Calls Mu'āwiyah to Obedience and Unity

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Ḥurrah al-Ḥanafī: 'Alī said, "On this day you have been given victory through zeal." The men went back to their camp, and 'Alī remained two days, during which he and Mu'āwiyah did not exchange messengers. Then 'Alī summoned Bashīr b. 'Amr b. Miḥṣan al-Anṣārī,[65] Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī,[66] and Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Tamīmī and said, "Go to this man and summon him to God, to obedience, and to unity."[67] Shabath b. Rib'ī asked, "Oh Commander of the Faithful, will you not tempt him with an offer of an office of authority and a position in which he will have influence with you if he gives you the oath of allegiance?" 'Alī replied, "Go to him and argue with him and find out his opinion." This was at the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [May–June 657].

They came and entered in upon Mu'āwiyah, and Abū 'Amrah Bashīr b. 'Amr praised God and extolled him.[68] Then he said, "Oh Mu'āwiyah, this world is transitory, but to the next you are returning. God will assess you according to your deeds and recom-

---

65. See Ibn al-Kalbi, II, index, s.v. Bašīr b. 'Amr.

66. Leader of the Banū Ḥimyar in al-Kūfah, said to be descended from the ancient south Arabian kings (Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 119).

67. Al-jamā'ah. Literally, the word indicates "community" and has a positive value in contradistinction to the implications of fitnah. "Splitting the staff of the community" or "of the Muslims" (shaqq 'aṣā al-jamā'ah/al-muslimīn) is a charge frequently brought against rebels, and the year in which Mu'āwiyah ended the Fitnah and established his rule over all the lands of the Arabs is known in tradition as the "year of unity" ('ām al-jamā'ah).

68. Ḥamida 'llāh wa-athnā 'alayhi, a stereotyped formula used to open a religious exhortation.

pense you 'for what your hands have offered.'[69] I implore you by God not to split the unity of this community and not to shed its blood in internal conflict." But Mu'āwiyah cut him off, saying, "Have you not commended that to your master?" Abū 'Amrah replied, "My master is not like you. Of all of creation, he has the most right to this position of authority by virtue of his merit, his religion (dīn), his precedence in Islam, and his relationship with the Messenger of God." Mu'āwiyah asked, "What does he say?" and Abū 'Amrah replied, "He asks you to fear God and to respond to your cousin in acknowledging the truth to which he calls you. It [3271] is safer for you regarding your life in this world and better for you regarding your final end." Mu'āwiyah said, "And are we to make the blood of 'Uthmān count for naught? No, by God, never!"

Sa'īd b. Qays went to speak, but Shabath b. Rib'ī plunged in first, saying, after praising God and extolling him:

> Mu'āwiyah, I understood your reply to Ibn Miḥṣan, and, by God, we are not unaware of what you intend and seek. The only way you could find to misguide the people, pervert their desires, and get from them their obedience was by saying "Your Imam was killed unjustly, and we seek revenge for his blood!" Some stupid riffraff responded to it, but we know that you delayed in giving 'Uthmān help and that you desired his killing so that you might obtain this position that you now seek.[70] There is many a one who desires something and seeks it, but God prevents it by His power, and sometimes he who desires a thing is granted his wish or even more than it. But, by God, there would be no good for you in either of the cases. If you fail to attain what you hope for, then you will be the most wretched of the Arabs as a result, while, if you achieve what you desire, you will have achieved it only by deserving the flames of hell from

69. Qur'ān 22:10.

70. It was commonly held, by the opponents of the Umayyads, that the murder of 'Uthmān was the result of plotting by members of his {Umayyad} family who feared that the caliphate would pass into the hands of 'Alī if 'Uthmān were to die a natural death. The accusation that Mu'āwiyah deliberately delayed in responding to the appeals for help that were made to him by 'Uthmān is part of the argument in support of this theory (see further, N. A. Faris, "Development in Arab Historiography," 435–41).

your Lord. Fear God, oh Mu'āwiyah. Leave off what you are about, and do not contest authority with its rightful possessor.

Mu'āwiyah praised God and extolled him, and then he said, "The first thing in which I recognized your stupidity and low level of maturity was your interrupting the speech of this respected and high-born man, who is the leader of his people [i.e., Sa'īd b. Qays]. Then afterward you meddled with something about which you know nothing. You have lied and been base, you rude and uncouth [3272] bedouin, in everything you have referred to and described. Get out of my presence, all of you! Between you and me there is nothing but the sword." He was furious.

The deputation departed with Shabath saying, "Do you threaten us with the sword? I swear by God that it will soon be raised against you." They came to 'Alī and told him what Mu'āwiyah had said. That was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (36, i.e., May–June 657).

Following this, 'Alī would give orders to certain individual leaders of high status, and a band of men would go out to fight in support while another man of rank, a follower of Mu'āwiyah, would come out against him with a group of his followers. The two of them would fight with horse- and footmen and then retire. They were reluctant to confront the Syrians with the whole body of the Iraqis because of the fear that it would entail mass slaughter and destruction.

At different times 'Alī sent out al-Ashtar, Ḥujr b. 'Adī al-Kindī,[71] Shabath b. Rib'ī, Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar,[72] Ziyād b. al-Naḍr al-Ḥārithī, Ziyād b. Khaṣafah al-Taymī,[73] Sa'īd b. Qays, Ma'qil b. Qays al-Riyāḥī,[74] and Qays b. Sa'd.[75] The one who was sent out most often was al-Ashtar. Mu'āwiyah sent out against the men of Iraq, at 71. The leader in al-Kūfah, in 51/670, of what is often seen as the first pro-'Alid anti-Umayyad movement after the death of 'Alī, and a rival of al-Ash'ath for the leadership of the Banū Kindah in al-Kūfah (see further *EI*², s.v. Ḥudjr b. 'Adī al-Kindī).

72. Of the Banū Shaybān/Bakr b. Wā'il (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ḫālid b. al-Mu'ammar).

73. Of the Banū Taym Allāh/Bakr b. Wā'il (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ziyāda b. Ḥaṣafah).

74. See n.30.

75. Son of Sa'd b. 'Ubādah of the Banū Khazraj/Anṣār, he had been governor of Egypt for 'Alī; for an account of his removal from there and his joining 'Alī, see pp. 142–44, below (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Qais b. Sa'd).

various times, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid al-Makhzūmī,[76] Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī,[77] Dhū al-Kalā' al-Ḥimyarī,[78] 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb,[79] Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ al-Kindī,[80] and Ḥamzah b. Mālik al-Hamdānī.[81] They fought for the whole of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, sometimes twice in one day, at its beginning and at its end.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim al-Fā'ishī: One [3273] of my fellow tribesmen[82] told me that one day al-Ashtar went out to fight at Ṣiffīn among some men of the qurrā'[83] and some of the bedouin horsemen. "The batle became fierce, and there came out against us a man taller and mightier than whom I have rarely seen. He put out a challenge to single combat, and no one responded to him except al-Ashtar. They exchanged blows and al-Ashtar struck him and killed him. I swear by God that we had been fearful for al-Ashtar and asked him not to answer the challenge. When al-Ashtar killed him, one of the dead man's heralds proclaimed:

Oh Sahm, Sahm Ibn Abī al-'Ayzār,
the best whom we know of Zār.[84]

[Zārah is a clan of Azd.] And he said, "I swear by God that either I will kill your killer, or he will kill me." He came out and attacked al-Ashtar, who turned toward him and struck him, and suddenly

76. Son of the famous Khālid b. al-Walīd, settled in Ḥimṣ (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdarraḥmān b. Ḥālid).

77. Of Quraysh, he had been put in charge by Mu'āwiyah of the force that he sent, too late, to help 'Uthmān (see n.70; and see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

78. Leader of an important family of the Banū Ḥimyar settled in Ḥimṣ (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Samayfa' b. Nākūr; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 95). Delete text's "Ibn"?

79. A son of the second caliph (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

80. A rival of al-Ash'ath for the leadership of the Banū Kindah in al-Kūfah, he had subsequently settled in Ḥimṣ and supported Mu'āwiyah (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 101).

81. WṢ, 44, refers to him among a group of the leaders of Qaḥṭān and Yaman who were trusted by Mu'āwiyah. For his role in witnessing on behalf of Mu'āwiyah the "arbitration document" signed at Ṣiffīn, see p. 87, below.

82. There are two groups called Fā'ish among the Banū Hamdān.

83. The qurrā' are frequently referred to throughout this volume and in connection with certain other events of early Islamic history. Traditionally they have been associated with the Qur'ān and are often described as "Qur'ān reciters/readers." A number of scholars have recently been dissatisfied with that interpretation and have suggested others. For the literature, see EI[2], s.v. ḳurrā'; and Calder, "The Qurrā' and the Arabic Lexicographical Tradition," 297–307.

84. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to Sahm b. Abī al-'Ayzār.

the man was down on the ground in front of al-Ashtar's horse, but his companions bore down on him and carried him off wounded. Abū Rufayqah al-Fahmī said, "This was a fire, but he came upon a whirlwind."[85]

The men fought for the whole of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, but when it was the end of the month they called on one another to refrain from fighting for the month of Muḥarram[86] and perhaps God would bring about peace or an agreement. So they refrained from fighting one another.

In this year 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib led the pilgrimage (ḥajj)[87] in accordance with 'Alī's appointment of him. That is what I was told by Aḥmad b. Thābit from someone who told him on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā, who had it from Abū Ma'shar.[88]

[3274] In this year, too, Qudāmah b. Maẓ'ūn[89] died, according to the claim of al-Wāqidī.[90]

---

85. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to Abū Rufayqah. WS, 196, has al-Sahmī instead of al-Fahmī.

86. Although our information is rather confused, the month of Muḥarram is said to have been one of the sacred months in pre-Islamic Arabia, during which fighting was prohibited. The Qur'ān thrice refers to the sacred month (in the singular) and once to there being four sacred months (see further *EI*², s.v. al-Muḥarram).

87. The annual complex of rituals performed at various places in and around Mecca during the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (see *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj).

88. Abū Ma'shar is a well-known collector of tradition who died in 171/787 (see *EI*², s.v.; GAS, I, 291–92). He is said to have composed a Ta'rīkh al-khulafā' and it is apparently this work that Ṭabarī frequently cites with the isnād used here. Ṭabarī's immediate authority, al-Rāzī, is categorized as a liar (kadhdhāb) in Ibn Abī Ḥātim's Kitāb al-Jarḥ wa'l-ta'dīl, I/i, 44.

89. An early follower of the Prophet Muḥammad, from Banū Jumaḥ/Quraysh, who had refused to give allegiance to 'Alī (see Ibn al-Kalbī, index, s.v.).

90. On this scholar, d. 207/822–823, important especially in the field of the biography of the Prophet, see *EI*², s.v. al-Wāḳidī; GAS, I, 294–97.

The Events of the Year 37

(JUNE 19, 657–JUNE 8, 658)

The Truce between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah

In the first month of this year, al-Muḥarram, there was the truce between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah. Desiring a settlement of their differences, they agreed not to fight during the whole of the month.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf al-Azdī—Sa'd Abū al-Mujāhid al-Ṭā'ī—al-Muḥill b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī: When 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah made a truce at Ṣiffīn messengers went back and forth regarding the matters in dispute between them, in the hope that a settlement could be reached. 'Alī sent 'Adī b. Ḥātim,[91] Yazīd b. Qays al-Arḥabī,[92] Shabath b. Rib'ī, and Ziyād b. Khaṣafah to Mu'āwiyah, and, when they came to him, 'Adī b. Ḥātim praised God and said: "Now, we have come to invite you to something be means of which God will overcome our dissensions and reunite our community, avoid our shedding blood, give security to the roads, and settle discord. Your cousin ['Alī] is the lord of the Muslims, the most meritorious of them regarding his early acceptance of Islam, and the best of them in it respecting his deeds. The people have agreed upon him, and God has guided their decision. There only remains you and those with you (who have not accepted him). Stop,[93] Mu'āwiyah, lest God afflict you and your companions with a day like that of the Camel."

91. Of the Banū 'Adī b. Akhzam of Ṭayyi', he had been prominent in the affairs of the Banū Ṭayyi' in the lifetime of the Prophet and afterward (see *EI*², s.v.; and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; for his struggle to carry the banner of Ṭayyi' at Ṣiffīn, see p. 26, below, and n. 113).

92. Of the Banū Hamdān, he had been involved in the anti-'Uthmān movement in al-Kūfah, and subsequently (see p. 102, below) governed Iṣbahān and Rayy for 'Alī (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Yazīd b. Qais b. Tammām).

[3275] Mu'āwiyah replied: "It is as if you have come merely to threaten, not to reach a settlement. You could not be more wrong, 'Adī. I am the son of Ḥarb, by God, so do not try to frighten me with empty threats.[94] By God, you are one of those who raised a clamor against ['Uthmān] Ibn 'Affān, one of those who killed him, and I hope that you will be one of those whom God will kill for it. How wrong you are, 'Adī b. Ḥātim—you have resorted to force when you could not succeed by persuasion."[95]

Shabath b. Rib'ī and Ziyād b. Khaṣafah, both of them answering together, said, "We have come to you to make a settlement between us, but you have started to spout proverbs at us. Cease useless words and deeds, and agree to our proposal, which will benefit both us and you." Yazīd b. Qays spoke, saying:

> We came merely to convey to you the message we have been sent with and to take back whatever we hear from you. Nevertheless, we will not refrain from offering you sound advice or from telling you what we think provides a sure argument for us against you and by means of which you will return to unity and community. Our master is he whose excellence you and the Muslims have recognized, and I think it is obvious to you that the people of religion

93. Translating the text's fa'ntahi; Ann., A.H. 37 §2, suggests fa'nbah, sta' attento!

94. The name of Mu'āwiyah's grandfather, Ḥarb, means "war." For the expression mā yuqa'qa'u lī bi-al-shinān (literally, "a confused clattering noise will not be made to me with the old, worn-out water-skins"), see Freytag, Arabum proverbia, II, 588; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. shann.

95. Qad ḥalabta bi-al-sā'idi al-ashadd (literally, "you have milked with the strongest forearm"), see Freytag, Arabum proverbia, I, 343; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥalaba. Ann., A.H. 37 §2, suggests it should be read ḥalabtu, "I have resorted to force only because persuasion was not successful."

and merit will not put anyone on a level with 'Alī or waiver in a choice between you. Fear God, Mu'āwiyah, and do not oppose 'Alī, for we have never seen anyone more God-fearing in his deeds, more abstemious in the things of this world, or more complete in all the good qualities than he.

Mu'āwiyah praised God and extolled Him and then said, "You have summoned us to obedience and unity. As for the unity to which you have called us, we have it among ourselves, but, as for obedience to your lord, we will not conceive of it, for he has killed our caliph and shattered our unity, and he has given shelter to those from whom we seek vengeance and those who killed 'Uthmān. [3276] Your master claims that he did not kill him, and we will not argue with him about that, but have you not seen those who killed our master, and do you not know that they are the companions of your master? Let him then deliver them up to us and let us kill them in revenge for 'Uthmān, and then we will respond to your call for obedience and unity."

Shabath said to him, "Would it make you happy, oh Mu'āwiyah, if you were given power over 'Ammār [b. Yāsir],[96] to kill him?" He replied, "Why should I not? But, by God, if I were given power over Ibn Sumayyah [i.e., 'Ammār], I would not kill him in revenge for 'Uthmān but [only] for Nātil the mawlā of 'Uthmān." Shabath said to him, "By the God of earth and of heaven, then you would not have acted equitably. No, by He other than Whom there is no god, you will not lay hands on 'Ammār until the heads fall from the shoulders of the peoples and the vast earth becomes too narrow for you, for all its breadth."[97] Mu'āwiyah replied, "If it were so, then the earth would be more straitened for you."

When they had left Mu'āwiyah, he sent to Ziyād b. Khaṣafah al-Taymī and spoke to him privately. After praising God and extolling Him, he said, "Brother of Rabī'ah! 'Alī has severed our ties of kinship and given shelter to those who killed our lord. I am asking for help against him from you with your family and clan. I give you a binding oath in the name of God that, if I achieve the victory, I will put you in charge of whichever of the two garrison towns you desire."

96. A Qurashī companion of the Prophet (see *EI*², s.v.; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.); for his death, see p. 64, below; Lecker, "Ḥudhayfa."

97. See Qur'ān 9:118.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sa'd Abū al-Mujāhid—al-Muḥill b. Khalīfah: I heard Ziyād b. Khaṣafah reporting this event, and he said: When Mu'āwiyah had finished, I praised God and extolled Him and then I said, "'I have a clear proof from my Lord,'[98] and 'with what [3277] He has graciously given me I will not help the evildoers.'"[99] Then I arose, and Mu'āwiyah said to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, who was sitting by his side, "No one of us ever argues with one of them but that they always assent to something good. What is the matter with them, may God cut them off with evil? It is as if their hearts were the heart of one man."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid al-Azdī—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd Abū al-Kunūd: Mu'āwiyah sent Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī, Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ, and Ma'n b. Yazīd b. al-Akhnas[100] to 'Alī. They went in unto him, I being present. Ḥabīb praised God and extolled Him and then said: "'Uthmān b. 'Affān, may God be pleased with him, was a caliph guided by God (khalīfah mahdī), who acted according to the Book of God and constantly busied himself with God's commands. You found his life a burden and could not wait for his death, and so you attacked and killed him. If you claim that you did not, then hand over to us the killers of 'Uthmān so that we can kill them in recompense. Then relinquish authority over the people: That will be a matter for consultation (shūrā)[101] among them, and they will give authority over them to whomsoever they agree on."

'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib said to him, "Who are you, you wretch, to tell me to relinquish authority? Keep silent, for it is no business of yours, and you are not fit for it." Ḥabīb arose and said, "By God, when you see me you will wish that you had not." 'Alī said, "What are you, even though you rally your horsemen and your foot-soldiers![102] May God not show mercy to you even if you show mercy

98. Qur'ān 6:57.

99. Qur'ān 28:17.

100. Of the Banū Sulaym (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; Lecker, The Banū Sulaym, esp. 70–72).

101. The idea that the choice of caliph (sometimes even of governor) should result from a process of consultation is of frequent occurrence in early Islam, but only rarely put into practice; see Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, index, s.v. shūrā.

102. See Qur'ān 17:64 (God addressing Satan!)

to me![103] Is it contempt and evil (that you want)? Go away, and do whatever you want." Shurahbil b. al-Simṭ said, "If I were to say anything to you, by my life it would just be like what my companion has said. Do you have any answer other than that which you gave him?"

'Alī said, "Yes, for you and your companion (i.e., Ma'n) I have a different answer." He praised God and extolled Him, and then said:[104] [3278]

> God sent Muḥammad with the truth and through him provided deliverance from error, salvation from destruction, and the overcoming of division. Then God took him to Himself after he had carried out his mission. The people appointed Abū Bakr as caliph, and Abū Bakr appointed 'Umar after him, and those two conducted themselves well and led the community with justice. We resented their ruling over us, the family of the Messenger of God, but we excused them for that. Then 'Uthmān ruled and did things that the people found reprehensible, so that they came to him and killed him. Afterward they came to me, who was keeping out of their concerns, and they asked me to accept the oath of allegiance. I refused, but they insisted and said that the community would never find anyone acceptable but me and that, if I did not, they were afraid that division would result. So I accepted the oath of allegiance from them. But then I was surprised to find the dissension of two of those who had given me the oath of allegiance[105] and 103. Lā abqā 'llāhu 'alayka in abqayta 'alayya (the last word has been supplied by the editor); for this saying, uttered derisively to somebody who affects to be showing mercy because unable to take his revenge, see Freytag, Arabum proverbia, II, 527; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. form IV of baqiya. The significance of the next two words, a-ḥuqratan wa-saw'an (or sū'an), is not at all clear. Ann., A.H. 37 §4, suggests reading khufrah (= dhimmah) for ḥuqrah and the translation "do you with to profit from your immunity [as a messenger] to say evil things?" The parallel passage at WṢ, 200, does not include these words.

---

104. 'Alī's speech resuming the early history of the caliphate from a particular viewpoint can be seen as an example of a topos; for another example, see, e.g., Ṭabarī, II, 515–18. In the present version 'Uthmān's alleged misdeeds are not elaborated but others often list them.

105. That is, the companions Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, who are widely reported to have rendered allegiance to 'Alī but then rebelled against him when he would not accede to their demands for important governorships.

the opposition of Mu'āwiyah, to whom God had given neither precedence in accepting the religion nor forebears of good character in Islam. He is one of those who were set free (ṭalīq) by the Prophet, and the son of one of them, a member of those "parties" that persisted in enmity to God, His Prophet, and the Muslims, both he and his father, until they reluctantly entered Islam.[106] But it is a surprise that you take part in his opposition and are led by him, abandoning the family of your Prophet, against which you [3279] must not show discord and opposition nor place any one on the same level. I call you to the Book of God, the precedent (sunnah) of His Prophet, the suppression of what is false, and putting into practice the signs of the religion. That is what I have to say, and I ask God's pardon for me and for you and for every Believer, male and female, and every Muslim, male and female."

Shuraḥbīl and Ma'n both said, "Testify that 'Uthmān was killed unjustly." 'Alī, however, answered, "I will not say either that he was killed unjustly or that his killing was justified, because he was unjust himself." They replied, "Whoever does not assert that 'Uthmān was killed unjustly, we dissociate ourselves from him," and they got up and left. 'Alī said, " 'You will not make the dead hear, you will not make the deaf hearken to the call when they turn away, going back, and you will not guide the blind from going astray. You will only make those who believe in our signs give ear, for they are the Muslims.' "[107] Then he went to his supporters and said, "Do not let these be more earnest in their error than you are in your truth and obedience to your Lord."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ja'far b. Ḥudhayfah, of the family of 'Āmir b. Juwayn: [Qays b.] 'Ā'idh b. Qays al-Ḥizmirī[108] contested

106. The derogatory references are to Mu'āwiyah as (a) one of those liable to enslavement by the Prophet when he conquered Mecca, but allowed to go free by him (al-ṭulaqā'), and (b) one of the "parties" or "confederates" (aḥzāb) who attacked the Prophet and his followers in Medina at the time of the "Trench" in A.H. 5 (Qur'ān, sūrah 33, Sūrat al-Aḥzāb, is said to allude to this event).

107. Qur'ān 27:80–81.

108. For the likely need to insert "Qays b." before the name of 'Ā'idh b. Qays, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Qais b. 'Ā'id b. Qais, although, as is indicated there, some sources have another son of 'Ā'idh b. Qays as the one who contested the honor of the banner with 'Adī b. Ḥātim. The clan of this Qays, the Banū Ḥizmir, was part of the tribe of Ṭayyi', on which see EI[1], s.v. Ṭaiy.

with 'Adī b. Ḥātim[109] for the privilege of carrying the banner at Ṣiffīn. Banū Ḥizmir were more numerous than Banū 'Adī the clan of Ḥātim. 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī al-Bawlānī[110] rushed up to the Banū Ḥizmir in the presence of 'Alī and said:

> Oh Banū Ḥizmir do you dare to compete with 'Adī? Is there one among you like 'Adī or any ancestor of yours like the father of 'Adī? Was 'Adī not the one who protected the waterskin and defended the water on a "day of want"?[111] Is he not the son of the "lord of the fourth" and of "the generous one of the Arabs"?[112] Is he not the son of the man who allowed his wealth to be plundered and of the defender of his client (jār)? Is he not the one who never acted [3280] > perfidiously, never wickedly, never ignorantly, never avariciously, never ungratefully, and never cowardly? Come up with one of your ancestors who may be compared with his father, or one of you who may be compared with him. Is he not the most meritorious of you in Islam, the leader of your delegation to the Prophet, and your leader at the battles of al-Nukhaylah, al-Qādisiyyah, al-Madā'in, Jalūlā'

109. On whom, see *EI*². Son of the renowned pre-Islamic poet of the Banū Ṭayyi', Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī, his clan was Banū 'Adī b. Rabī'ah b. Jarwal of Ṭayyi'.

110. For this poet of the Banū Ṭayyi', see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥalīfah.

111. Yawm rawiyyah. Possibly this refers to the battle "by the water" recounted previously, which is also alluded to in the first line of the poem of 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah later.

112. 'Adī's father, the poet Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī, was famed for his generosity, the subject of legend and proverb (see *EI*², s.v. Ḥātim). Ann. 37 A.H., §5, translates "lord of the fourth" (dhū a'l-mirbā') as "quello dal quarto del bottino," which may well be correct. Ḥātim was famous for allowing his own booty to be taken by others; that is, probably the substance of "the man who allowed his wealth to be plundered" (al-munhibu mālahu), later. According to the notice of Ḥātim in Ibn Qutaybah's Kitāb al-Shi'r, "whenever he acquired booty, he allowed it to be plundered, and whenever he was asked for anything, he gave it" (wa-idhā ghanima anhaba wa-idhā su'ila wahaba). It seems likely that Ṭabarī's phrases referring to Ḥātim are meant to be understood generally and not as allusions to any specific instance—defense of the jār was also a typical virtue of the Arab hero.

al-Waqī'ah, Nihāwand, and Tustar?[113] What do you have in common with him? By God, there is no other of your people who seeks what you seek!

'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib said to him, "That is enough, Ibn Khalīfah! Come to me, ye people, and gather around me all of Ṭayyi'!" When they had come together, 'Alī asked, "Who was your chief in these battles?" Ṭayyi' replied, "'Adī." Ibn Khalīfah said, "Ask them, Oh Commander of the Faithful, if they are not satisfied to give up the leadership to 'Adī." 'Alī asked them, and they said that they were. He then said to them, "Of all of you, 'Adī has the best claim to the banner—give it up to him." Then, because Banū al-Ḥizmir caused a disturbance, he said, "In my view, he ('Adī) has been your chief in the past and none of his people, apart from you, is against giving it up to him. Therefore, I follow the majority in that." And 'Adī took the banner.

Later, at the time of Ḥujr b. 'Adī,[114] 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah was sought so that he might be sent together with Ḥujr [as a prisoner to Mu'āwiyah], for he was one of the supporters of Ḥujr. Then he was exiled to the region of the two hills (al-Jabalān). 'Adī [b. Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī] had given him cause to hope that he would have Ibn Khalīfah's exile revoked and that he would seek an amnesty for him, but when that took a long time 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah said:

You forget my deeds at the Battle of the Watering Place, and the lances shattering against their shoulders at Ṣiffīn.
May his Lord requite 'Adī b. Ḥātim for me, [3281] for having abandoned me and forsaken me, an ample requital.

---

113. 'Adī, like his father, was originally a Christian, but he accepted Islam toward the end of the Prophet's life and led the Banū Ṭayyi' into Islam. The battles named here are famous landmarks in the Arab conquest of Iraq and southwest Iran. See further EI[2] s.v. 'Adī.

114. That is, at the time of Ḥujr's revolt in al-Kūfah in 51/670 (see n. 71, above). The subsequent mention of "the two hills" (al-Jabalān) is a reference to two hills (Aja' and Salmā) in the tribal lands of the Banū Ṭayyi' in northern Arabia, the region now known as Jabal Shammār (see Yāqūt, Mū'jam al-buldān, s.v. Jabalān). See also n. 229, below.

115. See Gloss., s.v. ṭ-l-b with ft.

Do you forget, oh son of Ḥātim, my reckless bravery on that evening when your company ('adī) was not enough to outdo Ḥizmir?
But I protected you against the gang until they let up, and I was the fierce and courageous adversary.
They turned tail and could not stand against me, as if they thought me a lion lurking among the reeds.
I gave you aid when those who were near moved away and those farther off held themselves apart. On me alone depended the victory.
My reward is to be stripped of everything among you, dragged along,[116] brought to degradation, and made captive.
How many times you have promised to me that you would bring me back!
You have not achieved with your promise anything[117] for me.[118]

The Organization of the Military Units (Katā'ib) and Preparation of the Troops for Battle

According to Abū Mikhnaf: The men waited until the end of Muḥarram drew nigh, and then 'Alī ordered Marthad b. al-Ḥārith al-Jushamī[119] to call out to the Syrians at sunset: "The Commander of the Faithful announces to you: 'I have given you time so that you might revert to the truth and turn to it in repentance. I have [3282] argued against you with the Book of God and have called you to it, but you have not turned away from oppression or responded to truth. Now I have cast back 'to you [the covenant between us] in a just manner, for God does not love the faithless.' "[120]

The Syrians rushed anxiously to their commanders and leaders, and Mu'āwiyah and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ went out among the men, organizing them in fighting units and preparing them and encouraging

116. The ms. and Ibn al-Athīr have saḥīban, which the editor has emended to sajīnan, "imprisoned." See, however, Gloss., s.v. s-ḥ-b, which has saḥīb as the equivalent of mashūb.

117. Ḥabtar, literally, "a fox"; it also can mean "short" (see LA, s.v.).

118. For a longer quotation of the poem from which these verses come and the story of the events surrounding their composition, see Ṭabarī, II, 148 l.1–155 l.1.

119. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to Marthad b. al-Ḥārith al-Jushamī.

120. See Qur'ān 8:58 (substituting nabadhtu ilaykum for Qur'ānic fa'nbidh ilayhim).

them to fight.[121] 'Alī, too, spent the entire night preparing his men, forming the units, and going around inciting the soldiers.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab al-Azdī—his father: On every occasion on which we confronted an enemy 'Alī would command us in these words: "Do not fight them unless they attack you first. You, praise be to God, have a good case and holding back from fighting them until they attack will strengthen it. If you fight them and defeat them, do not kill the fugitives, do not finish off the wounded, do not uncover their nakedness, and do not mutilate the slain.[122] If you reach their abodes, do not tear aside a curtain, enter a dwelling without permission, or seize any of their property apart from what you find in the army camp. Do not do harm against any woman, even if they utter abuse against your honor and vilify your leaders and righteous men, for women are weak of body and soul."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ismā'īl b. Yazīd—Abū Ṣādiq—al-Ḥaḍramī: I heard 'Alī encouraging the men at three battlefields—Ṣiffīn, the Camel, and the Canal (yawm al-nahr)[123]—in these words: "Servants of God! Fear God, cast down your gaze, [3283] lower your voices, keep your speech short, accustom yourselves to dismounting to fight, assaulting and being assaulted, individual combat, contention, fighting with swords and staves, wrestling, biting, and grappling. 'Stand firm and frequently mention the name of God so that you might prosper.'[124] 'And do not contend one with another and so lose courage and your strength expire; be steadfast, for God is with the steadfast.'[125] Oh God! Inspire them with steadfastness, send down victory to them, and make great their reward." The next morning 'Alī arose and appointed his commanders over the right and left wings and over the footsoldiers and horsemen.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī: 'Alī sent out al-Ashtar over the Kūfan cavalry and Sahl b. Ḥunayf[126] over the 121. Literally, "they lit the fires," but perhaps to be understood metaphorically.

---

122. Lā tamthulū bi-qatīlin; the verb mathala and the noun muthlah are used with a variety of related meanings in the context of the punishment and treatment of enemies; because here it refers to the slain, "mutilation" seems to fit best.

123. For the third of these "battles" (yawm al-nahr), see pp. 130–34, below.

124. Qur'ān 8:45.

125. Qur'ān 8:46

126. A Companion of the Prophet from the Banū Aws/Anṣār (see Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 39–41; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

Baṣran; he put 'Ammār b. Yāsir over the Kūfan infantry and Qays b. Sa'd over the Baṣran; Hāshim b. 'Utbah carried 'Alī's banner, and Mis'ar b. Fadakī al-Tamīmī[127] led the Baṣran qurrā'. The Kūfans rallied to 'Abdallāh b. Budayl[128] and 'Ammār b. Yāsir.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Jābir al-Azdī—al-Qāsim, the client (mawlā) of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah: Mu'āwiyah sent Dhū al-Kalā' al-Ḥimyarī out over his right wing and Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī over his left. At the time of his advance from Damascus, Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī, who was in command of the horsemen of Damascus, had charge of the vanguard, while 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ commanded the Syrian horsemen generally. Muslim b. 'Uqbah al-Murrī[129] led the infantry of Damascus, al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays[130] the infantry as a whole. Some of the Syrians gave the oath of allegiance to Mu'āwiyah to the death and bound their legs together with turbans (to prevent flight). Those who did so made up five rows. The Syrians who went out to fight formed ten rows, while the men of Iraq went out to fight in eleven.

On the first day of Ṣiffīn, when the men went out and fought, [3284]
al-Ashtar commanded those of the Kūfans who took part and Ḥabīb b. Maslamah commanded the Syrians. That was a Wednesday. A fierce battle took place for most of the day, and then both sides fell back, with honors even.

Hāshim b. 'Utbah then went out with a numerous and well-equipped force of horsemen and footsoldiers, and Abū al-A'war moved out to oppose him. They fought for that day, the horsemen attacking the horsemen and the footsoldiers the footsoldiers. They returned having held each other in check.

On the third day 'Ammār b. Yāsir went out, and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ opposed him. One of the fiercest battles ever was waged, and 'Ammār began proclaiming, "Men of Iraq, do you wish to look on one who showed enmity to God and His Messenger and struggled against them, one who oppressed the Muslims and gave support to the 127. Subsequently a leader of the Baṣran Khārijites (see pp. 79, 118, below).

128. Of the Banū Khuzā'a (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.); the context and a subsequent variant indicate that the qurrā' of the Kūfans rallied to him.

129. Of the Banū Murra of Ghaṭafān, he subsequently led the army sent by the caliph Yazīd to attack Medina (see *EI*², s.v.; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

130. Of the Banū Fihr/Quraysh, he subsequently played a leading role in the events of the second fitnah (see *EI*², s.v.; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

polytheists? But, when he saw that God would make mighty His religion and grant victory to His Messenger, he went to the Prophet and accepted Islam, it seems to us, out of fear and not from desire. Then God took to Himself His Messenger and, by God, this man continued to be known for enmity to the Muslim and forbearance to the evildoer. So hold firm against him and fight him, for he will extinguish God's light[131] and give help to His enemies."

With 'Ammār was Ziyād b. al-Naḍr, who had command of the horsemen. 'Ammār ordered him to make an attack with them. He did so, but the men fought against him and held firm, so 'Ammār reinforced the attack with the footsoldiers and caused 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to abandon his position. At that time Ziyād b. al-Naḍr met a uterine brother of his in single combat. The man's name was 'Amr b.
[3285] Mu'āwiyah b. al-Muntafiq b. 'Āmir b. 'Uqayl, and his and Ziyād's mother was one of the children of Yazīd.[132] When they met to fight, they recognized one another and desisted. Then each of them turned away from the other, and the forces retired.

On the following day Muḥammad b. 'Alī[133] and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar went out to fight each other with two strong detachments and fought extremely fiercely. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar then sent to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, inviting him to single combat, and he agreed. He went out on foot, but the Commander of the Faithful ['Alī] saw him and asked who the two challengers were. When he was told that they were Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar, he urged on his mount and called to Muḥammad, who waited for him. 'Alī then ordered his son to hold fast his horse. When he had taken hold of it, 'Alī walked toward 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar on foot. He said to him, "I will take you on in in single combat—come on!" But Ibn 'Umar replied, "I have no desire to meet you in combat." 'Alī insisted, but Ibn 'Umar remained adamant. When he withdrew Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah began saying to his father: "Oh my father, why did you stop me from facing him in single combat? By God, if you had 131. Possibly alluding to the Qur'ān, 9:32, 61:8.

132. 'Amr was active against the Byzantines under Mu'āwiyah and later governed Ahwāz for him; his mother was a certain Unāmah or Umaymah, daughter of Yazīd b. 'Abd b. al-Dayyān of the Bal-Ḥārith/Madhḥij (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Amr b. Mu'āwiyah b. al-Muntafiq).

133. For this son of 'Alī by a woman of the tribe of Ḥanīfah, see *EI*², s.v. Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah.

left me alone I hope that I would have killed him." 'Alī replied, "If you had fought him, then I hope you would have killed him, but I was not sure that he would not have killed you." His son said: "Oh my father, would you have taken on this evildoer in single combat? By God, if his father had invited you to single combat I would have wished for you to avoid it."[134] But 'Alī answered, "Oh my son, speak nothing but good of his father." The forces then separated and retired.

On the fifth day 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās and al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah went out and fought together fiercely. Ibn 'Abbās drew near al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who began to denigrate the descendants of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib [3286] and to say, "Oh Ibn 'Abbās, you have severed the ties of kinship and killed your imām. How do you think God will treat you? You will not be given what you seek nor attain what you hope for. If He wills it, God will destroy you and secure victory over you." Ibn 'Abbās sent, calling him to single combat, but he refused. On that day Ibn 'Abbās fought fiercely and personally engaged the Syrian forces.

Then Qays b. Sa'd al-Anṣārī and Dhū al-Kalā' al-Ḥimyarī came out, fought fiercely, and retired. That was the sixth day.

Al-Ashtar came out and Ḥabīb b. Maslamah again met him on the seventh day. They fought fiercely and then retired at noon, neither of them being victorious. That was Tuesday.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan al-Juhanī—Zayd b. Wahb: 'Alī said, "For how long will we not commit our whole force against them?" On Tuesday evening[135] after the afternoon prayer he stood among his men and said: "Praise be to God. What He has destroyed will not be firmly established, and what He has firmly established the destroyers will not destroy. If He wished, no two of His creatures would differ, the community would not dispute

134. That is, Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah regarded the second caliph, 'Umar, as unworthy to fight against 'Alī in single combat.

135. Literally, "on the evening of Tuesday, night of Wednesday"; it should be remembered that in the lunar calendar a day ends and begins at sunset, not midnight; accordingly the presunset period is counted to one day and the immediately following night to the next day.

about any of His affairs, and the second best[136] would not fail to acknowledge the merit of the best. But the divine decrees have herded us and these people and entangled us together, in this place, and our Lord sees and hears us. If God wished He would hasten the retribution and alter things so that He would give the lie to the evildoer and make known the outcome of the truth.[137] But He has made this world the place for deeds and the next world, with Him, 'the place of stability' 'so that He might requite those who have done evil for what they have done and reward those who have done good with a good outcome.'[138] Tomorrow you will meet the [3287] enemy, so lengthen the night standing in prayer, make abundant recitation of the Qur'ān, and ask God for help and steadfastness. Meet them with eagerness and resoluteness and be righteous!" He departed and the men rushed for their swords, lances, and arrows to ensure that they were in order. Ka'b b. Ju'ayl al-Taghlabī[139] passed them, saying:

The community has entered upon a strange matter, and the kingship tomorrow is gathered up for whoever wins it.
I have said something true and not false:
Tomorrow the distinguished ones of the Arabs will perish.

'Alī spent the whole of that night preparing the men. When morning came, he advanced with them while Mu'āwiyah came to meet him with the Syrians. 'Alī set about asking, "Who is this tribe?" and "Who is this tribe?" And the genealogy of the tribes of the Syrians was explained to him. When he knew who they were and saw their positions, he said to the Azd (on his own side), "Take care of the Azd for me," and to the Khath'am, "Take care of the Khath'am for me." He asked each tribe among the men of Iraq to

136. Al-mafḍūl, literally, "the one who is surpassed." The word was a technical term in discussions about the imamate: The Zaydiyyah sect of the Shī'a regarded it as legitimate to recognize the imamate of the "second best" if the man who was rightfully the imam failed to assert his rights. This enabled them to recognize Abū Bakr and 'Umar as legitimate even though 'Alī, according to the Shī'a, was the rightful imam following the Prophet.

137. Cairo reads: wa-ya'lamu al-ḥaqqu ayna maṣīruhu "and the truth will know its outcome" (?).

138. See Qur'ān 40:40, 53:31.

139. For this poet of the Banū Taghlib, see al-Iṣfahānī, Kitab al-Aghānī, V, 13 and passim; and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ka'b b. Ğu'ail.

take care of its counterpart among the Syrians, and if there was a tribe of whom there were none in Syria he would assign it against another of whom there were members among the Syrians but not among the Iraqis. For example, he assigned those of his men of Banū Bajīlah, of whom there was only a small number in Syria, to face Lakhm.

On Wednesday the men fought with one another and strove fiercely for the whole day. At evening they withdrew, neither side victorious, and on Thursday morning 'Alī led the prayer while it was still dark. [3288]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab al-Azdī—his father. I never saw 'Alī lead the prayer of daybreak while it was still dark at an earlier time than he did on that day.[140] Then he led his men out against the Syrians, advancing toward them and taking the initiative against them. When they realized that he had advanced toward them, they came to meet him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan—Zayd b. Wahb al-Juhanī: 'Alī went out to them on Wednesday morning, met them, and said,

> Oh God, Lord of the vault raised aloft,[141] maintained and held back, which You made as a place for the passing away of night and day, and in which You put the course of the sun and the moon and the stations of the stars, and the inhabitants of which You made a host of angels who never weary[142] of worship; and Lord of this earth that You made as a fixed place for mankind,[143] creatures great and small, and the innumerable invisible and visible things of Your great creation; and Lord of the ships that navigate the sea with goods useful for men;[144] and Lord of the clouds forced to go between the heavens and the earth; and Lord of the

140. Mā . . . ghallasa bi l-ṣalāt ashadda min taghlīsihi yawma'idhin. Taghlīs is a technical term in ḥadīth and fiqh discussions about the correct time for the dawn prayer (ṣalāt al-ṣubḥ or ṣalāt al-fajr). For references, see *EI*², s.v. Mīḳāt; and Wensinck et al., Concordances, s.v. gh-l-s. The Prophet and a number of his Companions are said to have made taghlīs bi-al-ṣalāt.

141. See Qur'ān 52:5. For the following speech, see SNB, IX, 301ff.

142. See Qur'ān 41.37.

143. See Qur'ān 40:64, 55:10.

144. Qur'ān 2:164.

> swarming sea[145] encircling the earth; and Lord of the mighty-headed mountains that You made as pegs for the earth[146] and as a benefit for creation; if You give us victory over our enemy, remove oppression from us, and guide us to the right; but if You give them victory over us, then recompense me with martyrdom and preserve the remnant of my companions from the fitnah.[147]

On Wednesday the men crowded together and fought one of the fiercest battles until night, desisting from one another only for prayer. The number of those slain on both sides was great, and when [3289] they separated at night neither side was victorious. The next day ʿAlī led his men in prayer early on Thursday morning, praying extremely early, while it was still dark. He then took the initiative from the Syrians by going out to fight, but when they saw that he had set out toward them they went out to face him. ʿAbdallāh b. Budayl was in command of ʿAlī's right wing and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās of his left. The qurrāʾ of the Iraqis were with three individuals—ʿAmmār b. Yāsir, Qays b. Saʿd, and ʿAbdallāh b. Budayl—while the other men were positioned according to their banners and stations. ʿAlī himself was in the center among the men of Medina, between the Kūfans and the Baṣrans. Most of the men of Medina with him were the Anṣār,[148] but there was also a good number of Khuzāʿah, Kinānah, and other people of Medina with him.

ʿAlī advanced with his men, while Muʿāwiyah erected a large dome-shaped tent over which he had cast hangings of cloth.[149] Most of the Syrians gave him the oath of allegiance that they would fight

---

145. Qur'ān 52:6.

146. See Qur'ān 78:7, 79:32–33.

147. The idea of fitnah is often referred to in this volume and also in the Qur'ān and much early Muslim literature. It is a word with a variety of connotations, according to context. Often used to refer to periods of "civil war" among the Muslims, it also frequently implies "trial," "test," "temptation," and "calamity," sometimes with apocalyptic associations. See *EI*², s.v.

148. The name given in tradition to those members of the Medinese clans of Aws and Khazraj who "helped" (n-ṣ-r) Muḥammad when he came to Medina from Mecca, and hence to the Aws and Khazraj in general. See *EI*², s.v.

149. Al-karābīs, pl. of kirbās. The Arabic lexicographical tradition defines it as a "coarse garment" or "piece of cloth" and derives it from Persian karvās; Lane, Lexicon, s.v., draws attention to Hebrew karpas (Esther 1:6. "[in the court of the garden of the king's palace were] white, green and blue hangings"), Greek karpasos, and Latin carbasus. See Sanskrit kārpāsa, "cotton."

to the death, and he sent out the cavalry of Damascus to surround his tent. 'Abdallāh b. Budayl advanced with 'Alī's right wing against Ḥabīb b. Maslamah and constantly harried him and drove back his cavalry from the left wing of Mu'āwiyah until he had forced them back to Mu'āwiyah's tent about noon.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan—Zayd b. Wahb al-Juhanī: Ibn Budayl stood among his men and said, "Mu'āwiyah has claimed what he has no right to and has contested this affair with someone not to be compared with him. He has used futile argument to attempt to refute the truth[150] and has attacked you with the bedouins and confederates.[151] He has made error seem good to them and sowed the seeds of fitnah in their hearts. He has deceived them in this matter and increased the filth in which they were already plunged.[152] But you have a light from your Lord and a clear proof.[153] Fight the crude tyrants and do not fear them. How can you fear them when you have in your hands the Book of God in purity and reverence? 'Do you fear them? It is more fitting that you should fear God if you are Believers. Fight them, and God will punish them at your hands and humiliate them. He will give you victory over them and restore to health the hearts of a people who believe.'[154] We have fought against them with the Prophet, and now we do so again. By God, they are not now any more God-fearing, pure or right guided. Stand against your enemy, and may God give you His blessing!" And he and his men fought bravely. [3290]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Amrah al-Anṣārī—his father and a client (mawlā) of his: At Ṣiffīn 'Alī incited his men as follows:

> "God has guided you to a commerce that will deliver you from a bitter punishment"[155] and bring you to the verge of good: "belief in God and His Messenger, and jihād in the path of God,"[156] may His name be exalted. He has made His reward a pardon of sin "and blessed abodes in the gardens

150. See Qur'ān 18:56, 40:5.
151. See Qur'ān 33:20; see n. 106, above.
152. See Qur'ān 9:125.
153. See Qur'ān 39:22.
154. Qur'ān 9:13–14.
155. Qur'ān 61:10.
156. Qur'ān 61:11.

of Eden."[157] Then He has informed you that He "loves those who fight in His path in lines as if they were a tightly compact building"[158] so make your lines even like a tightly compact building. Advance the armed man and hold back the unarmed, and grit your teeth, for it makes the swords rebound from the heads. Twist the ends of the lances, for it better preserves the points. Avert your gaze, for that is more calming for the soul and more soothing for the heart. Deaden your voices, for that is better for driving out cow-[3291] ardice and more dignified. As for your banners, neither lower them nor abandon them, and make sure they stay in the hands of the valiant men among you. Those who defend what it is their duty to defend and are steadfast in protecting what it is obligatory for them to protect, they are the guardians who surround their banners and protect them, fighting on both sides of them, behind and in front of them, and not abandoning them. A man has given satisfaction who strikes his opponent hard—may God have mercy on you—and puts his brother on a level with himself, and does not leave his opponent to his brother, so as to acquire blame and become base. And why is it that he should not act thus, one man fighting two opponents while another who has held back his hand leaves his opponent to confront his brother, he himself fleeing or standing looking on? Whoever does that, God hates him. So do not expose yourselves to the hatred of God, praise be to Him, for your place of return is only to God.[159] God, the mightiest of those who speak, said to a people, "Flight will not avail you if you flee from death or slaying; in that case you will be allowed to enjoy only a little time."[160] And I swear by God that, if you escape from the sword of this world, you will not escape from that of the next. Ask for the assistance of sincerity and steadfastness, for after steadfastness God sends down the victory.

157. Qur'ān 61:12.
158. Qur'ān 61:4.
159. See Qur'ān 40:43.
160. Qur'ān 33:16.

The Intensity of the Fighting

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Rawq al-Hamdānī: Yazīd b. Qays al-Arḥabī encouraged 'Alī's men to fight by saying:

> The perfect Muslim[161] is he whose religion and understanding are free from error. By God, these, our enemy, do not fight us to reestablish a religion that they think we have brought to naught and to restore a truth that they think we have destroyed. They are fighting us only for this world, that they may be tyrants and kings in it. If they were to triumph over you—and may God not show them victory or enjoyment—they would appoint over you[162] the likes of Sa'īd, al-Walīd, and the stupid and misguided 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir.[163] Each of them made gifts[164] in his court of sums equivalent to his own blood money and that of his father and grandfather, saying, "This is mine, and I do no wrong (in making such a gift)"—as if he had merely been given what he had inherited from his father and mother. In fact, that is God's property that He has granted to us as spoils, won by our swords and our lances. Servants of God, fight those evil people who rule and judge by other than what God has revealed, and do not let any reproach divert you in your jihād against them. If they have the victory over you, they will pervert your religion and your life in this world. They are those whom you have known and experienced, and I swear by God that until now they have merely become more evil. [3292]

'Abdallāh b. Budayl fought hard (against the Syrians) with the right wing and got as far as the tent of Mu'āwiyah. Those who had sworn the latter allegiance to the death then came to Mu'āwiyah,

---

161. Al-muslim al-salīm; see Qur'ān 26:89.

162. Lazimūkum bi-; WS, 247; and Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, III, 246, have alzamūkum.

163. The references are presumably to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣi (EI[1], s.v.), al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah (see n. 16 above), and 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz (EI[2], s.v.); all had been governors in al-Kūfah or al-Baṣrah.

164. Yujīzu . . . bi; Cairo has yukhbiru . . . bi; WṢ, 247, has yuḥaddithu . . . bi. The passage seems a little obscure. Presumably Yazīd b. Qays is accusing these governors of diverting for their own purposes funds that rightfully belonged to the Arab Muslims as a whole.

and he ordered them to resist Ibn Budayl and 'Alī's right wing. He sent to Ḥabīb b. Maslamah, who was with his own left wing, and, with those men and the others who were with himself, he (Ḥabīb) attacked our right and defeated them. The men of Iraq on the right wing were routed, and eventually only Ibn Budayl and 200 or 300 of the qurrā' were left (there), fighting back to back. 'Alī's men panicked, but he ordered Sahl b. Ḥunayf to advance with those Medinans who were with him. A large group of the Syrians came to meet them and attacked them, forcing them to join the men of [3293] the right. In the right wing, as far as the place where 'Alī was in the center, were the men of the Yemen,[165] and when they were put to flight[166] the rout was effective as far as 'Alī, who moved back unhurriedly on foot toward the left wing. The Muḍar of the left wing abandoned him while the Rabī'ah held firm.[167]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan al-Juhanī—Zayd b. Wahb al-Juhanī: 'Alī, together with his sons, passed by, going toward the left wing. I could see the arrows barely missing him, but each one of his sons was careful to protect (his father) with his own self. When that happened, 'Alī would go ahead and put himself between the Syrians and his son, taking his hand and placing him in front of him or behind.[168] Aḥmar, a mawlā of Abū Sufyān[169] or of 'Uthmān or another of the Umayyad family, saw him and swore:[170] "By the Lord of the Ka'bah! May God kill me if I do not either kill you or you kill me." He moved toward 'Alī, but Kaysān,[171] the mawlā of 'Alī, attacked him. The two of them exchanged blows, and the mawlā of the Umayyads killed Kaysān. 'Alī, however, seized the Syrian, put his hand in the breast of his armor, pulled him up, and then lifted him onto his shoulders. I can still see his two feet[172]

---

165. That is, those belonging to tribes classified by the genealogists as "southerners."

166. Kashifū, a quasi-passive of kashafa; WṢ, 248, has inkashafū.

167. Two tribal groupings, both classified as "northerners."

168. The referents of the pronouns are slightly ambiguous, so that it is not clear whether the father was sheltering the sons or the sons the father, although the latter seems more likely. WṢ, 249, inserts fa-yakrahu 'Aliyyun dhālik "'Alī did not like that" to make it clear that it was his sons who tried to protect 'Alī, who then took them and sheltered them himself.

169. That is, a mawlā of Mu'āwiyah's father.

170. WṢ, 249, makes 'Alī the one who swore the oath.

171. The name also occurs as that of a mawlā prominent in the rising of al-Mukhtār and as the eponym of a Shī'ī sect; see EI², s.v. Kaysān, Kaysāniyya.

172. Rujaylatā, a diminuitive; see Gloss., s.v. r-j-l.

coming down on 'Alī's neck, but then the latter smashed him to ground and broke his shoulder and his upper arms, and 'Alī's two sons, Ḥusayn and Muḥammad, fell on him and struck him with their swords. I can still see 'Alī standing and his two cubs striking the man. When they had killed him and come up to their father, 'Alī asked al-Ḥasan, who was standing by, "My son, why did you not act as your two brothers did?" He answered, "Commander of the Fathful, they made it unnecessary for me to do so."

Then the men of Syria got close to him, but, by God, that did [3294] not make him move any faster. Al-Ḥasan said, "It would not do any harm if you went more quickly so that you would reach those of your men who have held fast against the enemy." But he answered: "My son, there is a day coming for your father that he will inevitably face, and going fast will not postpone it for him, and walking normally will not hurry it up. By God it does not matter for your father whether he comes upon death or death comes upon him."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī—a mawlā of al-Ashtar: When the right wing of the Iraqis was defeated and 'Alī joined the left, al-Ashtar passed him galloping in the direction of the right wing toward the panic. 'Alī said to him, "Mālik," and he answered, "Yes, here I am at your service." 'Alī said, "Go to those men and ask them why they are fleeing from death, whose power they cannot destroy, to life, which will not long remain for them?" Mālik went on and met the men in their flight. He said to them what 'Alī had told him to say and rallied them, saying, "To me, men! I am Mālik b. al-Ḥārith, I am Mālik b. al-Ḥārith!" But then he thought that perhaps he was better known among them as al-Ashtar, and he said, "I am al-Ashtar! To me, men!"

A group joined him, but a group deserted, and he cried out: "Men, how shameful you are![173] How wretched has been your fighting today! Men, sort out Madhḥij,[174] and send them to me."

Madhḥij joined him, and he said: "May you bite on hard rock![175] You have neither pleased your Lord nor been true to Him regarding your enemy. How can that be when you are born warriors, lords

173. See Wright, Grammar, index, and Lane, Lexicon (Supplement), both s.v. han.

174. Together with Kindah and Hamdān, Madhḥij was one of the main "southern" tribes settled in al-Kūfah; al-Ashtar's own tribe of Nakha' belonged to them (see *EI*², s.v.; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Maḏḥiǧ).

175. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. aṣamm.

of the raid, lads for a fight, heroes of the chase, bringers of death [3295] to your opponents, Madhḥij of the weapon thrust, those who are ever first in taking their revenge, whose blood is not left unavenged, who never know disgrace on a battlefield? You are the sharp blade among the men of your garrison town, and the most ready to fight[176] of the clans of your people. Whatever you do on this day will be handed down afterward, so take heed of the accounts that will be passed on in the future. Prove true in meeting the enemy, for God is with those who are true. By Him in whose hand is Mālik's life, there is no man among those—and he pointed with his hand to the Syrians—comparable with Muḥammad, even to the extent of a gnat's wing. You have not fought well.[177] Remove the pallor[178] from my face, and let my blood return to it. Rouse yourselves against this great host! If God—may He be magnified and exalted—scatters it, those on each side will follow it, just as the tail of a flood of water follows its head."

They responded, "Lead us wherever you want," so he went toward the thick of the enemy from the side adjoining the right wing, beginning to advance toward them and pushing them back.

Warriors of Hamdān[179] turned toward him—they were 800 fighters at that time. The rest of the men had been routed, but they had held firm in the right wing until 180 of them had been laid low and 11 of their leaders had been killed. Each time one of them was killed, another took the banner. The first was Kurayb b. Shurayḥ, [3296] then Shuraḥbīl b. Shurayḥ, then Marthad b. Shurayḥ, then Hubayrah b. Shurayḥ, then Yarīm b. Shurayḥ, then Sumayr b. Shurayḥ. Those six brothers were all killed, and then Sufyān b. Zayd seized the banner, then 'Abd b. Zayd, then Kurayb b. Zayd. Those three brothers were all killed, and then 'Umayr b. Bashīr seized the banner, then al-Ḥārith b. Bashīr. They were both killed.

---

176. A'add; Ann. has "la più numerosa," but see jaysh a'add in Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

177. WS, 252, inserts al-yawma before al-qirā'.

178. Reading suwād, rather than sawād.

179. For this "southern" tribal group, see *EI*², s.v.; together with Madhḥij and Ḥimyar they made up one of the sevenths into which al-Kūfah was organized. None of the following names of Hamdānīs are listed in Ibn al-Kalbī, and these appear to be the only references to them in Ṭabarī's History.

Wahb b. Kurayb seized the banner, the brother of al-Qalūṣ.[180] He wanted to advance, but one of his fellow tribesmen said: "Go back with this banner, may God have mercy on you! The noble men (ashrāf) of your tribe have been killed around it. Do not kill yourself and those of your tribe who are left." They retreated, therefore, saying: "Would that we had an equal number from among the other Arabs who would swear an alliance with us to fight to the death. Then we and they together would advance and not retreat until we were killed or achieved the victory." They passed by al-Ashtar while they were saying this, and he addressed them: "Come to me. I will swear an alliance with you and make a covenant never to retreat until we have gained the victory or have perished." So they came to him and stood with him in battle.

Regarding what they said, Ka'b b. Ju'ayl al-Taghlabī recited:

And Hamdān are blind;[181] they seek someone with whom to ally.

Al-Ashtar proceeded toward the right wing, and there joined his men who were falling back, men of steadfastness who would avoid shame and fulfill their undertakings. He defeated every squadron he fought against and overcame and drove back every detachment. While he was doing that he passed Ziyād b. al-Naḍr, who was being carried to the army camp. He asked who it was and was informed: [3297]
"Ziyād b. al-Naḍr. 'Abdallāh b. Budayl and his men were surrounded in the right wing. Ziyād went forward and raised aloft his banner for the men of the right wing, and they stood firm. He fought until he was felled."

Then hardly any time seemed to pass before al-Ashtar passed Yazīd b. Qays al-Arḥabī, who was being carried back to the camp. He asked who it was, and they told him: "Yazīd b. Qays. When Ziyād b. al-Naḍr was felled, Yazīd raised aloft his banner for the men of the right wing and fought until he himself was laid low." Al-Ashtar said: "This, by God, is real perseverance and nobility in action. Is not[182] the true man ashamed to turn back without killing or being killed or being brought close to it?"

---

180. WṢ, 252, has the following suggested emendations to the names previously given, based on the citations of WṢ in SNB: Shimr/Shamir (for Sumayr) b. Shurayḥ; Karib (for Kurayb) b. Zayd; 'Abdallāh (for 'Abd) b. Zayd; 'Umayr and al-Ḥārith b. Bishr (for Bashīr); Wahb b. Kurayb Abū (for akhū) al-Qalūṣ.

181. Zurq; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. azraq, with reference to Qur'ān 20:102.

182. Ann. suggests read idhā for a-lā; WṢ, 254, has a-lā.

According to Abū Miknaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—al-Ḥurr b. al-Ṣayyāḥ al-Nakha'ī: At that time al-Ashtar was fighting, mounted on one of his horses with a Yemeni sword in his hand.[183] Every time he lowered it, you would have thought that it contained water flowing forth, and every time he raised it the rays of light from it were almost blinding. As he struck with his sword he would say, "Ill luck will change."[184]

Al-Ḥārith b. Jumhān al-Ju'fī[185] looked at him, but al-Ashtar was obscured by his armor, and al-Ḥārith did not recognize him. He drew near al-Ashtar and said, "May God reward you well henceforth for what you have done on behalf of the Commander of the Faithful and the Muslims." Al-Ashtar recognized him and said, "Does a man like you, Ibn Jumhān, lag behind when I am fighting like this?" Ibn Jumhān then looked at him and recognized him—al-Ashtar was one of the strongest built and tallest of the men, and he rarely trimmed his beard—and he said: "May I be made a ransom for you! By God, I did not know where you were until just now. I will stay with you until the death."

Munqidh and Ḥimyar, two sons of Qays of Banū al-Nā'iṭ,[186] saw him, and Munqidh said to his brother, "There is no one among the Arabs like this, judging from what I have seen of the way he fights."
[3298] Ḥimyar asked, "Do you think he has some ulterior motive beyond what you see him doing?" Munqidh answered, "I fear that he aims for kingship."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj—a mawlā of al-Ashtar: When most of those of the right wing who had fled had joined him, al-Ashtar worked them up and said,

> Grit your teeth, and meet the enemy head on. Fight like a people who have been denied vengeance for their fathers and brothers, wrathful against their enemy, determined on death for themselves so as not to be forestalled in their vengeance and not to meet shame in this world. I swear by 183. See Ann. 37 A. H. §20, for literature referring to the sword of al-Ashtar.

184. Literally, "the floods (come) and then pass from us," Freytag, Arabum proverbia, II, 173.

185. See n. 46, above.

186. The Banū al-Nā'iṭ are a branch of Hamdān (Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 227); Munqidh and Ḥimyar do not seem to be further identifiable.

> God that there is nothing in which a people are cheated of vengeance that presses on them more than that they should be cheated in their religion (dīn). The enemy are fighting you precisely on account of your religion, so as to destroy the accepted practice (sunnah), cause innovation (bid'ah) to flourish, and cast you back into the error from which God has delivered you by the grace of His regard. Servants of God, gladly surrender your blood, not your religion, and your reward will be due from God, for with Him are pleasant gardens.[187] In refusal to go forward there is the ruin of our honor, the seizure of the spoils we have won (fay'), abasement in life and in death, and shame in this world and the next.

He attacked the Syrians and defeated them until he had driven them back to the lines of Mu'āwiyah, during the time between the afternoon and evening prayers. He came to 'Abdallāh b. Budayl, who was with a group of the qurrā' between 200 and 300 strong, which had held its ground so stubbornly that they might have been heaps of stones. He drove the Syrians back from them, and when those qurrā' perceived that their brethren were at hand they asked about the Commander of the Faithful. Al-Ashtar's men replied, "He is alive and in good health, in the left wing and fighting the enemy in front of him." "Praise be to God. We thought that he must have perished and you too," they said. 'Abdallāh b. Budayl said to his [3299] men, "Let us advance," but al-Ashtar sent to him: "No! Hold fast with the army and fight—that is better for them and increases the chances of survival for you and your men." But he refused to heed that and went on just as he was toward Mu'āwiyah, surrounded as if by mountains. In his hand he had two swords.[188] He had been wounded,[189] but he was in front of his men, and every time a Syrian approached him he would strike him and kill him. When he had killed seven, he came close to Mu'āwiyah, but the latter's supporters rushed to him from every side, and he and a band of his men were surrounded. He fought until he and some of his men were killed, while a group of those who had been wounded[190] retreated in flight.

187. See Qur'ān 31:8.

188. For the custom of fighting with two swords, see F. W. Schwarzlose, Die Waffen, (Leipzig, 1886), 55–56 (Ann., A. H. 37 §21).

189. Read jurīḥa for kharaja (Add. et emend.); Cairo maintains kharaja.

Al-Ashtar sent Ibn Jumhān al-Ju'fī to attack those Syrians pursuing the men of Ibn Budayl who had escaped. After he had brought them relief, they came to al-Ashtar, who said: "Would not my view have been better for you than your own? Did I not tell you to hold fast with the men?"

While Ibn Budayl was striking out in front, Mu'āwiyah had said regarding him,[191] "Do you think that he is the bellwether of the army?" After he had been killed, he sent with instructions to find out who he was. Some of the Syrians looked at him but said that they did not recognize him, so Mu'āwiyah came and stood over him, and said: "Indeed, it is 'Abdallāh b. Budayl. By God, if the women of Khuzā'ah had been able to fight us as well as their men, they would have done so. Lay him out!"[192] They laid him out, and Mu'āwiyah said, "By God, this is just as the poet said:

Valiant fighter! If war afflicted him, he afflicted it, and if, one day, war became vehement for him, he strove (in it) vehemently.

[3300] (The verse is by Ḥātim Ṭayyi'.)[193]

Al-Ashtar advanced against them, and Mu'āwiyah met him with the 'Akk and the Ash'ar.[194] Al-Ashtar said to Madhḥij, "Protect me against 'Akk," and he positioned himself among Hamdān and said to Kindah, "Protect me against the Ash'ar." They fought fiercely while he went off to his own kin (Madhḥij), saying, "That is only 'Akk—attack them!" The 'Akk went down on their knees reciting in rajaz:

Woe to the mother of Madhḥij from 'Akk!
That is the mother of Madhḥij weeping.

---

190. Read juriḥū for kharajū (Add. et emend.).
191. Qāla li ibni Budayl.
192. Muddūhu; Ann. has "lasciatelo."
193. See his Dīwān, ed. F. Schultess (Leipzig, 1897), no. XLIX (p. 34, line 18).
194. Two "southern" tribes settled in Jordan; Ash'ar was counted as a uterine brother of Madhḥij (see Ibn al-Kalbī, s.vv. 'Akk b. 'Adnān and Aš'ar b. 'Udad; and *EI*², s.v. 'Akk).

They fought until evening, and then al-Ashtar attacked them with Hamdān and other groups. He charged at them and forced them to abandon their positions, eventually forcing them back among the five lines bound together with turbans around Mu'āwiyah. Then he bore down fiercely once more. He brought down the first four lines (they were bound together with turbans), and they reached the fifth line around Mu'āwiyah. Mu'āwiyah called for a horse and mounted. (Subsequently) he would say, "I wanted to flee, but I remembered what Ibn al-Iṭnābah[195] of the Anṣār (he was a poet before Islam, and his mother al-Iṭnābah was a woman of Balqayn) said:

My integrity and sense of honor have forbidden me (to flee), together with my boldness against the advancing hero,
My giving away what I have, in spite of my abhorrence for that,
my acquisition of praise for a gainful price,
And my saying each time my heart heaves with fright,
"Hold, heart, to your place—you will be given either praise or rest."

These words prevented me from fleeing.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan al-Juhanī—Zayd b. Wahb: When 'Alī saw that his right wing had taken up its position again and reformed its lines and that it had driven back the enemy facing it so decisively that they were fighting them in their own lines, he came up to them and said,

> I have seen how you were forced to move and pushed out of your lines. It was rude and evil ones and Syrian bedouins who dispersed you, while you are the magnanimous heroes of the Arabs, their mighty peak, denizens of the night in your reciting of the Qur'ān, and people summoning to the truth (ahl da'wat al-ḥaqq) when those in error have gone astray. If it were not for your advancing after your retreat and your attacking following your retirement, there would have been required of you what is required of the one who turns tail on the day of the advance, and you would have [3301] been among those who are lost. But it has abated my passion and remedied some of the anger of my soul that I have seen you, at the end, force them back just as they had forced you and make them leave their lines just as they had made you. You raked them with your swords, their foremost charging after their hindmost like camels being chased. But now, be steadfast. May God's spirit (al-sakīnah) descend on you, and may God make you firm with conviction so that he who is put to flight knows that he displeases his Lord and mortifies his soul. For flight arouses God's anger and results in lasting humiliation, abiding shame, the loss of the spoils that have been won, and the ruin of life. For he who flees there is no increase in the span of his life,[196] and his Lord is not given gratification. It is better that a man should die righteous, before what I have described happens, than that he should be satisfied with accustoming himself to it and accepting it.

195. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only citation from this poet. For the mother's tribe, see *EI*², s.v. Ḳayn.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Salām b. 'Abdallāh b. Jābir al-Aḥmasī: At Ṣiffīn the banner of the Bajīlah was borne by Banū Aḥmas b. al-Ghawth b. Anmār.[197] Abū Shaddād, that is, Qays b. Makshūḥ b. Hilāl b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Jābir b. 'Alī b. Aslam b. Aḥmas b. al-Ghawth, had it.[198] Bajīlah said to him, "Take our banner," but he said, "Someone else would be better for you." "We do not want anybody else," they said, and he replied, "By God, if [3302] you give it to me, I will not stop leading you forward until I reach the man with the gilded shield." They said, "Do as you wish." He took it, therefore, and went forward until he had led them as far as the man with the gilded shield, who was with a large group of Mu'āwiyah's men. (They said that he was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd al-Makhzūmī.) A violent fight broke out there, and Abū Shaddād rushed with his sword against the man with the shield. A Greek (rūmī), a mawlā of Mu'āwiyah, barred his way, struck at

196. Wa-inna al-fārra minhu lā yazīdu fī 'umrihi. The minhu seems intrusive and difficult to understand. WŞ, 256, has wa-inna al-fārra lā yazīdu al-firāru fī 'umrihi.

197. For the Banū Bajīlah, see Ibn al-Kalbī, I table 221, II, index, s.v. Bağīla, and *EI*², s.v. Badjīla; for the Banū Aḥmas b. al-Ghawth of Bajīlah, see Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 223.

198. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II index, s.v. Qais b. Makšūḥ.

Abū Shaddād's foot, and cut it off, but Abū Shaddād stabbed him and killed him. Then the points of spears were directed at Abū Shaddād, and he was killed.

'Abdallāh b. Qil' al-Aḥmasī[199] seized the banner, saying:

May God not dismiss Abū Shaddād since he answered the call of the summoner
And fell with his sword on the opponents.
How excellent a hero he was in face of the attack
And in the thrusting with spears of the footmen and their smiting with swords.

And 'Abdallāh b. Qil' fought until he was killed.

Then his brother, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Qil', took the banner and fought until he was killed. Next 'Afīf b. Iyās took it, and he kept hold of it until the two sides separated. Ḥāzim b. Abī Ḥāzim al-Aḥmasī, brother of Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim, was killed on that day, and so too was Nu'aym b. Ṣuhayb b. al-'Ulayyah al-Bajalī. The latter's cousin and namesake, Nu'aym b. al-Ḥārith b. al-'Ulayyah, came [3303] to Mu'āwiyah, whose side he was on, and said: "This slain man is my cousin. Give him to me so that I may bury him." But Mu'āwiyah responded: "Do not bury him—they[200] are not fit for that. By God, we could bury Ibn 'Affān only in secret." Nu'aym b. al-Ḥārith said, "By God, either you allow me to bury him, or I will join them and abandon you." Mu'āwiyah said: "Do you see the shaykhs of the Arabs preoccupied with these events—and you trouble me about burying your cousin![201] Bury him if you want, or leave him alone!" He buried him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah al-Azdī—shaykhs of Banū al-Namir of the Azd: When the Azd were assigned to fight the Azd, Mikhnaf b. Sulaym[202] praised God and exalted Him and then said: "It is one of the worst wrongs and most terrible trials that we sould be sent against our own people and they against us. By God, it is nothing less than cutting off our own hands and hacking off our arms with our swords. Yet, if we do not assist our comunity and act faithfully toward our leader, we deny our faith (kafarnā), and, if we do that, we abandon our honor and extinguish our fire."[203]

199. He and the Aḥmasīs who are mentioned subsequently do not seem to be further identifiable.

200. Mu'āwiyah apparently disparages all his opponents; Cairo has laysa in the singular.

201. The context seems to demand some such translation as this; Gloss., s.v. ḥ-w-l, form IV, with reference to this passage, has for aḥālahu amruhu": res sua ejus mentem mutavit, ut ad partes alias transiret," which would presumably produce a translation such as, "Do you think that their affairs cause the shaykhs of the Arabs to change their minds [and loyalties]?" WS, 259, has tarā ashyākh al-'arab lā nuwārīhim wa-anta... ["do you see the shaykhs of the Arabs whom we have not buried, and you ask me about..."].

Jundab b. Zuhayr[204] said to him: "By God. Supposing we were their fathers who had begotten them or their sons whom they had sired, and then they had removed themselves from our community and attacked our imām, and thus they exercised authority over those of our religion (millah) and those under our protection with tyranny. In that case the rest of us would not disband after joining together until the renegades had abandoned what they had taken up and returned to that to which we summoned them. Or, if they did not respond, there would be much slaughter between us."

Mikhnaf, who was a maternal cousin of Jundab, replied: "May God honor you for your motive. But, by God, you were always known,[205] as a child and as a grown man, as unlucky. By God, there never was a time, either in the time of our ignorance (jāhiliyyah) or after we had accepted Islam, when we had to make a choice about which of two things we should accept and which we should leave alone, but that you chose the hardest and most difficult. Oh God, [3304] we would rather that You gave us security than put (us) to the test. Grant to each of us what he asks of You."

Abū Buraydah b. 'Awf[206] said: "Oh God, judge between us according to what pleases You. My clansmen, you can see what the 202. For this Azdī ancestor of Abū Mikhnaf, see p. 13, above.

203. WṢ, 262, omits kafarnā.

204. An Azdī who is said to have accepted Islam from the Prophet himself, and an opponent of 'Uthmān (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II index, s.v. Ǧundab b. Zuhair; Ibn Sa'd, I/2, 30).

205. I have adopted the reading of the Cairo edition; Leiden (and Ann.) read 'ulimtu, "I was always known"; WṢ, 262, has Mikhnaf say to Jundab, 'alimtuka, "I have always known you."

206. This is Ṭabarī's only reference to him and it seems possible that it is the later mentioned Abū Zaynab b. 'Awf who is intended—a possible orthographic confusion. WṢ, 263, has Abū Baradah, who is mentioned elsewhere in WṢ and Ṭabarī, and that, too, would be possible orthographically.

people are doing. We have the example of what the community has agreed on, if we are in the right and they righteous; and to follow an example in evil, is, by God, as we know, a misfortune in life and in death."

Jundab b. Zuhayr came forward and challenged the head of the Syrian Azd to combat. The Syrian killed him. 'Ijl and Sa'd, the two sons of 'Abdallāh of the Banū Tha'labah, were also killed out of Jundab's group. Together with Mikhnaf, of his companions were killed 'Abdallāh and Khālid the two sons of Nājid, 'Amr and 'Āmir the two sons of 'Uwayf, 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥajjāj, Jundab b. Zuhayr,[207] and Abū Zaynab b. 'Awf b. al-Ḥārith. 'Abdallāh b. Abī al-Ḥuṣayn al-Azdī went out to fight among the qurrā' who were with 'Ammār b. Yāsir and was struck down with him.[208]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah—shaykhs of Banū al-Namir: At the time of Ṣiffīn 'Uqbah b. Ḥadīd al-Namarī[209] said:

> The pastures of this world have become dry stalks and its trees broken; what was new has become tatters, and what was sweet, bitter. I tell you of a truthful man. I had grown weary of this world and turned myself away from it. I longed for martyrdom and exposed myself to it in every combat and raid. But God insisted that I should attain this day. Now I again expose myself to it and yearn that I shall not be refused it. Servants of God, what do you expect of your jihād against those who act in enmity to God, while you are in fear of death coming to you and seizing your life—for there is no preventing death—or of a blow from [3305] > a sword? You will exchange this present world for the vision of the face of God—powerful and mighty is He—and for the meeting with the prophets, the truthful ones, the martyrs, and the just[210] in the abode of rest. [Fear of death] is not the right attitude!

---

207. The Leiden editor suggests that Jundab's name should be deleted from this list; the parallel in WṢ, 263 (which has some minor variants), includes it.

208. See on this p. 64ff, below.

209. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only mention of him; note that this is not the Banū al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ of Rabī'ah, but al-Namir b. 'Uthmān b. Naṣr. . . b. Mālik b. al-Azd. WṢ, 263–64, calls him 'Utbah b. Juwayriyyah.

210. Qur'ān 4:71.

Then he went on and said, "My brothers, I have sold this abode for that which lies ahead of it. Here I look toward it. May you not lose sight of it,[211] and may God not deny your hopes."

His brothers 'Ubaydallāh, 'Awf, and Mālik followed him, saying, "We will not seek the rewards of this world after you have gone, for God has made life hateful without you. Oh God, we hope that the loss of our lives will be rewarded with You." And they went forward and fought until they were killed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ṣilah[212] b. Zuhayr al-Nahdī—Muslim[213] b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḍibābī: I was at Ṣiffīn with our clan, and Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan[214] al-Ḍibābī was with us. Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī[215] challenged him to combat and struck Shamir in the face with his sword; Shamir gave him a blow that did no harm. Then Shamir returned to the place where he had left his equipment and drank something, for he was thirsty. He took his lance and went forward, saying:

It is my responsibility to give the brother of Bāhilah a lance thrust, since I did not kill [him] immediately;[216]
Or a blow, beneath the spears and the fighting, that will almost kill him or indeed kill him.

Then he attacked Adham and felled [but did not kill] him and said, "Take this (blow) for that one."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Amr b. 'Amr b. 'Awf b. Mālik al-Jushamī: Bishr b. 'Iṣmah al-Muzanī had joined Mu'āwiyah. When the armies fought at Ṣiffīn, Bishr noticed Mālik b. al-'Aqadiyyah

---

211. Hādhā wajhī ilayhā lā tubraḥu wujūhukum; WṢ, 264, has hādhā wajhī ilayhā lā yubriḥu (!) Allāhu wujūhakum.

212. Text has Mallah, but see Add. et emend.; he appears as Ṣilah at Ṭabarī, II, 636 (= XX, 220, of this translation, where al-Ḍabbābī should be corrected to al-Ḍibābī). WṢ, 268, cites the following report from Muslim via al-Ṣalt b. Zuhayr al-Nahdī, a name that figures in the isnāds of a number of its other reports.

213. Delete the Abū before Muslim in the text (see Add. et emend.).

214. Of the Banū Kilāb (of Qays); later famous as one of the leaders of the force that killed al-Ḥusayn at Karbalā' (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index s.v. Šimr b. Šuraḥbīl).

215. Of the Banū Qays (see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 168–69 and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

216. Following the reading suggested in note d): idh lam uṣib; the printed text has in lam uṣab, presumably giving a rendering like "if I am not killed." Ann. seems to amalgamate the two possibilities: "poichè non sono stato colpito" (A.H. 37 §26). WṢ, 268, has in lam amut.

(he was Mālik b. al-Julāḥ al-Jushamī,[217] but the name al-'Aqadiyyah had prevailed) achieving wonderful deeds against the Syrians. Mālik was a true Muslim and brave, and Bishr was annoyed by what he saw. So he attacked him, stabbed him, and felled him to the ground, but then he turned back and was sorry about stabbing him treacherously[218] and said: [3306]

From my "king" (i.e., God) I hope for forgiveness while in my heart is disquiet concerning the master of the branded camel.
I crept up to him beneath the dust of battle with a thrust at a time when spear thrusts were being exchanged violently.

Ibn al-'Aqadiyyah learned of what Bishr had said and replied:

Inform Bishr b. 'Iṣmah that I was preoccupied and that those whom I was against distracted me.
You seized upon a moment of inattention and took advantage of it like that; true champions are direct in attack or take advantage of opportunities.

Then 'Abdallāh b. al-Ṭufayl al-Bakkā'ī[219] attacked a group of Syrians. When he was on his way back, a man of the Banū Tamīm called Qays b. Qurrah,[220] one of the Iraqis who had joined Mu'āwiyah, attacked him and placed his lance between his shoulder blades. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, the cousin of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ṭufayl, then went up to him and put his own lance between the shoulders of the Tamīmī. He said, "By God, if you stab him, I stab you." The Tamīmī answered, "Do you swear faithfully by God that if I remove the spear point from the back of your companion you will take yours away from mine?" Yazīd said, "Yes, I promise you that by God." And the Tamīmī removed his spear from Ibn al-Ṭufayl, and Yazīd removed his.

---

217. For Bishr b. 'Iṣmah al-Muzanī, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s. v. Bišr. For Mālik b. al-Julāḥ al-Jushamī, WṢ, 269, n. 4, refers to the Mu'jam al-shu'arā' of al-Marzubānī (Jerusalem, 1354), 363. For the various possibilities regarding Banū 'Aqad, see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, II, 797.

218. Jabbāran; see Gloss., s.v.

219. Of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ṭufail al-Bakkā'ī).

220. WṢ, 277, has Qays b. Nahd al-Ḥanẓalī al-Yarbū'ī.

The Tamīmī asked which tribal group Yazīd was from, and he answered, "From Banū 'Āmir.[221] The Tamīmī said to Yazīd, "May [3307] God make me a ransom for you. May you two return with the friendship between us and your clan as it was before the battle, you (all) being noble,[222] (even though) you have killed eleven men of my family and clan today, and I am the last of them."

When the army got back to al-Kūfah, Ibn al-Ṭufayl reproved Yazīd regarding something of the sort for which a man censures his cousin, and Yazīd responded:

Did you not see me shielding you in good faith at Ṣiffīn when every close friend deserted you?
And I held the Ḥanẓalī (of Tamīm) back from you, who had come on a charger in the freshness of its youth and full of running.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj: One of the Syrians came out challenging anybody to fight and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥriz al-Kindī, al-Ṭaḥmī, went out against him.[223] The two of them sparred with each other for some time, and then 'Abd al-Raḥmān attacked the Syrian and stabbed him right between his collar bones and felled him to the ground. Then he dismounted and plundered his armor and weapons and found that he was a Ḥabashī.[224] 'Abd al-Raḥmān said: "We belong to God (and to Him we will return). Against whom did I hazard my life? Against a black slave!" Then a man of the 'Akk came out asking for combat, and Qays b. Fahdān al-Kindī, al-Baddā'ī,[225] accepted the challenge. The

---

221. In the Arabic subject and object are not clearly distinguished grammatically, but it seems that the Tamīmī asked the question of Yazīd, since the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah are the group of which the Banū Bakkā' are a fraction.

222. Ubtumā ilfukum ilfukum kirāman. For this translation, see Gloss., s.v. '-l-f, with reference to Wright, Grammar, II, §183a, rem., for the case of a verb followed by a nominal clause but without wa (one might have expected ubtumā wa-ilfukum . . .). Cairo has aynumā ulfikum ulfikum kirāman ("wherever I find you, I will find you noble ones"), and WṢ, 277 (aynumā laqaynākum wajadnākum kirāman), gives the same sense.

223. WṢ, 276, emends Ṭaḥmī to Ṭumaḥī or Ṭamaḥī, which is a fraction of Kindah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ṭumḥ b. al-Ḥārith.

224. That is, an Abyssinian, but here probably simply meaning "black."

225. See Add. et emend. for the nisba al-Baddā'ī (of Kindah); the printed text has al-Kināni al-Badanī, which is adopted by WṢ, 276–77, apparently from Ṭabarī (the ms. reading al-Kindī). See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Qais b. Fahdān, where it is said that he is falsely ascribed to Banū Baddā'.

'Akkī attacked Qays. He, however, stabbed his attacker, whose companions then carried him off. Qays b. Fahdān said:

'Akk have learned at Ṣiffīn that we,
when the two horsemen meet, shall thrust at them from every side,
And carry the banners of battle as they merit.
We will come with them white and bring them back red.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj: Qays b. Fahdān was urging on his companions, saying: "When you attack, attack together, and, when you turn away, turn away simultaneously. Lower your eyes, and be few in your words. Take turns in taking on your opponents, and indeed destruction will not befall the Arabs on your part." [3308]

Nahīk b. Zuhayr of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Adī, 'Amr b. Yazīd of the Banū Dhuhl, and Sa'īd b. 'Amr[226] were all killed. Qays b. Yazīd then came out—he was one of those who had fled to Mu'āwiyah from 'Alī—and issued a challenge. His brother Abū al-'Amarraṭah b. Yazīd went out against him, but they recognized each other and desisted from fighting together and then returned to their respective armies, each of them reporting that he had met his brother.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ja'far b. Ḥudhayfah of the family of 'Āmir b. Juwayn al-Ṭā'ī: At Ṣiffīn the Ṭayyi' fought fiercely, and a large force of them was mobilized. Ḥamzah b. Mālik al-Hamdānī[227] came to them and asked, "To which people do you belong, God be with you?" 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah al-Bawlānī, who was a partisan of 'Alī (shī'ī) and a poet and orator, replied,[228] "We are Ṭayyi' of the plain, Ṭayyi' of the sand, and Ṭayyi' of the mountain, which is well defended and supplied with palm trees; we are the defenders of the two hills[229] as far as what is between 226. WṢ, 285, has Nuhayk b. 'Azīz, Cairo Nuhayk b. 'Uzayr; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, has Nahīk b. Ghurayr (Gurair). The Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Adī are of Kindah. I cannot identify 'Amr b. Yazīd, but both names seem to be common among the Banū Dhuhl b. Mu'āwiyah of Kindah. For Qays and his brother Abū al-'Amarraṭah, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.v. Qais b. Yazīd b. 'Amr b. Šarāḥīl and 'Umair b. Yazīd.

227. See n. 81, above.

228. The following words are in saj', rhyming prose.

229. See n. 114, above, on the two hills of the Banū Ṭayyi'.

al-'Udhayb and al-'Ayn;[230] we are Ṭayyi' of the lances, Ṭayyi' of the butting, and warriors of the morning." Ḥamzah b. Mālik answered, "Well done! Excellent! You are great in praising your own people," and 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah said:

If you do not know of the courage of a group of people, then come to us, may misfortune not fall upon you, and you will know.

Then the men fought together most fiercely and 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah began calling out: "O band of Ṭayyi', may all that I have which is new and all that I have which is old be a ransom for you. Fight in accordance with your noble status!" And he began to say:

[3309] I am he whose sword, when the crier gives the call, penetrates through the bone, he who is spritely and excites admiration.
I unhorse the one who has donned the breastplate, the one concealed by his helmet, and I kill the noble man who fights on foot.

Bishr b. al-'Asūs al-Ṭā'ī, al-Milqaṭī,[231] said:

Ṭayyi' of the plains and the mountains!
Attack with your swords and iron tips of your spears and with your ironclad and heroic men.
And fight against the imams of the ignorant ones, those who wander in the ways of error.

On that day the eye of Abū al-'Asūs[232] was put out, and he said about it:

I wish that this eye of mine was like that one (which was lost), and then I could not walk among men, except with a guide.

---

230. Al-'Ayn is probably 'Ayn al-Tamr in the desert south of Hīt (n. 114, above), while al-'Udhayb is the name of a water source farther south, on the edge of the desert and the Sawād, close to the site of the Battle of Qādisiyyah (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v.).

231. WṢ, 279, has Bishr b. al-'Ashūsh; for the Banū al-Milqaṭ b. 'Amr of Ṭayyi', see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

232. Cairo has Ibn al-'Asūs. WṢ, 280, simply reads fa-fuqi'at 'aynuhu, thus indicating Bishr as the one who lost his eye and composed the following verses.

And would that I had not survived after Muṭarrif and Sa'd and after al-Mustanīr b. Khālid,[233] horsemen to the likes of whom the wet nurses never gave suck, when war became vehement.[234]
If only my foot there was cut off with its other part,[235] and my hand had perished with my forearm.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī—some shaykhs of Muḥārib: There was among them a man called Khanthar b. 'Ubaydah b. Khālid,[236] one of the bravest of the men. At the time of Ṣiffīn, when the men fought one another, he thought that his companions were routed, and he started to cry: "Oh band of Qays, is obedience to Satan preferable to you to obedience to the Merciful One? Flight entails rebellion against God, praise be to Him, and His anger, but in holding steadfast is obedience to God, mighty and great is He, and His pleasure. Will you choose God's anger over His pleasure and rebellion against Him over obedience to Him? Repose after death is only for he who dies able to account for himself.[237] And he said: [3310]

The soul of a man who has turned his back finds no refuge.
I am he who does not turn tail or flee and is not seen with those who stand apart, the treacherous ones.

He fought until he was carried off wounded. Subsequently he departed (kharaja) with the 500 men who withdrew (i'tazalū) with Farwah b. Nawfal al-Ashja'ī and settled at al-Daskarah and al-Bandanījayn.[238]

The Banū al-Nakha' fought strenuously on that day. Among them there fell Bakr b. Hawdhah, Ḥayyān b. Hawdhah, and Shu'ayb b. Nu'aym of the Banū Bakr al-Nakha' and Rabī'ah b. Mālik b. Wahbīl 233. I cannot further identify these heroes of Ṭayyi'.

234. Literally, "when war reveals the anklets of the virgins"; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. khadamah.

235. Bi-niṣfihā.

236. The subsequent invocation to the Banū Qays seems to identify the Banū Muḥārib as Muḥārib b. Khaṣafah (Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 92); WṢ, 286, reads 'Antar b. 'Ubayd b. Khālid.

237. Muḥāsiban li-nafsihi; Ann. has "essendo in regola con se stesso."

238. A reference to the withdrawal of Farwah and his men from the Khārijite forces facing 'Alī at Nahrawān. (see p. 130, below). Ann., A.H. 37 §31a, translates kharaja ("he departed") here as "si fece Khariǧita," which may be intended.

and Ubayy b. Qays the brother of 'Alqamah b. Qays, the man learned in religion and law (faqīh).[239] On that day 'Alqamah's foot was cut off, and he would say: "I do not wish my foot to be restored to health as it was. It is one of the things for which I hope for a goodly reward from my Lord." And he said: "I desired to see my brother or one of my brethren in my sleep, and I saw my brother. I asked him, 'Brother, what is it like where you are?' He replied, 'We and the enemy have met together and disputed before God, and we have defeated them with our arguments.' I have never been as happy since attaining reason as when I had this dream."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Suwayd b. Ḥayyah al-Asadī—al-Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir:[240] Before the battle some people had gone [3311] to 'Alī and said, "We suspect that Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar[241] has been in correspondence with Mu'āwiyah and we are afraid that he is an adherent of his." So 'Alī sent for him and for some of our notables. After praising God and extolling Him, he said, "Now, band of Rabī'ah, you are my supporters (anṣār) and the ones who have responded to my call, and you are one of the clans of the Arabs on which I rely most. But I have heard that Mu'āwiyah has been in correspondence with your companion Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar. So I have brought him here and gathered you together that you may be witnesses in his case and so that you may hear what I say." Then he turned to him and said: "Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar, if what I have heard is true, then I make God and those of the Muslims who are here my witnesses that you have security so long as you remain in the land of Iraq or the Ḥijāz or in any land where Mu'āwiyah does not have authority. If, on the other hand, you have been lied against, then our heart will rest easy in you."

Khālid denied it, swearing by God, and many of our men said, "If we knew that he had done that, we would make an example of him." Shaqīq b. Thawr al-Sadūsī[242] said, "May Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar never prosper if he has aided Mu'āwiyah and the Syrians 239. For the Banū al-Nakha', see n. 174, above. For the Banū Bakr b. 'Awf of Nakha', see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; and for 'Alqamah b. Qays, ibid., s.v.

240. For the role of this man of the Banū Shaybān (Bakr b. Wā'il) in the fighting, see pp. 59, 63, below; and see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 113.

241. See p. 18 and n. 72, above.

242. For this man of the Banū Sadūs of Bakr, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 120.

against 'Alī and Rabī'a." Ziyād b. Khaṣafah al-Taymī[243] said, "Oh Commander of the Faithful, reassure yourself of Ibn al-Mu'ammar by making him swear that he will not betray you." He did that, and we departed.

On Thursday our men were routed on the right, and 'Alī came out as far as us, together with his sons, and cried out in a loud and public voice as if he were not concerned with the plight of the men, "Whose banners are these?" "The banners of Rabī'ah," we replied, but he said: "No indeed, they are the banners of God; may God protect those who rally to them. May He make them steadfast and set their feet firm."[244] Then he said to me, "Young man, will you not take this banner of yours one dhirā'[245] nearer (to the enemy)?" [3312] and I said, "Yes, by God, even ten of them," So I got up and took it nearer until 'Alī said, "That is close enough." Then I stood fast where he had told me, and my companions gathered around.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī: I heard shaykhs of our clan of Taymallāh b. Tha'labah saying that the banner of those of Rabī'ah settled in al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah[246] was with Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar of the people of al-Baṣrah. Those shaykhs said further that Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar and Shaqīq[247] b. Thawr reached an agreement by putting al-Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir al-Dhuhlī in charge of the banner of the Baṣran Bakr b. Wā'il. Khālid and Shaqīq had contested with each other for possession of it but then said: "This youth of ours has an honorable status. Let us assign it to him until we have decided the question." Then afterward 'Alī put Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar in charge of the banner of all of Rabī'ah.

Mu'āwiyah cast lots to decide which of the three strongest tribes among the people of Iraq at that time—Rabī'ah, Hamdān, and Madhḥij—his own Ḥimyarīs should fight. The lot fell on Rabī'ah.

---

243. See p. 18 and n. 73, above.

244. See Qur'ān 2:250; 3:147.

245. A unit of measurement, sometimes translated "cubit" (see Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 55ff.).

246. Rāyatu Rabī'ata ahli Kūfatihā wa-Baṣratihā.

247. The printed text has Sufyān b. Thawr, and so too the mss. cited by Hinds in "Banners"; WS, 290, has Sa'īd b. Thawr. But the other references to Shaqīq here suggest that Shaqīq should be read on this occasion too. Al-Jāḥiẓ, al-Bayān, III, 108, refers to him as Shaqīq b. Majza'ah b. Thawr, whereas Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 153, has Shaqīq and Majza'ah as brothers.

Dhū al-Kalā'[248] said, "God damn you for a lot—you did not like the fighting!"[249] Dhū al-Kalā' advanced with Ḥimyar and those attached to it, including 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb with 4,000 qurrā' of the Syrians, and Dhū al-Kalā' commanded their right wing. They attacked Rabī'ah, who were the left wing of the people of Iraq and with whom was Ibn 'Abbās, in command of the left wing. Dhū al-Kalā' and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar attacked them fiercely with their cavalry and footmen, and the banners of Rabī'ah were brought low, except for a few of the best and the noblest.[250]

Then the Syrians turned away, but it was not long before they attacked again, and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar was saying: "Men of Syria!
[3313] This clan of the men of Iraq are the killers of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān (may God be pleased with him) and the supporters (anṣār) of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. If you defeat this tribe, you will attain your revenge for 'Uthmān, and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and the men of Iraq will be destroyed." They fiercely attacked the men, but Rabī'ah held firm against them and were most steadfast—except for a few of the lesser sort (ḍu'afā')[251] and the cowardly ones. The bearers of the banners, and those who were steadfast and concerned to protect their honor, held firm and kept fighting hard.

When Khālid b. al-Mu'ammar saw that some of his fellow Rabī'ah had withdrawn, he did so as well. But when he saw that the men of the banners had stood firm and that (others of) his people had patiently held fast, he returned to the fray and shouted to those who were fleeing, ordering them to go back. Those of his fellow tribesmen who wished to cast suspicion on Khālid said, "He wanted to retreat, but when he saw that we had held fast he came back to us." Khālid, however, said: "When I saw that some of our men had been put to flight I decided to confront them and make them come back to you. Now I have come to you with those of them who obeyed me." His behavior was ambiguous.

---

248. See p. 19 and n. 78, above.

249. Karihta al-ḍirāb, a pun playing on the fact that the root ḍ-r-b, "to strike," is used in connection with both the casting of lots and fighting. Presumably the story, which is being told from the point of view of the Banū Rabī'ah, is meant to illustrate the dismay of Dhū al-Kalā' at the prospect of fighting such a valiant enemy.

250. Abdāl here is presumably a doublet for akhyār.

251. For discussion of the use of the term ḍa'īf, see Serjeant, "Ḍa'īf and the Mustaḍ'af," 32–47.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—a man of Bakr b. Wā'il—Muḥriz b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-'Ijlī: On that day Khālid said,

> Oh band of Rabī'ah! God has brought every one of you from his birthplace and his home and gathered you all together here, in a way unprecedented since your dispersal in the land. But if you hold back your hands, shrink from your enemy, and stay away from your battle lines, God will not be pleased with what you have done, and you will never meet anyone, either small or great, but that he will say, "Rabī'ah has disgraced its honor and turned its back on battle, and the Arabs have been ruined on their account." Beware lest the Arabs and the Muslims see you as an evil omen today. If you go forward and advance, you will be seeking a reward from God. Advancing is your custom and being steadfast a trait. Be steadfast, fixing your intention on being recompensed, for the reward of he who fixes his intention on what is with God is nobility in this world and rank in that to come. God does not cause the reward of he who acts rightly to be lost.[252] [3314]

A man arose and said, "By God, the concerns of Rabī'ah were lost when they entrusted them to you. You order us to continue fighting and not to depart until our lives are lost and our blood shed. Do you not see that most of the men have retreated?" Then some of Khālid's own kinship group came up to dispute with him. They criticized him and argued with him, but Khālid said: "Drive this man out from your midst. If he remains among you, he will be a source of evil for you, and, if he leaves you, he will not cause you any loss; this is the one who (is so insignificant that), 'He will not diminish the band and will not augment the land.' May God afflict you for being an orator to a noble poeple! How widely you have missed the mark!"

The fighting between Rabī'ah and Ḥimyar, supported by 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar, became fierce, and the number of those slain multiplied. Sumayr b. al-Rayyān b. al-Ḥārith al-'Ijlī was killed[253]—he was one of the most courageous of the men.

---

252. See Qur'ān 9:120.

253. Verses referring to his death are in WS, 384.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ja'far b. Abī Qāsim al-'Abdī—Yazīd b. 'Alqamah—Zayd b. Badr al-'Abdī: Ziyād b. Khaṣafah came to Banū 'Abd al-Qays at the time of Ṣiffīn. The tribes of Ḥimyar together with 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, had been made ready under Dhū al-Kalā' against the Bakr b. Wā'il. The Bakr were so fiercely attacked that they were afraid of being wiped out, and Ziyād b. Khaṣafah said, "Oh 'Abd al-Qays, there will be no Bakr left after this day!"

We ('Abd al-Qays) mounted our horses and then went forward and contested the fight. It was not long before Dhū al-Kalā' was struck down and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar killed. Hamdān said that Hānī' b. Khaṭṭāb al-Arḥabī[254] killed him, while Ḥaḍramawt said that [3315] it was Mālik b. 'Amr al-Tin'ī.[255] Bakr b. Wā'il, however, said that Muḥriz b. al-Ṣaḥṣaḥ of the Banū 'Ā'ish b. Mālik b. Taymallāh b. Tha'labah[256] killed 'Ubaydallāh and took his sword, Dhū al-Wishāḥ.[257] Mu'āwiyah criticized Bakr b. Wā'il in al-Kūfah for that (when he came there at the end of the fitnah). They insisted that it was one of their number in al-Baṣrah, called Muḥriz b. al-Ṣaḥṣaḥ, who had killed 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar. Mu'āwiyah sent to him and took the sword from him. The chief of al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ was 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr of the Banū Taym.[258]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [Ibn al-Kalbī], it was Muḥriz b. al-Ṣaḥṣaḥ who killed 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar. He took his sword, Dhū al-Wishāḥ, which had belonged to ('Ubaydallāh's father) 'Umar. Ka'b b. Ju'ayl al-Taghlabī said about that:

---

254. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, has him as Khaṭṭāb b. Hānī' (s.v. Ḥaṭṭāb); for Arḥab of Hamdān, see ibid., I, table 231.

255. WṢ, 298, calls him al-Sabī'ī. The Sabī', who were prominent in al-Kūfah, were a branch of Hāshid/Hamdān, but Tin'ī seems better because it has specific connections with Ḥaḍramawt (see Ibn al-Athīr, al-Lubāb, I, 183).

256. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; 'Ā'ish b. Mālik were part of the Banū Shaybān of Bakr b. Wā'il/Rabī'ah.

257. That is, "Lord of the Sword Belt."

258. The ms. had Tamīm (and so too WṢ, 304), but the editor suggested emendation to Taym; the Cairo edition rightly supplies the Banū Taymallāh b. al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ of Rabī'ah (Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 141). It is not immediately obvious how this last sentence relates to the story that is the subject of the rest of the paragraph. It may be better situated as the first sentence of the paragraph reporting the death of some men of the Banū al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ, following the subsequent verses. The verses are attributed to a poet of the Banū Taghlib, of which the al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ were allies (idem, II, index, s.v. al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ).

The eyes weep only for a horseman[259] whose fellows fled at Ṣiffīn while he stood firm, Exchanging (the company of) Asmā' (his wife) for the swords of Wā'il.
He was a warrior; if only the fields of death had spared him.
(But) they left 'Ubaydallāh on the battleground, his flowing veins spitting out blood from the wound.

(There is more than this.)[260]

And on that day Bishr b. Murrah b. Shuraḥbīl and al-Ḥārith b. Shuraḥbīl[261] were among those of the Banū al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ killed. Asmā', the daughter of 'Uṭārid b. Ḥājib al-Tamīmī,[262] was married to 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar, and then al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī took her in marriage.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—the nephew of Ghiyāth b. Laqīṭ al-Bakrī:[263] When 'Alī reached the Rabī'ah, they were vying with one another (in deeds of valor), and they said, "If 'Alī is struck down among you, having sought refuge at your banner, you will be disgraced." Shaqīq b. Thawr said to them: "Oh band of Rabī'ah, there will be no excuse for you among the Arabs if hands are laid upon 'Alī while he is among you and there remains a man alive among you. But, if you protect him, you will win the glory of life." So, when 'Alī came to them, they fought more fiercely than they ever did before and 'Alī said about that: [3316]

Whose is the black[264] banner, the shadow of which quivers as it blows?
When it was said, "Take it forward, Ḥuḍayn!" he advanced, Going ahead with it into death in order to take it to visit the pools of fate that drip death and blood.

---

259. That is, 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar.

260. For fuller versions of these verses, see al-Dīnawarī, 178–79; WṢ, 298–99.

261. WṢ, 304, has fulān (so-and-so) b. Murrah b. Shuraḥbīl and al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Shuraḥbīl.

262. 'Uṭārid was a famous man of the Banū Dārim b. Mālik of Tamīm. See further, Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

263. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only citation of this transmitter.

264. In the version of these verses in WṢ, 289, the banner of Rabī'ah is described as "red" (ḥamrā'), which Hinds ("Banners and Battle Cries," 11) understands literally. We might take both "red" and "black" metaphorically to mean something like "blood-soaked."

We caused Ibn Ḥarb (Mu'āwiyah) to taste our spear thrusting and our striking with our swords, until he turned away and recoiled.
May God reward a people who are patient and steadfast in their confrontation in the presence of death, a people of surpassing virtue and nobility, Of the most pleasing traits and most noble character when the voices of men cry out in battle.
I mean Rabī'ah. They were a people of courage and bravery in their confrontation with a numerous army.[265]

The Killing of 'Ammār b. Yāsir

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Ḥurrah al-Ḥanafī
[3317] 'Ammār b. Yāsir took the field and said: "Oh God, You know that, if I knew that your pleasure was that I should throw myself into this river,[266] I would do so. Oh God, You know that, if I knew that Your pleasure was that I should put the point of my sword against my breast and then lean on it until it came out of my back, I would do so. But today I do not know of any deed more pleasing to You than jihād against these evildoers (fāsiqīn). If I did know of any deed more pleasing to You, I would do it."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr al-Azdī: I heard 'Ammār saying, "By God, I see a people who will indeed strike you a blow as a result of which those who consider our religion a vain thing will doubt us,[267] but I swear by God that even if they strike us until they bring us to the palm leaves of Hajar,[268] we will know that we follow the truth and they falsehood."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abbād b. Mūsā—Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl—Muslim al-A'war—Ḥabbah b. Juwayn al-'Uranī: I and Abū

265. See Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 116 (which also has the banner as red).
266. Baḥr, presumably indicating here the Euphrates.
267. Yartābu minhu al-mubṭilūna; see Qur'ān 29:48: idhan la irtāba al-mubṭilūna.
268. Probably referring to the fertile Hajar region of eastern Arabia, also called al-Aḥsā' (see LA, IX, 151b, s.v. s-'-f).

Mas'ūd[269] went off to Ḥudhayfah[270] at al-Madā' in and went in to him. He said: "Welcome to you both. There is nobody among the Arab tribes whom you have come from who is dearer to me than you two." I left the reply to Abū Mas'ūd,[271] and we said, "Oh Abū 'Abdallāh, report to us ḥadīth;[272] for we are afraid of the time of troubles (al-fitan)." He replied, "Hold to the party in which is Ibn Sumayyah ('Ammār b. Yāsir), for I heard the Prophet saying, 'The party of oppression that swerves from the (right) road will kill him, and his last sustenance will be milk mixed with water.'"

Ḥabbah continued: And I saw 'Ammār at Ṣiffīn when he was saying, "Bring me my final sustenance in this world," and he was [3318] brought a drink of diluted milk in a shallow bowl with a red rim. Ḥudhayfah was not wrong even by the thickness of a hair, for 'Ammār said: "Today I will meet the loved ones—Muḥammad and his party. By God, even if they strike us so as to bring us to the palm leaves of Hajar, we will know that we hold to the truth and they to falsehood." And he began to say, "Death is beneath the spears and paradise beneath the flashing swords."[273]

According to Muḥammad—Khalaf—Manṣūr b. Abī Nuwayrah—Abū Mikhnaf; and Hishām b. al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf; then in both lines of transmission Abū Mikhnaf cites from Mālik b. A'yan al-Juhanī—Zayd b. Wahb al-Juhanī: 'Ammār b. Yāsir said on that day, "Where are they who desire to please God and will not return to property or offspring?" A group of the men joined him and he said:

> Men, let us go directly against those who seek vengeance > for the blood of Ibn 'Affān and claim that he was killed

---

269. For Ḥabbah b. Juwayn, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ḥabba b. Ğuwain; Ibn Sa'd, VI, 123. For Abū Mas'ūd ('Uqbah b. 'Amr al-Anṣārī), who fought on the Muslim side at Badr, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Uqba b. 'Amr; Ibn Sa'd, II/i, 91. For Muḥammad b. 'Abbād, see al-Mizzī, al-Tahdhīb, XXV, 443–45.

270. For Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān al-'Absī, 'Alī's governor over al-Madā'in, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ḥuḍaifa b. Ḥusail.

271. Asnadtuhu ilā Abī Mas'ūd. The meaning is rather elusive. In view of the subsequent ḥadīth, it is tempting to relate the expression to the use of an isnād, but no obvious sense suggests itself.

272. Ḥaddithnā; for the following ḥadīth and parallels, see Wensinck, Concordance, s.v. baghā.

273. See the prophetic *ḥadīth*s "the gate of heaven is beneath the flashing swords" (al-suyūf al-bāriqah) and "heaven is beneath the shadows of the swords" (ẓilāl al-suyūf) (see Wensinck, Concordances, s.vv. baraqa, jannah).

unjustly. By God, they are not after vengeance for his blood but have tasted this world and liked and enjoyed it. They know that, if they have to accept the truth, it will be a barrier between them and the worldly things in which they are wallowing. They have no precedence in Islam by which they might deserve obedience from the people or exercise authority over them. They duped their followers by saying that their imam had been killed unjustly, so that that they could be tyrants and kings, and by this trickery they have got where you see them. If it were not for that, not even two men would have followed them. Oh God, if You help us, many a time You have helped us, but, if You give them the rule, store up for them, for what they have done to Your servants, the most painful chastisement.

He and the band who had responded to him went forward until [3319] they had drawn near 'Amr (b. al-'Āṣ), and 'Ammār said: "'Amr, you have sold your religion (dīn) for Egypt. Damn you, damn you! For long you have desired a deviation in Islam." And he said to 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: "May God cast you down! You have sold your religion to the enemy of Islam and the son of its enemy."[274] 'Ubaydallāh replied, "No, I only seek vengeance for the blood of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, may God be pleased with him." But 'Ammār said to him: "I bear witness, from what I know of you, that you do not seek the face of God in anything that you do. If you are not killed today, you will die tomorrow, so consider, since men are rewarded in accordance with their intention, what it is that you intend."

According to Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Masrūqī—'Ubayd b. al-Ṣabbāḥ—'Aṭā' b. Muslim—al-A'mash—Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī:[275] I heard 'Ammār b. Yāsir at Ṣiffīn say to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ: "Thrice with the Messenger of God did I fight against the man whose banner this is. This fourth time is no more pious or God-fearing."[276]

274. Presumably indicating Abū Sufyān and Mu'āwiyah.

275. 'Aṭā' b. Muslim al-Ṣan'ānī and Sulaymān b. Mihrān al-A'mash are well-known transmitters of *ḥadīth*s; for Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 183–84 (s.v. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥabīb b. Rabī'ah); Ibn Sa'd, VI, 119. SNB, X, 104 f. (citing from the Istī'āb of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr) has some parallels for the following reports, but most of the obscure and difficult passages are missing.

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad [al-Rāzī]—al-Walīd b. Ṣāliḥ—'Aṭā' b. Muslim—al-A'mash: Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī said: We were with 'Alī at Ṣiffīn and we had assigned two men to [stand by] 'Ammār's horse to guard him and prevent him from being attacked. But, whenever they were distracted for a moment, he would himself make an attack and not come back until he had stained his sword [with blood]. And once he made an attack and did not return until his sword had bent out of shape. He threw it at them, saying, "If it were not that it has bent, I would not have come back."

[Al-A'mash said, "By God, that was a blow of someone above doubt,"[277] and Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān responded, "Those there heard something and transmitted it, and they were not liars."]

Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān then continued: I saw that whenever 'Ammār went into one of the wādīs of Ṣiffīn those Companions of Muḥammad [the Prophet] who were there followed him. And [3320]
I saw him go to the Mirqāl, Hāshim b. 'Utbah,[278] who was bearer of 'Alī's banner, and say, "Hāshim, one-eyed and a coward! There is no good in a one-eyed man who does not plunge into battle. And then, what if some man from either side says, 'By God, this one is abandoning his imam, deserting his army, and holding back his effort?'[279] Mount, Hāshim!" Hāshim mounted and advanced, saying:

276. Possibly meaning that on this fourth occasion the enemy is no less hostile to God than on the previous ones. WṢ, 321, has a variant (wa-hādhihi al-rābi'a mā hiya bi-khayrihinna wa-lā abarrihinna bal hiya sharruhunna wa-afjaruhunna), which specifies the three occasions as Badr, Uḥud, and Ḥunayn. In the variant 'Ammār is not addressing 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ but an anonymous questioner who is puzzled as to why the two sides are fighting when they share the same religion. In reply, 'Ammār points out the black flag of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and identifies it as the flag of the mushrikīn, against which he had fought together with the Prophet on the three occasions specified. 'Ammār's point is to identify the Syrian opponents as direct descendants of the polytheists who had fought against the Prophet.

277. Ḍarbu ghayri murtāb [see n. 267, above]

278. See n. 48, above. For an explanation of al-mirqāl ("the swift she-camel"), see p. 72, below. The following sentences are rather difficult and the meaning is obscure. It may be that the text is disordered. Given Hāshim's high reputation as a soldier [in addition to his participation at al-Qādisiyyah, he led the Arab army at Jalūlā', the battle that sealed the conquest of Iraq], the charge of cowardice is surprising and harsh. In WṢ, 326, it is explained that the words "one-eyed and a coward" were addressed jestingly to Hāshim by 'Alī, who had noticed that he was wearing two sets of armor. However, the same report than has an anonymous man of Bakr b. Wā'il use the same words, apparently really thinking that Hāshim was afraid (qad intafakha saḥruka). In ibid., 327, it is again 'Alī who makes the remark. At ibid., 328, 'Ammār addresses Hāshim, "There is no good in a one-eyed man who does not confront fear" (lā ya'tī al-faza'), and here the intention is evidently to goad Hāshim to make him fight harder.

A one-eyed man who seeks a worthy opponent has busied himself with life until tired of it.
It needs must be that he conquer or be conquered.[280]

And 'Ammār was saying: "Press forward, Hāshim; paradise is beneath the shadows of the swords and death in the tips of the spears. The gates of heaven have been opened, and the houris have adorned themselves. Today I shall meet the beloved ones, Muḥammad and his party."[281] Neither returned, and both were killed.

[Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān commented: The words "those Companions of the Prophet who were there" inform you, al-A'mash, about the two of them, that they had distinguished themselves as men of courage.][282]

He then continued: And when it was night I said, "I will go to the enemy to find out if news of the killing of 'Ammār has affected them as it has affected us," for, when we left off fighting [each day], they used to talk with us and we with them.[283] So I mounted my

279. Ann., 37 A.H., §43, suggests reading walyufirranna (in al-Jāḥiẓ, al-Bayān, III, 301, 'Ammār includes the phrase walyufirranna jahdahu in a similar remark to 'Alī—but in a different context—with reference to Abū Mūsā) for walyaṣurranna. Cairo, V, 40, has walyaṣbiranna. The sense of fa-idhā is also questionable: Ann., loc. cit., appears to understand it as the temporal adverb ("quand'ecco"), rather than the conditional conjunction if. Bayna 'l-ṣaffayn (? "on either side"; Ann. has "fra le due file") seems odd. I can find no parallel in WṢ.

280. See the variants in WṢ, 327, 355.

281. Leiden does not set as verse, but see WṢ, 341, 342; SNB, X, 104; and Cairo, V, 41.

282. Yufīdu laka 'alayhimā man kāna hunāka min aṣḥābi rasūli Allāhi (ṣ) annahumā kānā 'allamā. For the translation, see Add. et emend., ad loc., and Lane, Lexicon, s.v. '-l-m, form II and f-y-d, form IV. Cairo reads yufīdu laka 'ilmahumā man kāna . . . annahumā kānā 'alaman, "Those of the Companions who were there will provide you with information about them, namely, that they were a banner [around which the soldiers congregated]." SNB, X, 104, has the phrase "as if he was a banner for them" (ka-annahu 'alam lahum) as part of the sentence that tells us that the Companions followed 'Ammār into the wadis of Ṣiffīn.

283. Taḥaddathū ilaynā wa-taḥaddathnā ilayhim. In spite of the subsequent ḥadīth, it seem unlikely that we are supposed to envisage meetings for the exchange of reports about the Prophet.

horse—early in the evening—and then I went into their camp. I found four men making the rounds together: Mu'āwiyah, Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr, who was the best of them. I brought my horse in among them, fearing that I would miss what one of the discussants was saying.

'Abdallāh said to his father, "Father, have you killed this man in your fighting today, even though the Messenger of God has said what he said about him?" 'Amr asked what that was, and his son said: "Were you not with us while we were building the mosque[284] and everyone was moving stone by stone and brick by brick while [3321] 'Ammār brought two stones and two bricks at a time? The effort caused him to faint, and the Messenger of God came to him and began wiping the dust from his face, saying, 'Alas for you, Ibn Sumayyah! The people transport stone by stone and brick by brick while you move two stones and two bricks at a time, desiring (divine) reward. In spite of that the usurping party will kill you. Alas for you!'" 'Amr pushed 'Abdallāh's horse away and pulled Mu'āwiyah toward him. He said, "Mu'āwiyah, do you not hear what 'Abdallāh is saying?" Mu'āwiyah asked what it was, and 'Amr reported the story. Mu'āwiyah said: "You are a stupid old man. You keep on telling stories[285] while you slither about in your piss. Was it we who killed 'Ammār? It was only those who brought him here." And the men came out from their tents and bivouacs, saying, "It was only those who brought 'Ammār who killed him." I do not know who was the more strange—he or they.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: It is reported that when 'Ammār was killed, 'Alī said to the Rabī'ah and the Hamdān, "You are my armor and my spear!" About 12,000 presented themselves to him, and 'Alī went in front of them on his mule. He and they attacked together as one man, and there was no line of the Syrians that was not destroyed. 'Alī and his men killed everybody they came up against until they reached Mu'āwiyah, and 'Alī was saying:

I strike them but Mu'āwiyah do not see,
he of the bulging eye and the great belly.[286]

284. The reference is to the building of the mosque in Medina.
285. Lā tazālu tuḥaddithu bi-al-ḥadīth.
286. See al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 370.

[3322] Then he called for Mu'āwiyah and said: "Why are the people being killed in our quarrel? Come, I will entrust God with the decision between us (uḥākimuka ilā Allāhi). Whichever of us kills the other, authority (al-umūr) will remain for him." 'Amr said, "The man has made you a fair offer," but Mu'āwiyah replied: "I have not been made a fair offer. You know that he has killed everyone whom he has challenged to combat." 'Amr said, "But it is not fitting that you should not accept the challenge and fight him." Mu'āwiyah said, "You cannot wait to get power after my death."

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Amrah[287]—Sulaymān al-Ḥaḍramī: I asked Abū 'Amrah, "Do you not see how splendidly equipped they appear (he meant the Syrians) and what a wretched flock are we?" He answered: "You look to your own state, make it better, and leave the others to themselves. They are as they are."

Hāshim b. 'Utbah al-Mirqāl and the "Night of Howling"[288]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Salamah: At evening Hāshim b. 'Utbah al-Zuhrī summoned the men: "Let anyone who seeks God and the next world come to me!" Many came to him, and he attacked the Syrians with a band of followers several times, but everywhere he attacked them they held firm against him and the fighting was fierce. He said to his men: "Do not let this steadfastness

287. The Leiden text here and subsequently reads 'Umrah; Ann. and Cairo both have 'Amrah. WṢ has two versions of this isnād: on p. 185 it goes 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Abū 'Amrah—his father, Sulaymān al-Ḥaḍramī; on p. 369 it goes 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—his father—Abū Sulaymān al-Ḥaḍramī, and there is further reference to Abū Sulaymān in the matn.

288. Laylat al-harīr. The verb harra, used of dogs, indicates snarling, howling, whining, and similar noises and actions. By extension it can also refer to other sounds, such as the turning of a millstone and the twanging of a bow. Harīr is also said to be used to indicate the looking of courageous men at one another (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.). With reference to Ṣiffīn, Wellhausen (Das arabische Reich, 49) used the expression die Nacht des Pfauchens ("Night of the Peacock Chick"), rendered in the English translation (Arab Kingdom, 78) as "Night of Clangour." The expression laylat al-harīr is also used in tradition to indicate a part of the Battle of Qādisiyya (Ṭabarī, I, 2337–38). In that connection, *EI*², s.v. Ḳādisiyya, has "Night of the Cries of Sorrow."

of theirs that you see frighten you. By God, it is only the fervor of the Arabs that you see and their steadfastness beneath their banners and in their battle positions. But they are in error while you follow truth. 'Oh my people, be patient and firm and vie with them in steadfastness.'[289] Unite together, and let us march against our enemy with deliberation and purpose. Then stand firm, help one another, remember God, let no man ask his brother for anything, do not keep turning round, be valiant in face of their courage, [3323] and make jihād against them in expectation of your divine reward 'until God decides (yaḥkumu) between us and them, for He is the best of judges (ḥākimīn).'"[290] Then he went forward with a band of the qurrā' and he and they fought fiercely at evening until they were content with what they had achieved. At that point a young warrior came out against them, saying:

I am the son of the great kings of Ghassān, and today I adhere to (al-dā'in bi) the religion (dīn) of 'Uthmān.
There has come a report that has caused much alarm, that 'Alī has killed the son of 'Affān.

He rushed to the attack and did not turn away until he had struck with his sword. He then made free with abuse and curses, and Hāshim b. 'Utbah said to him: "Servant of God, after such talk there is conflict and after such fighting there is the reckoning. Fear God, for you are returning to Him and He will question you about this encounter and what you sought by it." He replied, "I am fighting you because your master does not perform the prayer ritual, as I have been told, and neither do you; I am fighting you because your master killed our caliph and you urged him to it." Hāshim said to him: "What have you got to do with Ibn 'Affān? It was the companions of Muḥammad and the sons of his companions and the qurrā' of the people who killed him when he introduced innovations (aḥdāth) and opposed the authority (ḥukm) of the Book. They were people of religion (dīn) and more worthy of handling the affairs of the people than are you and your companions. I do not think that the affairs of this community and of this religion have been neglected even for an instant."

289. Qur'ān 3:200.
290. See Qur'ān 7:87.

The young man replied, "Indeed, by God, I will not lie, for lying is harmful and achieves no good." Hāshim said, "The people concerned with this matter know best about it, so leave it to those who have knowledge about it." The young man said, "By God, I do not doubt that you have advised me sincerely." Hāshim said: "As for what you said about our master not performing the prayer ritual, [3324] he was the first one to do so and he is the most knowledgeable (afqah) of God's creatures regarding the religion of God and the closest to the Messenger. As for those whom you see with me, each one of them is a reciter (qāri') of the Book of God, not sleeping at night in his vigil. Do not allow these deluded miscreants to turn you away from your religion." The youth replied, "Servant of God, I consider you a righteous man, so tell me—is there any repentance for me?" He answered, "Yes, oh servant of God. Turn in repentance to God and He will relent toward you, for 'He accepts repentance from His servants and forgives sins'[291] and 'He loves those who seek to be clean.' "[292]

By God, the youth, on returning (to his own side), abandoned his fellows. One of the Syrians said to him, "The Iraqi has cheated you, the Iraqi has cheated you." He replied, "No, he has given me sincere advice."

Hāshim and his men fought fiercely. He was called al-Mirqāl because he used to rush (r-q-l) into battle. He and his men fought until they had overcome those who were around them and until they considered that they had achieved the victory. At sunset a squadron of Tanūkh came to them and pressed an attack against the men. Hāshim fought them, saying:

A one-eyed man who seeks a worthy opponent has occupied himself with life until tired of it.
He fells them with the knotty-shafted spear.

They claimed that he killed nine or ten on that day, but al-Ḥārith b. al-Mundhir al-Tanūkhī attacked him and pierced him with a spear, and Hāshim fell. 'Alī sent to him, saying, "Take your banner forward," but he answered the messenger, "Look at my belly," and

291. See Qur'ān 42:25.
292. Qur'ān 2:222.

behold he had been ripped open. The Anṣārī al-Ḥajjāj b. Ghaziyyah[293] said:

If you boast (of killing) Ibn al-Budayl and Hāshim, we have killed Dhū al-Kalā' and Ḥawshab.[294] [3325]
We have left, after meeting you in battle, your brother 'Ubaydallāh[295] as meat stripped from the bone.
And we have surrounded the camel and its people[296] and given you deadly poison to drink.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan al-Juhanī—Zayd b. Wahb al-Juhanī: 'Alī passed near a group of the Syrians, among them al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who were abusing him verbally. He was told about that and stopped with those of his men who were close to them and said:

> Attack them! The presence of God, the dignity, the dignity of Islam,[297] and the sign of the righteous[298] be with you. By God, those among them who are closest to ignorance[299] are their leaders and the one who has mustered

293. Of the Banū Najjār/Anṣār, he is referred to on pp. 163, below, as being in Egypt with Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. WṢ, 401, has the first verse as part of a long poem attributed to Jarīsh al-Sakūnī, but refers to al-Ḥajjāj on p. 448 among a group of Anṣārīs supporting 'Alī.

294. This seems to be the only reference to Ḥawshab in Ṭabarī's material on Ṣiffīn, but he is mentioned frequently in WṢ. See also Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ḥaušab b. Yazīd . . . b. Ḏī Ẓulaim.

295. That is, 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

296. Ann., A.H. 37 §46, suggests an allusion to the Battle of the Camel.

297. 'Alaykum al-sakīna wa-al-waqār waqār al-Islām. For a discussion of the words sakīna and waqār, see Goldziher, "Ueber den Ausdruck «sakîna»," in his Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie, I, 177ff., especially 186 and n. 5. Goldziher notes the equivalence of waqār with Aramaic iqrā (= Hebrew kabūr), "abundance, honor, glory," and indicates the use of iqrā and shekhīnā together in Jewish Aramaic (for an example, see Michael Sokoloff, A Dictionary of Jewish Palestinian Aramaic of the Byzantine Period [Bar Ilan, 1990], s.v. 'yqr: "the glory of the divine presence"). In 'Alī's speech waqār al-Islām seems intrusive and may be a gloss. Perhaps a more basic translation ("the presence of God and the glory of God be with you") would convey the sense better.

298. See Qur'ān 48:29, etc., for formulas such as sīmāhum fī wujūhihim.

299. Jahl, "ignorance," here implies the complete opposite of Islam. 'Alī seems to be saying that the men who are named subsequently, although they might nominally be Muslims, are barely removed from the enmity that they showed to Islam in the jāhiliyyah.

them, Mu'āwiyah, together with Ibn al-Nābighah,[300] Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī, and Ibn Abī Mu'ayṭ, the wine drinker who was flogged according to God's law in the time of Islam. They are just the ones who would stand and cause harm to me and find fault[301] with me, for even before today they have fought against me,[302] at a time when I was calling them to Islam, and they were calling me to the worship of idols. Praise be to God. Formerly the evil ones (fāsiqūn) acted with enmity against me, but God made them slaves—were they not "conquered"?[303] This indeed is the important and grave matter—that evil ones, who are not regarded with favor but are fearful of Islam and its people,[304] duped a large part of this community and caused their hearts to drink the love of fitnah, winning over their wandering desires with lies and falsehood. They have raised war against us in putting out the light of God.[305] Oh God, disperse their congregation, shatter their arguments, and deliver them for destruction for their sins. He whom You befriend is not cast down, and he whom You oppose does not wax mighty.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah—al-Sha'bī: 'Alī passed by a body of enemy men with a banner and saw that they clung to their position. He urged on the men against them and was [3326] told that they belonged to Ghassān. He said: "They will not give up their position without an efficient spear thrust that will drive the breath from them and a sword blow by which heads will be split asunder, bones will be scattered, and from which wrists and hands will fall; not until their foreheads are split by shafts of iron 300. That is, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, here called derogatively after his mother.

301. See Add. et emend. for the suggested correction to yajdubūnanī; WS, 391, has yashtumūnanī.

302. Wa-qabla al-yawmi mā qatalūnī. For the use of mā after expressions involving qabla, see Gloss., s.v. mā, with reference to Wright, Grammar, II, §127, rem. c, and other works.

303. Fa'abbadahum Allāhu a-lam yuftaḥū. The two verbs are undotted and Cairo reads qa'īdahum Allāha a-lam yuqbaḥū. "By God who watches them, were they not denied success?" which seems smoother.

304. Wa'alā al-islāmi wa-ahlihi mutakhawwifīn. It is difficult to see how takhawwafa 'alā can have its usual sense of "to fear for" here. See Gloss., s.v., for khawwafa 'alā.

305. See Qur'ān 9:32; 61:8.

and their eyebrows are dispersed over their chests and chins. Where are those who will be steadfast and those who seek after eternal reward?" A band of the Muslims rallied to him, and he summoned his son Muḥammad and said, "March slowly against the people of that banner, taking your time, and when your lances are trained on their hearts wait until you hear my plan." They did what they had been told, and 'Alī made ready a similar group. When 'Alī had got close to them and the lances were trained on their hearts, he commanded those whom he had made ready and they attacked them, and he urged Muḥammad and those with him to attack from in front, and the Ghassānīs abandoned their position, while our men killed or wounded many of them. Then a great battle took place after sunset so that most of the men could perform the prayer ritual only cursorily.[306]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Bakr al-Kindī: 'Abdallāh b. Ka'b al-Murādī[307] was killed at Ṣiffin. Al-Aswad b. Qays al-Murādī was passing by him, and 'Abdallāh said to him, "Aswad!" "Yes," he replied "what can I do for you (labbayka)?" Seeing that 'Abdallāh was on the point of death, al-Aswad said: "By God, your being struck down pains me. By God, if I had been with you, I would have helped you and protected you, and, if I knew who has shed your blood, then I would not want him to get away before I killed him or was joined to you (in death)." He then dismounted and said to 'Abdallāh, "Indeed, by God, your neighbor has had security against your evil conduct,[308] and you have been one of those who frequently call God to mind, so give me your final instructions, may God have mercy on you." 'Abdallāh said, "I recommend to you the fear of God, that you faithfully serve the Commander of the Faithful, and that you

306. Īmā'an, literally, "by sign or gesture"; for *ḥadīth*s regarding the circumstances in which such a form of prayer is permissible, see Wensinck, Concordances, s.v. w-m-', form IV.

307. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only mention of 'Abdallāh, for whom see Ibn Ḥajar, al-Iṣābah, II, 363 (no. 4918); for al-Aswad in the fighting against the Khawārij, see p. 131, below. There seems to be some confusion in the sources: SNB (cited by the editor of WṢ, 456) refers to 'Abdallāh b. Budayl al-Khuzā'ī (see n.128) and al-Aswad b. Ṭuhmān al-Khuzā'ī, while the index of WṢ confuses 'Abdallāh b. Ka'b al-Murādī with 'Abdallāh b. Ka'b al-Nahdī, who likewise fell at Ṣiffīn fighting for 'Alī (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

308. Bawā'iq. The phrase seems to mean something like "you have led a good life and observed your duties toward your neighbor." See Wensinck, Concordance, s.v. b-w-q, and Lane, Lexicon, s.v. bā'iqah, for the occurrence of the phrase in *ḥadīth*s.

[3327] fight the transgressors (muḥillīn) with him until you are victorious or are united with God." Then he said, "Give him my greetings and say to him, 'Fight for the battlefield so that you put it behind you,[309] for he who finds on the morrow that the battlefield is behind him, will be superior.' " Shortly after that he died. Al-Aswad then went and informed 'Alī, who said, "May God have mercy upon him. In life he made jihād for us against our enemies, and in death he has offered us sincere advice."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, mawlā of the Banū al-Muṭṭalib:[310] It was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥanbal ad-Jumaḥī[311] who expressed these opinions to 'Alī at Ṣiffin.

According to Hishām—'Awānah: On that day Ibn Ḥanbal began to say:

If you kill me, Ibn Ḥanbal am I,
he who said, "A hairy one is nigh."[312]

According to Abū Mikhnaf (whose account now continues): The men fought for the whole of that night until morning—that was the "night of howling"—until the lances were broken, the stock of arrows exhausted, and the men had resorted to swords. 'Alī moved between his right and left wings, ordering every squadron of the qurrā' to advance on those adjacent to them. He kept that up, leading the men until, when morning came, the entire battlefield was behind his back.[313] Al-Ashtar commanded the right wing and Ibn 'Abbās the left. 'Alī was in the center, and the men were fighting on every side. It was Friday.

Al-Ashtar started to move forward with the right wing, fighting with them. He had been in charge of them on Thursday evening

309. Qātil 'an al-ma'rakah ḥattā taj'alahā khalfa ẓahrika. Perhaps signifying, "fight so fiercely that the battlefield comes to be behind you (because you have advanced so far)"? Cf. the report of Abū Mikhnaf, below.

310. That is, Ibn Isḥāq, the compiler of the Sīrah (d. 151/768).

311. For this poet of Quraysh, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

312. There are more anti-'Uthmān verses ascribed to 'Abd al-Raḥmān in Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, al-Istī'āb, 398, no. 1715 (= Ann., A.H. 37 §238). For an explanation of al-Na'thal ("hairy") as an abusive nickname for the caliph 'Uthmān, see The Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif of Tha'ālibī, tr. C. E. Bosworth (Edinburgh, 1968), 56, and the literature cited there.

313. Wa al-ma'rakah kulluhā khalfa ẓahrihi.

and night[314] until dawn appeared, and he kept saying to his men, "Go forward the length of this spear," advancing with them toward the Syrians. When they had carried out his order he would say, "Go forward the length of this bow." When they had carried out his order [3328] he would command them again in a similar manner until most of them had run out of courage. When al-Ashtar saw that he said, "I pray to God lest you suckle from sheep from now on."[315] Then he called for his horse and left his banner with Ḥayyān b. Hawdhah al-Nakha'ī,[316] while he went around among the squadrons, saying, "Who will purchase his life from God and fight with al-Ashtar until he is victorious or joins God?" And no man of those who had gone out to join him and Ḥayyān b. Hawdhah withdrew.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—'Umārah b. Rabī'ah al-Jarmī: By God, al-Ashtar passed by me, and I went forward with him and many men joined him. He proceeded until he had returned to the place of the right wing, where he led his men and said: "Launch an attack! May my paternal and maternal uncles be a ransom for you, by which you will please your Lord and glorify your religion (dīn). When I attack, attack!" Then he dismounted and struck the face of his mount,[317] and he said to his standard bearer, "Advance with it." He and his men with him then attacked the enemy and fought the Syrians until they had pushed them as far as their camp. They fought him fiercely by the camp, and his standard bearer was killed. 'Alī, seeing the victory of his men, began to send reinforcements.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad (al-Marwazī)—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Juwayriyah: At Ṣiffīn 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said to Wardān: "Do you know what we two may be compared with? With 314. Literally, "on Thursday evening and Friday night." The day was counted as beginning and ending at sunset.

---

315. For the expression, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. raḍi'a: used of a man who becomes mean, sordid, or ignoble.

316. Already reported as having been killed on p. 57, above. It could be that, with WṢ, 286, we should read Ḥanān on p. 57, possibly that we should amend here to Ḥānī' b. Hawdhah al-Nakha'ī (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.), or perhaps that we simply have variant traditions.

317. That is, to cause it to flee so that he himself could not escape if the battle were going against him. See Gloss., s.v. ḍ-r-b.

the sorrel camel[318] that, if it presses ahead, is hamstrung and, if it lags behind, is slaughtered. If you lag behind, I will cut off your head. Bring me a cord." (He did so, and 'Amr) fixed it on the feet [3329] of Wardān, who said: "By God, 'Abū 'Abdallāh, I will lead you to the pool of death. Put your hand on my shoulder." Then he began to go forward, looking at 'Amr from time to time and saying, "Indeed I will lead you to the pool of death."

(Resuming the account of Abū Mikhnaf:) When 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ saw that the position of the Iraqis had strengthened and was afraid that it would lead to destruction, he said to Mu'āwiyah, "What if I put something to you that can only increase our unity and their division?" "All right," said Mu'āwiyah. 'Amr said, "We will raise the maṣāḥif[319] and say, 'their contents are to be authoritative in our dispute (mā fīhā ḥukm baynanā wa-baynakum)!' Even if some of them refuse to accept it, you will find that some of them will say, 'Indeed, yes, we must accept,' and there will be a division between them. If, on the other hand, they say, 'Yes, indeed, we accept what is in it,' then we will have disburdened ourselves of this fighting and this warfare until an appointed time or a later occasion." So they raised the maṣāḥif on lances and said: "This is the Book of God between us and you. Who will protect the frontier districts of the Syrians if they all perish, and who those of the Iraqis if they all perish?" When the men saw that the maṣāḥif had been raised, they said, "We respond to the Book of God, and we turn in repentance to it."

---

318. Al-ashqar, a sorrel camel or horse; if the latter, then one of the best sort (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.). Ibn al-Athīr has a pun here: In response to 'Amr's question, Wardān says, "With al-Ashtar?" 'Amr answers, "No, with al-ashqar. . . ."

319. Al-muṣḥaf (of which al-maṣāḥif is the plural) may refer simply to a volume or a book but, used without further specification, usually refers to the Qur'ān or a copy of it. Many scholars, traditional and modern, have been happy to accept that 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ's famous plan was for the raising of copies of the Qur'ān on the ends of the Syrian lances. Some, however, have seen problems in that interpretation: Most obviously, according to the tradition, this would have been relatively soon after the promulgation of the text by 'Uthmān (who is said to have had all variant copies destroyed), and it is hard to see that many manuscript copies could have been made as yet. Various theories have been proposed to get around this difficulty (see, e.g., Hinds, "Ṣiffīn Arbitration Agreement"). To allow for the possibility that, at the time of the Fitnah, al-muṣḥaf (or expressions such as the Book of God or the Book) did not yet designate the Qur'ān as we understand it and to avoid imposing an interpretation, the terminology of the text has been maintained in the following.

The Raising of the Maṣāḥif and the Call for Arbitration

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab al-Azdī—his father: 'Alī said: "Servants of God, carry on fighting your enemies, for you have truth and right on your side. Mu'āwiyah, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, Ibn Abī Mu'ayṭ, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah, Ibn Abī Sarḥ, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays are men without religion and without qur'ān.[320] I know them better than you, for I was with them both as children and as men, and they were the worst of children and the worst of men. Alas for you! They have not exalted them (the maṣāḥif), and they do not exalt them and do not know what it is that they contain. They have raised them up to you only to deceive you, to outwit you, and to trick you."[321] They answered him, "If we are called to the Book of God, we are bound to respond." 'Alī said to them, "The only reason I have fought against them was so that they should adhere to the authority of this Book (li-yadīnū bi-ḥukmi hādhā al-kitāb), for they have disobeyed God in what He has commanded and they have forgotten His covenant and rejected His Book." [3330]

Mis'ar b. Fadakī al-Tamīmī and Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ṭā'ī, al-Sinbisī,[322] who were with a band of the qurrā' who afterward became Khawārij, said to him: "'Alī, respond to the Book of God when you are called to it. Otherwise we shall indeed deliver you up entirely to the enemy or do what we did with Ibn 'Affān. It is our duty to act in accordance with what is in the Book of God. We have accepted it and, by God, if you do not do what we tell you, we will do what we say." 'Alī said: "Do not forget that I forbade you to do this, and remember your words to me. As for me, if you are obedient to me, fight, and, if disobedient, then do whatever seems best to you." They answered, "At least send for al-Ashtar, and let him come to you."

---

320. Qur'ān parallels "religion" (dīn), both of which are grammatically undefined.

321. Innahum mā rafa'ūhā thumma lā yarfa'ūnahā wa-lā ya'lamūna bimā fīhā wa-mā rafa'ūhā lakum illā. . . . WŞ, 489, has innahum wa-Allāhi mā rafa'ūhā anhum ya'rifūnahā wa-ya'malūna (changed from the first edition's ya'lamūna) bihā wa-lākinnahā. . . "They have not raised them up because they recognize them and act according to them; [they have raised them] only. . .?"). There seems to be some punning involving rafa'a/'arafa in the two senses of "to lift up" and "to exalt" and playing on the words rafa'a/'arafa and 'alima/'amala.

322. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Zaid b. Ḥiṣn; he was of the Banū Sinbis b. Mu'āwiyah of the Ṭayyi'.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī—a man of the Banū al-Nakha': The informant saw Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar visit Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr,[323] and Ibrāhīm said: I was with 'Alī when the people compelled him to accept the arbitration (al-ḥukūmah), and they said, "Send for al-Ashtar and let him come to you."

(Abū Mikhnaf, continuing the narrative from Jundab al-Azdī:) So 'Alī sent Yazīd b. Hāni' al-Sabī'ī[324] to al-Ashtar to tell him to come. Yazīd went to al-Ashtar and gave him the message, but al-Ashtar
[3331] said that he should tell 'Alī: "Now is not the time for you to move me from my post. I am expecting success in battle; do not rush me." Yazīd b. Hāni' returned to 'Alī and told him the answer, but he had scarcely reached us when there was a cloud of dust and raised voices from the direction of al-Ashtar. The men said to 'Alī, "By God, we think you must have ordered him to give battle," but he replied: "What makes you think that? Do you think I spoke secretly with him? Did I not speak to him (the messenger) openly in your hearing?" They answered him: "Send for him and have him come to you. Otherwise, by God, we will withdraw (i'tazala) from you." 'Alī, therefore, said to Yazīd (the messenger): "Alas for you, Yazīd! Tell him, 'Come to me, for the fitnah has come!'" Yazīd told al-Ashtar that, and the latter asked, "Is it because of the raising of the maṣāḥif?" "Yes," he answered. Al-Ashtar said: "By God, indeed when they were raised I thought that they would cause division and disunity. It was the counsel of the son of the harlot. Do you not see what God has done for us? Do I have to leave the enemy and go away from them?"

I (Yazīd b. Hāni') said: I asked him, "Would you like to be victorious here while the Commander of the Faithful is driven from the place where he is or is made to submit there?" "No, by God," he replied; "Glory be to God." Yazīd said, "They have told 'Alī, 'Send to al-Ashtar and have him come to you, or we will kill you as we killed Ibn 'Affān!'"

So al-Ashtar came to them and addressed them: "Men of Iraq! Men of baseness and feebleness! (Will you abandon the battle) when you have won the upper hand over the enemy and they think that you are defeating them?[325] They have raised the maṣāḥif, calling you to what is in them but, by God, they have abandoned what God commanded in them and the example (sunnah) of him to whom they were sent down. Do not respond to those people. Just [3332] grant me the respite of a time between two milkings, for I sense success in battle." They answered, "No." He then said, "Just grant me the respite of a time of the running of a horse, for I am sure of victory."[326] They replied, "In that case we would be partaking of your sin (khaṭī'ah)."

323. That is, at the time when Muṣ'ab was governor of Iraq, after his defeat of al-Mukhtār, and Ibrāhīm was one of his leading commanders.

324. Al-Sabī' b. Sab' of the Banū Hamdān.

Al-Ashtar said: "Tell me, now that the best of you have been killed and only the base ones remain, when were you in the right? Was it when you were fighting and the best of you were killed? In that case, since you have now withdrawn from the fighting, you are in the wrong. Or are you now in the right? In that case, those of you who have been killed, whose merits you do not deny and were better than you, are in hell." They answered: "Leave us alone, Ashtar! We fought them in God's cause, and we will now leave off fighting them for His sake. We will not obey you or your master. Get away from us." Al-Ashtar said: "By God, you have been cheated and allowed yourselves to be duped. You have been invited to leave aside war and you have assented. Oh you of the dark foreheads,[327] we used to think your prayers were a renunciation of this world and a longing to join God. But now I see that you merely flee to this world from death. Shame on you, you who are like the aged she-camel who seeks after filth to eat. After this you will never see glory again. May you perish just as those evil people perished."[328]

They reviled al-Ashtar and he them, and they struck the face of his mount with their whips while he moved forward, striking the faces of theirs with his. 'Alī called to them, and they desisted, and he said to the men, "We have agreed to make the Qur'ān an authority (ḥukm) between us and them."

---

325. WŞ, 491, agrees with the reading a-ḥīna given in Add. et emend.

326. From "Just grant me. . ." to this point the translation includes material from the editor's footnote, which suggests that text has been omitted in the ms.

327. Ann. understands this term as a reference to their cowardice.

328. Possibly a reference to the Qur'ānic theme of the umam khāliyah, those communities that had been destroyed by God because they rejected the prophets He had sent to them (e.g., Qur'ān 11:94–95).

Al-Ash'ath b. Qays came to 'Alī and said to him: "The men all seem satisfied and pleased to respond to the enemy's summons regarding the authority of the Qur'ān. If you like, I will go to Mu'āwiyah and ask him what he wants, and you will see what he [3333] asks." 'Alī said, "Go to him if you want and ask him."

Al-Ash'ath went to him and said, "Mu'āwiyah, why have you raised these maṣāḥif?" He answered: "So that you and we together turn to what God commanded in His book. You will send a man from among you whom you find acceptable, and we will send a man from among us, and we will impose upon them that they act according to what is in the Book of God, not opposing it. Then we will follow what they agree upon." Al-Ash'ath b. Qays said to him, "This is just," and then he went back to 'Alī and told him what Mu'āwiyah had said.

Our men said, "We are pleased and accept." The Syrians said, "We have chosen 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ," and al-Ash'ath and those who became Khawārij afterward said, "We are content with Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī." 'Alī said: "You disobeyed me in the start of this business; do not disobey me now. I do not think I should grant power to Abū Mūsā." But al-Ash'ath, Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ṭā'ī, and Mis'ar b. Fadakī insisted, "We do not find anyone else acceptable: What he warned us against we have fallen into."[329] 'Alī said: "I do not consider him trustworthy. He separated from me and caused the people to abandon me. Then he fled from me until I granted him security after some months. But here is Ibn 'Abbās; we will give him power in that matter." They replied, "It would not make any difference for us whether it was you or Ibn 'Abbās. We insist on someone who is equally distant from you and Mu'āwiyah, no closer to one of you than he is to the other." 'Alī said, "I will appoint al-Ashtar."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī: Al-Ash'ath said, "Was it anybody but al-Ashtar who caused this conflagration in the land?"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—his father: Al-Ash'ath said, "Are we not already under the authority [3334] (ḥukm) of al-Ashtar?" 'Alī said, "What is that?" and al-Ash'ath answered, "That we should strike one another with swords until what you and he want comes to pass." 'Alī said, "Do you then refuse to accept anybody but Abū Mūsā?" and the men replied, "Yes." 'Alī said, "Then do what you want."

329. That is, fitnah.

They sent to Abū Mūsā, who had withdrawn apart (i'tazala) from the fighting and was in 'Urḍ.[330] A mawlā of his came to him and said, "The people have made a peace." He replied, "Praise be to God, Lord of the worlds." The mawlā then said, "They have made you an arbitrator (ḥakam)," and Abū Mūsā said, "We belong to God and to Him we return."[331]

Abū Mūsā came and entered the army camp. Al-Ashtar went to 'Alī and said, "Assign me to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and, by God other than Whom there is no god, if I lay eyes on him, I will kill him." And al-Aḥnaf came and said: "Commander of the Faithful, you have been assaulted by a crafty and cunning man[332] and by one who made war against God and His Messenger at the beginning of Islam. I have tested this man (Abū Mūsā) and tried him out in varying circumstances,[333] and I have found him dull-witted and shallow in intellect.[334] Only somebody who can get so close to the enemy as to be in the palms of their hands, and be so far from them as the Pleiades, will avail us in dealing with them. If you refuse to make me an arbitrator on the question, at least make me a second or a third (delegate). (Then) I shall untie any knot that he shall fasten, and he shall not undo any knot that I tie, unless I have (already) tied for you another more binding (aḥkamu)." But the people insisted on (the choice of) Abū Mūsā and acceptance of (the call to refer to) the Book. Al-Aḥnaf said, "If you insist on Abū Mūsā, then make sure someone is watching him."[335]

---

330. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 644, for this place, said to be between Palmyra and Ruṣāfah.

331. Qur'ān 2:156. This is a standard formula of resignation to God's will, often uttered on receipt of bad news, especially news of someone's death.

332. Rumīta bi-ḥajar al-arḍ. Gloss., s.v. ḥajar, refers to Freytag, Arabum proverbia, I, 520, for the similar ramayta al-amra bi-ḥajarihi; for the translation adopted here, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥajar. The reference is to 'Amr's initial opposition to the Prophet and his acceptance of Islam only when it had become clear that it would be victorious.

333. Ḥalabtu ashṭurahu. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. shaṭr, has the idiom.

334. Kalīlu al-shafrati qarību al-qa'ri; literally, "blunt of blade and lacking in depth." Lane, Lexicon, s.v. qa'r, has ba'īdu al-qa'r as meaning "of deep intellect."

335. Literally, "keep his back warm with the men"; perhaps, "give him some men to back him up."

They wrote: "In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. This is what 'Alī the Commander of the Faithful has determined." But 'Amr said, "Just write his name and that of his father, for he is your commander but not ours." Al-Aḥnaf said to 'Alī, "Do [3335] not efface the title of Commander of the Faithful, for I fear that if you erase it the office will never revert to you. Do not erase it, even though the people kill one another." 'Alī refused (to make the erasure) for much of the day, but then al-Ash'ath b. Qays said, "Erase this name, for God has removed it."[336] So it was erased, and 'Alī said: "God is most great! A precedent (sunnah) following a precedent and an example (mathal) following an example! I was writing in the presence of the Messenger of God on the day of al-Ḥudaybiyyah when they said, 'You are not the Messenger of God, and we will not lend credence to that—just write your name and that of your father,' and he wrote it." 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "God preserve us from this comparison—that we should be compared to infidels although we are believers!" 'Alī said: "Ibn al-Nābighah, when were you not a friend to the wicked (fāsiqūn) and an enemy to the Muslims? Do you resemble anybody but your mother who brought you forth?" 'Amr stood and said, "You and I will never sit together again." 'Alī said, "I hope that God cleanses my circle of you and the likes of you." And the document was written.

According to 'Alī b. Muslim al-Ṭūsī[337]—Ḥabbān—Mubārak—al-Ḥasan: Al-Aḥnaf told me that Mu'āwiyah wrote to 'Alī: "If you want there to be a peace agreement, then erase this title." 'Alī took counsel. He had a tent that he had given the Banū Hāshim permission to enter and me (al-Aḥnaf) with them. He asked, "What is your view regarding what Mu'āwiyah has written—'erase this title'?" (Mubārak said: That is, the title Commander of the Faithful.) They replied, "God has removed it, for, when the Messenger of God made a peace with the people of Mecca, he wrote, 'Muḥammad,

---

336. Gloss. insists that barraḥa is not to be understood as an optative but with reference to the story of al-Ḥudaybiyyah in the following. The account refers to the tradition that at al-Ḥudaybiyyah the still polytheist Meccans refused to allow Muḥammad to use the title "Messenger of God" in the document they and he drew up at the time of their truce in 6/628. They insisted that he style himself merely "Muḥammad the son of 'Abdallāh." Muḥammad is said to have agreed to this apparently humiliating concession. See further *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥudaybiyya.

337. A Baghdādī traditionist who died in 253/867 (see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 382, no. 622, where Ḥabbāb [sic] b. Hilāl is named as one of his authorities).

Messenger of God,' but they rejected that until he had written, 'This is what Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh has determined.' " I said to 'Alī: "What is this comparison between you and the Messenger of God? [3336] In giving you the oath of allegiance we have not given any special respect to you as an individual. If we had known anyone among us with more right in this matter than you, we would have given him our oath of allegiance and then fought you. I swear by God that, if you delete this title, upon which I have given an oath of allegiance and for which I have fought against them, it will never return to you."[338] And, by God, that is how it was. Rarely was al-Aḥnaf's opinion set against that of someone else without its proving to be superior.

(The narrative of Abū Mikhnaf is now resumed.)[339] The document was written:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate, this is what 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān have mutually determined. 'Alī has decided it for the men of al-Kūfah and those of their party (shī'ah) who are with them of the believers and the Muslims; Mu'āwiyah has decided it for the men of Syria and those believers and Muslims with them.
>
> We will comply with the authority (ḥukm) of God and His Book, and nothing else will bring us together. We will refer to the Book of God,[340] from its opening to its close. We will effect what it lays down and eliminate what it does away with. The two arbitrators (ḥakamān)—and they are Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī 'Abdallāh b. Qays and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ al-Qurashī[341]—will act in accordance with whatever they find in the Book of God. For whatever they do not find in

338. Cairo reads "upon which you have accepted an oath of allegiance and for which you have fought against them."

339. For variant readings of the following text, and variants in the names of the witnesses, see Hinds, "Ṣiffīn Arbitration Agreement"; and see Serjeant, "Early Arabic Prose," esp. 142–47.

340. Literally, "the Book of God is between us."

341. It is not clear whether we are meant to understand that the two names were part of the document or whether this is an explicit editorial interpolation. The two versions analyzed by Hinds contain the names.

the Book of God they will resort to the just precedent (al-sunnah al-'ādilah), which unites and does not divide.

The two arbitrators have from 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah and from the two armies pacts and covenants and from the people an assurance that they have security for themselves and their families. The community will be helpers (anṣār) for the two arbitrators regarding what they both determine, and the believers and Muslims of both parties are bound by God's pact and covenant that we will abide by the contents of this document (ṣaḥīfah), that what the two of them [3337] decide upon is obligatory for the believers. Security, right conduct, and the setting aside of arms are to be between the believers wherever they go, for themselves, their families, their properties, those of them who are here and those who are absent. 'Abdallāh b. Qays and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ have sworn to God that they will decide the issue disputed among this community and that they will not return it to warfare or division so long as they are not disobeyed.

The appointed time for the decision is Ramaḍān, but, if the two of them wish to defer that, they may defer it by mutual consent. If one of the two arbitrators dies, then the commander of (his) party (shī'ah) will choose in his stead one of those who are recognized for justice and probity[342] and will not delay. The place in which they will make their decision shall be a place equidistant between the people of al-Kūfah and those of Syria, and, if they so wish and desire, only those whom they want may be present there with them. The two arbitrators will take whomsoever they wish of those (now) present and write the fact of their witnessing[343] to what is in this document. They will be helpers (of the two arbitrators) against whoever abandons what is in this document and desires impiety (ilḥād) and injustice regarding it. Oh God, we ask for Your help against whoever abandons what is in this document.

---

342. Min ahl al-ma'dalah wa-al-qisṭ: for the concept of 'adālah in Muslim law, see *EI*², s.v. 'Adl.

343. Read shahādatahum, not shahādatahumā.

It was witnessed by;[344] from among 'Alī's companions, al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī, 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī, Warqā' b. Sumayy al-Bajalī, 'Abdallāh b. Muḥill al-'Ijlī, Ḥujr b. 'Adī al-Kindī, 'Abdallāh b. al-Ṭufayl al-'Āmirī, 'Uqbah b. Ziyād al-Ḥaḍramī, Yazīd b. Ḥujayyah al-Ṭaymī, and Mālik b. Ka'b al-Hamdānī.[345] And from among the companions of Mu'āwiyah (it was witnessed by): Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī 'Amr b. Sufyān, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī, al-Mukhāriq b. al-Ḥārith al-Zubaydī, Ziml b. 'Amr al-'Udhrī, Ḥamzah b. Mālik al-Hamdānī, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid al-Makhzūmī, Subay' b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī, 'Alqamah b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī, 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān, and Yazīd b. al-Ḥurr al-'Absī.[346] [3338]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—'Umārah b. Rabī'ah al-Jarmī: When the document (ṣaḥīfah) had been written, al-Ashtar was summoned to (witness) it, but he said: "May I lose my right hand, and may my left be useless after it, if my name is inscribed in this document in favor of peace or settlement. Do I not have a clear sign from my Lord about the error of my enemy;[347] and did you not have the prospect of victory if you had not agreed upon acting wrongfully?" Al-Ash'ath b. Qays said to him: "By God, you have seen neither victory nor wrongful acts. Come to us, for there is no reason for you to shun us."[348] He replied: "Yes, indeed, by God, there is reason to shun you in this world on its account and in the next on its account. God has shed by my sword the blood of men no worse than you in my view, and their blood was no less sacrosanct than yours."

'Umārah said: I looked at that man—he meant al-Ash'ath—and it was as if charcoal had been crushed on his nose (that is, he was black with rage).

---

344. Again, it is not clear whether this is to be understood as a continuation of the text of the document ("Witnessed by:. . .") or as an editorial comment.

345. For al-Ash'ath, Ibn 'Abbās, and Sa'īd b. Qays, see nn. 55, 3, 66, above; for Yazīd b. Ḥujayyah, Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; for Mālik b. Ka'b, ibid., s.v. Mālik b. Ka'b Abū al-Ḥārith; Ḥujr b. 'Adī (see n. 71, above), appears in other versions as Ḥujr b. Yazīd (which may be a better reading).

346. For Ḥamzah b. Mālik. see n. 81, above; for al-Mukhāriq, Ziml, and 'Utbah (the brother of Mu'āwiyah), see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.vv.

347. A-wa-lastu 'alā bayyinah min rabbī min ḍalāl 'adūwī. Cairo has a wāw before the second min; WṢ, 511, has . . . wa-yaqīn min ḍalālat 'adūwī.

348. Lā raghbata bika 'annā.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb: Al-Ash'ath went out with the document to read it to the men and to present it to them [3339] to read it (themselves). He came with it to a party of the Banū Tamīm, among whom was 'Urwah b. Udayyah, the brother of Abū Bilāl (Mirdās).[349] Al-Ash'ath read it to them, and 'Urwah said: "Do you appoint men as arbitrators in God's business? Authority (ḥukm) belongs to God alone."[350] Then he wielded his sword and lightly struck the rump of his mount with it so that it plunged forward, but his companions shouted to him, "Control yourself!" and he withdrew. The people of al-Ash'ath's tribe and many others of the Yemenis were furious on his behalf, but al-Aḥnaf b. Qays al-Sa'dī,[351] Ma'qil b. Qays al-Riyāḥī, Mis'ar b. Fadakī, and many of the Banū Tamīm came to al-Ash'ath and offered apologies and excuses. He accepted them and forgave them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zayd 'Abdallāh al-Awdī: A man of Awd[352] called 'Amr b. Aws fought alongside 'Alī at Ṣiffīn, and Mu'āwiyah took him prisoner with many others. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ told Mu'āwiyah to kill them, but 'Amr b. Aws said to Mu'āwiyah, "You are my maternal uncle, so do not kill me." The Banū Awd came up to Mu'āwiyah and requested, "Give us our brother," but he replied: "Let him be. By my life, if he is telling the truth, then we do not need your intercession; and, if he is lying, then your intercession will be of no use."[353] He asked 'Amr b. Aws: "How is it that I am your maternal uncle? By God, there is no marriage relationship between us and the Banū Awd." 'Amr replied, "If I tell you and you recognize it, then will it gain a safe-conduct for me from you?" "Yes," he said. 'Amr said, "Do you not know that Umm Ḥabībah the daughter of Abū Sufyān was the Prophet's wife?" "Yes, indeed," Mu'āwiyah answered. "Well, I am her son, and you are her brother, and therefore you are my maternal uncle." Mu'āwiyah said: "May God grant rest to your father! Among these there is nobody who

349. For these two brothers of the Banū Ḥanẓalah/Tamīm, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Urwa b. Ḥudair and Mirdās b. Ḥudair.

350. See Qur'ān 6:57, 12:40, 12:67.

351. For al-Aḥnaf, a Tamīmī leader proverbial for his tact and diplomacy, see *EI*², s.v.

352. Apparently the Banū Awd b. Ṣa'b of Madhḥij, which had members in both al-Kūfah and Syria (Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Aud).

353. Literally, "will come from behind him."

would have thought of it other than he (i.e., 'Amr b. Aws)."[354] Then he said to the men of Awd: "Indeed he has no need of your intercession! Let him go!"[355]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah al-Hamdānī—al-Sha'bī: The prisoners taken by 'Alī at Ṣiffīn were numerous, but [3340] he released them, and they went to Mu'āwiyah while 'Amr was advising the latter to kill the many whom the Syrians had captured. But they were surprised to find that the prisoners taken from their own side had been released, and Mu'āwiyah said to him: "'Amr, if we were to follow your advice regarding these prisoners, we would incur disgrace in the matter. Do you not see that our own captives have been released?" And he ordered the release of the prisoners who were in his hands.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ismā'īl b. Yazīd—Ḥumayd b. Muslim—Jundab b. 'Abdallāh: At Ṣiffīn 'Alī said to his men: "You have done something that has demolished strength, brought down might, caused weakness, and bequeathed lowliness. When you had the upper hand and your enemy feared destruction, when the slaughter was great among them and they experienced the agonies of wounds, they raised the maṣāḥif and summoned you to what was in them so as to obtain relief from you, to break off the fighting over the issue that divides you from them, and to await the accidents of fate, as a trick and a cunning trap. You gave them what they asked and insisted on leniency and forbearance toward them, and I swear by God that I do not think that henceforth you will agree upon right conduct or achieve a gate of discretion."

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: The document (kitāb) regarding the matter between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah was written, according to report, on Wednesday, thirteen days having elapsed of Ṣafar in the year 37 of the Hijrah. It was agreed that[356] 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah would come to the place of the two arbitrators at Dūmat al-Jandal[357]

354. The point is that Umm Ḥabībah, Mu'āwiyah's sister, enjoyed the honorific title "Mother of the Believers" (Umm al-mu'minīn) along with the Prophet's other wives (see Qur'ān 33:6).

355. For a in place of a-lā, see Gloss., s.v. a.

356. It is not clear whether we are to understand that the following was agreed in the document itself. Ann., A.H. 37 §67, seems to think so and translates "con la clausola."

357. For this oasis on the borders between the Arabian peninsula and modern Jordan, see *EI*², s.v.

in the month of Ramaḍān and each of them would bring 400 companions and followers.

[3341] According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad (b. Shabbawayh al-Marwazī)—his father—Sulaymān b. Yūnus b. Yazīd—al-Zuhrī: At Ṣiffīn, when Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Ṣūḥān[358] saw the men contending with one another,[359] he said: "Hear and understand! Know well, by God, that, if 'Alī is triumphant, he will be like Abū Bakr and 'Umar, but, if Mu'āwiyah wins, he will not acknowledge any man's word as truth."

Al-Zuhrī said: So it was that the Syrians displayed[360] their maṣāḥif and appealed to what they contained. The men of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah[361] were filled with awe, and at that they appointed the two arbitrators. The men of Iraq chose Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī and those of Syria 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. When the two had been appointed, the men at Ṣiffīn dispersed, and the two arbitrators stipulated that they should elevate what the Qur'ān elevates[362] and put down what the Qur'ān puts down, that they should make a choice for the community of Muḥammad, and that they would meet together at Dūmat al-Jandal or, if they did not meet for that,[363] that they should meet in the next year at Adhruḥ.[364]

When 'Alī went back the Ḥarūriyyah[365] opposed him and rebelled (kharaja). That was the first manifestion (of their movement). They exhorted him to fight (against Mu'āwiyah) and rejected his giving authority to (ḥakkama) men in something that was a matter for God's authority (ḥukm). They said, "Authority belongs to God alone" (lā ḥukma illā lillāh subḥānahu) and fought against 'Alī.

When the two arbitrators met at Adhruḥ, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah[366] came to them among those of the men who were present there. The two sent to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and to 'Abdallāh

---

358. See n. 62, above.

359. Reading, with Cairo, yatabārawna (Leiden reads yatabārrūna).

360. Nashara, which could mean "to unroll," "to unfurl," or perhaps "to hoist" (like a flag); Ann., A.H. 38 §23, understands it in this last sense—"sollevarono."

361. Literally, "the men of the two Iraqs."

362. An yarfa'ā mā rafa'a al-Qur'ān. Here the metaphorical sense of raf'u al-Qur'ān is explicit.

363. In lam yajtami'ā li-dhālik; possibly, "if they did not agree to that," although one would expect 'alā rather than li.

364. Between Ma'n and Petra (see *EI*², s.v.).

365. A name for the Khawārij, said to be derived from the village of Ḥarūrā', where they first gathered (see *EI*², s.v. Ḥarūrā').

366. For this controversial Companion of the Prophet and future governor of al-Kūfah for Mu'āwiyah, see *EI*², s.v.

b. al-Zubayr,[367] asking them to come with many men. Mu'āwiyah came with the Syrians, but 'Alī and the Iraqis refused to come. Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah said to some men of Quraysh who were well versed in public affairs, "Do you think anybody is well versed enough to devise it so as to find out whether the two arbitrators will agree or differ from one another?" They replied, "We do not think anyone knows how to do that." He said, "By God, I think that I will find it out from them when I am alone with them and question them." [3342]

He went in to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and spoke to him, saying: "Abū 'Abdallāh, answer my question. What do you think about us—a group of those who have removed themselves from the conflict (ma'shar al-mu'tazilah)? We are in doubt about the matter of this fighting, which is clear to you, and we thought that we should wait and be cautious until the community reached an agreement." 'Amr answered, "I consider you a band that has gone apart (mu'tazilah), behind the righteous ones but ahead of the evil ones." Al-Mughīrah went away, not asking him anything else, and came to Abū Mūsā. He questioned him just as he had 'Amr, and Abū Mūsā said: "I think you are the most steadfast of the people in holding the right opinion. In you is the remnant of the Muslims." Al-Mughīrah left without asking him anything else and met those well-versed men of Quraysh to whom he had said what he did. He said, "These two will never agree about anything."

When the two arbitrators met and debated, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "Abū Mūsā, I think that the first part of the truth we should determine is to decide in favor of those who fulfill their undertakings according to their fulfillment and against those who are perfidious according to their perfidy." Abū Mūsā said, "What do you mean?" and 'Amr said, "Do you not know that Mu'āwiyah and the Syrians have fulfilled their undertaking and come at the time and to the place upon which we pledged them?" "Indeed yes," said Abū Mūsā. 'Amr told him to write that down, and he did so. 'Amr said: "Abū Mūsā, do you accept that we should name a man who will have authority over the affairs of this community? Give me a name, and, if I can accept your suggestion, I undertake to do so; otherwise, you must accept mine." Abū Mūsā said. "I suggest 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar." (Ibn 'Umar was one of those who had "gone apart" [i'tazala].) 'Amr replied, "I suggest Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān." Their meeting ended in mutual vilification.

367. Both sons of prominent Companions of the Prophet, and possible candidates themselves for the caliphate (see *EI*², s.vv.).

[3343] Then they went out to the people, and Abū Mūsā said to them, "I have found 'Amr to be like those of whom God says, 'Recite to them the tidings of him to whom We have brought Our signs but he has cast them off.' "[368] When Abū Mūsā fell silent, 'Amr spoke and said, "People, I have found Abū Mūsā to be like those of whom God says, 'Those who were made to bear the Torah but then did not carry it are like the ass carrying writings.' "[369] And each one of them wrote down the simile he had coined regarding the other (to be sent to) the garrison towns.

Ibn Shihāb (al-Zuhrī) said: One evening Mu'āwiyah stood and addressed the people. He praised God in suitable terms and then said, "Whoever has something to say on this matter, let him show himself to us." Ibn 'Umar said: "I got up from my ḥubwah;[370] for I wanted to say, 'Men who fought your father in the cause of Islam have something to say about it,' but then I was afraid to say anything that would divide the community, or about which blood would be shed, or in which I might become carried away, for what God promised regarding the gardens (of paradise) is dearer to me than that. When Mu'āwiyah had returned to his dwelling place, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah came to me and asked, 'What stopped you speaking when you heard what the man was saying?' I replied, 'I wanted to do so but then was afraid to say anything that would be divisive, or about which blood would be shed, or in which I might become carried away. What God promised of the gardens is dearer to me than that.' " Ibn 'Umar said, "Ḥabīb said, 'You have been preserved by God from evil.' "[371]

---

368. Qur'ān 7:175, which continues, "and Satan followed after him and he became one of those who go astray" (al-ghāwīn).

369. Qur'ān 62:5.

370. On the ḥubwah, a garment or piece of cloth used to wrap around oneself when sitting on the ground with the knees drawn up against the chest, or the act of sitting in such a posture, see Lane, Lexicon, s.vv. ḥubwah and ḥ-b-w, form VIII.

371. 'Uṣimta. The story is illustrative of Ibn 'Umar's unwillingness to become involved in the fitnah. See the report in al-Bukhārī, Maghāzī, bāb 29 (ghazwat al-khandaq).

(The narrative of Abū Mikhnaf resumes.) According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī: After the document (ṣaḥīfah) had been written, 'Alī was told, "Al-Ashtar will not agree to what is in it, but insists on fighting." 'Alī replied: "By God, I did not accept (the appeal to stop the fighting) and I did not want you to accept it, but, after you insisted, I agreed. Now, since I have accepted it, it is not right to reject it again and to change our mind after confirming it, unless God is disobeyed and His Book transgressed. Fight those who have neglected God's command, but, as for he who you tell me has forsaken my command and my position, he is not one of those. I have no fear that he will be like that. Would that there were two like him among you; would that there was one like him, who sees my foe as I do. Then the burden of you would become light for me and I would hope that some of your deviation would be returned to the straight path for me, for I ordered you not to do what you have done, but you disobeyed me. I and you are as the brother of Hawāzin said: [3344]

Am I anything but one of Ghaziyyah? If it goes astray, so do I, and, if it follows the right path, so do I."[372]

A group of those with him said, "Commander of the Faithful, we have only done what you have done." 'Alī said: "Yes, but why was your answer to them in favor of our stopping fighting? As for the decision (to appoint arbiters), we have given you a pledge regarding it, and all I wanted was for you not fall into error, please God, the Lord of the worlds."

The document (kitāb) was written in the month of Ṣafar, and the time appointed for the meeting of the two arbitrators was Ramaḍān, eight months later. Then men buried their dead, and 'Alī gave the order to al-A'war[373] to call upon the men to depart.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—his father: When we left Ṣiffīn we took a different road from that by which we had come. We went by way of the open country on the [3345]

372. In al-Iṣfahānī, Kitab al-Aghānī, X, 8, line 8, the verse is attributed to Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah of the Banū Jusham b. Mu'āwiyah/Hawāzin, of which Ghaziyyah b. Jusham was a subclan (see Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 116).

373. Possibly to be identified with al-A'war al-Shannī, the poet (see the index to WṢ, s.v.).

bank of the Euphrates as far as Hīt and then by way of Ṣandawdā'.[374] There the Anṣārī descendants of Sa'd b. Ḥarām[375] came out and met 'Alī and proposed to him that he should pitch camp, and he passed the night among them.

The next morning, we continued the journey with him, and, when we had passed al-Nukhaylah and could see the houses of al-Kūfah, we came upon an old man sitting in the shade of a house, whose face bore traces of illness. 'Alī went to him (and we were with him) and greeted him, and so did we. He returned 'Alī's greetings in such a handsome manner that we guessed he must have recognized 'Alī. 'Alī said to him: "I see that your face is changed. What caused that—is it from an illness?" "Yes," he answered. 'Alī said, "You must have suffered from it?" but he answered, "I am glad that it afflicted me rather than another." 'Alī asked, "Are you not expecting a divine reward for the way it has afflicted you?" and he replied, "Indeed yes." 'Alī said: "Rejoice in the mercy of your Lord and the forgiveness of your sins. Who are you, servant of God?" He answered, "I am Ṣāliḥ b. Sulaym." "Of what people?" asked 'Alī. "In origin I am from Salāmān Ṭayyi', but I live among and count myself as one of the Banū Sulaym b. Manṣūr."[376] 'Alī said: "Praise be to God, how excellent is your name and that of your father, that of your adopted relatives and of those to whom you trace your descent. Have you been with us on this expedition?" He said: "No, by God, I have not. I wanted to, but the scourge of the fever, the traces of which you see, prevented me." 'Alī said: "The weak, the sick, and those who do not have the means to spend (in contributing to the support of jihād) are exempt from blame if they are true toward God and His Messenger, and there may not be any compulsion against those who do good. God is forgiving and merciful."[377] Tell me what the people 374. For Ṣandawdā' (or Ṣandūdā'), south of Hīt (n. 40, above), see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 420.

375. Read Sa'd b. 'Amr b. Ḥarām (as noted in Ann., 37 A.H., §69); he is reported as having been appointed over Ṣandawdā' by Khālid b. al-Walīd in 13/634, to enforce the submission of various Christian Arabs there (see Ṭabarī, I, 2109; al-Balādhurī, Kitāb al-futūḥ, 110).

376. The index to the Leiden edition has Salāmān Ṭayyi' (to which this is the only reference) as a person, whereas the Cairo index lists the name as that of a tribe. Possibly it refers to Salāmān b. Thu'al of the Ṭayyi' (for which, see Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 253). For the Banū Sulaym b. Manṣūr of Qays, see ibid., table 92.

377. Qur'ān 9:91.

say about what has happened between us and the Syrians." The old man said, "There are some who are pleased by it, and they are the faithless ones; but there are some who are crushed and sad about it, and they are those who are true to you." 'Alī went to leave and said: "You have spoken truly. May God make your sufferings a decrease of your sins.[378] There is no heavenly reward for illness, but it does decrease any sin that a servant of God incurs. There is only a reward for speaking with the tongue and acting with hand and foot, but God, who is to be greatly praised, admits to paradise a great multitude of his servants by reason of the purity of their intentions and the righteousness of their hearts." [3346]

Then 'Alī went on a short distance, and 'Abdallāh b. Wadī'ah al-Anṣārī[379] met him. He drew near, greeted him, and journeyed along with him. 'Alī asked him, "What have you heard the people saying about what we have done?" He replied, "Some of them approve and others disapprove, just as God said, 'They persist in their differences except for those upon whom your Lord has mercy.' "[380] 'Alī said to him, "What do those of sound understanding say about it?" He answered: "They say: 'Alī had a mighty body of support and he split it, he had a firm fortress and he razed it. How long will it take him to rebuild what he destroyed and to reunite what he sundered? If he had pressed on with those who obeyed him when those who disobeyed him disobeyed him, and if he had fought until he was victorious or had perished, that would have been good judgment (ḥazm)!' " 'Alī said:

> Did I destroy, or did they destroy? Did I split asunder, or did they? As for their saying, "If he had pressed on with those who obeyed him when those who disobeyed him disobeyed him and fought until he was victorious or had perished, that would have been good judgment," by God, it is not as if I did not think of that. I have no concern for the things of this world and am content with death. I

---

378. Ḥaṭṭ^{an} li-sayyi'ātika. For discussion of the benefits of pain, suffering, and illness, see the chapters with titles such as Fī ajr al-marīḍ in the ḥadīth collections, and Wensick, Concordances, s.vv. marḍ, marīḍ.

379. Perhaps the son of Wadī'ah b. 'Amr, a ḥalīf of the Banū al-Najjār, who fought at Badr (Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 58; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 632, no. 9118).

380. Qur'ān 11:118–19.

[3347] intended to advance against the enemy, but I considered those two who had rushed ahead of me (he meant al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn), and I considered those (other) two who had gone forward (he meant 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far and Muḥammad b. 'Alī).[381] I knew that if the first two perished, the progeny of Muḥammad would be cut off from this community, and I abhorred that (thought). And I was concerned for the second two lest they perish, for I knew that if it were not for my situation they would not have gone forward (he meant Muḥammad b. 'Alī and 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far). I swear by God that if I meet the enemy in the future I shall indeed meet them (in battle) so long as they (his three sons and his nephew) are not with me in any camp or dwelling place.

Then he moved on and, when we passed Banū 'Awf, on the right were the graves of seven or eight men. 'Alī asked, "What are these graves?" and Qudāmah b. al-'Aj̱lān[382] answered: "Commander of the Faithful, after you had departed Khabbāb b. al-Aratt[383] died, and his final wish was that he should be buried outside[384] al-Kūfah. (Previously burials were made only in the people's houses and courtyards.) He was buried outside the town (may God have mercy on him), and the others were buried alongside him." 'Alī said: "May God have mercy on Khabbāb. He entered Islam willingly, he made hijrah obediently, he lived as a fighter for Islam (mujāhid), and he was physically put to the test on several occasions. God will not neglect the reward of he who performs good deeds."[385] Then he came and stood over the graves and said: "Greetings to you, you of the 381. The identifications are part of the Arabic text. Al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn were 'Alī's sons from Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Prophet; 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far was the son of an elder brother of 'Alī (a line of descent that became the focus of messianic aspirations toward the end of the Umayyad period); and Muḥammad b. 'Alī was the already mentioned Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah.

382. WS, 530, supplies the nisbah al-Azdī. The Banū 'Awf might be the branch of 'Adwān with that name settled in al-Kūfah.

383. For this early follower of the Prophet in Mecca, where he is said to have suffered mistreatment from Quraysh, see *EI*², s.v.

384. Fī al-ẓahr (Gloss., s.v.). Wellhausen, Reste, 179, n. 1, refers to the discrepancy between *ḥadīth*s that forbid the use of houses for burial (Wensinck, Concordances, s.v. bayt, p. 340, col. a) and reports that the Prophet and other early Muslims were buried in their houses.

385. See Qur'ān 9:120.

desolate abodes and forsaken places, of the believing men and women, and of the Muslim men and women. You are they who have gone ahead before us, while we come after you and will shortly join you. Oh God, pardon us and them and forgive us and them." And he said: "Praise be to God, Who has created you from it (the earth) and made it the place to which you return. He will make you arise from it again and gather you together upon it. Blessings upon he [3348] who remembers the return, acts for the final reckoning, is content with a sufficiency, and is satisfied with the reward that God will bestow upon him."[386] Then he went ahead until, when he was opposite the lane of the Thawriyyūn,[387] he said: "Go in. Enter among these houses."[388]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim al-Fā'ishī: 'Alī passed by the Thawriyyūn and heard weeping. He asked about it and was told, "They are weeping for the slain at Ṣiffīn." He replied, "I bear witness for those of them who were killed patiently holding fast and expecting the rewards of martyrdom." Then he passed by the Fā'ishiyyūn[389] and heard crying and said something similar. He moved on and passed by the Shibāmiyyūn[390] and heard a great convulsion. He halted, and Ḥarb b. Shuraḥbīl al-Shibāmī[391] came out to him. 'Alī said: "Have your women taken control of you? Can you not prevent this wailing of theirs?" He answered: "Commander of the Faithful, if it were one house or two or three, we could, but 180 of this clan have been killed, and there is no house in which there is no weeping. As for us men, we do not weep but are happy for them. Should we not be glad for them on account of their martyrdom?" 'Alī replied, "May God have mercy on your slain and your dead," and Ḥarb began walking along with him while 'Alī rode. 'Alī said to him, "Go back." He stopped and repeated: "Go back. Someone like you walking with someone like me is a temptation

386. Wa-raḍiya 'an Allāh; see Qur'ān 9:100, where the expression is often understood in the sense of satisfaction with the reward given by God, rather than with God Himself.

387. This district of al-Kūfah is referred to in Ṭabarī's account of al-Mukhtār's revolt (II, 628 = XX, 213, of this translation); the Thawriyyūn were part of the Banū Hamdān.

388. See Jāḥiẓ, al-Bayān, III, 148, for this speech over the tombs.

389. There were two clans of the Hamdān called Fā'ish settled in al-Kūfah.

390. For the Banū Shibām b. As'ad of Hamdān, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

391. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to him.

(fitnah) for the governor (wālī) and a humiliation for the believer (mu'min)."[392] Then he passed on and went by the Nā'iṭiyyūn,[393] the majority off whom were 'Uthmāniyyah.[394] He heard one of them, called 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd[395] of the Banū 'Ubayd of the Nā'iṭiyyūn, saying: "By God, 'Alī has done nothing. He went away [3349] and then came back without anything." When they saw 'Alī, they fell silent, and 'Alī said, "These are the leaders of a people who have not seen Syria this year." Then he said to his companions, "A people from whom we have separated at the beginning[396] is better than these." Then he began to say:

Your brother is he who, if a mischance of fate distressed you, did not continue silent in face of your grief.
Your brother is not he who, if matters become bad for you, will persist in insulting and blaming you.

Then he went on, continuously uttering the name of God, until he had entered the governor's residence (qaṣr).

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—'Umārah b. Rabī'ah: They left for Ṣiffīn with 'Alī full of brotherly love and affection, and they came back with mutual hatred and enmity. Before they had left their camp at Ṣiffīn the cry "Authority belongs to God alone" (lā ḥukma illā lillāh) had spread among them, and they had set out, pushing each other aside all along the way, insulting one another and beating each other with whips. The Khawārij were saying, "Enemies of God, you have fallen short in God's affair and you have appointed arbitrators." And the others responded to them, "You have separated from our imam and divided our community." When 'Alī entered al-Kūfah, they (the Khawārij) did not go in with him but went to Ḥarūrā',[397] where 12,000 of them encamped. Their herald proclaimed: "Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Tamīmī[398]

---

392. It is not certain what this means unless the wālī is 'Alī and the fitnah is the temptation of pride—i.e., the story illustrates 'Alī's lack of vanity?

393. For the Banū al-Nā'iṭ of Hamdān, see Ibn al-Kalbī, I, table 227.

394. That is, supporters of the murdered caliph.

395. WṢ, 532, has 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Marthad, which latter is a common name among the Banū al-Nā'iṭ.

396. Leiden has anifan; ānifan, as in WṢ, 532, seems better. The point is probably that 'Alī is criticizing their hypocrisy in remaining in al-Kūfah while not supporting him—at least he knew where he stood with those who had gone over to Mu'āwiyah.

397. See n. 365, above.

398. See n. 57, above.

is in command of the fighting, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Kawwā' al-Yashkurī[399] is over the prayer ritual (ṣalāt). After the victory authority will be consultative,[400] and the oath of allegiance will be to God and (conditional on) the commanding of the good and the prohibiting of what is reprehensible."

'Alī Sends Ja'dah b. Hubayrah to Khurāsān

In this year (37/657–58), according to reports, 'Alī sent Ja'dah b. Hubayrah[401] to Khurāsān.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)[402]—'Abdallāh b. Maymūn—'Amr b. Shujayrah—Jābir—al-Sha'bī: After 'Alī had returned from Ṣiffīn, he sent Ja'dah b. Hubayrah al-Makhzūmī to (establish authority over) Khurāsān. He got as far as Abrashahr,[403] the people of which had espoused unbelief (kufr) and refused to yield. Ja'dah, therefore, went (back) to 'Alī, who sent out Khulayd b. Qurrah al-Yarbū'ī,[404] who besieged the people of Naysābūr until they made peace with him, and so too those of Marw.[405] He took two maidens of royal blood who had been given safe-conduct, and these he sent to 'Alī, who proposed that they should enter Islam and that he should marry them to someone. They said, "Marry us [3350]

399. Like Shabath, he developed from opposition to 'Uthmān, to support for 'Alī, to support for the Khawārij, to support for Mu'āwiyah (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr [al-Kauwā']).

400. Wa-al-amr shūrī. Presumably meaning that a shūrā (council) will be appointed to choose an imam, just as was done on the death of 'Umar. One could also read the sentence as "Authority will be consultative after the victory, the oath of allegiance to God, and the commanding of the good and prohibiting of what is reprehensible." The last phrase (al-amr bi-al-ma'rūf wa-al-nahy 'an al-munkar) is of frequent occurrence in the Qur'ān; in theory it is a duty of all Muslim governments, but it is emphasized especially by those of an activist disposition.

401. His mother was a sister of 'Alī (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ǧa'da b. Hubaira).

402. For 'Alī b. Muḥammad Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī, d. ca. 235/850, see GAS, I, 314–15; *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'inī; Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung," 103ff.

403. Abrashahr (or Abarshahr) was an alternative name for Nishapur (or Naysābūr), the major city of western Khurāsān (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map VIII and 382–88). Both names could also be applied to wider areas, and in this report it seems that Abrashahr is the name of the province and Naysābūr that of the town. (See *EI*¹, s.v. Nīshāpūr.)

404. Dīnawarī, 153–54, calls him Khulayd b. Kās. At Ṭabarī, I, 2349, we are told that the name was also transmitted as Khulayd b. Ṭarīf.

405. Marw is the major town in eastern Khurāsān (Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map VIII and 397–400).

to your two sons," but he refused that. One of the dihqāns[406] said to him, "Give them to me, for then you would bestow an honor on me." 'Alī did that, and the two of them stayed with the dihqān, who spread out for them silken carpets and gave them food from golden vessels. Then they returned to Khurāsān.

The Secession of the Khawārij from 'Alī and His Companions, and Their Subsequent Return

In this year the Khawārij withdrew from 'Alī and his companions and proclaimed their formula "Authority (ḥukm) belongs only to God." Then 'Alī argued with them, and they returned and entered al-Kūfah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb (al-Kalbī)—'Umārah b. Rabī'ah: After 'Alī had come to al-Kūfah and the Khawārij had separated from him, his party (al-shī'ah) hurried to him and said: "We pledge ourselves to you with a second oath of allegiance. We are the friends of those whom you befriend and enemies of those to whom you are an enemy." The Khawārij said: "You and the Syrians have vied with each other in unbelief (kufr) like two horses in a race. The Syrians gave the oath of allegiance to Mu'āwiyah, following their whims, while you gave yours to 'Alī, stipulating that you are friends of those whom he befriends and enemies of those to whom he shows enmity." Ziyād b. al-Naḍr answered them: "By God, 'Alī only ever offered to accept our allegiance,[407] and we only gave him our oath, on (condition that he follows) the Book of God [3351] and the example (sunnah) of His Prophet. Only after you had opposed him did his party come to him and say, 'We are friends of those whom you befriend and enemies of those to whom you show enmity.' That is our position. He is following the truth and right guidance and those who oppose him are lost and misleading."

'Alī sent Ibn 'Abbās to them, telling him, "Do not be in a hurry to reply to them and dispute with them before I came to you." Ibn 'Abbās went to them and they began to debate with him, and he

406. The local gentry of the Sasanid empire, who remained as a distinct group for some time after the Arab conquest (see *EI*², s.v. Dihkān). For reference to a dihqān in Egypt, see p. 145, below.

407. Mā basaṭa 'Alī yadahu . . . illā . . . . Literally, "'Alī only stretched forth his hand . . . ."

was impatient to reject their arguments and said: "What is it that you hold against the two arbitrators (ḥakams)? God said, 'If the two of them desire reconciliation, God will bring about agreement between them.'[408] (If that is how it is with a married couple), how much more so with the community of Muḥammad!" The Khawārij answered: "Regarding whatever God has delegated authority for to mankind and ordered them to look into and make better, that is for them just as He commanded. But what He has decided (ḥakama) and effected Himself is not for His servants to look into. God has decided for the fornicator a hundred lashes, and for the thief the cutting off of the hand, and it is not for His servants to look into that." Ibn 'Abbās said, "But God says, 'Two "just men" from among you shall judge (yaḥkumu) it.'"[409] The Khawārij replied. "Do you place the precept (ḥukm) regarding game (killed while the slayer is in a condition of ritual purity) and what passes between a man and his wife on a par with the blood of the Muslims?"

(The Khawārij said: We said to him, "This verse separates us from you. Do you consider Ibn al-'Āṣ a 'just man,' given that yesterday he was fighting us and shedding our blood? If he is a 'just man,' then we are not, for we are at war with him. You have appointed men as arbitrators (ḥakams) in the affairs of God, but God has effected His precept (ḥukm) regarding Mu'āwiyah and his party—that they should be killed or repent.[410] In the past they always rejected our appeals when we summoned them to the Book of God. Now you [3352] and he have written between you a document and agreed on a truce and discussion,[411] but God has put an end to discussion and truces between the Muslims and the 'people of war' since the revelation of 'Quittance,' except for those who agree to pay the jizyah.")[412]

---

408. Qur'ān 4:35, referring to dispute between a married couple.

409. Qur'ān 5:95, referring to adjudication of the penalty imposed on someone who kills game while in a state of ritual purity (iḥrām).

410. Literally, "return" (yarjiʿū). Semantically the notions of return and repentance are close; see Qur'ān 9:5, where the polytheists (mushrikūn) are ordered to be killed unless they repent (tābū). Presumably that is the ḥukm to which the Khawārij refer; the variant wording is interesting.

411. Al-istifāḍah. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. f-y-ḍ, forms IV and X.

412. "Quittance" (barāʾah) is the title of sūra IX (also called Sūrat al-Tawbah) of the Qur'ān, in which jizyah (in Muslim law a poll tax to be paid by non-Muslims in exchange for toleration and protection; also a sign of inferiority) is mentioned in verse 29. However, the argument of the Khawārij here, with its general reference to the "people of war," does not distinguish (as the Qur'ān appears to) between "polytheists" and "people of the Book."

'Alī sent Ziyād b. al-Naḍr to them and told him, "See which of their leaders has the strongest support." He investigated and told 'Alī that the majority seemed to be gathered around Yazīd b. Qays.[413] So 'Alī left with some of his men, went to the Khawārij, came to the tent of Yazīd b. Qays, and entered. There he performed his ritual ablution, prayed two rak'ahs, and appointed Yazīd as governor over Iṣbahān and Rayy.[414] Then he left and went to (the others) who were disputing with Ibn 'Abbās. 'Alī told him, "Leave off debating with them. Did I not tell you not to, may God have mercy on you?"

Then 'Alī himself entered into debate with them. He praised God and extolled Him, and said, "Oh God, he who is successful (in his arguments) in this place most merits success on the day of Resurrection, but he who speaks in it and makes no sense[415] will be blind in the next world and straying yet more from the path.' "[416] Then he asked them, "Who do you say is your leader?" "Ibn al-Kawwā'," they replied. 'Alī asked, "What led you to rebel against us?" and they told him, "The arbitration process (ḥukūmah) (agreed by you) at the time of Ṣiffīn." 'Alī said,

> I implore you by God! Do you know what I said to you when they raised the maṣāḥif, and you said that we should respond to their call to the Book of God? I said, "I know them better than you. They are men without religion (dīn) or qur'ān.[417] I was with them and knew them as children and as men, and they were the worst of children and the worst of men. Persist in your truth and your righteousness, for they have raised these maṣāḥif only to outwit you and to trick you." You rejected my view and said, "No, rather we will yield to them," and I warned you, "Do not forget what I have said to you and your disobedience to me." When > [3353] you, nevertheless, insisted that I enter into a written agreement, I stipulated to the two arbitrators that they should bring about that which the Qur'ān has brought into being

413. See n. 92, above.

414. Two towns of western Iran, the former in the south, the latter in the north, of the province known as Jibāl (Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map V, and 202–5, 214–17).

415. Aw'atha. See Gloss., s.v.

416. Qur'ān 17:72.

417. See p. 79 and n. 320, above.

and suppress what it has put an end to. For, if they both decide according to the authority (ḥukm) of the Qur'ān, it is not for us to oppose a decision that is made according to what is in the Qur'ān. But, if the two of them reject that, then we will be free of their authority.

The Khawārij said, "Tell us—do you think it is 'just' to give men authority in a matter of blood?" 'Alī replied, "We have not given men authority; we have made the Qur'ān the authority. But this Qur'ān is merely a writing set down between two covers. It does not speak; it is merely men who speak through it." They said to him, "Tell us about the delay—why have you made it in (pursuing) your dispute with them?" He answered, "So that he who is ignorant might know and he who knows might make sure. Perhaps God will reconcile this community during this truce. Go and enter your garrison town, may God have mercy on you." And they did so to the last man.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab al-Azdī transmitted from his father a report similar to that just narrated. But as for the Khawārij, they say: We said (to 'Alī), "You have spoken truly and it was just as you have said,[418] but that was unbelief on our part and we have turned to God in repentance from it. Repent as we have, and we shall give you the oath of allegiance; otherwise we will oppose you." 'Alī took the oath of allegiance from us and said, "Go in (to al-Kūfah) and we will wait for six months until the money (from taxation) is raised and the horses are fattened, and then we will go out against our enemy." We do not accept what they have said for they have lied.

Ma'n b. Yazīd b. al-Akhnas al-Sulamī[419] came to 'Alī about the delay in effecting the arbitration process (al-ḥukūmah), and said, "Mu'āwiyah has kept his promise. You keep yours. Do not let the bedouins of Bakr and Tamīm[420] change your mind." 'Alī ordered the putting into effect of the arbitration. They had separated from Ṣiffīn having stipulated that the two arbitrators should come with 400 men each to Dūmat al-Jandal.[421]

---

418. That is, we did insist that you accept the Syrians' call to stop fighting.

419. See n. 100, above; presumable Ma'n was sent to 'Alī by Mu'āwiyah.

420. That is, the Khawārij.

421. The relationship of the various reports and the chains of authority claimed for them in the previous section seems quite ambiguous. Is the paragraph beginning [3354] Al-Wāqidī claimed that Sa'd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ][422] had been present with those who were with the arbitrators and that his son 'Umar did not leave him until he had accompanied him to Adhruḥ. Then Sa'd repented of that and entered the required state of ritual purity in Jerusalem for an 'Umrah.[423]

The Meeting of the Two Arbitrators at Dūmat al-Jandal

In this year (37/657–58) there was the meeting of the two arbitrators.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd—al-Sha'bī—Ziyād b. al-Naḍr al-Ḥārithī: 'Alī sent 400 men under the command of Shurayḥ b. Hāni' al-Ḥārithī, with 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, who led them in prayer and directed their affairs, together with Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī; and Mu'āwiyah sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ with 400 of the Syrians. They came to Dūmat al-Jandal at Adhruḥ.[424]

Whenever Mu'āwiyah wrote to 'Amr the messenger passed between them not knowing what message he brought or what he took back, and the Syrians did not question him about anything. But, whenever the messenger of 'Alī came, his men went to Ibn 'Abbās and asked, "What did the Commander of the Faithful write to you?" If Ibn 'Abbās concealed the message, they speculated about it and said, "We think he wrote to you such-and-such." He would reply,

---

"The Khawārij said, 'We said to him. . . ,' " which has been put in parentheses, part of Abū Mikhnaf's report from Abū Janāb—'Umārah, or is it an interpolation into it? Similarly, the part beginning "But as for the Khawārij, they say: We said to 'Alī. . ." may be part of Abū Mikhnaf's report from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—his father, or it may be another interpolation. The source of the comment in the last sentence of that paragraph ("We do not accept what they [the Khawārij] say. . .") is not clear (Abū Mikhnaf?) and neither is that for the last paragraph (beginning "Ma'n b. Yazīd. . .came to 'Alī").

422. A leading companion of the Prophet, of the Banū Zuhrah of Quraysh, who might have been a candidate for the caliphate (see *EI*², s.v.). For his unwillingness to become involved in the events of the arbitration, see p. 105, below.

423. The "minor pilgrimage" to Mecca that may be performed at any time of the year (see *EI*¹, s.v.).

424. Ar. tawāfaw bi-Dūmat al-Jandal bi-Adhruḥ. The Leiden editor's note indicates that we should understand something like "they came to Dūmat al-Jandal or rather Adhruḥ," while the note in Add. et emend. suggests that a marginal comment might have found its way into the text. Some sources read min Dūmat al-Jandal bi-Adhruḥ, which Ann., A.H. 38 §18, understands as "at Adhruḥ, coming from Dūmat at-Jandal." It is possible that the various formulas should be seen as attempts to reconcile contradictory traditions about the place of the arbitration meeting. For a modern attempt, see *EI*², s.v. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

"Don't you understand? Don't you see Mu'āwiyah's messenger coming and going without knowing what message he brings and takes back? You hear nothing from them, no word. But every day you are with me indulging in speculation."

There were present at that meeting: 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar; 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr; 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī; 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. [al-Aswad b.] 'Abd Yaghūth al-Zuhrī; Abū Jahm b. Ḥudhayfah al-'Adawī; and al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah al-Thaqafī.[425] 'Umar b. Sa'd [b. Abī Waqqāṣ] went to his father who was at a water hole of the Banū Sulaym in the desert. He said to him, "Oh my father, you have heard about the dispute between the people at Ṣiffīn and that they have appointed Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ as arbitrators. A group of Quraysh have turned up with them. You should go and be present with them for you are a Companion of the Messenger of God and one of the shūrā,[426] and you never entered into anything that this community objected to. Join them, for you have the most right among the people to the caliphate." But Sa'd answered, "I will not do that, for I have heard the Messenger of God saying, 'There will be a fitnah in which the best will be he who is inconspicuous and fears God.' By God, I will never have anything to do with this matter."[427] [3355]

The two arbitrators met and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "Abū Mūsā, do you not know that 'Uthmān was killed unjustly?" He replied, "I testify to that." 'Amr said, "Do you not know that Mu'āwiyah and the family of Mu'āwiyah are his closest kin (awliyā')?" He answered, "Yes, indeed." 'Amr continued:

> God has said, "Whoever is killed unjustly, we have given authority (sulṭān, i.e., to exact revenge) to his next-of-kin (walī); but do not let him (the walī) go to excess in killing (in revenge); he will be helped (manṣūr)."[428] So why do you

425. Apart from al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah (see n. 366, above), all are leading members of Quraysh of Mecca, sons of figures active in the time of the Prophet, and now possible contenders for the caliphate. In Sunnī legal theory, descent from Quraysh was a necessary condition for the caliphate.

426. That is, the group of six appointed to choose a successor as caliph to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb in 23/644.

427. That is, the caliphate; in contexts such as this al-amr ("the matter" or "the affair") usually indicates the issue of the leadership of the community.

428. Qur'ān 17:33.

refrain from supporting Mu'āwiyah, the next-of-kin of 'Uthmān, Abū Mūsā? (The status of) his family in Quraysh is as you know. If you are afraid that the people will say, "Abū Mūsā has given power to Mu'āwiyah,[429] but he is not one of the early Muslims," you have an argument in response to that. You will say, "I have found him to be the next-of-kin of 'Uthmān, the unjustly killed caliph, and the seeker of revenge for his blood, and I have found him adept in government and in managing things. He is the brother of Umm Ḥabībah, the wife of the Prophet, and he was a Companion to the Prophet, one of the group of Companions."

Then 'Amr hinted to Abū Mūsā that he would obtain a position of authority and said, "If Mu'āwiyah rules, he will bestow on you honors such as no caliph has ever granted."

Abū Mūsā answered:

[3356] 'Amr, fear God. Regarding what you have said about the nobility of Mu'āwiyah, it is not on the basis of nobility that those who are right for it are given power. If it were on the basis of nobility, then the rule would belong to the family of Abrahah b. al-Ṣabbāḥ.[430] Rather it is something only for people of religion (dīn) and merit (faḍl). Moreover, if I were to give it to the best of Quraysh in nobility, I would give it to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. And as for what you said about Mu'āwiyah as the one responsible for taking vengeance for the blood of 'Uthmān, and that therefore I should accord the rule to him, I will not give Mu'āwiyah power in it and abandon (the rights of) the first muhājirūn.[431] And concerning your hinting at a position of authority for me, by God, even if all of Mu'āwiyah's authority devolved on me, 429. Following the suggestion of Ann., A.H. 38 §18, to read wallā for waliya.

430. Said to be named after his maternal grandfather, the famous Abyssinian ruler of the Yemen in the sixth century C.E., he is referred to in Dīnawarī, 199, as "one of the sons of the kings of the Yemen (al-tabābi'ah)" (see Ṭabarī, I, 2586; II, 211; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

431. Here perhaps meaning the surviving earliest followers of the Prophet who had moved with him from Mecca to Medina (such as Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ), and their descendants (such as 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr).

> I would not give him power, and I am not to be bribed in [a matter concerning] the authority (ḥukm) of God. But if you wish we will revive the name of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.[432]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—['Umārah b. Rabī'ah or al-Ḥurr b. al-Ṣayyaḥ]: Abū Mūsā said, "Indeed, by God, if I could I would revive the name of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb." 'Amr said to him, "If you want to give the oath of allegiance to the son of 'Umar, what prevents you from giving it to my son[433]—for you know his merit and righteousness?" He answered, "Your son is a man of righteousness (ṣidq), but you have submerged him in this fitnah."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Nāfi', the mawlā of Ibn 'Umar: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "Only a man with a tooth, who eats and gives food, is suitable for this office."[434] Ibn 'Umar was oblivious and 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr said to him, "Take note and pay attention."[435] 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar replied, "No, by God, I will not give anything as a bribe to obtain it (i.e., the rule)." And he said, "Oh Ibn al-'Āṣ, the Arabs have entrusted their affair to you after clashing with swords and fighting one another with spears. [3357]
Do not cast them back into the fitnah."[436]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ al-'Absī: I was with Shurayḥ b. Hāni' on the campaign in Sijistān,[437] and he told me that 'Alī had entrusted him with a message to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. 'Alī had told Shurayḥ that when he met 'Amr he was to tell him that 'Alī had sent him the following message:

> The most excellent in God's sight is he who prefers acting rightfully, even if it diminishes him and causes him

---

432. That is, by appointing 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar.

433. That is, 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ (see n. 10, above).

434. Inna hādha al-amra lā yuṣliḥuhu illā rajulun lahu ḍirsun ya'kulu wa-yuṭ'imu. The context seems to indicate that the phrase refers to a man willing to take and give "sweeteners." See Dīnawarī, 200: "a man with two teeth, with one of which he eats and with the other gives food (succors?)."

435. Or, said to him, "Take note!" and he paid attention.

436. In the variant form of this report in WṢ, 542, the remark about the man with the tooth is made by 'Amr to Abū Mūsā, who has suggested that the rule should be offered to Ibn 'Umar. It is Abū Mūsā who is oblivious. Then Ibn al-Zubayr advises Ibn 'Umar to offer 'Amr a bribe, but he refuses and, instead, addresses the final sentence to 'Amr.

437. Shurayḥ (n. 26, above) is said to have been killed in Sijistān with the army of 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah in the time of al-Ḥajjāj.

grief, over vain deeds, even if he yearns for them and they augment him. 'Amr, by God you know where the right lies, so why do you pretend not to know? If you are given the least thing that you covet, with it you will be an enemy to God and His friends, and (consequently) it will be as if you have lost what you have been given, woe unto you! "Do not be an adversary on behalf of the traitors"[438] nor a partisan of the evildoers.[439] Indeed, I know of a day when you will be remorseful—that is the day of your death, (when) you will earnestly desire that you had not displayed enmity to a Muslim or accepted a bribe for a judgment (ḥukm).

Shurayḥ said: I told 'Amr that, and his face became suffused with anger. He said, "When have I ever accepted the advice of 'Alī, done what he said, or taken account of his views?" I answered him, "Why do you not, Ibn al-Nābighah, accept the advice of your master, the one who, after their Prophet, is the lord of the Muslims? Those who were your betters, Abū Bakr and 'Umar, asked for his advice and acted in accordance with his views." He said, "People like me do not argue with the likes of you." I said, "On account of which of your two parents do you have a disdain for me—is it because of your low-class (washīẓ) father or your 'distinguished' (nābighah) [3358] mother?"[440] 'Amr got up and left and I did too.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī: When 'Amr and Abū Mūsā met together at Dūmat al-Jandal, 'Amr at first gave Abū Mūsā precedence in speaking, saying himself, "You are the companion of the Messenger of God and you are my senior. Speak and I will speak." 'Amr had accustomed Abū Mūsā to think that he would give him precedence in everything, wishing thus to make him go first so he would take the initiative in deposing 'Alī.

Abū Mūsā considered the matter in hand and what they had come together for, and 'Amr wanted him to declare in favor of

438. Qur'ān 4:105. The verse talks of God's sending down the Book "so that you may judge (ḥ-k-m) between the people." Ann., A.H. 38 §21, translates fa-lā takun lil-khā'inīna khaṣīman as "non entrare in disputa coi traditori."

439. See Qur'ān 28:17, 28:86.

440. Shurayḥ is being insultingly ironic; 'Amr's father, al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il b. Hishām, was a prominent man of the Banū Sahm of Quraysh, while his mother Nābighah (= "distinguished") was a slave.

Mu'āwiyah, but he refused. 'Amr then wanted him to declare in favor of his son, but again he refused. Abū Mūsā tried to get 'Amr to declare in favor of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, but he refused. 'Amr then said to Abū Mūsā, "Tell me what you think." He answered, "I think we should depose these two men and make the matter consultative between the Muslims, who will choose for themselves whomever they like." 'Amr said to him, "I agree." They went toward the people who were gathered together. 'Amr said, "Abū Mūsā, tell them that we have a meeting of minds and an agreement." Abū Mūsā spoke and said, "I and 'Amr have agreed on something by which we hope God will bring about peace to this community." 'Amr said, "You have spoken the truth and kept your word, Abū Mūsā, go ahead and speak."

Abū Mūsā went forward to speak, but Ibn 'Abbās said to him: "Woe to you, by God, I suspect that he has tricked you. If you have both agreed on something, let him go first and speak about that thing before you, and then you speak after him. 'Amr is a treacherous man and I am not sure that he has given you satisfaction when it was just the two of you, but, when you stand among the people he will oppose you." But Abū Mūsā was heedless and said, "We have agreed."

Abū Mūsā went forward, praised God and extolled Him, and then said, "People, we have considered the affairs of this community and [3359]
we do not think that there is anything that will be more beneficial for it or more conducive to resolving its difficulties than that upon which I and 'Amr have agreed. That is, that we should depose 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah and that this community should confront the issue and appoint over themselves from among themselves whomever it is that they want. I have accepted the deposition of 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah, and now you confront the issue and give power over you to whomever you think is fitting for this matter."

He then stood aside and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ took his place. He praised God and extolled Him, then said, "This fellow has spoken as you have heard and declared the deposition of the one whom he represents. Similarly, I declare that he is deposed and I confirm my support for my candidate Mu'āwiyah. He is the next-of-kin of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and the one who seeks vengeance for his blood. Of all the people, he has most right to take his place."

Abū Mūsā said, "What are you doing, may God foil you? You have acted treacherously and unrighteously. You are like the dog which, if you attack it, it lolls out its tongue, or, if you leave it alone, it still lolls out its tongue!'"[441] 'Amr responded, "And you 'are like the monkey which carries writings!'"[442] Shurayḥ b. Hāni' attacked 'Amr, lashing at his head with a whip, and a son of 'Amr assailed Shurayḥ, striking him with a whip. Everyone got up and separated the two of them, and subsequently Shurayḥ used to say, "There is nothing I regret more than my striking at 'Amr with a whip. If only I had struck at him with a sword and let fate bring him what it would!" The Syrians sought Abū Mūsā, but he mounted his camel and retired to Mecca.

Ibn 'Abbās said, "God damn the decision (ra'y) of Abū Mūsā! I warned him and told him to be circumspect, but he took no heed." And Abū Mūsā used to say, "Ibn 'Abbās warned me of the treachery of the evildoer (fāsiq), but I trusted him and did not imagine that he would put anything above sincere advice to this community."

Then 'Amr and the Syrians went back to Mu'āwiyah and greeted him as caliph, while Ibn 'Abbās and Shurayḥ b. Hāni' went to 'Alī. Whenever he was making the early morning prayers, 'Alī would stand in supplication[443] and say, "Oh God, put a curse on Mu'āwiyah, 'Amr, Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī, Ḥabīb [b. Maslamah], 'Abd al-[3360] Raḥmān b. Khālid, al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays, and al-Walīd [b. 'Uqbah]." Mu'āwiyah heard about that, and when he himself made supplication, he cursed 'Alī, Ibn 'Abbās, al-Ashtar, al-Ḥasan, and al-Ḥusayn.

Al-Wāqidī claims that the meeting of the two arbitrators was in the month of Sha'bān in the year 38 of the Hijrah (January 659).

The Actions of the Khawārij at the Time of 'Alī's Sending Abū Mūsā to the Arbitration, and the Battle at the Canal[444]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mughaffal[445]—'Awn b. Abī Juḥayfah: When 'Alī was about to send Abū Mūsā to the arbitration

441. Qur'ān 7:177.

442. Qur'ān 62:5.

443. Yaqnutu; the qunūt are supplications made in standing position at the end of the ṣalāt.

444. Yawm al-nahr; this refers to the canal of Nahrawān (see later). On the following, see Wellhausen, Religio-Political Factions, 27–29.

445. The name is doubtful.

(ḥukūmah) two men (from the Khawārij), Zur'ah b. al-Burj al-Ṭā'ī and Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr al-Sa'dī,[446] came to him. They went in to where he was and said to him, "Authority (ḥukm) belongs to God alone."[447] 'Alī responded, "Authority belongs to God alone."

Ḥurqūṣ said to him, "Repent of your sin (khaṭī'ah), retract your decision, and come out with us against our enemies whom we will fight until we meet our Lord." 'Alī answered them, "That is what I wanted you to do, but you disobeyed me and now we have a written agreement with them and stipulated conditions, and we have made them promises and given them our word regarding it. God has said, [3361] 'Observe God's covenant when you have entered into it and do not break your oaths after you have pledged them, for now you have made God your guarantor. God knows what you do.' "[448] Ḥurqūṣ said to him, "That is a sin (dhanb) from which you must repent," but 'Alī answered, "It is no sin but only a failure of judgment (ra'y) and weakness of action. I enjoined you concerning it and told you not to do it."

Zur'ah b. al-Burj said to him, "'Alī, unless you stop giving men authority over the Book of God, I will fight against you, seeking thereby the face of God and His favor." 'Alī answered, "May woe befall you! How abject is your state! I seem to see you slain with the wind blowing on you."[449] Zur'ah said, "That is what I would like." 'Alī said, "If you followed the truth there would be consolation for (the loss of) this world in dying while supporting the truth, but Satan has seduced you. Fear God. There is no good for you in this world over which you fight."

The two of them left him, proclaiming the slogan "Authority belongs to God alone" (yuḥakkimān).

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Ḥurrah al-Ḥanafī: One day 'Alī went out to deliver an address. In the course of it those who objected to his giving men authority in God's affairs proclaimed their slogan, "Authority belongs to God alone"[450] from

446. This seems to be the only appearence of Zur'ah; the more prominent Ḥurqūṣ belonged to the Banū Sa'd b. Zayd Manāt of Tamīm.

447. See Qur'ān 6:57; 12:40, 67. This is the famous slogan (lā ḥukma illā lillāh) of the Khawārij, known as the taḥkīm. See Hawting, "The Significance of the Slogan."

448. Qur'ān 16:91.

449. That is, lying dead and unburied after battle.

450. Ḥakkamat al-muḥakkimah.

all sides of the mosque. 'Alī responded, "God is most great! Their words are are true, but they use them to mean something false! If they are silent, we will embrace them (in our community); if they insist on arguing, we will argue against them; but if they rebel against us, we will fight them." Yazīd b. 'Āṣim al-Muḥāribī[451] leaped up and said, "Praise be to God! Our Lord is not to be set aside nor dispensed with. Oh God, I take refuge with you from perpetrating shameful behavior in our religion. That would be falling short in the affairs of God and a baseness that subjects those who do it to [3362] God's wrath. 'Alī, do you threaten us with killing? By God, I hope that we will strike you with the swords after a little while, with their edges, not their flats. Then you will know to which of us hell's burning is most due."[452] Then he and three of his brothers (he was the fourth) "went out" with the Khawārij and were killed with them at the canal (al-nahr)—one of them was killed later at al-Nukhaylah.[453]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ajlaḥ b. 'Abdallāh—Salamah b. Kuhayl—Kathīr b. Bahz al-Ḥaḍramī: 'Alī stood among the men to deliver an address one day and someone said from the side of the mosque, "Authority belongs to God alone." Another arose and proclaimed similarly, and then a number, one after the other, proclaimed the slogan (taḥkīm). 'Alī said, "God is most great! Their words are true but something false is meant by them. Three things do we grant you. So long as you remain with us, we will not deny to you the mosques of God that you may mention His name in them; we will not deny to you the spoils (fay') so long as your hands are joined with ours; and we will not fight against you unless you make the first move against us." Then he returned to the place where he had been in his address.

---

451. Apparently Ṭabarī's only reference to this man who was presumably of the Banū Muḥārib b. Khaṣafah/Qays.

452. See Qur'ān 19:70.

453. There is much confusion in the sources about the battle(s) of the Khawārij at al-Nukhaylah. Al-Mubarrad, 576 ff., has two: one in which they fought against 'Alī and another in which they fought against Mu'āwiyah after he had taken possession of Iraq following the death of 'Alī. The latter matches the battle reported by Ṭabarī, II, 10. Wellhausen, Religio-Political Factions, 35, n. 7, seems to argue that there was only one such battle—that against Mu'āwiyah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—anonymous—al-Qāsim b. al-Walīd: Ḥakīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd al-Bakkā'ī[454] shared the views of the Khawārij. One day he came to 'Alī while he was delivering an address and said, "It has been revealed to you and to those who were before you that if you ascribe partners to God your deeds will be of no avail and you will be one of those who are lost."[455] 'Alī responded, "Bear patiently, for the promise of God is truth, and do not let those who have no certainty despise you."[456]

According to Abū Kurayb[457]—Ibn Idrīs—Ismā'īl b. Samī' al-Ḥanafī—Abū Razīn: When the appointment of the arbitrators had been made (lammā waqa'a al-taḥkīm)[458] and 'Alī returned from Ṣiffīn, (the Khawārij) came back in a state of separation from him. When they reached the canal[459] they stopped there, while 'Alī entered al-Kūfah with the men. The Khawārij camped at Ḥarūrā'[460] and 'Alī sent [3363] 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās to them. But he came back without achieving anything, so 'Alī himself went to them and debated with them until both sides were satisfied and the Khawārij entered al-Kūfah. Then someone came to 'Alī and said, "It is being said that you gave in to their demand that you renege on your unbelief (kufr)." So 'Alī delivered an address during the midday prayer. He referred to the position of the Khawārij and criticized it, and they leaped up on all sides of the mosque proclaiming, "Authority belongs to God alone." One of them stood facing him with his fingers in his ears and said, "It has been revealed to you and to those who were before you that if you ascribe partners to God your deeds shall be of no avail and you will be one of those who are lost."[461] 'Alī replied, "Bear 454. Again, this is the only appearance in Ṭabarī's work of this man: the Banū al-Bakkā' were part of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah/Qays; for his son, see later, p. 117 and n. 485, below.

455. Qur'ān 39:65.

456. Qur'ān 30:60.

457. For Abū Kurayb Muḥammad b. al-'Alā', d. 247/861, see GAS, I, index, s.v., with reference to Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb.

458. Possibly, "when the protest against the appointment of arbitrators had been made."

459. This canal is not Nahrawān, which is not en route from Ṣiffīn to al-Kūfah; it must refer to one of the canals in the vicinity of al-Kūfah.

460. Ḥarūrā' (see n. 365, above) seems to have stood by a water course in the early Islamic period although later references speak of it as being in the desert (see *EI*², s.v.).

461. Qur'ān 39:65.

patiently, for the promise of God is truth, and do not let those who have no certainty despise you."[462]

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Idrīs—Layth b. Abī Sulaym—his companions: 'Alī began to wring his hands (the narrator said: with his hands like that) while on the dais (minbar). He said, "God's decision (ḥukm) is looked for among you twice.[463] We grant you three things. We will not prevent your prayer in this mosque; we will not prevent your partaking of these spoils so long as your hands are joined with ours; and we will not fight you unless you fight against us."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Ḥurrah: When 'Alī had sent Abū Mūsā to effect the arbitration, some of the Khawārij met together and gathered in the dwelling of 'Abdallāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī.[464] He praised God and extolled Him, and then said, "By God, it is not fitting that a people that believes in God the Merciful and turns in repentance to the authority (ḥukm) of the Qur'ān should prefer this world to the commanding of good, the forbidding of evil, and the proclaiming of the truth. Pleasure [3364] in this world, confidence in it, and love for it, is an occasion of distress and destruction. If someone is wearied and injured, then he who is wearied and injured in this world,[465] has his reward on the day of Resurrection in God's good favor and perpetual abode in His gardens.[466] So let us go out, brethren of ours, from this settlement whose poeple are wicked[467] to one of the dictricts of the mountains[468] or to one of those towns,[469] rejecting these innovations (bida') that lead astray."

---

462. Qur'ān 30:60.

463. Presumably this refers to the change of mind of the Khawārij—first they had insisted on stopping the fighting against Mu'āwiyah, and now they insisted on starting it again.

464. See *EI*², s.v., for this pietist of the Banū Rāsib of Azd.

465. Wa-in munna wa-ḍurra fa-innahu man yumannu wa-yuḍarru.... The reading of the text is unsure. It is unpointed and apparently meaningless (see editorial note c in Leiden text). The man has been conjecturally supplied by the editor. Ibn al-Athīr, III, 281, merely paraphrases the passage.

466. From this point as far as "And he wrote to the Khawārij at the canal" p. 119, below, there is a gap in the manuscripts, supplied by reference to Ibn al-Athīr, III, 281, 1.3–283, bottom. See the editorial note d in the Leiden text.

467. See Qur'ān 4:75.

468. Or, "a district in (the region of) al-Jibāl"?

469. Perhaps, "to one of the settlements that formed part of al-Madā'in (Ctesiphon)."

Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr said to him, "The delights of this world are few and separation from it is imminent. Do not let its fineries and delights tempt you to stay in it or turn you from seeking what is true and rejecting evil. 'God is with those who fear, and they are those who do good.'"[470] Ḥamzah b. Sinān al-Asadī[471] said: "Oh people, you are right. Grant authority over your affairs to a man [3365] from among you, for you cannot do without a support and a prop and a banner around which you can gather and to which you can return." They offered the position to Zayd b. Ḥusayn al-Ṭā'ī, but he refused, and to Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr, who also refused. Ḥamzah b. Sinān and Shurayḥ b. Awfā al-'Absī[472] both refused, too. When they offered it to 'Abdallāh b. Wahb, he said, "Give it to us! By God, I do not accept it out of a desire for this world and I will not abandon it out of fear of death." They gave him the oath of allegiance when ten days had passed of Shawwāl, and he was called Dhū al-Thafināt.[473]

Then they gathered in the dwelling of Shurayḥ b. Awfā al-'Absī, and Ibn Wahb said, "Let us go to a land where we shall gather to effect the authority (ḥukm) of God, for you are the people of the truth." Shurayḥ said, "Let us leave for al-Madā'in. There we shall dismount, seize its gates, expel its inhabitants, and send for our brethren among the people of al-Baṣrah that they might come to us." Zayd b. Ḥusayn said, "If you depart together, you will be followed, but go out one by one in secret. As for al-Madā'in, there are those there who will resist you; do not stop there but go on until you reach Jisr al-Nahrawān[474] and there write to your brethren among the people of al-Baṣrah." They said, "That is right!" and 'Abdallāh b. Wahb wrote to those of them who were in al-Baṣrah, telling them what they had agreed on and urging them to join them. The letter was conveyed to them and they answered it, saying that they would join him.

---

470. Qur'ān 16:128.

471. Of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah of Khindif.

472. Sometimes referred to as Shurayḥ b. Abī Awfā, he was of the Banū 'Abs of Ghaṭafān/Qays (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Šuraiḥ).

473. That is, "he with the scars" on his forehead or knees as a result of his constant prostration in prayer (cf. Wellhausen, Religio-Political Factions, 27; and *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Wahb).

474. This was the town (Nahrawān Bridge) on the canal of Nahrawān, northeast of al-Madā'in.

When they had decided to depart, they passed the night—that [3366] was the night before Friday—and the day of Friday worshiping God. On Saturday they set out. Shurayḥ b. Awfā al-'Absī left, reciting God's words, "And he (Moses) departed from it in fear, looking about him. He said, 'Oh my Lord, deliver me from the evil people,' and when he was journeying toward Midian, he said 'Perhaps my Lord will guide me on an even path.' "[475]

Ṭarafah b. 'Adī b. Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī[476] went out with them. His father 'Adī went after him but could not catch up with him; when he got as far as al-Madā'in he turned back. When he had reached Sābāṭ,[477] however, 'Abdallāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī came upon him with about twenty horsemen. 'Abdallāh wanted to kill him, but 'Amr b. Mālik al-Nabhānī and Bishr b. Zayd al-Bawlānī[478] prevented him. 'Adī then sent to Sa'd b. Mas'ūd,[479] 'Alī's prefect over al-Madā'in, warning him about what the Khawārij were doing, and Sa'd was thus on his guard. He secured the gates of al-Madā'in and went out with a body of horsemen, leaving behind his nephew, al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd, in command of the town. Sa'd then went in pursuit of the Khawārij.

'Abdallāh b. Wahb was informed of this and he took care (to avoid) Sa'd's route, going by way of Baghdādh.[480] At al-Karkh[481] Sa'd b. Mas'ūd caught up with them with 500 horsemen at evening time. 'Abdallāh turned to attack Sa'd's force with thirty mounted men. They fought for a while, but most refrained from joining in. Sa'd's men said to him, "Why are you fighting against these men when you have received no order concerning them? Let them go on their way and write to the Commander of the Faithful. If he tells you to follow them, do so, but if someone other than you takes care of them for you that will be all the better for you." Sa'd rejected [3367] that but when night had fallen, 'Abdallāh b. Wahb went and crossed

475. Qur'ān 28:21–23.

476. For the father, 'Adī, see p. 27, above.

477. A suburb of al-Madā'in on the Tigris (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 34–35).

478. Nabhān and Bawlān are both clans of Ṭayyi', 'Adī's tribe.

479. For Sa'd and his nephew, see n. 29, above.

480. This was the Persian name of the village on the site of which the town of Madīnat al-Salām (Baghdād) was later to be built.

481. Al-Karkh, southwest of Baghdādh toward al-Kūfah, was later incorporated as a suburb of Baghdād.

the Tigris to the district of Jūkhā,[482] where he headed for al-Nahrawān[483] and joined up with his companions. They had despaired of him and had said, "If he has perished we will put Zayd b. Ḥusayn or Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr in charge of our affairs."

A group of Kūfans set out wishing to join the Khawārij, but their own families forced them to return under duress. Among them were al-Qa'qā' b. Qays al-Ṭā'ī, the paternal uncle of al-Ṭirimmāḥ b. Ḥakīm,[484] and 'Abdallāh b. Ḥakīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Bakkā'ī.[485] 'Alī had heard that Sālim b. Rabī'ah al-'Absī[486] wanted to go out to join them, so he summoned him and forbade him, and he desisted.

When the Khawārij had left al-Kūfah, the companions and supporters (shī'ah) of 'Alī came to him and gave him the oath of allegiance. They said, "We are the friends of those whom you befriend and enemies of those to whom you show enmity." (In accepting their oaths) 'Alī undertook (to adhere to) the example (sunnah) of the Messenger of God. Rabī'ah b. Abī Shaddād al-Khath'amī[487] came to him (he had been present with 'Alī at the battles of the Camel and Ṣiffīn and had borne the banner of Khath'am), and 'Alī said to him, "Give me the oath of allegiance on (condition that I observe) the Book of God and the example of His Messenger." Rabī'ah said, "(And that you observe) the example of Abū Bakr and 'Umar!" 'Alī said to him, "Woe to you! If Abū Bakr and 'Umar had not acted according to the Book of God and the example of His Messenger they would not have had any legitimacy (lam yakūnā 'alā shay' min al-ḥaqq)." So Rabī'ah gave him the oath of allegiance, and 'Alī looked at him and said, "By God, it is as if I see you now having departed with these Khawārij and been killed. It is as if I see you, the horses having trampled on you with their

482. The district east of the Tigris, usually regarded as south of al-Mada'in although here it presumably refers to the lands north of that town also (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 42).

483. Probably indicating the aforementioned Jisr Nahrawān (see n. 474, above).

484. Al-Ṭirimmah is a well known Khārijī poet of the Banū Ṭayyi' of the Umayyad period (see EI[1], s.v.).

485. Son of the aforementioned Ḥakīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Bakkā'ī (p. 113 and n. 454, above).

486. For his participation in the movement of the Khawārij after 'Alī's death, see Ṭabarī, II, 17f.

487. This seems to be his only appearance in Ṭabarī's work.

hoofs." And he was killed on the day of the Canal with the Khawārij of al-Baṣrah.

The Khawārij of al-Baṣrah gathered together in a party of 500 and appointed Mis'ar b. Fadakī al-Tamīmī over them. When Ibn 'Abbās learned of that, he sent Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī[488] to follow them. He caught up with them at the great bridge, and they confronted one another until nightfall separated them, and Mis'ar and his men [3368] set off again. He began attacking people indiscriminately,[489] with al-Ashras b. 'Awf al-Shaybānī[490] over his advance guard, and he continued until he met up with 'Abdallāh b. Wahb at the canal.

When the Khawārij had "gone out," Abū Mūsā had fled to Mecca, and 'Alī had sent Ibn 'Abbās back to al-Baṣrah, 'Alī gave an address in al-Kūfah and said:

> Praise be to God, even though destiny brings oppressive circumstances and momentous events. I bear witness that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad is His Messenger. Now, disobedience bequeaths distress and leads to remorse. I have given you my orders regarding these two men and this arbitration, and I have freely shared my views with you even though my authority is little. But you have insisted upon what you wanted. I and you are as the brother of Hawāzin[491] says:
>
> I have given them my command at the curving of the sand hill, > but they only saw the right path on the morning of the next day.
>
> Those two men whom you have sent out as arbitrators have cast the authority (ḥukm) of the Qur'ān behind their

488. On this poet and alleged founder of the science of Arabic grammar, see *EI*², s.v.; and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ẓalīm b. 'Amr. The vocalization Du'alī seems to be more correct than the Leiden edition's Du'ilī, although his tribe was the Banū Du'il b. Bakr of Kinānah.

489. Ya'tariḍu al-nās. This could be a technical term referring to the Khārijite practice of isti'rāḍ (q.v. in *EI*²), the subjection of individuals to an inquisition and their execution if they failed to answer correctly (for examples, see pp. 123–25, 176, below). But it may be that the term is used here in a less technical sense.

490. This appears to be Ṭabarī's only reference to this man of Bakr b. Wā'il.

491. That is, Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah (see n. 372, above); for the verses see al-Iṣfahānī, Kitāb al-aghānī, IX, 5, lines 15–20.

backs. They have revived what the Qur'ān has suppressed, and each of them has followed his own inclinations without any guidance from God. They have passed judgment (ḥakamā) without any clear proof or accepted precedent (sunnah mādiyah). They have differed in their judgment (ḥukm), and neither of them has been rightly guided. God and His Messenger and the righteous of the Believers are quit of those two! Prepare and get ready to set out for Syria. Be in your army camp, God willing, on Monday morning. Then he stepped down.

And he wrote to the Khawārij at the canal:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from the servant of God, 'Alī, Commander of the Faithful, to Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn and 'Abdallāh b. Wahb and those who are with them: Now these two men whose authority [3369] (ḥukm) we accepted have opposed the Book of God and followed their own inclinations without any guidance from God. They have not acted according to the precedent (sunnah) nor effected a judgment (ḥukm) according to the Qur'ān. God and His Messenger and the Believers are quit of the two of them. When you receive this letter of mine, come, for we are setting out against our enemy and your enemy and we are still concerned with the matter that occupied us originally. Farewell!

The Khawārij wrote to 'Alī: "You were never zealous on account of your Lord, only on account of yourself. If you recognize your own unbelief and turn to repentance, we will consider that which divides us from you. Otherwise we have separated from you 'without distinction, for God does not like those who are faithless.' "[492] When 'Alī read their letter, he despaired of ever convincing them and decided that he should leave them alone and go with the men against the Syrians in order to meet and fight them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mu'allā b. Kulayb al-Hamdānī—Jabr b. Nawf Abū al-Waddāk al-Hamdānī: When 'Alī, having stopped at al-Nukhaylah, had given up hope of winning back the Khawārij, he arose, praised God and extolled Him, and then said, > Whoever abandons the jihād that is waged for God and falls short in His affairs is on the brink of his own destruction, unless God extends a blessing to him.[493] Fear God and fight against those who oppose Him[494] and who try to extinguish His light.[495] Fight against those who are in error and go astray, the unrighteous and the evildoers, those who are not "readers" of the Qur'ān (qurrā' al-Qur'ān), experts in religion (fuqahā' fī al-dīn), or learned in exegesis ('ulamā' fī al-ta'wīl), those who have no right to be concerned with this matter by reason of any precedence in accepting Islam.

492. Qur'ān 8:58.

> [3370] By God, if they were to have charge over you, they would treat you like Chosroes and Heraclius.[496] Make ready and prepare to set out against your enemies among the people of the west.[497] We have sent to our brethren of al-Baṣrah, asking that they come to you. When they do and you have united your forces, we will depart, God willing, and there is no power or strength but with Him.

'Alī sent 'Utbah b. al-Akhnas b. Qays of the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr[498] with a letter to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās. It read, "We have gone out to our army camp at al-Nukhaylah and agreed to set out against our enemies among the people of the west. Set out with your men, and, when my messenger comes to you, wait until you receive further orders. Salutations."

When the letter reached Ibn 'Abbās, he read it aloud to the men and commanded them to set out with al-Aḥnaf b. Qays. Of them, 1,500 left with him, but 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās considered that too

493. See Qur'ān 68:49.

494. See Qur'ān 58:22.

495. See Qur'ān 9:32, 61:8.

496. The names (of Sasanid and Byzantine rulers) symbolized worldly kingship and tyranny in contrast to the righteous caliph.

497. The characterization of the Syrians as westerners and their opponents (first 'Alī and later the Zubayrids) as easterners is common in non-Muslim sources, rarer in Muslim ones.

498. Of Hawāzin/Qays, he was subsequently (51/671) implicated in the revolt of Ḥujr b. 'Adī (n. 71, above) but released by Mu'āwiyah (see Ṭabarī, II, 136ff.).

few and he therefore arose among the people, praised God and extolled Him, and then said,

> Men of Baṣrah, there has come to me the order of the Commander of the Faithful telling me to send you out. I have ordered you to go out to join him with al-Aḥnaf b. Qays but only 1,500 of you have done so and yet you number 60,000, without taking account of your sons, slaves, and clients (mawālī). Now go out with Jāriyah b. Qudāmah al-Sa'dī[499] and do not let any man give me grounds for taking action against him, for I shall punish anyone who absents himself from his post[500] in disobedience to his imam. I have ordered Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī to muster you, and anyone who gives grounds for action to be taken against him has only himself to blame.

Jāriyah went out and established a camp and Abū al-Aswad went there and mustered the men. Seventeen hundred men joined Jāriyah. [3371] He then proceeded until 'Alī met him at al-Nukhaylah, where he had remained until those two armies from al-Baṣrah, 3,200 men, should come to him. He assembled the leaders of the Kūfans, the leaders of the "sevenths,"[501] the leaders of the tribes (qabā'il), and the prominent men. He praised God and extolled Him and then said, "Men of al-Kūfah, you are my brethren, my supporters (anṣār), my helpers in establishing what is right, and my companions in making jihād against my enemies, the profaners of God's law (al-muḥillīn). With you I will smite the backslider (mudbir) and hope for perfect obedience from him who goes ahead (muqbil). I have sent to the Baṣrans and asked them to come to join you, but only 3,200 of them have come to me. Help me with a counsel that is clear and devoid of all deception for you [. . .][502] our going out to Ṣiffīn. Rather, gather all together. I ask that the head of each tribe (qawm) write down for me what fighting men he has in his kinship

499. Of Sa'd b. Zayd Manāt/Tamīm; for his mission against Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī in al-Baṣrah, see pp. 169–70, below (see *EI*², s.v. Djāriya b. Ḳudāma; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ǧāriya).

500. Maktab (see Gloss., s.v.).

501. For the seven groupings into which the tribes in al-Kūfah were organized, see Djaït, "Les Yamanites," 154.

502. There is a lacuna in the text.

group ('ashīrah), together with their sons who have reached fighting age, and the slaves and clients of his kinship group, and then present that to us."

Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī stood and said, "Commander of the Faithful, we hear and obey, we offer love and counsel. I shall be the first to bring what you ask for and seek." Ma'qil b. Qays al-Riyāḥī stood and spoke similarly, and 'Adī b. Ḥātim, Ziyād b. Khaṣafah, Ḥujr b. 'Adī, and the notables of the men and the tribes did the same. Then the chiefs wrote down the names of those under them and presented them to 'Alī, and they ordered their sons, their slaves, and their clients to go out with them and that none of them should lag behind. They presented to 'Alī 40,000 fighting men, plus 17,000
[3372] of their sons who had reached the right age, and 8,000 clients and slaves. They said, "Commander of the Faithful, as for those fighting men with us and their sons who have reached puberty and can fight, we have put before you those who are strong and resolute and we have ordered them to depart with us. But there are also nonfighting men (ḍu'afā') among them, and they are involved in crafts and doing things that will be of benefit for us."

There were 57,000 Arabs from al-Kūfah and 8,000 of their clients and slaves (mamālīk): altogether 65,000 from al-Kūfah. In addition there were 3,200 Baṣrans, so that the number of those with 'Alī came to 68,200.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī: 'Alī wrote to Sa'd b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī, his prefect over al-Mada'in, as follows. "I have sent Ziyād b. Khaṣafah to you. Dispatch with him those of the fighting men of al-Kūfah whom you have with you, and make haste, God willing, and there is no power except with Him."

'Alī heard that the men were saying among themselves, "If only he would go with us against these Ḥarūriyyah, and we dealt with them first and then, having finished with them, we turned our attention to the profaners of God's law (al-muḥillīn)."[503] So 'Alī addressed them, and after praising God and extolling Him, said, "I have heard what you have been saying: 'If only the Commander of the Faithful would go with us against this group of Khārijites that has rebelled against him, and we dealt with them first and then, having finished with them, we turned to the profaners of God's law.'

503. That is, the Syrians.

But others are more important for us than these Khārijites. Stop talking about them and march instead against a people who are fighting you so that they may be tyrants and kings and take the servants of God as chattel." And the men shouted from every side, "Commander of the Faithful, lead us wherever you wish!"

Ṣayfī b. Fasīl al-Shaybānī[504] stood to speak and said, "Commander [3373] of the Faithful, we are your party (ḥizb) and your supporters. We oppose those whom you oppose and join together with those who are obedient to you. Lead us against your enemies whoever they are, wherever they are. God willing, you will not lack followers great in number and firm in intention." Muḥriz b. Shihāb al-Tamīmī[505] of the Banū Sa'd also stood and said, "Commander of the Faithful, your party (shī'ah) is as one man in its agreement to unite together to support you and in its eagerness for jihād against your enemies. Rejoice at the help we give and lead us against whichever of the two bands you wish. We are your party that hopes for a fitting recompense in obeying you and making jihād against those who oppose you. And we fear the dire consequences that would follow from betraying and opposing you."

According to Ya'qūb[506]—Ismā'īl [b. 'Ulayyah]—Ayyūb [b. Abī Tamīmah al-Sakhtiyānī]—Ḥumayd b. Hilāl—a man of the Banū 'Abd al-Qays[507] who was one of the Khawārij but then separated from them: (The Khawārij) entered a village and 'Abdallāh, the son of Khabbāb the Companion of the Prophet,[508] came out in terror dragging his ridā'.[509] They asked him, "Why are you frightened?" and he answered, "By God, you have made me terrified." They asked, "Are you 'Abdallāh the son of Khabbāb the Companion of the Prophet?" and he answered, "Yes." They asked, "Did you hear from your father a report (ḥadīth) that he narrated from the Prophet, according to which the Prophet said, '(There will be) a fitnah in 504. Later implicated with Ḥujr b. 'Adī and killed.

505. Also implicated with Ḥujr and killed (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

506. The Cairo edition identifies him as Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Dawraqī, d. 252/866 (see GAS, I, 38, 285).

507. For 'Abd al-Qays/Rabī'ah, see *EI*², s.v.

508. Son of the Companion of the Prophet who is referred to previously (p. 96 and n. 383, above).

509. An outer garment that is wrapped around the body (see Dozy, Dictionnaire . . . Vêtements, s.v.).

which the sitting man is better than the standing, the standing better than the walking, and the walking than the running. And if you are alive then, servant of God, be the one who is slain'?" (Ayyūb said: I do not know any other version but that in which the Prophet said, "Do not be, servant of God, the one who is the slayer.")[510] Ibn Khabbāb answered them, "Yes." So they brought him to the canal bank, where they cut off his head and his blood flowed [3374] like the lace of a sandal, and they pierced the womb of his concubine (umm walad) and emptied it of its contents.[511]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Aṭā' b. 'Ajlān—Ḥumayd b. Hilāl: The Khawārij who came from al-Baṣrah proceeded until they drew near their brethren on the canal. A band of them went out and came upon a man who was driving a donkey carrying a woman. They crossed to him, called to him, threatened and terrorized him, and said, "Who are you?" He replied, "I am 'Abdallāh, the son of Khabbāb the Companion of the Prophet." Then he grasped at his robe (thawb), lifting it from the ground where it had fallen when they were terrorizing him. They said, "Have we frightened you?" and he answered, "Yes." They said, "There is no need to be alarmed. Tell us a ḥadīth that your father heard from the Prophet. Perhaps God will give us some benefit by it." He said, "My father told me from the Prophet, 'There will be a fitnah in which the heart of a man will die as does his body. In the evening he will be a Believer and by the next morning an unbeliever, and in the morning he will be an unbeliever and by the next evening a Believer.' " They said, "This is the ḥadīth we have asked of you. And what do you say about Abū Bakr and 'Umar?" He heaped praise on them both. They asked, "What do you say about 'Uthmān in the first part of his caliphate and in the last part?" He said, "He was in the right in the first part and in the last part." They said, "And what do you say about 'Alī before the appointment of the arbitrators (taḥkīm)

510. For ḥadiths of this type, see Wensinck, Concordance, s.v. fitnah, V, 60, col. b; and for ḥadiths with injunctions of the type "be 'Abdallāh the slain not 'Abdallāh the slayer," see ibid., s.v. q-t-l, V, 289, col. b.

511. Muslim law forbids the killing of the women and children of the enemy. But it is reported that some of the extreme Khārijites killed women and children as part of their practice of isti'rāḍ, taking the view that they shared in the sin and unbelief of their menfolk (see *EI*², s.vv. Azāriḳah, isti'rāḍ). Evidently this story is intended to illustrate that their doctrine even extended to an unborn child.

and afterward?" He answered, "He knows more of God than you do. He is more God-fearing in his religion (dīn), and more perceptive in his views." They said. "You follow your own inclinations and support men according to their names rather than their deeds. By God, we will inflict on you a death such as we have never inflicted on anybody."

They took him and bound him and then led him and his wife who was in the last stages of pregnancy beneath heavily laden palm trees. A date fell from them and one of them took it and put it in [3375] his own mouth. Another said, "(You do that) without permission and without paying!" and he spat it out. Then he took his sword and began swinging it around.[512] A pig belonging to one of the "protected peoples" (ahl al-dhimmah)[513] passed by, and the Khārijī struck it with his sword. They said, "This is evil in the land,"[514] and the one who had struck it went to the owner of the pig and gave him satisfaction for it. When Ibn Khabbāb saw them doing that, he said, "If you are sincere in what I have seen, I need fear no evil from you. I am a Muslim who has not caused any wrong in Islam, and you have given me security when you said, 'There is no need to be alarmed.'" But they took him and made him lie down, and then slaughtered him so that his blood flowed into the water. Then they came to his wife, who said, "I am only a woman! Do you not fear God?" But they slit open her belly. And they killed three women of Ṭayyi', as well as Umm Sinān al-Ṣaydāwiyyah.[515]

When 'Alī and those of the Muslims heard about the way in which the Khawārij had killed 'Abdallāh b. Khabbāb and about the slaughter (i'tirāḍ) they were imposing, he sent al-Ḥārith b. Murrah al-'Abdī[516] to them, to go to them and enquire about what he had

512. The text is unpointed here; I have followed the suggestion of Ann., A.H. 38 §100, to read yahuzzuhu as in Balādhurī, Ansāb. Cairo has yamīnahu/yamīnuhu/yumīnuhu, which is closer to the ductus of the manuscript, but it is difficult to supply a meaning to fit the context.

513. That is, the non-Muslims who had accepted Arab rule and maintained their preconquest religious and communal allegiances in return for tax.

514. See Qur'ān 5:33, 5:64, 8:73, etc.

515. I have not been able to identify this Umm Sinān further.

516. Al-Dīnawarī, 207, has al-Faq'asī (Faq'as b. Ṭarīf of Asad) instead of al-'Abdī, and Ann., in its necrology for 38 A.H., says that the Dīnawarī reading is certainly correct. On p. 171, presumably referring to the same individual, Dīnawarī has al-'Abdī. Lectio dificilior would favor al-Faq'asī. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only mention of him.

heard concerning them and to write back about it fully and without concealment. He left and when he had got as far as the canal, intending to question them, they came out against him and killed him. News of this reached the Commander of the Faithful ('Alī) and his followers, who came to him saying, "Commander of the Faithful, why are you letting them remain at our backs, to take our properties and our families from us?[517] Lead us against them and then, when we have settled the matter with them, we will go against our Syrian enemy."

Al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī came and spoke to him in the same way. There had been an impression that al-Ash'ath shared the views of the Khawārij because at Ṣiffīn he had been saying, "(The Syrians are) a people who have treated us fairly, appealing to the Book of [3376] God." But (now), when he asked 'Alī to go against the Khawārij, it was realized that he did not share their point of view.

'Alī agreed that they should go against the Khawārij first, and announced the setting out, He left and crossed the bridge, and prayed two rak'ahs at al-Qanṭarah.[518] He stopped at Dayr 'Abd al-Raḥmān and then at Dayr Abī Mūsā, then took the route via Qaryat Shāhī, Dabāhā, and the bank of the Euphrates.[519] On the way he was met by an astrologer who advised him to travel only at a certain time of day. He said, "If you journey at another time, you and your companions will meet a dire evil." But 'Alī rejected that and (deliberately) traveled at the time when the astrologer had told him not to. When he had finished the battle at the canal, 'Alī praised God and extolled Him, and then said, "If we had journeyed at the time the astrologer said, the ignorant ones who have no knowledge would have said, 'He traveled at the time that the astrologer ordered and consequently has been victorious.' "

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—'Abdallāh b. 'Awf: When 'Alī wished to set out from al-Anbār[520] against the men of 517. Yakhlufūnanā fī amwālinā wa-'iyālinā, indicating that the Khawārij would take over the properties of families of those Iraqīs killed in fighting the Syrians.

---

518. Ann., A.H. 38 §100, has "sul ponte." But it perhaps refers to the place known as Qanṭarah al-Kūfah or al-Qanāṭir, about a day's journey north of al-Kūfah, where the road crossed the Badāt canal (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 74).

519. For Qaryat Shāhī and Dabāhā, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 246 and II, 545.

520. On the Euphrates due west of the town of al-Nahrawān (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II).

the canal, he sent Qays b. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah ahead and told him to go to al-Madā'in, where he should wait until further orders reached him. Then 'Alī came proceeding against the Khawārij, and Qays and Sa'd b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī joined him at the canal. 'Alī sent to the men of the canal, saying, "Surrender to us those among you who killed our brethren so that we may kill them for what they have done. Then I will leave you alone and refrain from action against you so that I may meet the Syrians. And perhaps God will bring about a change of heart on your part and bring you back to a better situation than that in which you are." They sent back, saying, "All of us were their killers and all of us consider your and their blood to be licit."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd Abū al-Kunūd: Qays b. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah addressed the Khawārij, "Servants of God, send out to us those among you whom we seek and come back into this undertaking that you have deserted. Return with us to the fight against our enemy and your enemy. You have done a terrible thing, bearing witness against us that we have committed polytheism (shirk), 'and polytheism is a terrible evil,'[521] shedding the blood of the Muslims, and counting them as polytheists (mushrikūn)." 'Abdallāh b. Shajarah al-Sulamī[522] replied, "The truth has shone forth for us. We will not follow you unless you bring us someone like 'Umar." Qays said, "We do not see anyone of that description among us other than our lord ('Alī); do you see such among you?" And Qays said, "I implore you by God not to destroy yourselves, for I think fitnah has triumphed over you." [3377]

Abū Ayyūb Khālid b. Zayd al-Anṣārī[523] addressed them, saying, "Servants of God, you and we are again in exactly the same position as we were before (Ṣiffīn) and there is no division between us. Why are you fighting against us?" They said, "If we were to give you the oath of allegiance today, you would appoint arbitrators tomorrow." Abū Ayyūb replied, "I implore you by God not to rush into fitnah in this year out of fear of what may happen in the next."[524]

---

521. See Qur'ān 31:13.

522. This speech and the subsequent reference to his death seem to represent the only appearance in Ṭabarī's work of this Qaysī.

523. For this famous Companion who is said to have died in the attack on Constantinople during Mu'āwiyah's caliphate, see *EI*², s.v. Abū Ayyūb.

524. See Gloss., s.v. qābil.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. A'yan—Zayd b. Wahb: 'Alī came to the men of the canal, stood before them, and said, "You band, which a quarrelsome animosity and stubbornness have caused to rebel, which your own inclinations have turned away from the truth and rashness carried away, and which has fallen into confusion [3378] and great misfortune! I warn you lest tomorrow this community find you laid low by the bends of this canal and the beds of this lowland without a clear proof from your Lord or a conclusive demonstration. Do you not know that I ordered you not to accept the arbitration process (ḥukūmah) and that I told you that the enemy's seeking it from you was (really) a ruse and a trick directed against you? And I informed you that they were not men of religion (dīn) or scripture (qur'ān); that I knew them better than you, for I knew them as children and as men and they are a people of cunning and treachery; and that if you rejected my opinion, you would be setting aside sound judgment. But you disobeyed me so that consequently I agreed to appoint an arbitrator. When I did so, I made conditions, extracted undertakings, and imposed on the two arbitrators that they give life to that which the Qur'ān effects and do away with what the Qur'ān suppresses. But they did differently and opposed the authority (ḥukm) of the Book and the authoritative precedent (sunnah). Therefore, we have rejected the whole procedure involving them and have gone back to our previous situation. What then is your position and what do you want?"

They replied, "We accepted the setting up of arbitration and when we did so we sinned and became unbelievers. But we have repented and, if you do the same, then we will be with you fully. If you refuse, however, then withdraw (i'tazil) from us, for we reject you 'without distinction for God does not love the treacherous.' "[525]

'Alī answered them, "May a whirlwind strike you and not one of you survive! After my believing in the Messenger of God, making hijrah with him, and jihād in the way of God, should I (now) testify to unbelief against myself? 'Then I would have gone astray and would not be of the rightly guided.' "[526] He then turned away from them.

---

525. Qur'ān 8:58.
526. Qur'ān 6:56.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Salamah al-Zuhrī, whose mother was the daughter of Anas b. Mālik:[527] 'Alī said to those who had gathered at the canal:

> You have let yourselves be enticed into the abandonment of this arbitration process that you yourselves initiated and asked for, while I abhorred it. I told you that the enemy had asked for your agreement to it as a trick and a ruse, but you rejected me like opponents and turned away from me like disobedient wretches until I changed my mind and gave in to you. By God you are a light-headed and simple-minded people. Unworthy to be called sons![528] I did not introduce anything illicit nor, by God, did I deprive you of anything that concerned you or conceal any of this matter from you. I did not make you do anything without proper consideration and did not seek after adversity for you, even though our cause is clearly that of the Muslims.[529] Your council (mala')[530] agreed to choose two men, and we imposed on them that they should judge (yaḥkumā) according to what is in the Qur'ān and not disregard it. But they went astray and left the truth, even though they perceived it. Oppression was all their desire, even though we had entrusted to them to judge with justice, together with their opposing to the truth their evil views and their oppressive judgment.[531] We must trust ourselves now those two have deviated from the path of truth and done what is not acceptable. Make clear to us why you consider it lawful to fight against us and go out from our community. The people did not choose two men so that you should put your swords on your shoulders, slaughter (isti'rāḍ) people, cut off their [3379]

527. Abū Salamah al-Zuhrī was an elder relative of the famous Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī (see Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, index, s.v. Abū Salama); for the famous Companion and transmitter Anas b. Mālik, see *EI*², s.v.

528. Lā aba laka does not have the same force in Arabic as "Bastard!" in English (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. abū).

529. (?) Wa-in kāna amrunā la-amra al-muslimīna zāhiran; Cairo reads . . . li-amri al-muslimīna. . . . It is difficult to see what precisely it means.

530. Perhaps indicating a general opinion rather than any consultative institution.

531. Following the reading of SNB and Cairo: wa-al-ṣaddu li al-ḥaqqi suw'a ra'yihimā wa-jawra ḥukmihimā. Leiden has bi-suw'i ra'yihimā wa-jawri ḥukmihimā.

heads, and shed their blood. "Indeed that is clear depravity."[532] By God, if you killed even a chicken like that, its killing would be a weighty matter with God. How will it be, then, regarding a soul the killing of which God has prohibited?

But the Khawārij shouted out, "Do not address them or argue [3380] with them. Prepare to meet the Lord; hasten, hasten to Paradise."

So 'Alī went and made ready the men. He gave Ḥujr b. 'Adī command of his right wing and Shabath b. Rib'ī or Ma'qil b. Qays al-Riyāḥī command of his left. He put Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī over the cavalry and Abū Qatādah al-Anṣārī[533] over the infantry and placed Qays b. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah over the men of al-Madīnah, of whom there were 700 or 800.

The Khawārij made ready, too, and gave command of their right wing to Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ṭā'ī, of their left to Shurayḥ b. Awfā al-'Absī, of their cavalry to Ḥamzah b. Sinān al-Asadī, and of their infantry to Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr al-Sa'dī.

'Alī sent al-Aswad b. Yazīd al-Murādī[534] with 2,000 horsemen against Ḥamzah b. Sinān, who led 300 of the cavalry of the Khawārij, and hoisted a flag of safe conduct alongside Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī. This last called out to the Khawārij, "Whoever of you who has not committed murder or slaughter (isti'rāḍ) and comes to this flag, he has safe-conduct; and whoever of you goes back to al-Kūfah or al-Madā'in and abandons this party, he has safe-conduct. We will have no need to shed your blood after we have slain those among you who have murdered our brethren." Farwah b. Nawfal al-Ashja'ī said, "By God, I know of no reason why we should fight against 'Alī; I think that I must retire until it becomes clear to me whether to fight against him or to follow him." So he withdrew with 500 horsemen and waited at al-Bandanījayn and al-Daskarah.[535] Another group also separated and went to al-Kūfah. And about 100 of them [3381] went over to 'Alī. The Khawārij numbered (originally) 4,000 and

532. Qur'ān 22:11, 39:15.

533. A Companion who is reported to have led the expedition to Baṭn Iḍam (8/629) and fought at Ḥunayn (8/630), and who is the source of various reports about the Prophet.

534. See Ibn al-Kablī, II, index, s.v. al-Aswad b. Yazīd b. al-Ğābir.

535. For these two places northeast of Nahrawān (Yāqūt calls the former a baldah and the latter a qaryah), see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 80 and map II.

there remained with 'Abdallāh b. Wahb 2,800. They marched against 'Alī, who sent forward his cavalry in front of the footsoldiers, and arranged his men in two lines behind the horsemen, placing the bowmen in front of the first line.

'Alī said to his men, "Hold back from them until they attack you. If they launch an attack against you—and the majority of them are on foot—they are bound to be tired when they get to you while you will be repulsing them and defending against them." The Khawārij advanced, and when they were close they called out to Yazīd b. Qays. (Yazīd b. Qays was governor of Iṣbahān.)[536] They said, "Yazīd b. Qays, authority belongs to God alone, even though Iṣbahān denies it." 'Abbās b. Sharīk and Qabīṣah b. Ḍubay'ah, both of them 'Absīs,[537] called out to the Khawārij, "Enemies of God, is not Shurayḥ b. Awfā, who has wasted his own soul, among you, and are you not all like him?"[538] They said, "And what is your argument against a man who suffered temptation and found in us his repentance?" Then they called out, "Hasten, hasten to Paradise!" and launched an attack.

'Alī's horsemen were in front of his infantry, but the horsemen of the Muslims[539] did not hold firm against the attack and split into two groups, one on the right, the other on the left, and the Khawārij advanced on the infantry. 'Alī's bowmen confronted them with their arrows, while the horsemen from both the right and the left turned on them, and the footmen rushed at them with spears and swords. By God, they wasted no time in killing the Khawārij.[540] Then Ḥamzah b. Sinān, the leader of the cavalry of the Khawārij, when he saw the destruction, called to his men, "Dismount," and they went to do so but had not taken up positions before al-Aswad b. Qays al-Murādī attacked them and horsemen came at them from the direction of 'Alī. They were slain in a short time.

---

536. See n. 92 and p. 102, above.

537. For these two supporters of 'Alī (the latter was implicated with Ḥujr b. 'Adī), see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.vv.

538. For Shurayḥ, also an 'Absī, see n. 472, above. Dīnawarī, 210, refers to him as one of the ascetics (nussāk) of the Khawārij. Ṭabarī's report here indicates that he had defected to the Khawārij after first supporting the decision to go to arbitration. For his death, see p. 132, below.

539. That is, 'Alī's horsemen.

540. See Gloss. for this meaning of anāma.

[3382] According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Muslim b. Salām b. Thumāmah al-Ḥanafī—Ḥakīm b. Sa'd:[541] As soon as the Baṣran Khawārij met us we did not delay in fighting them.[542] It was as if they had been ordered to die, and they did so before their strength became effective and could cause significant damage.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb: Abū Ayyūb came to 'Alī and said, "Commander of the Faithful, I have killed Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn." 'Alī asked, "What did you say to him and what did he say to you?" He replied, "I stabbed him with a spear in his chest so hard it came out of his back, and I said to him, 'Rejoice, enemy of God, that you are going to Hell,' and he answered me, 'You will find out which of us is "more fitting to burn in it."'[543] 'Alī said nothing. (But according to [another version of the report from] Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb: 'Alī said to Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī, "He is more fitting to burn in it.")

And 'Ā'idh b. Ḥamalah al-Tamīmī[544] came and said, "Commander of the Faithful, I have killed Kilāb."[545] 'Alī replied, "You have done well. You are a supporter of the truth and you have killed an adherent of falsehood."

And Hāni' b. Khaṭṭāb al-Arḥabī[546] and Ziyād b. Khaṣafah came quarreling with one another about who had killed 'Abdallāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī. 'Alī said to them, "How did you do it?" and they answered, "Commander of the Faithful, when we saw him we recognized him, and we vied with one another to attack him and stabbed him with our spears." 'Alī said, "Do not argue with one another—both of you killed him."

Jaysh b. Rabī'ah Abū al-Mu'tamir al-Kinānī[547] attacked Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr and killed him, and 'Abdallāh b. Zaḥr al-Khawlānī[548]

---

541. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, lists a Ḥakīm b. Sa'd of the Banū al-Bakkā'/'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah. According to Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 264: "the dār of Ibn Ḥakīm in al-Kūfah was ascribed to [mansūbah ilā] Ḥakīm b. Sa'd b. Thawr b. Mu'āwiyah b. 'Ubādah b. al-Bakkā', who was a sayyid."

542. For mā huwa illā an . . . fa- . . ., see Gloss., s.v. illā.

543. Qur'ān 19:70.

544. Involved in the rising of Ḥujr b. 'Adī (see Ṭabarī, II, 120, for his verses about an injury received at that time).

545. I am unable to identify.

546. See n. 254, above.

547. This seems to be his only appearance in Ṭabarī's history.

548. Another only appearance.

attacked 'Abdallāh b. Shajarah al-Sulamī and killed him. Shurayḥ b. Awfā came to a wall and fought for a long time of the day by a gap in it. He had killed three men of Banū Hamdān, and he began to extemporize, saying:

An 'Absī handmaiden knows, gentle and sheltered among her people, [3383] that I will defend my gap tonight.

Qays b. Mu'āwiyah al-Duhnī[549] attacked him and cut off his foot, but he moved to fight them, saying: "The stallion camel, though hobbled, defends its pregnant females." Then Qays b. Mu'āwiyah attacked and killed him, and the people said:

One day Hamdān and a man fought together.
They fought from dawn until just before evening, and God gave Hamdān success over the man.

Shurayḥ said:

I will strike them and, were I to see Abū al-Ḥasan ('Alī),
I would strike him with the sword until he becomes still.

And he said:

I will strike them and, if I should see 'Alī,
I would envelop him with a white gleaming mashrafī sword.[550]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Ḥurrah: 'Alī went out seeking Dhū al-Thudayyah.[551] With him were Sulaymān b. Thumāmah al-Ḥanafī Abū al-Jabrah, and al-Rayyān b. Ṣabrah b. Hawdhah.[552] The latter found him in a hollow on the bank of the canal among forty or fifty slain men.

549. Another only appearance.

550. For variant explanations of the epithet mashrafī, of frequent occurrence in conjunction with sayf, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

551. That is, "he with the woman's breast"; see Wellhausen, Religio-political Factions, 24, n. 6, for discussion. The point of the following story becomes clearer on p. 139, below: There was a ḥadīth, known to 'Alī, associating "a people who would pass through Islam as an arrow through game" with a man with a deformed arm, and 'Alī was looking for this man to confirm that the men he had fought at the canal were indeed those referred to in the ḥadīth. The ḥadīth is generally understood as referring to the Khawārij.

552. Both of the Banū Ḥanīfah/Bakr b. Wā'il; for the latter, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. al-Raiyān b. Ṣabira.

When he was dragged out, al-Rayyān examined the upper part of his arm and saw some flesh attached to the shoulder, looking like a woman's breast with a nipple bearing some black hairs. When it was stretched out it extended until it was equal to his other arm, and when it was let go it retracted to his shoulder like the breast [3384] of a woman.

When Dhū al-Thudayyah was dragged out, 'Alī said, "God is most great! By God, I did not lie and was not deceived. Indeed by God, were it not that you would refrain from good deeds, I would tell you what God decreed through the mouth of His Prophet for him who fights against them while conscious of his motive for fighting them and recognizing the right to which we adhere." Then he passed among the fallen Khawārij and said, "Woe unto you! He who has deluded you has done you harm." His own men asked, "Commander of the Faithful, who is it who has deluded them?" He replied, "Satan and their own selves inciting to evil[553] deluded them with their desires, made disobedience seem attractive to them, and told them that they would be victorious."[554]

A search was made for any among them who still had a spark of life, and we found 400 of them. 'Alī commanded that they be given back to their kin, to whom he said, "Take them away with you and restore them to health. When they are better, take them to al-Kūfah and take possession of anything in their camp."

As for weapons, mounts, and the matériel of war,[555] 'Alī divided them among the Muslims. Regarding goods and male and female slaves, he returned them to their owners when he came (to Kūfah). 'Adī b. Ḥātim sought his son Ṭarafah.[556] Having found him, he buried him and then said, "Praise be to God, who put me to the test, by your death in this battle, in spite of my yearning for you."[557] Some of our men buried the slain men of their own tribe, but when the Commander of the Faithful heard about that he said, "Leave them! Do you kill them and then bury them?" And the men departed.

---

553. See Qur'ān 12:53.
554. Ann., 38 A.H., §107, reads ṭāhirūna, "pure."
555. (?)Wa-mā shahidū bihi 'alayhi al-ḥarb.
556. See p. 116, above.
557. (?)Alladhī ibtalānī bi-yawmika 'alā ḥājatī ilayka.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mujāhid—al-Muḥill b. Khalīfah [al-Ṭā'ī]: One of the Banū Sadūs, called al-'Ayzār b. al-Akhnas,[558] who shared the views of the Khawārij, went out to join them. Beyond al-Madā'in he met 'Adī b. Ḥātim, with whom were al-Aswad b. Qays and al-Aswad b. Yazīd, both of the Banū Murād.[559] When he met him, al-'Ayzār said to him, "Are you secure from sin and gainful of recompense or evil and sinful?" 'Adī replied, "Indeed, secure from sin and gainful of recompense." The two Murādīs said [3385] to him, "You have only said that because of an evil in your heart, for we know that you, 'Ayzār, share the views of those people (the Khawārij). You will not leave us before we bring you to the Commander of the Faithful and tell him about you." It was not long before 'Alī arrived and the two of them told him about al-'Ayzār, saying, "Commander of the Faithful, he shares the views of the enemy—we have recognized that in him." 'Alī said, "Shedding his blood is not licit for us, but we will imprison him." 'Adī b. Ḥātim said, "Commander of the Faithful, give him to me and I will take responsibility that nothing untoward happens to you on his part." So 'Alī gave al-'Ayzār to 'Adī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Imrān b. Ḥudayr—Abū Mijlaz—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab b. 'Abdallāh: Only seven of 'Alī's companions were killed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah al-Yanā'ī—Abū Dardā': When 'Alī had finished with the people of Nahrawān, he praised God and extolled Him and then said (to his own men), "God has favored you and reinforced your victory, so direct yourselves immediately against your enemy."[560] They answered, "Commander of the Faithful, our arrows are exhausted, our swords have become blunt, the tips of our spears have fallen off, and most of them have been broken in pieces. Go back to our garrison town and let us make the best possible preparation. Perhaps the Commander of the Faithful will add to our equipment that of those of us who have died, 558. This seems to be his only appearance. Ann., A.H. 38 §108, says that we should read Sinbis rather than Sadūs (the Banū Sinbis of Ṭayyi' fits better with the subsequent tribal affiliations). Balādhurī Ansāb, cited in Ann., A.H. 38 §120, has al-Akhnas b. al-'Ayzar al-Ṭā'ī al-Sinbisī.

559. See nn. 307, 534, above.

560. That is, the Syrians.

for that will make us better fitted to confront the enemy." Their spokesman in putting that forward was al-Ash'ath b. Qays.

'Alī went and stopped at al-Nukhaylah, where he told the men to remain in their camp and prepare themselves for jihād, and to cut down on visiting their wives and children until they set out against their enemy. They remained there for some days, but then they slipped away from their camp and entered (the town), apart [3386] from a few of their leaders, and the camp was left empty. When 'Alī saw that, he entered al-Kūfah and his idea of departing to fight Mu'āwiyah was shattered.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—anonymous—Zayd b. Wahb: In his first address to the men after the fighting at the canal, 'Alī said, "Men, get ready to go out against an enemy, in the making of jihād against whom there is drawing near to God and obtaining a way of getting close to Him. They are confused regarding what is right, they shun the Book, and they deviate from the religion (dīn), wandering perplexedly in rebellion[561] and cast down in the flood of error. Get ready against them all the force that you can muster and all the horses you can bridle. Put your trust in God, for He is a sufficient protector[562] and He is a sufficient helper."[563]

But they neither went to do what he said nor prepared themselves. He left them alone for a few days until, despairing of their doing what he had asked, he summoned their chiefs and leaders and asked them their opinion and what was delaying them. Some among them offered excuses and some evinced an antagonism to his wishes; those who showed enthusiasm were in the minority. So 'Alī stood to address them in a khuṭbah.[564]

He said:

> Servants of God, what possessed you, when I commanded you to go to fight, that you were averse to war and inclined to the earth?[565] Do you desire the life of this world

561. See Qur'ān 2:15; 6:110.
562. See Qur'ān 4:81; 33:3, 48.
563. See Qur'ān 4:45.
564. A formal address delivered from the dais (minbar) in the mosque. It became a formal part of the midday prayer service on Friday, but in early Islam was not limited to liturgical contexts. See *EI*², s.v.
565. Ithtthāqaltum ilā al-arḍ; i.e., "you were slow and sluggish" (see Lane, Lexicon, th-q-l, form VI.

more than the next[566] and lowliness and degradation to glory? Each time I have urged you to the jihād, your eyes have rolled as if you are in the agonies of death, as if you are mad and without reason, and as if your eyes are blind and you cannot see. I am amazed at you.[567] You are only lions of al-Sharā[568] in time of peace and sly foxes when you are called to be brave. You will never be men on whom I can rely, you are not riders with whom one can attack, and [3387] you are not men of strength to whom one may cling. By the eternal God, you are wretched men of valor[569]—you are duped and you do not outwit: your lands are diminished[570] and you do not care; others are not taken off guard by you,[571] but you are heedless and negligent. The true warrior is he who is alert and has understanding, while he who seeks for agreements comes to abasement. He who engages in dispute overcomes, but those who are defeated are vanquished and despoiled.

Then he said, "Now, you have obligations toward me and I have obligations toward you. My duties toward you are good counsel to you so long as I am associated with you, increasing your spoils (fay'), providing you with knowledge so that you are not ignorant, and educating you so that you acquire knowledge. Your duties to me are fulfillment of the oath of allegiance, good advice in private and in public, responding when I call you, and obedience when I command you. If God intends a good outcome for you, draw back from what I dislike, return to what I desire, and you will obtain what you seek and achieve what you hope for."

Narrators other than Abū Mikhnaf say that the battle between 'Alī and the people of the canal was in year 38 (658–659). That is

566. See Qur'ān 9:38.

567. Li Allāhi antum! An expression usually indicating appreciation of some good quality, perhaps used here ironically.

568. A proverbial expression for fierceness or bravery, said to refer to a mountain abounding in lions (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

569. Ḥushshāsh al-ḥarb. Literally, "kindlers of war" (Lane, Lexicon, s.v. miḥashsh).

570. (?)Wa-yatanaqqaṣu aṭrāfukum. Ann., A.H. 38 §III, has "vi si rattrappiscono le mani e i piedi." Nanquṣu min aṭrāfihā is Quranic (13:41, 21:45) and is variously understood.

571. (?)Lā yunāmu 'ankum.

what most of the specialists in historical traditions (ahl al-siyar) say, and it is supported, too, by what 'Umārah al-Asadī told me—'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā—Nu'aym—Abū Maryam:[572] Shabath b. Rib'ī and Ibn al-Kawwā' went out from al-Kūfah to Ḥarūrā', and 'Alī ordered the men to appear with their weapons. They all went out to the mosque, which became full with them, but 'Alī sent to them, [3388] saying, "What you have done in entering the mosque with weapons is wrong. Go to the Jabbānah of Murād[573] and await my orders."

So we went to the the Jabbānah of Murād and waited there for part of the day. Then we heard that the Khawārij were returning, marching back.

I said, "I will go out to see them." So I went and infiltrated their columns until I came to Shabath b. Rib'ī and Ibn al-Kawwā', who were resting on one thigh in the saddles[574] of their mounts. With them were 'Alī's messengers, who were imploring the two of them by God to return with the men,[575] and saying to the men, "We beseech you by God not to hasten the fitnah this year out of fear of next year."

A man (of the Khawārij) came up to one of the messengers of 'Alī and hamstrung his mount. The messenger then dismounted, uttering the istirjā',[576] picked up his saddle, and went on with it. The Khawārij were saying, "All we want is to resume open hostilities with them (the Syrians)," and the messengers were imploring them by God. We waited for a time and then they went back to al-Kūfah, where it was as if it were a day of breaking the fast or a day of sacrifice.[577]

---

572. Abū Maryam al-Thaqafī is cited at Ṭabarī, I, 3154, as being in al-Kūfah when al-Ashtar seized it for 'Alī and expelled Abū Mūsā, before the Battle of the Camel; Ṭabarī reports from him via al-Minqarī. The present instance seems to be Ṭabarī's only citation from 'Umārah al-Asadī. The ahl al-siyar would seem to be scholars specializing in reports about the military events of early Islam; for a discussion of the development of the term siyar and related fields of tradition, see Hinds, "Maghāzī and Sīra," esp. pp. 61–62 and n. 8.

573. A jabbānah is a cemetery. In al-Kūfah the *jabbānah*s seem to fulfill the role of public squares in each tribal quarter (see *EI*², s.v. al-Kūfa, p. 347a).

574. (?)Wāqifān mutawarrikān; the significance of the description escapes me.

575. For this sense of lammā (= illā) after a verb of swearing or imploring, see Wright, Grammar, II, 340, at top.

576. See n. 331, above.

577. Because of the commotion. (The "breaking of the fast (of Ramadān)" and the "day of sacrifice" (during the ḥajj) are the two major feasts of the Muslim year.)

'Alī had been narrating to us before that that a people would go out from (yakhrujūna min) Islam, passing through the religion as the arrow passes through the hunted game.[578] The sign of them would be a man with a deformed arm (mukhdaj al-yad). I heard that ḥadīth from him several times.

Nāfi'[579] the Deformed (al-Mukhdaj) also heard it, and I saw him going off his food because he had heard him saying it so often. Nāfi' was with us in the mosque, praying by day and spending his nights there too. I had given him a burnus to wear, and I met him subsequently and asked him if he had gone out with those who had gone to Ḥarūrā'. He replied, "I went out intending to join them, but when I came to the Banū Sa'd some youth met me and divested me of my weapons and made fun of me, so I went back.[580] against them. I did not go with him, but my brother Abū 'Abdallāh did and he told me: 'Alī went to them, and when he was opposite them on the bank of the Nahrawān, he sent imploring them by God and asking them to return. A succession of messengers went ceaselessly from him to them until they killed a messenger of his. When he saw that, he attacked them and fought them until he had finished with them. Then he asked his companions to seek for the Deformed One (al-Mukhdaj), and they did so. Some of them said, "We cannot find him" and some said, "No, he is not among them." Then a man came and announced good news to 'Alī and said, "Commander of the Faithful, we have found him beneath two slain men in an irrigation ditch." 'Alī said, "Cut off the arm that is deformed and bring it to me." When he was brought it, he took it and lifted it up and said, "By God, I did not lie and was not deceived."[581]

About a year later, the men of the canal "went out" and 'Alī went [3389]

---

578. See n. 551. For the ḥadīth, see Wensick, Concordance, s.vv. maraqa and akhdaja, and idem, Muslim Creed, 38. Maraqa, "to pass through," is used of an arrow that goes clean through the animal at which it is shot.

579. Apparently not a reference to the famous Khārijī Nāfi' b. al-Azraq.

580. The wearing of the burnus, most likely here a hooded cloak, is probably meant to be indicative of an ascetic. Al-Dīnawarī, 203, has aṣḥāb al-barānis with reference to supporters of the Khārijites. The continuation of the narrative in the first person makes it difficult to be sure where the words of Nāfi' end, but the following sentence surely cannot be his and must belong to the narrator Abū Maryam.

581. This story relates to that of Dhū al-Thudayyah earlier.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: Abū Maryam has indicated with his words, ". . . so I went back. About a year later, the men of the canal 'went out,' " that the war between 'Alī and the men of Ḥarūrā' was in the year after that in which they had rejected 'Alī's agreement to arbitration. This latter occurred in 37, as has been established previously, and, if that was the case, and the matter developed according to the report that we have transmitted from Abū Maryam, then it is sure that the battle between 'Alī and them was in 38.[582]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Abdallāh b. Maymūn—'Amr b. Shujayrah—Jābir—al-Sha'bī: After he had returned from Ṣiffīn, 'Alī sent Ja'dah b. Hubayrah al-Makhzūmī, whose mother was Umm Hāni' bint Abī Ṭālib, to Khurāsān. He [3390] got as far as Abrashahr, the people of which had espoused unbelief and refused to yield. He therefore went back to 'Alī, who sent out Khulayd b. Qurrah al-Yarbū'ī, who besieged the people of Naysābūr until they made peace with him, and so too the people of Marw.[583]

In this year, that is, 37 (657–658), 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās led the pilgrimage.[584] He was 'Alī's governor over the Yemen and its provinces (makhālīf). Qutham b. al-'Abbās was over Mecca and al-Ṭā'if, and Sahl b. Ḥunayf al-Anṣārī over al-Madīnah. It is also said that Tammām b. al-'Abbās[585] was over al-Madīnah. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās was over al-Baṣrah, with Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī over its judicial affairs. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr[586] was over Egypt and Khulayd b. Qurrah al-Yarbū'ī over Khurāsān. And it is said that when 'Alī departed for Ṣiffīn, he left behind Abū Mas'ūd al-Anṣārī[587] as his deputy over al-Kūfah. According to Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Dawraqī[588]—'Abdallāh b. Idrīs—Layth—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Rufay': When 'Alī went out to Ṣiffīn, he left behind as his deputy over al-Kūfah Abū Mas'ūd

582. For discussion of the chronology and the cause and effect relationship between the meeting of the arbitrators, the defection of the Khawārij, the Battle at the Canal (Nahrawān), and the rebellion of al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid (see later), see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 88–90.

583. Apart from the addition of the information about Ja'dah's mother, this passage is identical to that on pp. 99, above.

584. 'Ubaydallāh was a full younger brother of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās (n. 3, above).

585. Tammām was a half-brother of 'Abdallāh and 'Ubaydallāh, known for his great strength (Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 27).

586. Son of the first caliph (see *EI*², s.v.).

587. See n. 269, above.

588. D. 246/860, brother of the previously cited Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm (n. 506, above; see GAS, I, 112).

al-Anṣārī 'Uqbah b. 'Amr. As for Syria, that was the territory of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān.

The Events of the Year 38

(June 9, 658–May 28, 659)

The Killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr in Egypt

Among the events of this year was the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr in Egypt, where he was governor. We have already reported the circumstances of 'Alī's appointing him there and the deposition of Qays b. Sa'd. Now we will recount why and where he was killed and how things turned out regarding him. We will begin with the conclusion of the report of al-Zuhrī, the beginning of which we have given previously.[589]

[3391] According to 'Abdallāh [b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī]—Yūnus [b. Yazīd]—al-Zuhrī:[590] When Qays b. Sa'd was told that Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr was coming to replace him as governor, he went to meet him and spoke to him in private. He took Muḥammad into his confidence and said, "You have been sent by a man who lacks judgment (ra'y), but the fact that you are removing me from office will not stop me offering you sincere advice. I have some insight into your task here, for I was involved in something in which I was attempting to get the better of Mu'āwiyah and 'Amr and the people of Kharbitā.[591] You use the same stratagem against them for, if you try to get the better of them by any other means, you will perish." Qays described to him the stratagem whereby he was trying to get the better of them, but Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr suspected his motives and acted completely differently from the way Qays had said.

589. See Ṭabarī, I, 3241–42, 3245–46. According to the account, 'Alī had been led to believe that Qays b. Sa'd (n. 75) was not entirely reliable as governor of Egypt and had sent Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr instead. Qays's father, Sa'd b. 'Ubādah, is said to have been a rival of Abū Bakr, the father of Muḥammad, at the time of the saqīfah following the death of the Prophet. On the following, see *EI*², s.v. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and the literature cited there.

590. The isnād is given in an abbreviated form (for the full version, see Ṭabarī, I, 3245).

When Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr had established himself and Qays b. Sa'd had left for Medina, Muḥammad sent the Egyptian army to Kharbitā, where they fought but were defeated. When Mu'āwiyah and 'Amr heard that, they came with the men of Syria, conquered Egypt, and killed Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. The land remained under Mu'āwiyah's control henceforth until he secured victory (in the struggle with 'Alī).

Qays b. Sa'd reached Medina, but Marwān and al-Aswad b. Abī al-Bakhtarī[592] threatened him until eventually, fearing that he would be seized or killed, he mounted up and went to join 'Alī. Mu'āwiyah wrote to Marwān and al-Aswad, expressing his anger at them and saying, "You have reinforced 'Alī with Qays b. Sa'd, and his sound opinion and his shrewdness. By God, if you had sent him 100,000 fighting men, that would not have angered me more than your forcing Qays b. Sa'd to leave to join 'Alī."

Qays b. Sa'd came to 'Alī and when he had told him what had happened and news reached them of the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, 'Alī realized that Qays b. Sa'd was equally the object of some substantial trickery and that those who had advised him to remove Qays from office had not given him sincere advice. [3392]

---

591. Kharbitā, in the delta near Alexandria (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, II, 416), was the center of a group of 'Uthmāniyyah, opponents of 'Alī, who were, nevertheless, willing to accept the authority of Qays on certain conditions. Qays, we are told, had been willing to negotiate with them in exchange for their agreement not to resist him, so that he could oppose the attempts of Mu'āwiyah to take over Egypt. See Ṭabarī, I, 3237–38, 3241.

592. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was the senior Umayyad in Medina, and became caliph himself in 64/683–84 (see *EI*², s.v.); for al-Aswad b. Abī al-Bakhtarī of the Banū Asad of Quraysh, son of an opponent of the Prophet who is said to have been killed at Badr, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. al-Aswad b. al-'Āṣi.

As for Abū Mikhnaf's version of the start of the affair of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, his going to Egypt and his governorship over it, our report of it has been given earlier.[593] Now we will report the remainder of the account about Muḥammad according to Abū Mikhnaf from Yazīd b. Ẓabyān al-Hamdānī: When those at Kharbitā had killed Ibn Muḍāhim al-Kalbī,[594] whom Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr had sent against them, Mu'āwiya b. Ḥudayj al-Kindī al-Sakūnī[595] went out and called for vengeance for the blood of 'Uthmān. Others responded to him and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr was unable to maintain order in Egypt. 'Alī heard about the rising of the Egyptians against Muḥammad and about their determination (to overthrow) him, and he said, "Only one of two men is right for Egypt—the companion of ours whom we removed from it (meaning Qays b. Sa'd) or Mālik b. al-Ḥārith (meaning, al-Ashtar)."

When 'Alī returned from Ṣiffin, he had sent al-Ashtar back to his command over the Jazīrah and had said to Qays b. Sa'd, "Stay with me in charge of my personal guards (shuraṭ) until we have finished this business of the arbitration (ḥukūmah), and then go to Ādharbayjān." So Qays remained with 'Alī over his personal guard and when the business of the arbitration was over, 'Alī wrote to Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Ashtar, who at that time was at Naṣībīn:[596] "Now, you are one of those whose help I need in making the religion (dīn) effective, by whom I restrain the arrogance of the sinner, and by whom I fortify the dangerous frontier district (thaghr). I have put Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr over Egypt, but the rebels (khawārij)[597] [3393] there came out against him and he is a raw youth with no experience of war and untested. Come to me so that we can consider what is necessary regarding that, and leave behind over your province those of your men who are trustworthy and sincere advisors. Salutations."

---

593. See Ṭabarī, I, 3243–48.

594. Ibid., I, 3248, l. 18.

595. One of the 'Uthmāniyyah (n. 591); see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥadīg.

596. That is, Nisibis in northern Mesopotamia.

597. Khawārij; the word seems to be used in the general sense of rebels or defectors. It does not imply that the followers of Ibn Ḥudayj shared the views of those who fought 'Alī at Nahrawān (in fact, their views about 'Uthmān were contradictory). Rather it indicates that the name al-Khawārij probably originally had the general connotation of separatists or rebels and only later became the standard name for the Khārijites, whose origins were traced back to their rejection of the ḥukūmah.

Mālik came to 'Alī and went in to him. 'Alī told him the news about the men of Egypt and gave him the reports about them, and he said, "You are the only man for it. Set out there, may God have mercy on you. If I do not tell you what to do about it, it is because I am content with your own judgment. Ask for God's help if anything worries you, and mix firmness with gentleness. Be mild so long as mildness is effective, but insist on firmness when you have to." So al-Ashtar left 'Alī, went to the place where he had left his things, and got ready to set out for Egypt.

Mu'āwiyah's spies came and informed him of 'Alī's appointment of al-Ashtar, and that weighed heavily on him for he coveted Egypt and knew that if al-Ashtar arrived there he would be a more difficult prospect than Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. He therefore sent to al-Jāyastār, one of those subject to the kharāj tax,[598] and told him that al-Ashtar had been appointed over Egypt. And he said to him, "If you take care of him for me, I will not take any kharāj from you as long as I live;[599] so do what you can to outwit him." Al-Jāyastār then went to al-Qulzum[600] and waited there. Al-Ashtar left Iraq for Egypt, and when he reached al-Qulzum al-Jāyastār met him and said, "Here is somewhere to stay and here is food and fodder. I am one of those subject to the kharāj." Al-Ashtar stayed there with him and the dihqān came with fodder and food. Then, when he had fed him, he brought him a honeyed drink into which he had mixed poison. He gave it to him to drink and when he had done so he died.

Mu'āwiyah proceeded to tell the Syrians, "'Alī has sent al-Ashtar [3394] to Egypt—call on God that He will suffice you against him." So every day they implored God against al-Ashtar, and then he who had given him the drink came to Mu'āwiyah and told him of al-

598. Jāyastār may be a version of an administrative title in Byzantine Egypt that appears in the administrative papyri as the Arabic jastāl. "Quaestor," "logistarius," and "augustalis" have been suggested (see *EI*¹, s. v. Arabia, d. Arabic Writing [I, 383, col. b.]); Becker, Neue arabische Papyri," 255; and Ann., A.H. 37 §219). "Subject to the Kharāj" (rajul min ahli 'l-kharāj) perhaps indicates that the man had responsibility for collecting the tax from a district and paying part of it over to the Arabs. The promise to be released from it for life would then be a substantial reward—what he collected would be entirely his own. Note the subsequent reference to him as a dihqān (n. 406, above).

599. Or, "as long as you live" (thus Cairo and Ibn al-Athīr).

600. Ancient Klysma, modern Suez at the head of the Red Sea; a canal ran from it to join up with the Nile in the region of modern Cairo (see *EI*¹, s.v. Ḳulzum).

Ashtar's death. Mu'āwiyah stood among the people and delivered a khuṭbah. He praised God and extolled Him and then said, "'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib had two right hands; one of them was cut off on the day of Ṣiffīn (meaning 'Ammār b. Yāsir) and the other today (meaning al-Ashtar)."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj—a mawlā of al-Ashtar: When al-Ashtar died we found among his things the following letter of 'Alī to the people of Egypt:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate, from the servant of God, 'Alī, Commander of the Faithful, to the community of Muslims who are jealous for God when He is disobeyed in the land and tyranny pitches its tents over the pious and the immoral equally, so that no right is respected nor any evil abstained from. Greetings. Praise be to God—there is no other but He. Now, I have sent to you one of the servants of God who does not sleep on the days of fear and does not shrink from the enemies out of wariness against calamities, who is harder on the unbelievers than the burning of the fire. He is Mālik b. al-Ḥārith, the brother of Madhḥij. Hearken unto him and obey him, for he is one of the swords of God, which does not rebound when striking and the blade of which does not become dull. If he orders you to advance, advance, and if he orders you to retire, retire, for he advances and withdraws only on my orders. (By sending him to you) I have given you preference over myself on account of his sincere advice to you and his stubborn unyielding attitude to your enemy. May God preserve you with right guidance and confirm your conviction. Salutations.

[3395] When Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr heard that 'Alī had sent al-Ashtar, he was troubled. Then, at the time of al-Ashtar's death, 'Alī wrote to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr—that was when 'Alī learned of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr's displeasure at al-Ashtar's coming:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate, from the servant of God, 'Alī, Commander of the Faithful, to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, greetings. Now, I have learned that you are displeased at my sending al-Ashtar to your province. But I did not do that because I found you tardy regarding the jihād nor in an attempt to increase your effort. If I had removed from your authority that which is under your hand, I would have appointed you over something that would have been less troublesome and more pleasing for you to exercise authority over. The man whom I had appointed over Egypt was a sincere adviser to us and resolute against our enemies. But he has completed his days and met his appointed fate, we being pleased with him. May God be pleased with him, may He increase his reward and may He make pleasant for him the place to which he has been removed. Be steadfast against your enemy and get ready for warfare. "Summon people to the path of your Lord with sagacity and goodly exhortation."[601] Multiply the mention of God's name, the asking of Him for help, and fear of Him, so that He may protect you against what troubles you and help you in that to which He has assigned you. May God help us and you in that which cannot be achieved without His mercy. Salutations.

Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr wrote to 'Alī in reply:

In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate, to the servant of God, 'Alī, Commander of the Faithful, from Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, greetings. Praise be to God—there is no other but He. The letter of the Commander of the Faithful has reached me, and I have understood it and am cognizant of its contents. There is none among the people who finds the opinion of the Commander of the Faithful more acceptable than I, no one who exerts himself more against the Commander of the Faithful's enemy or [3396] is more gracious to his friend. I went out and established the army camp and I granted security to the people except for those who raised war against us and manifested their opposition. I follow the commands of the Commander of the Faithful, I am mindful of them, I seek refuge in them, and I take my stand with them. And the help of God is sought in every circumstance. Salutations.

601. Qur'ān 16:125.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Jahḍam al-Azdī, one of the Syrians—'Abdallāh b. Ḥawālah al-Azdī: After the Syrians had returned from Ṣiffīn, they waited for the decision that the two arbitrators would reach. When the two of them left the arbitration disagreeing with one another, the Syrians gave the oath of allegiance as caliph to Mu'āwiyah, and his strength continued to increase, while the people of Iraq were in disagreement regarding 'Alī. Mu'āwiyah's only concern was Egypt, fearing its fighting men because of their proximity to him and the strength of their enmity to anyone who was of the opinions (ra'y) of 'Uthmān. Nevertheless, Mu'āwiyah knew that a group there had found the killing of 'Uthmān reprehensible and opposed 'Alī. Furthermore, he hoped that if he won control over Egypt he would also be victorious in the war against 'Alī on account of the huge sum that was raised from its kharāj.

Mu'āwiyah summoned those of Quraysh who were with him: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah, Busr b. Abī Arṭāt,[602] al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd; and others (not of Quraysh): Abū al-A'war 'Amr b. Sufyān al-Sulamī, Ḥamzah b. Mālik al-Hamdānī, and Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ al-Kindī. He said to them, "Do you know what it is I have summoned you to? I have summoned you to a matter of great importance in which I desire that God grants help." The group said, all of them or those of them that spoke, "God has never informed anyone about the unknown and He will not let us know what you wish."

'Amr b. al-Āṣ said, "By God, I think that it is the question of this [3397] land great in kharāj, rich in equipment, and numerous in population that concerns you. And you have summoned us then to ask us about what we think regarding it. If you have summoned us for that and gathered us together on account of it, then be determined and go forward, for how excellent is the view that you have formed! In conquering it you and your followers will achieve honor, your enemy will be put down, and those who oppose you will be humiliated." Mu'āwiyah said to him in reply, "I know what it is that concerns you, Ibn al-'Āṣ!" He said that because 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ had made an agreement with Mu'āwiyah, at the time when he had given Mu'āwiyah the oath of allegiance in the fight against 'Alī b.

602. See p. 206, below.

Abī Ṭālib, that Egypt would be his for the rest of his life. That was intended as an incentive for him.

Mu'āwiyah turned to those others present and said, "This one (meaning 'Amr) has thought about it and affirmed his suspicions." They said, "But we do not know!" Mu'āwiyah said, "Abū 'Abdallāh has got it right." 'Amr said, "I am Abū 'Abdallāh." Then he said, "The best supposition is that which resembles certainty."

Then Mu'āwiyah praised God and extolled Him and said:

> Now, you have seen what God has done for you in your fight against your enemy.[603] They came to you expecting that they would devastate your territory and destroy your land. They had no doubt but that you would be in their hands. "But God repelled them with their rage, and they obtained none of the good"[604] that they desired. We entrusted the decision (ḥākamnāhum) about them to God, and He decided for us against them (ḥakama lanā 'alayhim). Then He joined together our forces and settled our differences, while He cast them into enmity and division, bearing witness one against another of unbelief and shedding each other's blood. By God, I hope that this business will be concluded in our favor and I have conceived the idea that we should seek to deceive the Egyptians. What do you think of our opinion regarding that?[605]

'Amr replied, "I have informed you regarding that which you asked me about and I have advised you as you have heard." Mu'āwiyah said, "'Amr has made up his mind, but he was sharp and cutting and failed to explain (yufassir). How should I act?" 'Amr said to him, "I will advise you how you should act. I think you [3398] should send a powerful army under the command of someone who is resolute and stern, someone on whom you rely and in whom you trust. He should go and enter Egypt, and those of its people who share our view will come to him and help him against our enemies who are there. And when your army and those members of your party (shī'ah) there have united against your opponents, I hope that God will help you with your victory and aid your triumph."

603. That is, 'Alī and the Iraqis.

604. See Qur'ān 33:25.

605. Comparison with parallel sources suggests that there is an omission in the text here: They answered, "We agree with 'Amr!" Mu'āwiyah said, "But what should I do?"

Mu'āwiyah said to him, "Do you have any ideas other than this regarding what might be done in our dispute with them?" He replied, "Not that I know of." But Mu'āwiyah said, "Indeed I do! I think we should write to those of our party (shī'ah) there, and to our enemy. I will tell those of our party to persevere in their cause, and I will promise them that we are coming to their aid. And we will call our enemies there to make peace with us and give them cause to hope for our gratitude at the same time as we make them afraid about fighting against us. If what they have to offer is agreeable to us without fighting, then that is what we wanted. If it is not, then we still have the option of war available. You, Ibn al-'Āṣ, are a man blessed with hastiness, while I am a man blessed with deliberateness." 'Amr said, "Do according as God has shown you. By God, I think it inevitable that your dispute with them lead to a resumption of war."

Thereupon Mu'āwiyah wrote to Maslamah b. Mukhallad al-Anṣārī[606] and Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj al-Kindī, both of whom had opposed 'Alī:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Now, God has commissioned the two of you for a matter of importance, by which He will make great your reward, elevate your name, and make you magnificent among the Muslims—your seeking vengeance for the blood of the caliph unjustly slain and your zeal for God when the authority (ḥukm) of the Book was abandoned. You have waged jihād against the people of injustice and enmity. Rejoice in the good pleasure of God, in the imminence of the victory of the friends of God, and in the benefits that > [3399] will come to you in this world. And rejoice in our authority, until that which will please you is achieved by it, and we give you by it what you deserve in full measure according to your merits. "Be patient and vie in patience"[607] against > your enemies. Call the backslider (mudbir) to your right guidance and protection. The army (of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr) has been led astray against you and everything that you reject has been cleared away and everything that you long for has come to pass. Peace be upon you.

606. Like Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj, Maslamah was a leader of the 'Uthmāniyyah in Egypt (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

607. Qur'ān 3:200.

Mu'āwiyah wrote this letter and sent it with a client of his called Subay', who took it to Ibn Mukhallad and Ibn Ḥudayj in Egypt. There Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr was governor, having declared war on the followers of Ibn Mukhallad and Ibn Ḥudayj, and not (yet) having suffered any loss on the day the attack was made against him.[608] Subay' handed over his letter to Maslamah b. Mukhallad and also the letter of Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj, but Maslamah said, "Take Mu'āwiyah's letter to him so that he can read it, and then bring it to me so that I can answer it from both of us." The messenger took his letter to Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj, who had him read it out loud to him. When he had finished reading it, Subay' said, "Maslamah b. Mukhallad told me that I should take the letter back to him after you had read it so that he could reply to Mu'āwiyah on behalf of both of you." Ibn Ḥudayj said, "Tell him that he should do that," and he gave the letter to the messenger, who returned to Ibn Mukhallad.

The latter then wrote on behalf of himself and Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj:

> This matter for which we have sacrificed ourselves and in which we have followed God's command is something in which we hope for the reward of our Lord, deliverance from those who oppose us, and the hastening of retribution on those who violated our imām and rushed with haste into jihād against us. We, in this quarter of the earth, have re-

608. Wa-qad nāṣaba hā'ulā'i al-ḥarba bihā wa-huwa ghayru mutakhawwan bihā yawma al-iqdāmi 'alayhi. The sentence is problematic. In view of the preceding reference to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and the wa, hā'ulā'i is presumably the object, rather than subject, of nāṣaba, and refers to the followers of the two men to whom Mu'āwiyah sent the letter. The Leiden editor indicates that mutakhawwan is unvocalized and only the nūn is dotted. He suggests it be understood in the same sense as mutanaqqaṣ ("diminished," "impaired")—Lane, Lexicon, s. v. form V of kh-w-n, has "to diminish," "to impair," synonomous with tanaqqaṣa. It might be more obvious to read as mutakhawwin, "suspecting treachery or trickery" (i.e., on the part of Mu'āwiyah)—Cairo leaves unvocalized.

[3400] jected those unjust ones who were here, and we have aroused those here who are equitable and just. You have referred to our sharing in your power and your worldly success but, by God, that is nothing to incite us nor is it anything we wish for. If God brings together for us that which we seek and gives us what we desire, then this world and the next belong to God, the Lord of the worlds, Who may cause them to coincide as one world of His creation, just as He has said in His Book (and His promise is never broken): "And God gave them the reward of this world and the fairest reward of the world to come, for God loves those who do good."[609] Hasten your cavalry and your footmen to us for our enemy is furious against us and we are few among them. And (yet) they have become frightened of us while we have become equal adversaries of them. If God gives us help from your part, God will grant you success, and there is no power or might other than with God. "And God is sufficient for us, an excellent guardian."[610] Peace be with you.

This letter reached Mu'āwiyah, who was in Palestine at the time, He summoned the group of men whom he had called in connection with the letter, and said, "What do you think?" They answered, "We think that you should send an army and with God's permission you will conquer it." Mu'āwiyah said, "Get ready to go there, Abū 'Abdallāh (meaning 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ)."

Mu'āwiyah sent 'Amr with 6,000 men, and he went to bid him goodbye. While he was doing so Mu'āwiyah said to him, "'Amr, I commend to you the fear of God and mildness, for that assures success; ease of pace and deliberateness, for hurrying comes from Satan; and I recommend that you receive kindly him who draws near and leave alone him who turns his back. If he agrees, then that is excellent, but if he refuses, then severity after leniency is more effective in argument and more likely to achieve a good result. Call the people to make peace and unite. When you have gained the victory, let your helpers (anṣār) be the most favored of all by you, [3401] but do good to all the people."

609. Qur'ān 3:148.
610. Qur'ān 3:173.

'Amr departed and journeyed to the nearest parts of the land of Egypt, where he pitched camp. The 'Uthmāniyyah gathered to him and he remained with them. He wrote to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr: "Withdraw from me and do not make me shed your blood, Ibn Abī Bakr, for I do not want to lay a finger on you. The people of this land have agreed on opposition to you and rejection of your rule; they have repented of following you and are forsaking you (hum muslimūka), for matters have come to a head.[611] 'Depart from it, for I am one of your sincere advisers.'[612] Salutations."

'Amr also sent to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr the letter that Mu'āwiyah had written to him:

> The outcome of injustice and evil is great harm. Whoever sheds prohibited blood does not escape retribution in this world or evil consequences in the next. We do not know of anyone who was more persistent in injustice against 'Uthmān, more shamefully wicked against him, or more fervent in opposing him, than you. You were among those who rushed against him in assault, and you were among those who shed his blood. Then you thought that I would overlook or forget you to the extent that you made yourself ruler (amīr) over the land in which you are a neighbor of mine, and the majority of the people of which are my supporters who share my views, heed what I say and call on me for help against you. I have sent against you a band of men that is enraged against you, seeks your blood to drink, and attempts to draw near to God by jihād against you. They have given God an undertaking that they will make an exemplary punishment[613] of you, and if it were not that they intend for your something more than merely killing you, I would not have warned you nor given you notice. I would have liked them to kill you for your evil, your breaking the bonds of relationship, and your enmity against 'Uthmān on the day when he was pierced by your arrow heads between the bone that protrudes behind the ear and his jugular vein. But it is abhorrent to me that I should make an exemplary punishment of a Qurashī, though God will never deliver you from retaliation wherever you are. Salutations.

611. Following the suggestion of Ann., A.H. 38 §242, to read wa-qad for law qad. Literally the expression means "for the two rings of the camel-girth have met."
612. Qur'ān 28:20.
613. La-yumaththilunna bika.

[3402] Muḥammad folded up their two letters and sent them to 'Alī, together with a covering letter of his own: "Ibn al-'Āṣ has descended on the nearest parts of the land of Egypt, and the men of the land, most of whom are of those who share their views, have gathered to him. He has come with a clamorous and destructive army and I have observed signs of cowardice among those who are with me. If you have any use for the land of Egypt, then send me support in men and money. Peace be upon you."

'Alī replied to him:

I have received your letter in which you mention that Ibn al-'Āṣ has descended on the nearest parts of the land of Egypt with a clamorous and destructive army and that those there with a view like his have gone out to join him. But the going out to him of those who see things like him is better for you than that they should remain with you. And you have mentioned that you have observed faintness of heart in some of those who are with you. Do not lose heart but, if they are faint-hearted, fortify your habitation, gather your party (shī'ah) around you, and send Kinānah b. Bishr,[614] who is well known for sincere advice, bravery, and courage, to go against the enemy. I am sending men to you for any sort of task you may require,[615] so be patient in face of your enemy, proceed judiciously, fight them as you have purposed, and make jihād against them patiently, expecting your eternal reward. If your party is the smaller of the two, then God may strengthen the few and forsake the many. I have read the letter of the wicked one (fājir) son of the wicked one, Mu'āwiyah, and the wicked one son of the infidel, 'Amr, the two of them united in love of deeds of disobedience (to God), plotting together and taking bribes

614. According to some accounts, this man of Banū Tujīb of Kindah had given the fatal blow to 'Uthmān (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Kināna b. Bišr).

615. Literally, "on the difficult and the docile" (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṣa'b).

regarding the arbitration,[616] both of them abhorred in this world. "They have enjoyed their share as those who were before them enjoyed their share."[617] Do not let their threats and menaces frighten you. If you have not responded to them, do so as they deserve. You will find the words you seek. Salutations.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Thābit al-Anṣārī—a shaykh of the people of al-Madīnah: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr wrote to Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in reply to his letter: [3403]

> I have received your letter in which you remind me of the matter of 'Uthmān, and I make no apology to you regarding that. You tell me to withdraw from you, as if you were a sincere adviser, and you try to frighten me with reference to an exemplary punishment (al-muthlah) as if you were sympathetic to me. I hope that fortune will raise me up again over you and that I will sweep you away in battle, but if you are given the victory and authority (al-amr) in this world is yours, then, by my life, how many an evildoer you will have helped and how many a Believer you will have killed and mutilated (mathaltum). But both you and they must appear before God, for all things return to Him, and "He is the most merciful of the merciful"[618] "and God's help is to be implored against what you describe."[619] Salutations.

And Muḥammad wrote to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ: "I have understood what you have said in your letter, Ibn al-'Āṣ. You have claimed that you abhor that you should lay a finger on me, but I bear witness that you are one of the false ones. You claim that you are a sincere adviser to me, but I swear that I regard you as unworthy of trust. You claim that the people of the land have rejected my views and my authority and have repented of following me: then they are 616. Al-ḥukūmah.

617. See Qur'ān 9:69.
618. Qur'ān 12:64, 12:92.
619. Qur'ān 12:18.

friends to you and to Satan the accursed.[620] But God, the Lord of the Worlds, is our sufficiency, and our reliance is on God the Lord of the great throne.[621] Salutations."

'Amr b. al-'Āṣ advanced, heading straight for Fusṭāṭ[622] and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr stood to address the men. He praised God and extolled Him, and he prayed for His Prophet. Then he said: "You who have accepted Islam and you who believe! Those who are profaning what is sacrosanct, reviving error, kindling the fire of fitnah, and winning power by tyranny, have erected enmity against you and come against you with armies. Servants of God! Whoever [3404] desires Heaven and forgiveness, let him go out against this band and make jihād against them for God. Go against them, may God have mercy upon you, with Kinānah b. Bishr."

About 2,000 men put themselves forward to go with Kinānah, and Muḥammad went out with another 2,000 men. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ went to meet Kinānah, who was over the vanguard of Muḥammad, and he proceeded toward him. When he drew near to Kinānah, he dispatched the squadrons, one after another. Whenever one of the Syrian squadrons approached him, Kinānah would attack it with the men he had with him and assail it so as to force it to draw near again to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. He did that several times and 'Amr, seeing it, sent to Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj al-Sakūnī, who came with a sizable force[623] and surrounded Kinānah and his men. Then the Syrians gathered against them on all sides and, when Kinānah b. Bishr perceived that, he dismounted together with his men, saying, "No soul may die except with the permission of God, according to the fixed time that is written; whoever desires the reward of this life, We shall give him of it, and whoever desires the reward of the next life, We shall give him of it, and We shall recompense those who are thankful."[624] And he fought the Syrians with his sword until he fell a martyr, may God have mercy upon him. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ advanced toward Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, whose men had deserted 620. The expression occurs frequently in the Qur'ān. For the epithet al-rajīm in the sense of "Accursed," see Jeffrey, Foreign Vocabulary, s.v.

621. See Qur'ān 9:129.

622. The text has miṣr, which can indicate Egypt in general or Fusṭāṭ in particular.

623. Fī mithli al-dahm "made a surprise attack"?

624. Qur'ān 3:145.

him when they heard about the killing of Kinānah, so that he remained entirely alone.

When Muḥammad perceived that, he hurried off on foot along the road until he came to a ruined place close to it and sought shelter there. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ proceeded to occupy al-Fusṭāṭ,[625] while Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj went off in pursuit of Muḥammad. He came upon some local non-Arabs ('ulūj) on the highway and asked them, "Did anyone unknown to you pass by?" One of them replied, "No, by God, but I went in to this ruined place and I saw a man sitting [3405] in it." Ibn Ḥudayj said, "By the Lord of the Ka'bah, that is he," and they rushed forward and went in to him. They brought him out almost dead of thirst and took him off toward Fusṭāṭ of Egypt.[626]

Muḥammad's brother, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr, who was part of the army of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, hurried to 'Amr and said, "Will you kill my brother in chains? Send to Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj and forbid him to do that." So 'Amr sent to him, telling him to bring Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr to him, but Mu'āwiyah said, "Really! You have killed Kinānah b. Bishr and I should let Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr go! What an idea! 'Are your infidels better than these? Or do you have an immunity (for them) in the scriptures (zubur)?' "[627]

Muḥammad said to them, "Give me some water to drink," but Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj answered him, "May God not give him anything to drink if he ever gives you a drop.[628] You prevented 'Uthmān from drinking water until you had killed him, while he was fasting and in a state of ritual purity (iḥrām), and God received him with 'choice sealed wine.'[629] By God I will kill you, Ibn Abī Bakr, and God will give you to drink 'boiling water and pus.' "[630]

Muḥammad said to him, "Son of a Jewish weaving woman! That is not up to you or him whom you mentioned. It is only up to God. He provides drink for His friends and causes His enemies to thirst—

---

625. Fusṭāṭ basically means "tent" and that is how Ann., A.H. 38 §243, understands it here: ('Amr) "era tornato alla sua tenda." The name of the garrison town may be associated with Latin fossum "ditch."

626. Fusṭāṭ Miṣr, which may indicate that the source distinguishes between fusṭāṭ in its general signification (see the previous note) and in its use as the name of the main Arab garrison town of Egypt.

627. Qur'ān 54:43.

628. The remark is presumably addressed to the man from whom Muḥammad requested water, and the following sentences to Muḥammad himself.

629. See Qur'ān 83:25.

630. See Qur'ān 38:57, 78:25.

you and your ilk and him who has responsibility for it. Indeed, by God, if my sword had been in my hand you would not have got the better of me like this." Mu'āwiyah said to him, "Do you know what I am going to do with you? I shall put you in the belly of a donkey and then burn it with you inside."

[3406] Muḥammad said, "If you do that to me, then how often has it been done to the friends of God! I hope that God will make for me of this fire with which you burn me 'a saving coldness'[631] just as He made it for His friend Abraham, and I hope that for you and your friends He makes it as He made it for Nimrod and his. May God burn you and him whom you mentioned previously[632] and your imam (he meant Mu'āwiyah) and this one (he indicated 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ) with a fire that will blaze over you. 'As often as (its fires) die down, God increases its blaze.' "[633]

Mu'āwiyah said to him, "I am only slaying you in retaliation for 'Uthmān." Muḥammad asked him, "What have you got to do with 'Uthmān? He acted unjustly and rejected the authority (ḥukm) of the Qur'an, and God has said, 'They who do not judge (ḥ-k-m) with what God has revealed, they are the iniquitous.'[634] We held that against him and killed him, but you give him merit for it, you and those who are like you. God has absolved us—God willing—from his sin (dhanb), but you share in his offense (ithm) and the enormity of his sin, and the one who uses you [i.e., Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān] is just the same."

Mu'āwiyah became angry, had him brought forward, and killed him. Then he cast him into the corpse of a donkey and set fire to it. When 'Ā'ishah[635] heard about that, she mourned for him greatly and made extra prayers for him at the end of the ritual prayers, appealing to God against Mu'āwiyah and 'Amr. She joined the household of Muḥammad (b. Abī Bakr) to hers, and al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr[636] became part of her household.

---

631. Qur'ān 21:69.

632. Presumably 'Uthmān. Leiden has "I mentioned"; Cairo does not specify the person.

633. Qur'ān 17:97.

634. Qur'ān 5:47.

635. 'Ā'ishah, the widow of the Prophet, although an opponent of 'Alī, was a half-sister of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr.

636. Al-Qāsim became a leading religious scholar (ḥumila 'anhu al-'ilm) in Medina (see Zubayrī, Kitab nasab Quraysh, 279).

According to al-Wāqidī—Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ went out with 4,000 men, including Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj and Abū al-A'war al-Sulamī, and they (he and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr) met at al-Musannāt,[637] where they fought a great battle. When Kinānah b. Bishr b. 'Attāb al-Tujībī was killed and he could find no more men, Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr fled and tried to hide with Jabalah b. Masrūq.[638] But Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj was led to him and [3407] surrounded him, and Muḥammad then came out and fought until he was killed.

Al-Wāqidī said that (the battle at) al-Musannāt was in Ṣafar of 38 (July–August 658) and (the arbitration meeting at) Adhruḥ was in Sha'bān (January 659) of the same year.

(The narrative of Abū Mikhnaf continues.) 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ wrote to Mu'āwiyah when he had killed Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Kinānah b. Bishr: "We met Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Kinānah b. Bishr and they had with them large bodies of the men of Egypt. We called them to the right path, the accepted precedent (sunnah), and the authority (ḥukm) of the Book, but they rejected the truth and persisted in error. We made jihād against them and called on God for help, and God struck them in front and behind and they fled from us. God killed Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, Kinānah b. Bishr, and the leading men. 'Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds,'[639] and peace be upon you."

The Killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah

In this year Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah b. 'Abd Shams was killed,[640] although the experts in historical tradition (ahl al-siyar) differ regarding the date of it.

Al-Wāqidī dated it to the year 36 (656–657) and said that the cause of it was as follows: Mu'āwiyah and 'Amr set out against Ibn Abī

637. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 98, translates as "the dam"; Rhuvon Guest locates it on the map that accompanies his edition of al-Kindī's Kitab wulāt Miṣr (The Governors and Judges of Egypt) as a little northeast of modern Cairo, but indicates that the position is doubtful.

638. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to him.

639. Qur'ān 1:1.

640. Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah (see *EI*², s. v.) had been sent to Egypt by 'Uthmān but had led and fomented the opposition there against the caliph, seizing Fusṭāṭ in the disturbances at the time of 'Uthmān's murder.

Ḥudhayfah in Egypt, which he had seized. They camped at 'Ayn Shams[641] and tried to enter (Fusṭāṭ), but they could not prevail against him. Then they tricked Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah into leaving for al-'Arīsh[642] with a thousand men, and he set out leaving al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt[643] behind as his deputy over Fusṭāṭ.[644] When Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah had departed for al-'Arīsh, he fortified himself, and 'Amr came and set up the siege weapons, forcing him to descend with thirty of his companions, all of whom were taken [3408] and killed.[645] That was before 'Alī sent Qays b. Sa'd to Egypt.

Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, however, reported that Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah was taken only after the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and the entry of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ into Egypt and his seizure of it. Hishām asserted that when 'Amr and his men entered Egypt, they captured Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah and sent him to Mu'āwiyah, who was in Palestine. He incarcerated him in a prison of his, where he remained for a short time before escaping. He was a maternal cousin of Mu'āwiyah, but Mu'āwiyah let it be thought that he disapproved of his escape and he asked the Syrians for volunteers to track him down.

In reality, it is thought Mu'āwiyah had wanted Ibn Abī Ḥudhayfah to escape, but a man of Khath'am called 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. Ẓalām,[646] a brave man who was an 'Uthmānī, said that he would go in search of him. He went off immediately and came up with him at a place in the Balqā' in Ḥawrān.[647] Ibn Abī Ḥudhayfah had gone into a cave there. Some donkeys, seeking to escape rain, went into it, but when they saw the man there they shied and bolted. Some people who were harvesting near the cave said, "By God, there 641. Ancient Ōn/Heliopolis, northeast of modern Cairo (see EI², s.v.).

642. Ancient Rhinokorura, an oasis on the Mediterranean marking the border between Palestine and Egypt but traditionally counted to the latter (see EI², s.v.).

643. This is Ṭabarī's only reference to al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt (b. Makhramah al-Qurashī), who is to be distinguished from the later Thaqafī governor of al-Kūfah with the same name.

644. Miṣr.

645. The translation reflects the lack of clarity regarding the referents of the pronouns in the Arabic, but it must be Ibn Abī Ḥudhayfah and his men at al-'Arīsh who were taken and killed. Ann., 36 A.H., §399, argues that separate accounts of different expeditions of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ have here been conflated.

646. This is his only appearance in Ṭabarī's history.

647. The Balqā' is the region west of the Jordan to the south of Jerash (see EI², s.v.). For the Ḥawrān, the mountainous region south of Damascus, see EI², s.v.

is something behind the flight of these donkeys from the cave!" and they went to look and came upon him there. As they left the cave, 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. Ẓalām al-Khath'amī chanced upon them. He asked them about Ibn Abī Ḥudhayfah and described him to them, and they said, "There he is in the cave." He went and brought him out and, unwilling to send him back to Mu'āwiyah, who would let him go, cut off his head.[648]

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b b. Fuqaym—Jundab—'Abdallāh b. Fuqaym, the paternal uncle of al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b [. . .][649] calling for help from the part of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr to 'Alī. At that time Muḥammad was their governor. 'Alī rose among the men, having ordered a communal prayer service to be proclaimed and the men having gathered. He praised God and extolled Him, prayed for Muḥammad the Prophet, and then said, [3409]

> Now, this is the cry of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and your brethren among the people of Egypt. Ibn al-Nābighah,[650] the enemy of God and the friend of those who oppose God, has gone against them. Do not allow the people of error to be more united in their futility and their reliance on the path of wickedness (ṭāghūt) than you are in this just cause of yours. They have made the first move against you and your brethren in war; now you hasten to your brethren with assistance and help. Servants of God, Egypt is greater than Syria, more productive, and with better people. Do not let yourselves be defeated over Egypt, for the continuation of Egypt in your hands is a matter of pride for you and a humiliation for your enemy. Go out to al-Jara'ah[651] between al-Ḥīrah and al-Kūfah, and join me there tomorrow, God willing.

On the next day he walked out, arriving there early in the morning and waiting until it was about midday. Not one of them

---

648. Ann., A.H. 36 §400, and Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 98, note the similarity between the accounts of the killing of the two Muḥammads, Ibn Abī Ḥudhayfah and Ibn Abī Bakr, both being associated with donkeys: not only was Ibn Abī Bakr burned in an ass's skin; his hiding place was revealed by 'ulūj, a word that can mean "donkeys" as well as non-Arabs.

649. There is a lacuna in the text.

650. That is, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ.

651. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-Buldān, s.v. (II, 62).

came to him there and he went back. In the evening he sent to the notables (ashrāf), and they went in unto him in the governor's residence (qaṣr). He was dejected and downcast and he said,

> Praise be to God for what He has decreed concerning my affairs and ordained regarding what I do, and for my being put to the test through you, you party (firqah) of those who do not obey when I command or respond when I call. You are not worthy to be called sons![652] What do you expect for your steadfastness and jihād for your rightful cause? Death and humiliation are for you in this world for anything but what is right. By God, if death comes—and it will indeed come—it will certainly separate you and me, for I detest > [3410] your companionship and I care nothing for you. I am amazed at you. No religion unites you and no zeal inflames you when you have heard that your enemy is coming to your country and launching an attack against you. Is it not astonishing that Mu'āwiyah summons the uncouth and the lowly and they follow him without stipend ('aṭā') or support (ma'ūnah),[653] and they respond to him twice or thrice in one year for whatever purpose he desires? But I call you, you who are possessed of understanding, some of whom have a stipend and the rest receive support, but you remain apart from me, disobey me, and oppose me!

Mālik b. Ka'b al-Hamdānī, al-Arḥabī,[654] arose to respond to him and said, "Commander of the Faithful, send out the men for war for 'there is no perfume after the bride.'[655] I have kept myself for a day such as this and the reward only comes with the attack.[656] Fear God and answer your imam, help his cause (da'wah), and fight his enemy. I will set out for Egypt, Commander of the Faithful."

---

652. Lā abā li-ghayrikum. See n. 528, above, for lā abā lakum; the addition of the ghayr seems to be euphemistic in force (see Gloss., s.v.).

653. For these two forms of payment to soldiers, see EI², s.vv. In the present instance they appear to indicate different types of payment to different types of soldiers, the ma'ūnah being a gratuity to those not in receipt of regular stipends ('aṭā').

654. He had witnessed the arbitration document on behalf of 'Alī (see n. 345, above).

655. Apparently meaning "there is no point in saving things beyond the event for which they were intended" (see Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, II, 482).

656. (?) Wa-al-ajru lā ya'tī illā bi-al-kurrah.

'Alī commanded his crier Sa'd, who proclaimed among the men, "Stand ready for Egypt with Mālik b. Ka'b!" Then he, and 'Alī with him, went out to see and found that altogether about 2,000 men had presented themselves. 'Alī said, "Set out but, by God, I think that by the time you reach the men in Egypt everything will be over."

Mālik set off with them and traveled for five days. Then al-Ḥajjāj b. Ghaziyyah al-Anṣārī, al-Najjārī, came to 'Alī from Egypt, and so did 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shabīb al-Fazārī.[657] Al-Fazārī was 'Alī's spy in Syria, while al-Anṣārī had been with Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. Al-Anṣārī told 'Alī what he had seen and witnessed and informed him about the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. And al-Fazārī told him that before he had left Syria the reports of good tidings from 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ had arrived in succession, one after another, with news of the conquest of Egypt and the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, and his killing had been proclaimed from the minbar. He said, "Commander of the Faithful, rarely have I seen a people more overjoyed or a joy more openly manifested than I saw in Syria when news of the death of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came to them." 'Alī said, "Indeed, our sorrow for him matches their joy—no, it is many times greater." And 'Alī sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ al-Shibāmī[658] to Mālik b. Ka'b, telling the latter to come back. [3411]

'Alī grieved for Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr so much that it was visible in his face and it was obvious. He stood among the men to deliver an address, and after praising God and extolling Him, and praying for His Prophet, said:

> The wicked ones (al-fajarah), those who are unjust and evil, those who turned people from the path of God and evilly wished Islam crooked,[659] have conquered Egypt. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr has been martyred—may God have mercy upon him—and we seek for his recompense with God. By God, he was, as I know, indeed one of those who await the (divine) decrees, act (to attain) the (eternal) reward, loathe the way of the wicked (fājir), and desire the right 657. For al-Ḥajjāj, see n. 293; for 'Abd al-Raḥmān, pp. 201, below.

658. Shibām b. As'ad were part of Hamdān and this 'Abd al-Raḥmān appears as a supporter of al-Mukhtār in Ṭabarī's account of the second civil war (see XX, 189–92, of this translation).

659. See Qur'ān 3:99.

path of the Believer. By God, I do not blame myself for failing, for I am fully experienced in enduring in war; I set about the matter boldly and resolutely, and I stand ex-[3412] pressing my views effectively. I publicly call upon you for help and openly cry to you for assistance, but you do not heed what I say or obey what I command, so that things could not become worse for me. You are a people with whom vengeance will not be attained and revenge not taken. I have called you to the aid of your brethren for some fifty days, but you have gurgled as do slack-jawed camels slurping their water and you were sluggardly like people with no intention of waging jihād against the enemy or acquiring eternal reward. Then a tiny force came out to me from among you, one by one (mutadhānib)[660] "as if they were[661] being driven toward death while looking around." Shame on you!

Then he sat down. And he wrote to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, who was in al-Baṣrah:

In the name of God the Merciful and Compassionate, from the servant of God, 'Alī, the Commander of the Faithful, to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, greetings. Praise be to God, for there is no other than He. Now, Egypt has been conquered and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr has been martyred. We look for his reward with God and we treasure him (in our hearts). At the very start I stood among the people and commanded them to help him before the calamity should occur. I summoned them in secret and in public, over and over again. Some of them came unwillingly, some made lying excuses, and some stayed where they were. I ask God that He give me a way out and an escape from them and that He deliver me from them before long. By God, if I were not so desirous of dying in God's cause (shahādah), then I would [3413] not want to remain with these people for one day. May God strive to bring about for us and for you right guidance, 660. See Gloss., s.v.

661. Leiden has ka-thabaratin, but read ka-annamā with Cairo and (as noted by the Leiden editor) Ibn al-Athīr and Nuwayrī; and see Qur'ān 8:6.

(rightful) fear of Him and His right way. "He has power over everything."[662] Salutations.

Ibn 'Abbās wrote back:

In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. To the servant of God, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, the Commander of the Faithful, from 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās. Peace be upon you, Commander of the Faithful, and God's mercy and blessings. I have received your letter in which you mention the conquest of Egypt and the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. God's help is to be implored in every eventuality. May [3413] God have mercy upon Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and may He reward you, Commander of the Faithful. I have asked God to give you a way out and an escape from the flock with which you have been afflicted and that before long He strengthen you with the support of angels. God will do that for you and He will strengthen you and answer your call, and He will crush your enemy. I tell you, Commander of the Faithful, that the people sometimes drag their feet and then become eager. Treat them well, oh Commander of the Faithful, flatter them and give them something to hope for. Ask God for help regarding them. May God suffice to comfort you for the trouble they cause you. Salutations.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj—Mālik b. al-Ḥūr: 'Alī said, "May God have mercy on Muḥammad. He was a raw youth. I wish I had appointed the Mirqāl Hāshim b. 'Utbah[663] over Egypt. By God, if he had ruled it, he would not have allowed entrance to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and his helpers, the evildoers (al-fajarah al-'arṣah) and he would not have been slain without his sword in his hand, not without shedding blood like Muḥammad. But may God have mercy on Muḥammad, for he exerted himself (ijtihād al-nafs) and did his duty."

In this year, following the killing of Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, Mu'āwiyah sent 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī[664] to al-Baṣrah

662. See Qur'ān 41:39; 46:33.

663. See pp. 70ff. and n. 48, above.

664. Son of a ḥalīf of the Umayyads who was famous as the first Meccan to be killed by the Muslims after the Hijrah, 'Abdallāh himself seems to be known only [3414] to appeal for acceptance of the judgment (ḥukm) of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ in his favor. And in this year A'yan b. Ḍubay'ah al-Mujāshi'ī,[665] whom 'Alī had sent to drive Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī out of al-Baṣrah, was killed.

The Episode of Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī, Ziyād, and A'yan

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Abū al-Dhayyāl—Abū Na'āmah: After Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr had been killed in Egypt, Ibn 'Abbās departed from al-Baṣrah and went to 'Alī in al-Kūfah, leaving Ziyād[666] behind as his deputy. Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī came (to al-Baṣrah) from Mu'āwiyah and stayed among the Banū Tamīm. Ziyād sent to Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir and Mālik b. Misma',[667] saying, "You, group of Bakr b. Wā'il, belong to the supporters (anṣār) of the Commander of the Faithful, and his confidants. You know where Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī has lodged and who visits him there. Protect me (imna'ūnī) until I hear what the Commander of the Faithful thinks." Ḥuḍayn replied affirmatively, but Mālik's viewpoint inclined toward the Banū Umayyah (Marwān had sought refuge with him on the Day of the Camel).[668] He said, therefore, "This is a matter in which I cannot act alone—I will ask advice and consider."

When Ziyād saw Mālik's hesitation, he was afraid that the Rabī'ah[669] would be divided on the matter. He sent, therefore, to Nāfi' asking for advice.[670] Nāfi' advised him to approach Ṣabrah for this episode in al-Baṣrah. On the following episode, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 400.

---

665. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. A'yan b. Ḍubai'a; Banū Mujāshi' b. Dārim of Tamīm.

666. That is, Ziyād b. Abīhi who, following the death of 'Alī, transferred his allegiance to Mu'āwiyah, was recognized by him as his own half-brother, and became one of the most famous governors of Iraq (see EI[1], s.v.).

667. Ḥuḍayn and Mālik were rival leaders of the Banū Shaybān of Bakr b. Wā'il (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.vv.; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 113, 116).

668. See Ṭabarī, I, 3220.

669. That is, the confederation to which the Bakr b. Wā'il belonged.

670. The text seems to have something missing, and the translation follows the conjectural interpolation of the editor (p. 3414, note e). Nāfi' (b. al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah) was a uterine brother of Ziyād.

b. Shaymān al-Ḥuddānī,[671] to whom Ziyād sent, saying, "Will you not grant protection (jiwār)[672] to me and the treasury of the Muslims, for the treasury holds your spoils (fay') and I am the trustee (amīn) of the Commander of the Faithful?" Ṣabrah answered, "Yes indeed, if you bring it to me and stay in my house." Ziyād said, "I will bring it." He did that and came to Banū al-Ḥuddān and stayed in the house of Ṣabrah b. Shaymān, and he moved the treasury and [3415] the minbar[673] and put it in the mosque of the Banū al-Ḥuddān. Fifty men moved together with Ziyād, among them the father of Abū Ḥāḍir.[674]

On Friday Ziyād would lead the ritual prayer in the mosque of the Ḥuddān and distribute food there. Ziyād said to Jābir b. Wahb al-Rāsibī,[675] "Abū Muḥammad, I do not think Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī is going to hold back—I am sure he will fight against you. I do not know what views your men have. Consult them and see."

When Ziyād had led the prayer, he sat in the mosque and the men gathered around him. Jābir said, "Group of Azd, Tamīm are claiming that they are the ones who count and that they are more steadfast than you in war. I have heard that they desire to come against you so as to seize your guest (jār) and expel him by force from the garrison town. How will things be with you if they do that when you have given him and the treasury of the Muslims protection?" Ṣabrah b. Shaymān, who was accorded special respect, said, "If al-Aḥnaf comes, I will come, and if al-Ḥutāt comes, I will come;[676] but if merely young fellows come, then we have young

---

671. Or Ṣabirah (the edition indicates both forms of the name). He was a leader of the Azd al-Sarāt in al-Baṣrah (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ṣabra b. Šaiman). Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 126, n. 1, 400, refers to him as Ṣabirah, and that is how Cairo vocalizes.

672. For Jiwār, see *EI*², s.v. Djiwār; Crone, Roman, Provincial, and Islamic Law, 51–56.

673. The minbar, a dais from which the caliph or his representative delivered an official address (khuṭbah), was a symbol of authority. Neither it nor the khuṭbah had the mainly cultic significance that they later acquired and I have, therefore, avoided the common translations "pulpit" and "sermon."

674. Perhaps referring to the father of the Abū Ḥāḍir al-Asadī mentioned in Ṭabarī, II, 801–2, as an associate of 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah. The family of the latter claimed a relationship with Ziyād.

675. The brother of the Khārijī leader 'Abdallāh b. Wahb (see n. 464, above).

676. For al-Aḥnaf, see n. 351, above; for al-Ḥutāt b. Yazīd of the Banū Mujāshi' b. Dārim of Tamīm, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

fellows of our own (who will suffice)." Ziyād used to say, "I had to laugh, and I jumped up. There was never any stratagem I attempted to carry out in which I came closer to exposing myself than on that day when I was overcome with laughter."[677]

Then Ziyād wrote to 'Alī: "Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī has come from Syria and has put up in the house of the Banū Tamīm. He has lamented the death of 'Uthmān and appealed for war. Tamīm and most of the people of al-Baṣrah have given him the oath of allegiance and there was nobody left with me with whom I might seek protection so I have asked for it for myself and the treasury from Ṣabrah b.
[3416] Shaymān and I moved and put up with them. The party (shī'ah) of 'Uthmān continuously consorts with Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī."

'Alī sent A'yan b. Ḍubay'ah al-Mujāshi'ī to split his fellow tribesmen from Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī. He told him,[678] "See what the situation is. If the party of Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī has been split, then that is what you want; but if they manage to persist in disobedience, then go and make jihād against them. If you see any holding back in those on your side, and you are afraid that you will not achieve what you want, use flattery and procrastination toward them. Then keep your ears and eyes open, for it will be as if the armies of God have drawn near you, fighting the evil ones."

A'yan arrived and went and stayed with Ziyād. Then he went to his fellow tribesmen and, having gathered some together, went up to Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī. He appealed to the latter's followers, but they abused him verbally and skirmished with him, so that he had to leave them. Subsequently a crowd (qawm) broke in upon him and killed him.

---

677. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 126, n. 1, expresses puzzlement at Ziyād's laughter following Ṣabrah's remark, and the point of Ziyād's remark is indeed puzzling. Presumably the "stratagem" (makīdah) here refers to his attempt to manipulate the Azd into opposition to the Tamīm, and perhaps he was moved to laughter by what he saw as Ṣabrah's overestimation of his own value—needing Ṣabrah's support, he could not afford to be seen to be belittling him?

678. This phrase is not in the text, but is called for if we are to read, with the Leiden edition, following Ibn al-Athīr and Nuwayrī, fa-wajjaha 'Aliyyun. The Leiden editor notes that in the ms. it is possible to read fa-wajjih 'alayya ("send to me A'yan. . ."] and, therefore, we could understand the following paragraph as a continuation of Ziyād's letter to 'Alī. However, the final sentences of the paragraph sound more appropriate in instructions from 'Alī to A'yan than in a letter from Ziyād to 'Alī.

After A'yan b. Ḍubay'ah had been killed, Ziyād wanted to fight Tamīm, but they sent to the Azd, saying, "We have not assailed your guest nor any of your men, so what do you want with our guest [Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī] and making war against us?" The Azd did not want to fight and said, "If they assail our guest, we will oppose them; but if they refrain from attacking ours, we will refrain from attacking theirs." They restrained themselves.

Ziyād wrote to 'Alī:

> A'yan b. Ḍubay'ah arrived and gathered together those of his clan who obeyed him, and with them he went in all seriousness and with a pure intention to Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī and called upon the opponents to obey. He summoned them to desist and cease their discord, and most of them agreed.[679] That frightened the supporters of Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī, and many of those with them split away, giving them cause to expect that they would help him. There was skirmishing and A'yan returned to his own people, but then the enemy broke in upon him and took him unawares and he was felled. May God have mercy upon A'yan. At that I wanted to fight them, but there was no one I could prevail upon to hasten with me against them. The two tribes (Azd and Tamīm) have exchanged messages and refrained from fighting one another.

When 'Alī read his letter, he summoned Jāriyah b. Qudāmah al-Sa'dī[680] and dispatched him with fifty men of the Banū Tamīm, and with him he sent Sharīk b. al-A'wal.[681] (It is also said that he sent Jāriyah with 500 men.) 'Alī wrote to Ziyād, approving of what he had done and telling him to aid Jāriyah b. Qudāmah and to offer him advice. Jāriyah came to al-Baṣrah and went to Ziyād, who said to him, "Be ready and take care lest there befalls you what befell your companion (A'yan). And do not trust any of the people (qawm)." [3417]

679. (?) Wa-wāfaqathum 'āmmatu qawmin; the editor notes that Ibn al-Athīr has wa-wāqafahum nahārahu, and he suggests that we might read wa-wāqafahum 'āmmata yawmin ("confronted them for an entire day"; see Gloss., s.v. 'āmmah).

680. See n. 499, above, for this Tamīmī.

681. For this supporter of 'Alī, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.

Jāriyah went to his own tribe (qawm) and read the letter of 'Alī to them. He made them promises and most of them responded to him. Then he went to Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī and besieged him in the house of Sunbīl.[682] He set fire to the house with Ibn al-al-Ḥaḍramī and his supporters inside—there were seventy men (it is also said that there were forty). The people were dispersed and Ziyād returned to the governor's residence (dār al-imārah).

Ziyād then sent Ẓabyān b. 'Umārah,[683] who was one of those who had come with Jāriyah, with a letter to 'Alī [. . .][684] "And Jāriyah came to us and went against Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī and put him in a state of commotion,[685] forcing him into one of the houses of the Banū Tamīm with a number of his companions after offering him forgiveness, warning him, and calling him to obedience. But they did not repent or turn back, and he set fire to the house with them inside, and burned them in it, and then it was destroyed over them. And away with those who are tyrannical and disobey!"

'Amr b. al-'Arandas al-'Awdī[686] said:

We sent Ziyād back to his residence, and the guest of Tamīm vanished in smoke.
May God revile a people that roasted its guest.
[3418] "For two dirhams the skin of the sheep will be singed off"
Call out the slaughterers and their rabble, after they have singed his (Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī's) head with flames.[687]
We are a people whose custom it is to defend our protected guest from attack by force.
We have defended him when he abode among us, and only (a people with) honor can defend its guest.
They (Tamīm) did not acknowledge the sanctity of the grant of protection, when a noble people attaches great importance to its guest,

682. Following the Leiden text; the ms. has Sabīl (?) here and in I, 2906, where we are told that 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim returned to al-Baṣrah from Khurāsān and was present with Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī in the "house of Sunbīl/Sabīl" during this episode.

683. See n. 50, above, for this Tamīmī.

684. There is a lacuna in the text.

685. Fa-taltalahu; Cairo has fa-qatalahu.

686. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only citation of this poet.

687. For the three hemistichs, see Gloss., s.v. kh-n-q.

Just as they did before with al-Zubayr, on the evening when his arms were plundered.[688]

And Jarīr b. 'Aṭiyyah b. al-Khaṭafā[689] said:

You [Tamīm] acted treacherously toward al-Zubayr, and did not fulfill your undertaking in the way that Azd did when they defended Ziyād.
Their guest received a mighty deliverance, while the guest of the Banū Mujāshi' [Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī] became ashes.
If you had tied the rope of Abū Sa'īd, then what the sword belt bears would have scattered the people.
He led the horses near the dust of death, and enveloped them with the lances and spears.[690]

The Opposition of al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid and the Banū Nājiyah to 'Alī, and al-Khirrīt's Separation from Him

And among the events of this year (that is, the year 38 [658–659]) there was the declaration of opposition to 'Alī by al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid and the Banū Nājiyah, and al-Khirrīt's separation from him.[691]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith al-Azdī—his paternal uncle, 'Abdallāh b. Fuqaym: Al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid came to 'Alī, he being one of 300 men of the Banū Nājiyah who were with 'Alī in al-Kūfah. They had come with al-Khirrīt from

688. According to the traditions, after the Camel al-Zubayr was granted jiwār by a man of Tamīm but was subsequently killed by Tamīmīs in Wādī al-Sibā' (see, e.g., Ibn Sa'd, III/1, 78–79; *EI*², s.v. Djamal).

689. One of the famous poets of the Umayyad period (see *EI*², s.v. Djarīr).

690. The last two verses refer to the abandonment of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab (i.e., Abū Sa'īd, correctly identified in the Cairo ed.) by those Tamīmīs who had supported him in his revolt against Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik in 102/720. See Ṭabarī, II, 1395ff.; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 312ff.

691. For al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid and the following events, see SNB, III, 119–51; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, apud Levi della Vida, "Il Califfato," 486; Ann., A.H. 38 §§192–200; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 86ff.; Morony, Iraq, 443–44; *EI*², s.v. al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdalbait b. al-Ḥārith. For the complex issue of the genealogy of the Banū Nājiyah, regarded by some as descended from Quraysh, see Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 188–89 (Eng. tr., I, 173–74); Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Nāǧiya b. Garm.

al-Baṣrah, whence they had gone out to join 'Alī on the Day of the Camel, and had been present with him at Ṣiffīn and al-Nahrawān. Al-Khirrīt came to 'Alī with 30 horsemen from among his men, proceeding in the midst of them until he stood before him, and said, [3419] "By God, 'Alī, I will not obey your orders nor pray behind you, and tomorrow I shall separate from you." (That was after the appointment of the two arbitrators.)[692]

'Alī said to him, "May your mother be bereaved of you! Then you will disobey your Lord, violate your covenant, and cause only evil to yourself. Tell me why you are doing that." He answered, "Because you have given authority (to men) over the Book (of God) (ḥakkamta fī al-kitāb), and you have shown no strength for (defending) the truth when matters became serious, but have relied on those people who have done evil to themselves.[693] I upbraid you and detest them, and I separate myself from you all."

'Alī said to him, "Come, and I will study with you the Book and examine with you the authoritative precedents (sunan), and I will broach with you matters concerning the truth of which I am more knowledgeable than you, and perhaps you will understand that of which you are now unaware and perceive that about which you are now ignorant." Al-Khirrīt said, "Then I will return to you." 'Alī said, "Do not let Satan seduce you or ignorance carry you away. By God, if you seek right guidance from me and my advice and accept what I say, I shall lead you in the path of righteousness." And al-Khirrīt left 'Alī's presence and returned to his people.

I ('Abdallāh b. Fuqaym) hurried after him. One of his cousins was a friend of mine, and I wanted to meet that cousin and tell him what had happened so that he could tell al-Khirrīt to obey the Commander of the Faithful and accept his advice and so he could inform him that that would be better for him in the things of this world and those of the next. I went to al-Khirrīt's house, where he had arrived before me, and I stood by the door. Inside were some of his companions who had not been with him when he had had the audience with 'Alī.

692. The sentence in parentheses is probably to be understood as an explanation of causation as well as temporal sequence, but the whole question of the temporal and causative relationship between the revolt of the Banū Nājiyah and the other events of the Fitnah is very complex (see the previous note for the different treatments of Wellhausen and Morony).

693. The locution (ẓalamū anfusahum) is Quranic.

By God, he did not skimp on any detail about what had passed between himself and 'Alī, and then he said to them, "Men, I had decided to separate from this man. I have now left him on the understanding that I will return to him tomorrow, but tomorrow I think it is inevitable that I shall separate from him." Most of his men said, "Wait until you see him, and, if he produces something of which you approve, then accept it from him; if he does not, then how much better placed you will be to separate from him." He said to them, "An excellent idea!" [3420]

Then I asked permission to go in unto him, and they allowed me to. I said, "I implore you by God not to separate from the Commander of the Faithful and the community of the Muslims, not to provide grounds for the use of force against you, and not to kill those whom I see of your clansmen. 'Alī follows what is right." Al-Khirrīt said, "I will go to him tomorrow and listen to his arguments and see what he puts before me and has to say. If I see it to be what is right and true guidance, I will accept it; but, if I see it to be error and injustice, I will reject it."

I went apart with that cousin of his, who was one of al-Khirrīt's closest intimates. He was Mudrik b. al-Rayyān, one of the important men among the bedouins.[694] I said to him, "I owe to you the obligations that arise from brotherhood and love, in addition to the obligations of a Muslim to a Muslim. You have heard what your cousin has said about himself—work on him to make him change his mind and see the magnitude of what he is doing. I fear that if he separates from the Commander of the Faithful, he will kill both himself and his clansmen." He replied, "God bless you for a brother. You have given sincere advice and have been a true friend. If my friend wishes to separate from the Commander of the Faithful, I will separate from him and oppose him, and I shall be the most strenuous of the people against him. Later I shall talk to him privately and counsel him to obey the Commander of the Faithful, to be his sincere advisor, and to remain with him. In that lies his good fortune and right guidance."

694. Mudrik seems to be known only from this account by 'Abdallāh b. Fuqaym (for his death in the fighting, see p. 185, below). It seems that kāna min rijāl al-'arab refers specifically to the bedouins.

Then I left him, intending to go back to the Commander of the Faithful and inform him of the way things were, but I trusted in what my companion had said and so returned to my dwelling, where I spent the night. The next day I arose and when it was mid-morning I went to the Commander of the Faithful and sat in his presence for a while, wanting to tell him in private what I had heard from the cousin, but I sat there for a long while and the number of those present continued to increase. I therefore drew near to him and sat [3421] behind him, and he leaned toward me to listen to what I had to say.

I told him what I had heard from al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid, what I had said to him, and what he had replied to me. And I told him what I had said to his cousin and how he had answered me. 'Alī said, "Let al-Khirrīt be. If he recognizes the truth and approaches it, we will recognize that and accept it from him. If he refuses to come, we will seek him." I said, "Commander of the Faithful, why do you not seize him now, put him in irons, and imprison him?" He answered, "If we did that with everyone whom we have suspicions about, we would fill our prisons with them. I think that should be done—he meant moving against people, imprisoning them, and punishing them—only when they manifest opposition against us."

I finished speaking to him and moved away and rejoined the others. After a short while 'Alī said, "Come here to me!" I did so, and he said to me secretly, "Go to the man's house and find out for me what he has done, for he has always previously come to me earlier than this."

I went to his house and found nobody there. I called out at the gates of other houses where there had been a group of his companions, and nobody replied or answered. So I returned to 'Alī, who said when he saw me, "Have they stayed and remained in security, or have they moved away and departed?" I replied, "Indeed, they have gone away and declared their position." He said, "They have done it! May there be 'a sweeping away' for them 'as Thamūd were swept away.'[695] Indeed, if the tips of lances had been trained upon them and swords been brought down upon their heads, they would have repented. Satan today has seduced them and misled them, and tomorrow he will 'rid himself of them'[696] and leave them in the lurch."

695. See Qur'ān 11:95. Thamūd are one of the peoples mentioned in the Qur'ān as having been destroyed by God for their refusal to accept His message.

Ziyād b. Khaṣafah[697] stood up before him and said, "Commander of the Faithful, if the only harm was their separation from us, their loss would be no such great matter that we would grieve for them, for they added little to our numbers if they stayed, and their departure from us has decreased us but little. But we are afraid lest [3422] they alienate from us a large number of those they go to and who have previously been obedient to you. So allow me to go after them so that I can bring them back to you, God willing." 'Alī answered him, "Do you know where they are headed?" "No," he answered, "but I will go out and ask and follow after them." 'Alī said to him, "Go as far as Dayr Abī Mūsā,[698] may God have mercy on you, but do not go any farther until you receive my orders. If they have gone off as a group openly, then my officials will write telling me; but if they have split up and kept under cover, then that will keep them better hidden and I will write to my officials about them."

'Alī wrote one text and sent copies of it to his officials: "Some men have fled from us, and we suspect that they have headed toward the territory of al-Baṣrah. Make enquiries about them of the people of your region and set agents to keep a lookout for them in each district of your area. Write to me about anything that you hear concerning them. Salutations."

Ziyād b. Khaṣafah went as far as his house and gathered his men together. He praised God and extolled Him and then said, "Now, band of Bakr b. Wā'il, the Commander of the Faithful has assigned me to a matter of great importance for him and has commanded me to see to it quickly. You are his party (shī'ah) and his helpers (anṣār) and of all the clans you are the most trustworthy respecting his own self. So join with me in this right now, and make haste."

By God in no time at all 120 or 130 of them joined him and he said, "We are enough—we do not want more than this." They left

696. See Qur'ān 8:48.

697. See n. 73, above.

698. Also mentioned in Ṭabarī, II, 644, in an account concerning al-Mukhtār, it is evidently outside al-Kūfah (not to be confused with Dār Abī Mūsā in the town).

and crossed the bridge and came to Dayr Abī Mūsā, where he stopped. He remained there for the rest of the day, awaiting the orders of the Commander of the Faithful.

[3423] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-A'war al-Taymī—Abū Sa'īd al-'Uqaylī—'Abdallāh b. Wa'l al-Taymī:[699] By God, I was with the Commander of the Faithful when a messenger[700] came to him with a letter from Qaraẓah b. Ka'b al-Anṣārī[701] in his hands:

> In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate. I inform the Commander of the Faithful that horsemen have passed us coming from al-Kūfah and heading toward Niffar[702] and that one of the *dihqān*s from the Lower Euphrates called Zādhān Farrūkh, one who has allied himself with our religion and community,[703] was coming from his maternal relatives in the district of Niffar. They arraigned him[704] and said, "Are you a Muslim or an infidel?" He answered, "Indeed, I am a Muslim." Then they asked him, "What do you say about 'Alī?" and he replied, "Good things—I say that he is the Commander of the Faithful and the lord of mankind." They said to him, "You have committed unbelief, enemy of God!" A band of them then attacked him and cut him to bits. And they discovered one of the protected people (ahl al-dhimmah) with him, whom they asked, "What are you?" He replied, "One of the protected people," and they said, "Regarding this one, we have no right to arraign him." Then that protected man came and told us what had happened. I had been asking questions

699. Of the Banū Taym of Bakr b. Wā'il, he was subsequently active in the movement of the Tawwābūn (see vol. XX of this translation, pp. 8off.). 'Alī's reference to him below as "my nephew" is not to be taken literally.

700. Fayj, from Persian payk, possibly indicating a foot messenger or courier (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

701. A Companion of the Prophet who had been made governor of Al-Kūfah by 'Alī before the Camel (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

702. Midway between al-Kūfah and (the later) al-Wāsiṭ near the southern end of the Nars canal (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and 73–74).

703. Literally, "he has made the ṣalāt."

704. 'Araḍū lahu, i.e., they subjected him to inquisition in the manner of the Khāriji isti'rāḍ (see n. 489, above). The similarity between the following account and the previous stories that contrast the cruel Khāriji treatment of the Muslim with their strict observance of the rights of the dhimmī is obvious.

about them, but no one could tell me anything. Now let the Commander of the Faithful write to me telling me his views so that I will know them. Salutations.

'Alī wrote back to him: "I have taken note of what you have said about the band that passed by you and slaughtered the pious Muslim while the transgressing infidel had security with them. They are a people whom Satan has seduced. They have gone astray and are like those who 'reckoned that there would be no fitnah, and they became blind and deaf.'[705] 'Make them hear and make them watch for a day'[706] on which their deeds will be known. Remain at your post and occupy yourself in collecting your taxes[707] and you will remain, as you have said, obedient and a sincere advisor. Salutations."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-A'war al-Taymī—Abū Sa'īd al-'Uqaylī—'Abdallāh b. Wa'l: 'Alī, peace be upon him, sent me with a letter to Ziyād b. Khaṣafah. At that time I was just a young man: "I ordered you to wait at Dayr Abī Mūsā until you received my orders. That was because I did not know the direction in which those people were headed. Now I have heard that they have gone in the direction of a settlement called Niffar. Follow them and enquire about them. They have killed a man of the Sawād[708] who had taken part in our prayer ritual. When you overtake them, send them back to me; but if they refuse, fight them and ask God for help against them. They have departed from the truth, shed inviolate blood, and spread fear on the roads. Salutations." [3424]

I took the letter from him but had not gone very far with it before I turned back and said, "Commander of the Faithful, should I not continue with Ziyād b. Khaṣafah against the enemy after I have given him your letter?" He answered, "My nephew, do so and I hope, by God, that you will be one of my helpers in the cause of the truth and one of my supporters against those evil ones." I said to him, "By God, Commander of the Faithful, I am indeed one of those, and I am at your service."

705. Qur'ān 5:71.
706. Qur'ān 19:38.
707. Aqbil 'alā kharājika.
708. That is, the fertile ("black") land of Iraq.

Ibn Wa'l said: By God, I would not want to exchange those words of 'Alī for anything.[709] Then I went to Ziyād b. Khaṣafah with 'Alī's letter, riding a splendid and noble horse and bearing arms. Ziyād said to me, "Oh my nephew, I cannot do without you and indeed I want you to be with me in my task." I said to him, "I asked the permission of the Commander of the Faithful for that, and he gave it to me." Ziyād was delighted about that.

We left and came to Niffar, where we asked about them and were told that they had gone up toward Jarjarāyā.[710] We pursued them and were told that they had taken the road to al-Madhār,[711] and that is where they had camped when we caught up with them, having been there a day and a night. They had rested and foddered their [3425] mounts, and they were relaxing. We, however, came to them tired and exhausted, fatigued and worn out. When they saw us, they rushed for their horses and mounted them while we advanced and came up to them and confronted them. Their leader, al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid, called out to us, "You who are blind of heart and of understanding, are you with God, His Book, and the precedent (sunnah) of His Prophet, or are you with the evildoers?" Ziyād b. Khaṣafah answered him, "Indeed we are with God and with him to whom God and His Book and His Prophet are preferable as a reward to the things of this world from the time it was created until the day when it ends, you who are blind of understanding and deaf of heart and hearing."

Al-Khirrīt said to us, "Tell me what you want," and Ziyād, who was experienced and temperate in manner, said, "You see how exhausted and hungry we are, and the thing we have come for is not helped by open argument in the hearing of my men and yours. Let us both dismount, and then we will meet together in private and discuss this business of ours together. We will consider, and if you think the thing we have come for is of benefit for you, you will accept it. If I think that in what I hear from you there is something of advantage for us and for you, I will not reject it." Al-Khirrīt said, "Let us dismount, then."

---

709. Ḥumr al-na'am; literally, "the choicest camels" (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. aḥmar).

710. On the Tigris to the north of Niffar (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and 37).

711. Exact site unknown, but to the east of the Tigris in the Jūkhā region and in the vicinity of Nahrawān (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 42–43).

Ziyād came back to us and said, "Let us dismount by this water." When we had reached the water, we began to dismount and before long we had dismounted and split up into groups and formed circles of ten, nine, eight, and seven, each placing their food in front of them and eating and then going to the water to drink. Ziyād said to us, "Put the nosebags on your horses," and we did so, while Ziyād remained between us and the enemy, who moved aside and then dismounted.

Ziyād turned to us, and when he saw that we had split up and formed circles he said, "Glory be to God! Are you men of war! By God, if these should come against you now while you are in this [3426] state, they could not ask of anyone anything better for them than the state you are in. Be quick and go to your horses!" We made haste and scurried about. Among us there were those who had relieved themselves and were making their ablutions,[712] those who were drinking, and those who were giving water to their horses.

When we had finished that, Ziyād came to us with a root in his hand that he was tearing at with his teeth. He tore two or three bites from it and then was brought a vessel containing water, from which he drank. He cast down the root from his hand and said, "Men, we have met our enemy and, by God, you are equal in number to them. I have made a rough estimate, and I do not think that either of the two sides has five men more than the other. And, by God, I think that the issue between you is bound to end in fighting. If things do bring you and them to that, do not be the weaker of the two." Then he said to us, "Let each one of you take hold of the reins of his horse (and wait) until I approach the enemy, summon their leader to me, and argue with him. If he gives me the oath of allegiance on the conditions that I have laid down, well and good; but if I call to you, mount your horses and then come to me altogether, not dispersed."

He went on before us (and I was with him) and I heard one of the enemy saying, "When they came against you they were weary and fatigued while you were relaxed and rested. But you have allowed them to dismount, eat, drink, and rest. That was a bad decision for, by God, the matter that is between us will inevitably result in fighting."

712. Yatanaffaḍu thumma yatawaḍḍa'u. Biberstein-Kazimirski's Arabic-French dictionary has relevant meanings under n-f-ḍ, forms VIII and X.

They fell silent and we went up to them. Ziyād b. Khaṣafah summoned their leader and said, "Let us go aside and examine this matter of ours." By God, he came to Ziyād in a party of five, so I said to Ziyād, "Call up three more of our men so that we meet them on equal terms," and he answered, "Call up whomever you wish." So I called up three of our men and we were five strong each.

[3427] Ziyād asked him, "What did you hold against the Commander of the Faithful and us, and why did you separate from us?" He replied, "I did not approve of your leader as an imam and I did not approve of your conduct. Therefore I decided that I would go apart and join those who call for consultation (al-shūrā). Then, when a man acceptable to the whole of the community was agreed upon, I would be with the people (as a whole)." Ziyād said to him, "Woe to you! Can the people agree on a man from among them who (even) approximates, in his knowledge of God, His precepts (sunan), and His Book, and also in his close relationship to the Prophet and precedence in accepting Islam, to your lord from whom you have separated?" The opponent answered him, "I have told you my views." Ziyād then asked him, "Why did you kill that Muslim man?" He replied, "It was not I who killed him, but a band of my men." Ziyād said, "Hand them over to us," but he replied, "There are no grounds for that." Ziyād responded, "Is that your final decision?" and he insisted, "It is as you hear."

We called up our men and he called up his, and then we advanced and, by God, such fighting was never seen since my Lord created me. We thrust at each other with lances until none remained in our hands, and we exchanged blows with swords until they were twisted out of shape. Most of the horses, ours and theirs, were hamstrung, and the injured men on both sides were numerous. Two of our men were killed, the mawlā of Ziyād, called Suwayd, who carried Ziyād's banner, and one of the abnā'[713] called Wāfid b. Bakr. We felled five of them, and then night fell and drew a veil between us. By God, neither we nor they had any desire to continue fighting, and both Ziyād and I were wounded.

713. Perhaps indicating Persian ancestry (see *EI*² and Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, both s.v. abnā'), but the name is purely Arab.

The enemy then withdrew and we spent the night apart. After a time, during the night, they moved off, and we followed them as far as al-Baṣrah, where we heard that they had gone to al-Ahwāz and had camped on its border. There about 200 of their supporters who had been with them in al-Kūfah joined them. These had not been strong enough to rise up together with the others, but had risen up (subsequently) and followed them and joined them in the territory of al-Ahwāz, where they remained with them. [3428]

Ziyād b. Khaṣafah wrote to 'Alī:

> We overtook the enemy of God from the Banū al-Nājiyah at al-Madhār and we summoned them to the right path and the truth and to what we have in common.[714] But they did not abide in the truth "and pride in sin seized them"[715] "and Satan made their deeds seem beautiful to them and turned them from the path."[716] They attacked us, but we fought back at them and we struggled fiercely from noon to sunset. Two of our righteous men fell as martyrs and five of the enemy were killed. They abandoned the field to us, and injuries were widespread on both sides. Then, when night fell, they departed under cover of it, turning aside to the territory of al-Ahwāz. We have heard that they are camped there in a part of it while we are in al-Baṣrah, healing our wounds and awaiting your command. May God have mercy upon you and peace be upon you.

When I delivered his letter, 'Alī read it out loud to the men and Ma'qil b. Qays arose before him and said, "Commander of the Faithful, God keep you. There should have been ten of the Muslims in the place of each one of those who have gone after those men. When they overtook them, they would have rooted them out and suppressed them completely. But, if an equal number confront them, by my life, they hold fast against them. They are Arabs and one number holds fast against the same and obtains its rights from it."

'Alī said, "Ma'qil b. Qays, get ready to go against them," and he detailed 2,000 of the men of al-Kūfah to go with him, including

---

714. Illā. . . kalimat al-sawā'; see Qur'ān 3:64.
715. See Qur'ān 2:206.
716. Qur'ān 27:24, 29:38.

Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī.[717] He wrote to Ibn 'Abbās: "Send a firm and brave man who is known for his righteousness together [3429] with 2,000 men to follow after Ma'qil. As he goes through the territory of al-Baṣrah he will be the commander of his men until he reaches Ma'qil. But, once he has come to Ma'qil, the latter will be the commander of both forces and your man must listen to what he says and obey him and not oppose him. And tell Ziyād b. Khaṣafah to come to me. What an excellent man he is and how excellent those of his men who have fallen!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-A'war—Abū Sa'īd al-'Uqaylī: 'Alī wrote to Ziyād b. Khaṣafah:

> Now, I have received your letter and taken note of what you say about the man of the Banū Nājiyah and his brethren "on whose hearts God has set a seal"[718] "and Satan has made their deeds seem beautiful to them and they go astray"[719] "while they think that they are performing good deeds."[720] And you have described what happened to you and to them. As for you and your men, may God bless your effort and from God is due your reward. Rejoice in the reward of God for it is better than this world over which the ignorant ones destroy their souls. "What is with you passes while what is with God persists. We shall surely give those who were steadfast their reward according to the best of what they have done."[721] As for your enemy whom you met, sufficient for them is their having left the right guidance for error and their perpetration of it, their having rejected the truth and being obstinate in fitnah. "So leave them and the falsehood they fabricate"[722] and leave them "in their insolence wandering astray"[723] and you yourselves hear and understand. I can see you among them shortly, some of them captive, others slain. Come, you and your men, to us well rewarded.

---

717. Leiden vocalizes as Mughfil, Cairo as Mughaffal (Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, has several instances of Mughaffal but none of Mughfil).
718. Qur'ān 16:108, 47:16.
719. Qur'ān 27:24, 29:38, and 27:4.
720. Qur'ān 18:104.
721. Qur'ān 16:96.
722. Qur'ān 6:112, 6:137.
723. Qur'ān 6:110, 7:186.

You have heard and obeyed, and done well in the test. Salutations.

The man of the Banū Nājiyah[724] remained encamped in a part of al-Ahwāz, where many of the local non-Arabs ('ulūj) joined him, desiring to avoid the kharāj,[725] as well as many bandits and another group of bedouin who adopted his position against 'Alī. [3430]

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madā'inī]—'Alī b. Mujāhid—al-Sha'bī: After 'Alī had slain the people at al-Nahrawān, many came out in opposition to him. His outlying provinces rebelled against him and the Banū Nājiyah opposed him. Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī came to al-Baṣrah, the people of al-Ahwāz rebelled, and those subject to the kharāj were eager to avoid it, Then Sahl b. Ḥunayf was expelled from Fārs, where he had been 'Alī's governor. Ibn 'Abbās proposed to 'Alī, "I will take care of Fārs for you by means of Ziyād," and 'Alī told Ibn 'Abbās to send Ziyād there. Ibn 'Abbās went to al-Baṣrah and sent Ziyād to Fārs with a strong army, which he used to suppress the people of Fārs, who then fulfilled their duty to pay kharāj.

According to Abū Mikhnaf, whose account is now resumed—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b—'Abdallāh b. Fuqaym al-Azdī: I and my brother Ka'b were in that army under Ma'qil b. Qays. When he intended to depart, he went to 'Alī, who bade him farewell and said, "Ma'qil, fear God to your utmost. It is God's instruction (waṣiyyah) to the Believers that you should not act unjustly to those of your religion and community,[726] should not commit evil against the protected people, and should not wax proud, for God does not love those who wax proud." Ma'qil said, "God's help is to be sought,"[727] and 'Alī responded, "(He is) the best of those whose help is to be sought."

Ma'qil set out, and we with him, and we came to al-Ahwāz.[728] We remained there, awaiting the men from al-Baṣrah, for they had delayed in joining us. Ma'qil b. Qays stood among us and said, "Men, we have waited for the men of al-Baṣrah but they have kept us

724. That is, al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid.

725. Literally, "to break (kasara) it."

726. Literally, "those who share your direction of prayer" (ahl al-qiblah).

727. Qur'ān 12:18.

728. The name of the province, and its capital, at the head of the Persian Gulf to the east of Iraq. It is also called Khūzistān. (See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and 232ff.)

waiting and we are not, praise be to God, few or lacking support. Let us go, therefore, against this paltry and lowly enemy, and I hope that God will aid you and destroy them."

My brother Ka'b b. Fuqaym addressed him and said, "You are [3431] right, may God guide you, in your views. By God, I hope that God will help us against them but, if it is otherwise, then in death while following the truth is a consolation for the loss of this world." Ma'qil said, "Go on with the blessing of God." We went on and, by God, Ma'qil did not cease to display honor and affection for me, above that which he showed to anyone else in the army. He kept repeating, "How did you say it?—'In death while following the truth there is consolation for the loss of this world'? You spoke the truth, by God, and said a good thing, and have been truly guided."[729]

We had gone on for less than a day when a messenger overtook us, rushing with a letter (ṣaḥīfah) in his hand from 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: "If my messenger reaches you in the place where you were waiting or he reaches you when you have left it, do not leave the place where my messenger gets to you. Stay there until the expedition that we have sent to you arrives. For I have sent Khālid b. Ma'dān al-Ṭā'ī,[730] one of the men of righteousness, religion, bravery, and courage. Give ear to him and and acknowledge those qualities. Salutations." Ma'qil read the letter out loud to the men and praised God, for that plan (of marching on without the Baṣrans) had frightened them. We waited, therefore, until the Ṭā'ī reached us. He came and went in unto our leader, greeting him as the holder of authority, and they joined together to form one army.

Then we departed and moved against the enemy, who began to go up toward the hills of Rāmhurmuz,[731] aiming for a fortified castle there. But the people of the region came to us and informed us about that, and we went after them in pursuit. We caught up with them as they had drawn near to the hill. We formed ourselves into a line against them and proceeded toward them. Ma'qil placed Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal over his right wing, and Minjāb b. Rāshid al-Ḍabbī, 729. The narrator seems to have switched from 'Abdallāh b. Fuqaym to his brother Ka'b. See the following explicit reference to Ka'b as the narrator.

730. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; and *EI*², s.v. Ḳaḥṭaba b. Shabīb (Khālid was the grandfather of the 'Abbāsids' general Qaḥṭabah).

731. Rāmhurmuz is a town three days' march east of the town of Ahwāz (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 243–44).

one of the men of al-Baṣrah, over his left.[732] Al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid al-Nājī formed a line out of those bedouin who were with him, and [3432] they made up his right wing. And he put the local people, the non-Arabs, those who wanted to avoid the kharāj and their followers from among the Kurds[733] as a left wing.

Ma'qil b. Qays went around among us, encouraging us and saying, "Servants of God, do not look the enemy directly in the eye but lower your gaze and speak little. Prepare yourselves for thrusting and striking and rejoice in the expectation of the great reward for fighting them. You will be fighting only renegades (māriqah) who have reneged on the religion, non-Arabs who have refused the kharāj, and Kurds. Wait until I attack and then charge as one man." He passed along the whole of the line, saying that to them until, when he had passed by all of the men, he went forward and took his place in the center of the line in the 'heart.'[734] We looked to see what he would do, and he waved his banner twice and, by God, they withstood us only for a short while before turning in flight, and we slaughtered 70 bedouins of the Banū Nājiyah and their bedouin followers, and we killed about 300 of the non-Arabs and Kurds.

Ka'b b. Fuqaym continued: I looked among the bedouin who were killed and found my friend Mudrik b. al-Rayyān, slain.

Al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid fled until he came to the shores of the sea, where there was a significant number of his tribe. He continued going around among them and summoning them to oppose 'Alī, explaining to them (the reasons for) his separation from him, and telling them that the right path lay in fighting him, until many of them followed him.

Ma'qil b. Qays remained in the territory of al-Ahwāz and sent me with a letter to 'Alī, telling of his success. It was I who went to 'Alī, and Ma'qil wrote to him: "In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate, to the servant of God, 'Alī, the Commander of the Faithful, from Ma'qil b. Qays. Peace be upon you and I praise God other than Whom there is no god. We met the renegades, who 732. For Minjāb, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Minǧāb.

733. On the Kurds in the early Islamic period, and reference to their involvement with al-Khirrīt, see *EI*², s.vv. Kurds, Kurdistān.

734. Fī al-qalb, i.e., qalb al-jaysh, the main body of the army.

had sought help against us from the polytheists (mushrikīn).[735] We [3433] killed them as 'Ād and Iram were killed,[736] save only that we did not abandon your manner of acting (sīrah) regarding them: we did not kill any of the renegades who had turned away (in flight) or any prisoner, and we did not dispatch any wounded man of them. God has given you and the Muslims victory, and 'Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds.' "[737]

I came to him with this letter, and he read it out loud to his men and asked for the benefit of their opinions. They were unanimous in their view and said to him, "We think that you should write to Ma'qil b. Qays and that he should go after the evil one (fāsiq) and keep pursuing him until either he kills him or drives him out of your territories, for we fear that he will cause mischief for you among the people."

'Alī sent me back to Ma'qil with a letter in reply: "Praise be to God for supporting His friends and disappointing His enemies. May God give you and the Muslims a goodly reward, for you have performed well and fulfilled your duty. Ask about the man of the Banū Nājiyah and, if you hear that he has taken up residence anywhere, go after him to kill him or expel him for he will continue to be an enemy to the Muslims and a friend of the evildoers (qāsiṭīn) as long as he lives. Peace be upon you."

Ma'qil asked about where al-Khirrīt had established himself and where he had come to and was told that he was by the seashore and that he had persuaded his people to renounce their obedience to 'Alī and corrupted those of the Banū 'Abd al-Qays in his vicinity and their allies among the rest of the Arabs.[738] In the year of Ṣiffīn his tribe had refused to pay the ṣadaqah,[739] and they had also refused 735. Presumably, here referring to the Christians.

736. According to the Qur'ān, pre-Islamic peoples who were destroyed by God for refusing to accept His messengers.

737. Qur'ān 1:1.

738. That is, he had won them over.

739. The ṣadaqah (sometimes used synonomously with zakāt) is in Muslim law an alms tax incumbent upon Muslims; the ruling authorities regarded its collection as their prerogative. Sometimes the word is used more loosely to mean alms or charity of a voluntary sort. In the early Islamic period it frequently appears as the name of a tax demanded by the rulers from the Arab tribes—see an example on p. 200, below. (See *EI*², s.vv. Ṣadaḳa, Zakāt).

it in the current year, so that a payment of two years[740] was now due from them.

Ma'qil went against them with that army made up of men of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, and followed the road to Fārs[741] until he reached the seashore. When al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid heard that he was coming, he approached those of his men who were with him who held the views of the Khawārij and confided to them, "I share your views, and 'Alī should not give authority to men (yuḥakkim al-rijāl) in the affairs of God." But he said to the others, making his criticisms more public before them, "'Alī granted authority to an [3434] arbitrator (ḥakkama ḥakaman) and was satisfied with (the choice of) him. That arbitrator, whom he had approved for himself, declared 'Alī removed from office. I accepted what ('Alī) approved for himself of his decision and his judgment (min qaḍā'ihi wa-ḥukmihi)." (This was the view according to which he departed from al-Kūfah.)[742] To those who sympathized with 'Uthmān, he said secretly, "By God, I share your views. By God, 'Uthmān was killed unjustly." Thus he gave satisfaction to each category of them and led them to think that he was with them. He said to those who had refused to pay the ṣadaqah. "Keep a firm grip on your ṣadaqāt, bestow them on your relatives, and if you wish, give them up to those among you who are destitute."[743]

Among them were many Christians who had accepted Islam, but when dissension had developed in Islam had said, "By God, our religion (dīn) from which we have departed is better and more correct than that which these people follow. Their religion does not stop them from shedding blood, terrifying the roads, and seizing properties." And they returned to their former religion. Al-Khirrīt met them and said to them, "Woe unto you! Do you know the precept (ḥukm) of 'Alī regarding any Christian who accepts Islam and then reverts to Christianity? By God he will not hear anything 740. 'Iqālān.

741. The province east and south of Ahwāz (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map VI); evidently al-Khirrīt had gone south from Rāmhurmuz and was on the extreme northeast shore of the Gulf.

742. Because it seems that this sentence should be read as a comment by the narrator rather than as a part of al-Khirrīt's words, the subject of kharaja min al-Kūfah must be al-Khirrīt himself. Al-Khirrīt is here presenting his opposition to 'Alī as stemming from the latter's failure to accept the verdict of the arbitration.

743. That is, "the decision whether to give ṣadaqah, and if so to whom, is yours."

they say, he will not consider any excuse, he will not accept any repentance, and he will not summon them to it. His precept regarding them is immediate cutting off of the head when he gets hold of them."[744] Al-Khirrīt continued thus until he had united them and duped them (into following him). Those of the Banū Nājiyah and others who were in that district came to him, and many men joined him.

According to 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan al-Azdī—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaymān—'Abd al-Malik b. Sa'īd—Abū Janāb—al-Ḥurr—'Ammār al-Duhnī—Abū al-Ṭufayl:[745] I was in the army that 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib sent against the Banū Nājiyah. We came to them and found them split into three groups. Our commander said to one of these groups, [3435] "What are you?" and they replied, "We are a Christian people who do not consider any religion to be better than ours, and we hold fast to it." Our commander said to them, "Be off with you (i'tazilū)!" He said to another band, "What are you?" and they said, "We were Christians, but we accepted Islam and we hold fast to our Islam." He said to them, "Be off with you!" Then he said to the third group, "What are you?" and they said, "We are a people who were Christians. We accepted Islam but we do not think, that any religion is better than our previous one." He said to them, "Accept Islam!" but they refused. He said to his men, "When I rub my head three times, attack them and kill the fighting men and make captive the dependents."

The dependents were brought to 'Alī, and Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah[746] came and bought them for 200,000 dirhams. He delivered 100,000 (dirhams) but 'Alī would not accept it (requiring the whole of the agreed sum to be paid), and Maṣqalah went off with the money, came to the captives, and set them free, and himself absconded to

744. For differing views as to whether the apostate should be given the opportunity to repent and return to Islam, see EI[1], s.v. murtadd.

745. The isnād is problematic. This is Ṭabarī's only citation from an 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan who is specifically designated as al-Azdī, although he has three others from an unspecified 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan. The name following 'Abd al-Malik b. Sa'īd is obscure in the ms. The Leiden editor, comparing with an isnād from Abū Mikhnaf on p. 3297, l. 9, suggests that 'Abd al-Malik has transmitted from Abū Janāb al-Kalbī from al-Ḥurr b. al-Ṣayyāḥ al-Nakha'ī. The Cairo editor reads 'Abd al-Malik b. Sa'īd b. Ḥāb (this would be Ṭabarī's only mention of him), transmitting from al-Ḥurr.

746. Of the Banū Shaybān/Bakr b. Wā'il (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Maṣqala; SNB, III, 127).

Mu'āwiyah. 'Alī was asked, "Will you not recapture those dependents?" but he refused and did not concern himself with them.[747]

According to Abū Mikhnaf, whose account is now resumed—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b: When Ma'qil b. Qays returned, he read out loud to us a letter from 'Alī:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from the servant of God, 'Alī, the Commander of the Faithful, to those Believers, Muslims, Christians, and Apostates (murtadd) to whom this letter of mine is read. Peace be upon you and upon whoever follows the right path and believes in God, His Messenger, His Book, and Resurrection after death, fulfills the covenant of God and is not one of the faithless ones. I summon you to the Book of God, the precedent (sunnah) of His Prophet, and acting according to the truth. For that is what[748] God commanded in the Book. Whoever of you returns to his family, restrains his hand, and withdraws from this warmongering killer who has started to fight against God and His Messenger and the Muslims, and has spread evil upon the earth, he has security for his property and his blood. But whoever supports him in making war against us and forsaking our [3436] obedience, we have asked God for help against him and made God the judge between us, and "God is a sufficient helper."[749]

Ma'qil broke out a flag of security, raised it, and said, "Whoever comes to it has security, except for al-Khirrīt and his men, who have waged war against us and attacked us on the first occasion." Most of those with him who were not of his tribe separated from al-Khirrīt, and Ma'qil b. Qays prepared his men to fight. He placed Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī over his right wing and al-Minjāb b. Rāshid al-Ḍabbī over his left, and then he advanced with them against al-Khirrīt. With al-Khirrīt were the Muslims and Christians from his tribe, and those who refused to pay the ṣadaqah.

747. The story becomes clearer in the fuller version given later (p. 192, below).

748. Wa-bihī amara Allāhu fī al-kitāb. Cairo has wa-bimā (. . . acting according to the truth, and what God commanded . . .), which is more expected.

749. Qur'ān 4:45.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b—Abū al-Ṣiddīq al-Nājī: At that time al-Khirrīt said to his men, "Defend what your honor requires you to defend (ḥarīmaka) and fight for your women and children. By God, if they are triumphant over you, they will slay you and take you prisoner." One of his men said to him, "By God, this is what your hands and your tongue have inflicted upon us." Al-Khirrīt said, "Fight, all of you, God bless you! 'The sword has anticipated the censure!'[750] Be silent! By God, a calamity has befallen my people."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b—'Abdallāh b. Fuqaym: Ma'qil went among us, urging on the men, moving between the right and left wings and saying, "You Muslims (ayyuhā al-nās al-muslimūn), you will not obtain any greater reward than that which has been handed to you in this place. God has led you to a people who have refused to pay the ṣadaqah, apostasized from Islam, and violated the oath of allegiance out of evil and enmity.
[3437] I bear witness that paradise is for whomever of you is killed, and God will delight the eyes of whomever lives with victory and booty (al-ghanīmah)." He kept on like that until he had passed by all of the men, and then he came and stood in the center with his banner.

Then he sent to Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal, who was with the right wing, "Attack them!" Yazīd did so, but they held firm and fought fiercely, and Yazīd withdrew and resumed the position he had occupied on the right wing. Ma'qil then sent to Minjāb b. Rāshid al-Ḍabbī on the left, and he attacked, but the enemy held firm and fought fiercely for a long time and Minjāb, too, withdrew and resumed his previous position.

Ma'qil sent orders to both the right and the left wings, "When I attack, follow me all together!" He waved his banner and brandished it aloft and then attacked, his men joining him all together. Al-Khirrīt's men held fast for a while, but then al-Nu'mān b. Ṣuhbān al-Rāsibī of the Banū Jarm[751] spied al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid, attacked him, stabbed him, and brought him down from his mount. He himself then dismounted, having wounded al-Khirrīt and weakened him.

---

750. See Freytag, Arabum proverbia, I, 599; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. shajn. A saying used when one has been criticized for something but it is too late to go back on it.

751. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. For his role in al-Baṣrah in the second civil war, see Ṭabarī, II, 444–47 (= tr. XX, 20–23); there he is described as a man of Muḍar, although his tribe of Jarm is counted to Quḍā'ah.

They exchanged two blows and al-Nu'mān b. Ṣuhbān killed al-Khirrīt.

Of his men, 170 were killed with him in the battle, and the remainder fled in all directions. Ma'qil b. Qays sent the cavalry after them to the baggage camp and took prisoner those he caught up with. He captured a large number of men, women, and children and examined them. The Muslims he let go after taking the oath of allegiance from them, and he allowed them to keep their families. To the apostates he offered (reacceptance of) Islam, and they came back to it and he let them go together with their families. But there was an old man among them, a Christian called al-Rumāḥis b. Manṣūr,[752] who said, "By God, the only error I have made since attaining reason was abandoning my religion, the religion of truth, for yours, the religion of wickedness. No by God, I will not leave my religion and I will not accept yours so long as I live." Ma'qil [3438] brought him forward and cut off his head.

Ma'qil gathered the (defeated) people together and told them, "Bring what ṣadaqah you owe for these years," and he took two years' payment ('iqālayn) from the Muslims (among them). He turned to the Christians and their dependents and immediately dragged them away. The Muslims (among those who had supported al-Khirrīt) came with them, to accompany them, but Ma'qil ordered that the Muslims should be sent back. When they turned away, they clasped hands and wept, and the men and the women wept with each other.

('Abdallāh b. Fuqaym said:) I bear witness that I never felt such compassion for anyone before or after.

Ma'qil b. Qays wrote to 'Alī:

> I inform the Commander of the Faithful about his army and his enemies. We pushed on to our enemy on the seashore and found there tribes strong in number, violent and earnest. They had been gathered against us and made common cause against us. We summoned them to obedience and community, to the authority (ḥukm) of the Book and of the precedent (sunnah); we read out loud to them the letter of the Commander of the Faithful, and we raised aloft to them a flag of safe-conduct. A group of them inclined toward us, while another group remained hostile. We accepted those who came forward and we fought against[753] those who turned away. God put them to flight[754] and gave us victory over them. We were gracious to any Muslim, took his oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, and took possession of the ṣadaqah that was due from them. For anyone who had apostatized, we offered return to Islam or else death. They all returned apart from one man, whom we killed. As for the Christians, we made them captive and led them off so that they might be a warning for those of the protected peoples who come after them not to refuse the jizyah[755] and not to make bold against our religion and community,[756] for the protected people are of little account and lowly in status. May God have mercy upon you, Commander of the Faithful, and award to you [3439] gardens of delight. Peace be upon you.

752. The name al-Rumāḥis does not seem to be specifically Christian.

He then brought along the prisoners and passed with them by Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah al-Shaybānī, who was ʿAlī's governor over Ardashīrkhurrah.[757] There were 500 of them, and the women and children were weeping while the men cried out, "Abū al-Faḍl [i.e., Maṣqalah], protector of the men and liberator of the captives, be good to us—buy us and free us." Maṣqalah said, "I swear by God that I will give ṣadaqah for them (i.e., to buy their release) for 'God repays those who give ṣadaqah!'"[758]

Maʿqil was told about that and said, "By God, if I knew that he had said that out of compassion for them and contempt for you, 753. Ṣamadnā ṣamdan li . . .

754. Ḍaraba Allāhu wujūhahum; see Gloss., s.v. ḍ-r-b.

755. In Muslim law the jizyah is a tax payable by the protected non-Muslims at a fixed rate per head (a "poll tax"). In early Islam the significance of the word varies according to context, but here it clearly refers to a payment taken from the non-Muslims. The following reference to the subordinate status of the non-Muslims (wa-hum ahlu al-ṣaghār wa-al-dhull) echoes Qur'ān 9:29, ḥattā yuʿṭū al-jizyata ʿan yadin wa-hum ṣāghirūna. See further *EI*², s.v. Djizya.

756. Literally, "those who share our direction of prayer" (ahl al-qiblah).

757. One of the five districts into which Fars was subdivided, its chief town was Shīrāz (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map VI and 248).

758. Qur'ān 12:88. Here ṣadaqah has its more general sense (see n. 739, above).

I would cut off his head, even if that meant the mutual destruction of Tamīm and and Bakr b. Wā'il."[759]

Then Maṣqalah sent Dhuhl b. al-Ḥārith al-Dhuhlī[760] to Ma'qil b. Qays, asking, "Sell me the Banū Nājiyah," and Ma'qil replied, "Alright, I will sell them you for a million dirhams," and he sent them to Maṣqalah, telling him, "Send the money quickly to the Commander of the Faithful." Maṣqalah said, "I am sending a first installment immediately, and then I will send another similar and keep on until all is paid, please God." Ma'qil b. Qays went to the Commander of the Faithful and told him what he had done regarding that, and 'Alī told him, "You have done well and acted right." 'Alī waited for Maṣqalah to send him the money, and he heard that Maṣqalah had set free the captives without asking them to help him in any way in liberating themselves.[761] 'Alī said: "I suspect that Maṣqalah must have borne the burden of expenditure. I think that you will soon see him cleaving to the ground."[762]

Then 'Alī wrote to Maṣqalah: "One of the worst types of falseness [3440] is falseness regarding the community, and one of the worst forms of deception against the men of the garrison is deception of the imam. You owe the Muslims 500,000 dirhams. Send them to me as soon as my messenger reaches you. Otherwise, come (yourself) as soon as you have looked at this letter, for I have told my messenger to you not to allow you to wait for one hour after he has come to you unless you send the money. Peace be upon you." The messenger was Abū Jurrah al-Ḥanafī,[763] and Abū Jurrah said to Maṣqalah, "Send the money now or set out for the Commander of the Faithful."

After he had read the letter, Maṣqalah went and lodged in Baṣrah, where he remained for some days, and then Ibn 'Abbās asked him

759. The tribe of Ma'qil, the Banū Riyāḥ, was counted as part of Tamīm/Muḍar, while Maṣqalah's tribe, the Banū Shaybān, was attached to Bakr/Rabī'ah.

760. The context implies the Banū Dhuhl of Shaybān/Bakr b. Wā'il, but see vol. XXII, 69, n. 282, of this translation where, in the account of the killing of Dhuhl b. al-Ḥārith at the hands of Khārijites in A.H. 76, the suggestion is made that they are Dhuhl b. Mu'āwiyah of Kindah.

761. That is, without asking them to make a contribution to their own ransom.

762. Mulbidan: Lane has "a man cleaving to the ground, and making himself inconspicuous", "a man cleaving to the ground by reason of poverty"; Ann., A.H. 38 §199: "fra poco di certo lo vedrete qua."

763. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to Abū Jurrah.

for the money, for the governors dependent on al-Baṣrah would bring the tribute from those districts[764] that were subordinate to it to Ibn 'Abbās, and it was he who would send it to 'Alī. Maṣqalah replied, "All right, but give me a few days." Then he went to 'Alī, who granted him some days but then asked him for the money. He brought him 200,000 but was powerless (to get the rest) and could do nothing about it.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-A'war—Dhuhl b. al-Ḥārith: Maṣqalah called me to his place of abode. His evening meal was set before him and we shared it, and then he said, "By God, the Commander of the Faithful is asking me for this money and I cannot give it to him." I answered, "By God, if you wanted, you could get it all in less than a week," but he said, "By God, I am not going to impose it upon my fellow tribesmen and I will not seek it from anyone else." Then he said, "Indeed, by God, if Ibn Hind (Mu'āwiyah) were seeking it from me, or Ibn 'Affān, they would cancel the debt. Did you not see Ibn 'Affān give al-Ash'ath 100,000 dirhams annually from the kharāj of Ādharbayjān?" I answered Maṣqalah, "This man ('Alī) will not see things that way. No, by God, he is not one who generously gives away something that you have taken." He was quiet for a while and I too remained silent, [3441] and indeed, by God, just one night after this talk he absconded to Mu'āwiyah.

'Alī heard about that and said, "What is the matter with him, God confound him! He acted like a noble Arab [in ransoming the captives] but fled like a slave and was treacherous like an evildoer (fājir). By God, if he had stayed here and could not pay, we would not have done any more than put him under detention and then, if we had found that he had anything of value we would have taken it, but if we could not get any money we would have left him alone." 'Alī then went to Maṣqalah's house and destroyed and demolished it.

Maṣqalah's brother Nu'aym b. Hubayrah was a partisan (shī'ī) and sincere adviser of 'Alī. Maṣqalah sent one of the Christians of the Banū Taghlib,[765] whose name was Ḥulwān, to Nu'aym from Syria with a letter: "I have spoken to Mu'āwiyah about you and he has promised a position (al-imārah) for you and given grounds to hope for some honor (al-karāmah). Come to us immediately when my messenger reaches you, God willing." But Mālik b. Ka'b al-Arḥabī[766] seized the messenger and brought him to 'Alī, who took his letter and read it. He then cut off the hand of the Christian, who died.

764. Kuwar, plural of kūrah, is a loan word in Arabic, perhaps from Greek chōra. The Arabs had taken over from the Sasamids the subdivision of the provinces into administrative areas call kuwar.

765. The Banū Taghlib, whose area was the Syrian desert south of Palmyra, had been significantly christianized in the period before Islam.

Nu'aym wrote to his brother Maṣqalah:

Do not cast against me, may God guide you, an imputation of your suspicions. I had nothing to do with Ḥulwān.
That one who coveted what he could obtain by greed is dead, and do not let his death grieve you.[767]
What did you want in sending him, stupidly, hoping to trip up a man who is not found sleeping?
You exposed him to 'Alī, who is a lion, walking with a proud gait, one of the lions of Khaffān.[768] [3442]
You benefited from a good position under him, defending Iraq and being called the best of Shaybān, Until you rushed into something for which, secretly and openly,
you had expressed a dislike for those who took part.
If you had brought that which was due to the people, persevering for the truth, you would have revived our quick and our dead.
But you have joined the people of Syria, seeking the favor of Ibn Hind (Mu'āwiyah). That is a position that grieves us.
Today you regret your debt, repenting, but what can you say? What has happened has happened.
All the clans together have come to hate you, and God has never exalted any man in hatred.

When this reached Maṣqalah, he knew that his messenger was dead, and soon the men of Taghlib also learned of the death of their fellow tribesman, Ḥulwān. They went to Maṣqalah and said, "You sent our fellow and you caused his death. Either restore him to life, or pay blood money for him." He answered, "To restore him to life I cannot, but I will pay blood money for him," and he did so.

766. See n. 345, above.

767. Read ḥānā for khānā (see Add. et emend.; SNB, III, 146, reads iḥzānā).

768. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-Buldān, s.v. (II, 456), says that this is a place close to al-Kūfah and a place of lions (ma'sadah).

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—his father: When 'Alī learned of what had befallen the Banū Nājiyah and the killing of their leader, he said, > Perish his mother! How defective was his understanding and how bold he was against his Lord! Someone came to me once and said, "There are men among your companions whom I fear will separate from you. What do you think > [3443] about them?" I replied, "I am not one to seize somebody merely on suspicion or punish merely on supposition. I will only fight him who opposes me, declares war on me, and manifests hostility toward me. And then I will not fight him until I have called on him to repent and offered him forgiveness. If he repents and returns to us, we accept that from him and he will be our brother. But if he insists on warring against us, we ask God's aid against him and struggle against him."

>
> The man who had addressed me kept away for some time, and then he came to me again and said, "I fear that 'Abdallāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī and Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn are stirring up dissension against you, for I heard them talking about you in such a way that, if you had heard it, you would not have left them alive or at liberty. Keep them in prison for ever." I said, "I ask your advice about them—what should I do?" He said, "I advise you to summon them and cut off their heads." But then I knew that he was neither pious nor wise and I said, "By God, I do not think you are pious or wise and useful in your advice. By God, if I had intended to kill them, you should have said, 'Fear God. Why do you think that killing them is lawful when they have not killed anybody, have not declared opposition to you, and have not departed from your obedience?' "

In this year Qutham b. al-'Abbās led the annual pilgrimage (ḥajj) on behalf of 'Alī (God have mercy on him). Aḥmad b. Thābit told me that from Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.[769] At that time Qutham was 'Alī's governor over Mecca. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās was over the Yemen and 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās over al-Baṣrah. There is a difference of opinion about who was 'Alī's governor in Khurāsān. Some say that it was Khulayd b. Qurrah al-Yarbū'ī and some that it was Ibn Abzā.[770] Syria and Egypt were under Mu'āwiyah and his governors.

769. For Abū Ma'shar, whose Ta'rīkh al-khulafā' is probably being cited here, see *EI*², s.v.; GAS, I, 291–92; for Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī, see Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Jarḥ, I/1, 44.

770. For Khulayd, see p. 99 n. 404, above; the index to the Leiden edition identifies Ibn Abzā as 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abzā the rāwī.

[3444]

The Events of the Year 39

(MAY 29, 659–MAY 16, 660)

Mu'āwiyah Sends His Forces into 'Alī's Territories

He sent al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr[771] (according to the report of 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—'Awānah) with 2,000 men to 'Ayn al-Tamr,[772] where Mālik b. Ka'b was on garrison duty[773] for 'Alī with 1,000 men. Mālik, however, had allowed his men to go to al-Kūfah, and when al-Nu'mān came against him he had only 100 left with him. Mālik, therefore, wrote to 'Alī telling him of the matter of al-Nu'mān and his party. 'Alī addressed the men and ordered them to set out for 'Ayn al-Tamr, but they were reluctant to do so and Mālik had to give battle to al-Nu'mān, who had 2,000 men, with only 100 of his own. Mālik ordered his men to fight with their backs

771. Son of a Medinese Companion of the Prophet, his father is said to have been killed at the conquest of 'Ayn al-Tamr (see EI[1], s.v.; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 155).

772. In the desert west of the Euphrates, south of Hīt (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 65).

773. Maslaḥatan. Literally, "a place of arms," such as a thaghr (frontier), but also used to refer to individuals bearing weapons or occupying the maslaḥa (see Gloss., s.v. s-l-ḥ; Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

to the wall of the settlement, and he wrote to Mikhnaf b. Sulaym,[774] who was nearby, asking him to send reinforcements. Mālik b. Ka'b fought against al-Nu'mān's force with the band of men who were with him as fiercely as anyone could. Mikhnaf sent his son 'Abd al-Raḥmān to him with fifty men and, when they reached them, Mālik and his companions had broken the scabbards of their swords[775] and were on the verge of death. When the Syrians saw the new arrivals—it was evening—they thought that they were (significant) reinforcements for Mālik's men and took flight. Mālik pursued them and killed three of them, and the Syrians fled.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān [b. Ṣāliḥ]—'Abdallāh—'Abdallāh b. Abī Mu'āwiyah—'Amr b. Ḥassān—a shaykh of the Banū Fazārah: Mu'āwiyah dispatched al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr with 2,000 men. They came to 'Ayn al-Tamr and attacked it. There was a governor of 'Alī there called the son of so-and-so al-Arḥabī, who had 300 men. He wrote to 'Alī asking for help, and 'Alī ordered the men to get ready to go to that governor. They were reluctant to do so, and 'Alī therefore ascended the minbar. I (the shaykh of the Banū Fazārah) went to him, but when I got there he had already made the declaration of faith and was saying, "Oh people of al-Kūfah, every time you hear about a troop[776] of Syrian horsemen coming against you, each man of you hides in his house and locks the door, like a lizard in his hole and a hyena in his lair. Whoever trusts in you is duped[777] and whoever draws you draws a useless lot.[778] You are not real men (aḥrār) when the summons (to appear in arms) is made nor trustworthy brothers with secrets. 'We belong to God and to Him we are returning.'[779] How I have been tested through you! You are blind ones who do not see, dumb ones who do not speak, and deaf ones who do not hear.[780] 'We belong to God and to Him we are returning.' " [3445]

774. See p. 13, above for the presence at Ṣiffīn of this prominent Azdī forebear of Abū Mikhnaf.

775. That is, they had determined to fight to the death.

776. Mansir, literally, "beak (of a bird)," used to refer to an advance force of an army (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

777. Literally, "the one who is duped is he whom you have duped!"

778. Al-sahm al-akhyab, an allusion to the game of chance called maysir (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. akhyab).

779. Qur'ān 2:156.

780. See Qur'ān 2:18, which says that the deaf, dumb, and blind (spiritually) "do not return."

(The account of 'Awānah transmitted by al-Madā'inī continues.) And in this year Mu'āwiyah sent Sufyān b. 'Awf[781] with 6,000 men, telling him to go to Hīt, pass through (qaṭa'a) and raid it, and then move on to al-Anbār and al-Madā'in,[782] where he should fall on the forces there. He went to Hīt but found no one there, and then to al-Anbār where there was a garrison (maslaḥah) of 'Alī. There had been 500 men, but they had dispersed and only 100 remained. Sufyān fought them but 'Alī's men held firm in spite of their small [3446] number. Then Sufyān's cavalry and infantry charged them together, and killed the commander of the garrison, Ashras b. Ḥassān al-Bakrī,[783] with thirty men. They carried off what they found in al-Anbār and the property of its people and returned to Mu'āwiyah.

'Alī heard about that and went out to Nukhaylah. The men said to him, "You can rely on us," but he said, "You are not adequate for me or for yourselves." He dispatched Sa'īd b. Qays[784] after Sufyān's men, and he went off in pursuit until he passed Hīt without catching up with them and then turned back.

In this year, too, Mu'āwiyah sent 'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah al-Fazārī[785] with 1,700 men to Taymā',[786] ordering him to extract the ṣadaqah from the bedouins whom he passed by and to kill any of them who refused to deliver the ṣadaqah of his wealth to him. Then he should go to Mecca, Medina, and the Ḥijāz to do the same. Many of his fellow tribesmen joined him.

When 'Alī heard about that, he sent al-Musayyab b. Najabah al-Fazārī,[787] who caught up with Ibn Mas'adah at Taymā'. They fought fiercely for the whole day until sunset. Al-Musayyab charged against Ibn Mas'adah and struck him three times, but without intending 781. An Azdī prominent in the campaigns against the Byzantines (Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

782. The itinerary would have involved moving down the Euphrates and then crossing to al-Madā'in on the Tigris at the point where the two rivers come closest to each other. The reports are intended to indicate that the Syrians could raid 'Alī's heartlands with impunity.

783. This seems to be his only appearance in Ṭabarī's work.

784. See n. 66, above.

785. Captured by a raiding party sent by the Prophet against the Banū Fazārah, he subsequently was prominent in Mu'āwiyah's campaigns against the Byzantines (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

786. In northwest Arabia (now in Saudi Arabia).

787. Subsequently killed with the Tawwābūn at 'Ayn al-Wardah (see vol. XX of this translation, pp. 80ff.).

to kill him and saying to him, "Flee, flee!" Ibn Mas'adah and most of those with him entered the castle while the remainder fled toward Syria.

The bedouins plundered the ṣadaqah camels[788] that were with Ibn Mas'adah, and al-Musayyab besieged him and his men for three days. Then he piled firewood against the gate and hurled fire upon it until it caught alight. When those inside sensed that they would be destroyed, they went aloft and appealed to al-Musayyab, "It is your own tribesmen!" and he had pity on them and was reluctant that they should perish. He gave orders for the fire to be extinguished. He said to his men, "Spies have come to me and told me that an army is approaching from Syria. Gather together in one place!" and Ibn Mas'adah and his men departed by night and escaped [3447] to Syria. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shabīb[789] said to al-Musayyab, "Come and let us pursue them!" but he forbade that he should do that. Ibn Shabīb said to him, "You have cheated the Commander of the Faithful and played a trick regarding them."

In this year, too, Mu'āwiyah dispatched al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays,[790] telling him to traverse the region below Wāqiṣah[791] and attack every bedouin whom he came upon who recognized the authority of 'Alī. With him he sent 3,000 men. As he proceeded, he seized the property of the people and killed those bedouins whom he met. He passed by al-Tha'labiyyah[792] and attacked the garrisons (masālih) of 'Alī and seized their goods. When he had got as far as al-Quṭquṭānah,[793] 'Amr b. 'Umays b. Mas'ūd[794] came with some horsemen of 'Alī, and his family going in front, intending to make the annual pilgrimage. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk attacked those who were with him and prevented him from going on. When 'Alī heard that, he dispatched Ḥujr b. 'Adī al-Kindī with 4,000 men, giving them fifty 788. That is, those camels that had been taken from the bedouin in payment of the ṣadaqah.

789. Of the Banū Fazārah (see p. 163, above).

790. See n. 130, above.

791. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v. (IV, 892). Al-Wāqiṣah and the two places mentioned subsequently are in Najd, on or near the road from Mecca to al-Kūfah. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk's route took him in the direction of al-Kūfah.

792. Ibid., I, 925.

793. Ibid., IV, 137.

794. Of the Banū Hudhayl (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.), this seems to be his only appearance in Ṭabarī's work.

dirhams each. He caught up with al-Ḍaḥḥāk at Tadmur[795] and killed nineteen of his men. Two of his own men were killed. Night prevented any further fighting and al-Ḍaḥḥāk and his men fled, while Ḥujr and his went back.

In this year, too, Mu'āwiyah himself set off toward the Tigris, but when he was in sight of it he withdrew and went back. Ibn Sa'd reported that from Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ibn Jurayj—Ibn Abī Mulaykah: In the year 39 (659–660) Mu'āwiyah was within sight of it. And there is a report to the same effect from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

There are differences of opinion about who led the pilgrimage [3448] (ḥajj) ceremonies in this year. Some say that it was 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās on behalf of 'Alī, while some say that it was 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās. According to Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah, it is said that 'Alī sent 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās to be present at the pilgrimage festival (mawsim) and lead the prayers in 39, while Mu'āwiyah sent Yazīd b. Shajarah al-Rahāwī.[796] But (said Ibn Shabbah) Abū al-Ḥasan (al-Madā'inī) claimed that that was wrong and that 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās was not present at the mawsim in any official position before the killing of 'Alī (peace be upon him). The one with whom Yazīd b. Shajarah contested the office was Qutham b. al-'Abbās. Eventually they settled their dispute by agreeing that Shaybah b. 'Uthmān[797] would lead the rituals, and consequently it was Shaybah who led the prayers in 39.

And similar to what I have been told on the authority of Abū Zayd (Ibn Shabbah) from Abū al-Ḥasan (al-Madā'inī), is the report of Abū Ma'shar. I have that from Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—his informant—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

According to al-Wāqidī, in the year 39 'Alī sent 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās to be in charge of the mawsim, while Mu'āwiyah sent Yazīd

---

795. That is, Palmyra.

796. His nisbah refers to the Banū Ruhā' of Madhḥij (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II index, s. v. Yazīd b. Šağara). He was subsequently active in the warfare against Byzantium, especially at sea, and is reported to have been killed in 58/677–78. In 116/734–35, however, there is a strange reference to him (or to someone of the same name), described as sayyid ahl al-Sha'm, as if he were still alive (see Ṭabarī, II, 1564 [= XXV, 103, of this translation]).

797. Shaybah is said to have acquired the office of control of the key of the Ka'bah in the time of the Prophet. For some comment on the traditions about him and his office, see Hawting, "'Sacred Offices'," 62–84, esp. 65, n. 5.

b. Shajarah al-Rahāwī to hold (aqāma) the ḥajj for the people. When the two of them met in Mecca they contested the issue, each one refusing to surrender to the other. Finally they compromised on Shaybah b. 'Uthmān b. Abī Ṭalḥah.

'Alī's governors over the garrison towns in this year were those whom we have reported in 38, except that Ibn 'Abbās had left his position in al-Baṣrah in this year and had appointed Ziyād, called Ziyād the son of his father, over the finances (kharāj), and Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī over the judicial matters (qaḍā').[798]

And in this year Ibn 'Abbās sent Ziyād, on the orders of 'Alī, to Fārs and Kirmān when he returned to al-Baṣrah from visiting 'Alī in al-Kūfah.

The Sending of Ziyād to Fārs [3449]

According to 'Umar (Ibn Shabbah)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī): After Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī was killed[799] and opposition against 'Alī grew, the people of Fārs and Kirmān[800] wished to avoid paying the kharāj;[801] and in every district the inhabitants seized power and expelled their governors.

According to 'Umar (Ibn Shabbah)—Abū al-Qāsim—Salamah b. 'Uthmān—'Alī b. Kathīr: 'Alī asked advice about whom he could appoint over Fārs when they refused to fulfill the duty of the kharāj. Jāriyah b. Qudāmah said to him, "Indeed I will point out to you, Commander of the Faithful, a man who is firm in opinion, knowledgeable in authority, and capable for what he has to do." 'Alī asked who that was and received the answer, "Ziyād." "Alright," said 'Alī, "It is his." He appointed him over Fārs and Kirmān and sent him with 4,000 men. He subjugated those lands and put them in order.

---

798. See nn. 666, 488, above.

799. See pp. 165ff., above.

800. The province east of Fārs, bordered on the north by the desert and on the south by the Gulf (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map VI and 299ff.).

801. According to the classical works of Muslim law, this is a tax raised from land, but in this early period it, like other fiscal terms, seems to be used rather generally (see *EI*², s.v.).

According to 'Umar (Ibn Shabbah)—Abū al-Ḥasan (al-Madā'inī)—'Alī b. Mujāhid—al-Sha'bī: When the people of the Jibāl[802] had rebelled, and those subject to the kharāj wished to avoid paying it and expelled Sahl b. Ḥunayf, 'Alī's governor, from Fārs, Ibn 'Abbās said to 'Alī, "Leave Fārs to me." He came to al-Baṣrah and sent Ziyād to Fārs with a large force that he used to suppress the people of the region and make them fulfill their duty of kharāj.

According to 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Ayyūb b. Mūsā—a shaykh of the people of Iṣṭakhr[803]—his father: I remember being in Fārs while Ziyād was governor there and revolt had flared up. He ceaselessly used inducement and artifice so that they returned to the obedience that was due from them and to good order and there was no hostile attitude. And the people of Fārs used to say "We have not seen any conduct more like that of Kisrā Anūshirwān[804] than the conduct of this Arab for gentleness, ways of inducement, and understanding of what it is fitting."

[3450] When Ziyād came to Fārs, he sent to its leaders and made promises and gave cause to hope to those who helped him, but some he terrified and threatened. Thus he used some to fight others and suggested to some the weak spot of others. Some fled and some remained, and some of them killed others, and consequently Fārs came completely under his control, with no force or fighting against him there. He acted similarly in Kirmān and then went back to Fārs, where he went around the districts (kuwar) raising their expectations so that the people became peaceful and the region calm. He went to Iṣṭakhr, where he took up residence and fortified a castle there between Bayḍā' Iṣṭakhr and Iṣṭakhr,[805] which became known as Qal'at Ziyād. He brought the wealth (of the province)

802. Strictly al-Jibāl is the province east of Iraq and north of Khuzistān and Fārs (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map V, and 185ff.). The term may be used loosely here.

803. Just north of ancient Persepolis, it was probably the most important town in Fars at this time (see *EI*², s.v.).

804. Khusrow I Anoshirwan (Immortal Soul), ruled 530–579 C.E., was a Sasanid shah legendary for both his justice and his efficiency.

805. For the town called Bayḍā' (Bayzā in Persian), southwest of Iṣṭakhr, see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map VI, and 280.

there. Subsequently, Manṣūr al-Yashkurī fortified himself in it so that today it is known as Qal'at Manṣūr.[806] 806. Ann., A.H. 39 §4, identifies him as Manṣūr b. Jumhūr al-Yashkurī. But the famous Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, who was involved in politics at the end of the Umayyad period (and who was in Fārs at one point, involved in the movement of 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah), is always referred to as Manṣūr b. Jumhūr al-Kalbī (he was of the Banū 'Āmir of Kalb). According to the indexes of the Leiden and Cairo editions, this is Ṭabarī's only reference to Manṣūr al-Yashkurī (Yashkur are a subtribe of the Bakr). It is possible that al-Kalbī has been deformed in the ms.

The Events of the Year 40

(MAY 17, 660–MAY 6, 661)

Mu'āwiyah Sends Busr b. Abī Arṭāt with 3,000 Fighting Men to the Ḥijāz

According to Ziyād b. 'Abdallāh al-Bakkā'ī[807]—'Awānah: After the appointment of the two arbitrators, Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān dispatched an army under Busr b. Abī Arṭāt, a man of the Banū [3451] 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy.[808] They came from Syria to Medina, whence 'Alī's governor at that time, Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī,[809] fled to 'Alī at al-Kūfah, and Busr entered Medina.

Busr ascended the minbar of Medina, without having met any opposition and cried out, "Dīnār, Najjār, and Zurayq![810] My shaykh, my shaykh, with whom I was only yesterday—where is he now?"

---

807. Al-Bakkā'ī (d. 183/799–800) is best known as the transmitter of Ibn Isḥāq's Sīrah to Ibn Hishām; presumably al-Madā'inī is still al-Ṭabarī's source for the following report.

808. Busr (see *EI*², s.v.) was a Companion of the Prophet; 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy were a branch of Quraysh.

809. See n. 523, above.

810. These are all subtribes of Khazraj of the Anṣār (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.vv. Dīnār b. Taimallāh, Naǧǧār b. Tha'laba, and Zuraiq b. 'Āmir).

(He was referring to 'Uthmān.) Then he said, "People of Medina! By God, if it were not for my charge from Mu'āwiyah, I would not leave any mature man alive (among you)," and then he extracted the oath of allegiance (to Mu'āwiyah) from them. He sent to the Banū Salimah, saying, "By God, you shall have no safe conduct with me, and I shall not accept your oath of allegiance, until you bring me Jābir b. 'Abdallāh."[811]

Jābir hurried to Umm Salamah,[812] the widow of the Prophet, and said to her, "What do you think? I am afraid that I shall be killed, but this oath of allegiance is not right." She said, "I think that you should give the oath of allegiance. I have told my son 'Umar b. Abī Salamah that he should give it, and also my son-in-law 'Abdallāh b. Zam'ah."[813] (Her daughter Zaynab, the daughter of Abū Salamah, was at that time married to 'Abdallāh b. Zam'ah.) So Jābir went to Busr and gave him the oath of allegiance.

Busr demolished some houses in Medina and then went on to Mecca. Abū Mūsā[814] was afraid that he would kill him, but Busr said to him, "I would not do that to a Companion of the Prophet," and let him go. Previously Abū Mūsā had written to the Yemen saying that horsemen sent from Mu'āwiyah would slay the people, would slay those who refused to accept the arbitration process (ḥukūmah).

Busr continued on to the Yemen, where 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās was governor on behalf of 'Alī. When 'Ubaydallāh heard of his approach, he fled to al-Kūfah, where he joined 'Alī, leaving behind as his deputy over the Yemen 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Madān al-Ḥārithī.[815] Busr came and killed him together with his son. He also came across the baggage train of 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās, with which were two small sons of the latter. He slaughtered them both. Some [3452]

811. For the Banū Salimah b. Sa'd of Khazraj, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.; for the Companion Jābir b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr of the Banū Salimah, see ibid., s.v. Gābir.

812. For Umm Salamah, Hind bint Abī Umayyah of Makhzūm/Quraysh, see Ibn Sa'd, VIII, 60.

813. 'Umar was Umm Salamah's son from her first husband, Abū Salamah of Makhzūm; 'Abdallāh b. Zam'ah, of the Banū Asad of Quraysh, is described as a sharīf of Quraysh who transmitted from the Prophet and married Zaynab the daughter of Abū Salamah and Umm Salamah (see Zubayrī, Kitāb nasab Quraysh, 222).

814. That is, the "arbitrator" who had declared 'Alī deposed (see p. 82ff., above).

815. A leader of Bal-Ḥārith of Madhḥij (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr).

say that he found the two sons of 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās with a bedouin of Banū Kinānah. When he wished to slay them, the Kinānī asked, "Why are you going to kill these two when they have done no wrong? If you are going to kill them, then kill me!" Busr replied, "I will!" and he began by killing the Kinānī and then he killed them. Then he went back to Syria. It is also reported that the Kinānī fought to protect the two children until he was himself killed. One of the children whom Busr killed was called 'Abd al-Raḥmān and the other Qutham.[816]

In the course of that expedition Busr killed a large number of the partisans (shī'ah) of 'Alī in the Yemen. 'Alī heard the news of what he was doing and sent 2,000 men under Jāriyah b. Qudāmah and another 2,000 under Wahb b. Mas'ūd.[817] Jāriyah came to Najrān,[818] where he set fire to some properties and took some of the partisans of 'Uthmān and killed them. Busr and his men fled from him and Jāriyah followed them as far as Mecca, where he told the Meccans to give him the oath of allegiance (for 'Alī), but they replied, "The Commander of the Faithful is dead,[819] so on whose behalf should we give the oath of allegiance?" He said, "On behalf of him to whom the companions of 'Alī have given it." They were reluctant, but eventually they did give it.[820]

Jāriyah then went to Medina, where Abū Hurayrah[821] was leading the people in the prayers. Abū Hurayrah fled from him and Jāriyah said, "By God, if I had taken Abū Sinnawr,[822] I would have cut off his head." He then told the Medinans, "Give the oath of allegiance 816. There are variant accounts that provide different names for the boys (Zubayrī, Kitāb nasab Quraysh, 264).

817. For Jāriyah, see n. 499, above; this appears to be Ṭabarī's only reference to Wahb b. Mas'ūd, who is called al-Khath'amī in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh II, 232–33.

818. A town in northern Yemen (now in Saudi Arabia), famous as a center of Christianity before Islam.

819. That is, 'Alī had been killed while Jāriyah was engaged in the expedition.

820. It is not clear whether Jāriyah demanded that they gave him the oath on behalf of an unnamed individual, or whether they all knew the one to whom 'Alī's companions had given allegiance. In the next paragraph, referring to Medina, 'Alī's successor is named.

821. A Companion of the Prophet, famous as a transmitter of ḥadīth. He appears to have been friendly with the Umayyads, for it is reported that both Marwān and Mu'āwiyah used him as a deputy governor of Medina. (See *EI*², s.v.).

822. A derogatory reference to Abū Hurayrah: sinnawr means "cat," as does hirr, of which hurayrah is a diminutive.

to al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī,"[823] and they did so. He remained there for a day, then departed, returning to al-Kūfah, while Abū Hurayrah returned and again led the Medinans in the prayers.

In this year (40/660–61), according to reports, there was the truce between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah after correspondence had passed between them (it would prolong our work unduly to give the texts) about the cessation of hostilities; it was specified that 'Alī should have Iraq and Mu'āwiyah Syria, neither of them encroaching on the area under the authority of the other with an army, an attack, or a raid. [3453]

According to Ziyād b. 'Abdallāh [al-Bakkā'ī]—Abū Isḥāq: When neither of the two parties would acknowledge obedience to the other, Mu'āwiyah wrote to 'Alī, "If you wish, you may have Iraq while I have Syria. Thus the sword shall be averted from this community and the blood of the Muslims shall not be shed." 'Alī consented, and the two of them agreed on it. Consequently Mu'āwiyah remained in Syria with his forces, levying taxes from it and its surrounding area, while 'Alī levied taxes from Iraq and distributed the income among his forces.

In this year 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās left al-Baṣrah and went to Mecca, according to most of the specialists in historical traditions (ahl al-siyar). Some of them, however, denied that and claimed that he continued at Baṣrah, as governor on behalf of the Commander of the Faithful 'Alī (peace be upon him), until 'Alī was killed and al-Ḥasan had made peace with Mu'āwiyah—it was then that he departed for Mecca.

The Circumstances of Ibn 'Abbās' Going to Mecca and Leaving Iraq

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—a group of narrators—Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. (Abī) Rāshid[824]—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd Abū al-Kunūd: 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās encountered Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī, who said, "If you were an animal, you would be a camel; if you were a herdsman, you would not be able to control (your flock

823. That is, 'Alī's elder son from Fāṭimah.

824. Comparison with other sources indicates that Abī should be inserted.

at) pasture and would not know how to manage them wisely on the move."[825]

Abū al-Aswad consequently wrote to 'Alī: "God has made you a ruler trusted by his subjects and a pastor who takes responsibility
[3454] for his flock. We have tried you and found you full of integrity and a sincere adviser to your flock. You give them their booty (fay') in abundance, you abstain from (seizing) their wordly goods (dunyā), you do not devour their wealth, and you do not take bribes in their government (aḥkām). Your cousin, however, has devoured what is under his authority without your knowledge, and I cannot allow that to be kept from you. So look into what is going on here, may God have mercy on you, and write to me telling me your views about what you want me to do for you. Salutations."

'Alī wrote back in reply: "To act like you have done is to advise the imam and the community sincerely, to render trustworthy service, and to guide to the truth. I have written to your companion concerning the behavior about which you have written to me, but I have not told him that it was you who wrote to me. You must continue to inform me of what happens in your presence if it is beneficial to the community to look into it, for you are competent to do that and you have an obligatory duty to do so. Peace be with you."

'Alī then wrote about that to Ibn 'Abbās, who replied, "What you have heard is false. What I have under my authority I control in an orderly and careful way. Do not believe these suspicions. Salutations." 'Alī wrote back, "Tell me what jizyah[826] you have taken, whence you have taken it, and where you have deposited it." Ibn 'Abbās answered, "I understand your concern at the seizures that you have heard I have made of the wealth of men this territory,

---

825. Grammatically, it is not clear who said the words to whom, but they seem to be intended as a criticism of the governorship of Ibn 'Abbās, and Abū al-Aswad must then be the speaker. In view of the following details and Abū al-Aswad's complaint about Ibn 'Abbās to 'Alī, it may be the ability of the camel to consume large amounts of food and water that prompts the comparison. Ann., A.H. 38 §224, suggests emending the text in accordance with the parallel in al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (= Ann., A.H. 38 §222a). The Arabic is not given, but the last phrase is translated "nè sapresti governale bene durante l'inverno." The parallel passage in Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, IV, 354, omits the last phrase entirely.

826. Jizyah here seems to have the more general meaning of "tax"; see n. 755, above.

so send anyone whom you wish to your province and I will make way for him. Salutations."

Ibn 'Abbās then summoned his maternal uncles of the Banū Hilāl b. 'Āmir,[827] and al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Hilālī and 'Abdallāh b. Razīn b. Abī 'Amr al-Hilālī came to him. Then all of Qays joined with him, and he carried away a considerable amount of property.

According to Abū Zayd (Ibn Shabbah)—Abū 'Ubaydah:[828] These [3455] were monies and provisions that had been collected for the maintenance (arzāq) of the fighting men, and Ibn 'Abbās took away with him as much as he had collected.[829]

All of the "fifths"[830] sent after him and caught him up at al-Ṭaff,[831] where they confronted him, intending to get the wealth. But Qays[832] (opposed them) and said, "By God, you will not get it so long as any of us remains alive."[833] Ṣabrah b. Shaymān al-Ḥuddānī[834] said, "Band of Azd, by God, Qays are our brothers in Islam, our neighbors in dwelling place, and our helpers against the enemy. If your share of this money that has been taken from you were given back to you, it would not amount to much, and tomorrow Qays (and their support) will be better for you than money." Azd responded, "So what do you think?" and Ṣabrah said, "Turn away from them and let them go." They did that and turned away, and the Banū Bakr and 'Abd al-Qays said, "What an excellent opinion was that ex-

827. That is, the Banū Hilāl b. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah of Qays, the tribe of Lubābah Umm al-Faḍl, the mother of 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās (see Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-'arab, 262). This is the only appearance of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Hilālī and 'Abdallāh b. Razīn al-Hilālī in Ṭabarī's work.

828. For Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā, a Baṣran scholar and traditionist who died 209/824–25, see *EI*², s.v.

829. Fa-ḥamala ma'ahu miqdāra mā ijtama'a lahu; Ann., 38 A.H. §224, has "quello che spettava a lui" ("that which was his due"). Arzāq is the plural of rizq (a loan word from Persian), which usually indicates the food and provisions allocated to the fighting men along with their pay ('aṭā'—see n. 653, above). Presumably, when this was in government hands, before it was allocated to the soldiers, some of it must have been in the form of cash. This interpolation by Ibn Shabbah from Abū 'Ubaydah is a comment on Abū Mikhnaf's account, which now resumes.

830. That is, the five divisions into which the various tribal fragments settled in al-Baṣrah were grouped (see Pellat, Milieu Baṣrien, 23–24).

831. Al-Ṭaff is here probably used in a general sense and does not refer to the specific place, often also called by the same name, where al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was killed (see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v. [III, 539]).

832. That is, the tribal group to which Ibn 'Abbās' maternal relatives belonged.

833. Literally, "while there remains among us a blinking eye."

834. See n. 671, above.

pressed by Ṣabrah to his tribesmen," and they too withdrew. The Banū Tamīm, however said, "By God, we will not separate from them. We will fight them for it," but al-Aḥnaf [b. Qays] said to them, "They who are further than you in kinship from them have refrained from fighting them."[835] Still they insisted, "By God, we will fight them," and al-Aḥnaf said, "In that case I will not aid you against them," and he withdrew from them.

They made Ibn al-Mujjā'ah[836] of Banū Tamīm their chief, therefore, and fought with Qays. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk [b. 'Abdallāh al-Hilālī] attacked Ibn al-Mujjā'ah and stabbed him, and 'Abdallāh b. Razīn grabbed him around the neck and they both fell to the ground struggling. There were many wounded, but nobody was killed in the fighting. The "fifths" then said, "We have achieved nothing. We have (merely) withdrawn from them and left them fighting each other." And they separated the two parties.[837] They said to the Banū Tamīm, "We are more generous in spirit than you because we have left this money to your cousins while you are fighting them for it. Your men have attacked and been successfully resisted, so let your opponents go and, if you wish, go back yourselves." And Ibn 'Abbās went on with about twenty men and reached Mecca.

According to Abū Zayd (Ibn Shabbah): Abū 'Ubaydah claimed (although I did not hear it from him) that Ibn 'Abbās did not leave [3456] al-Baṣrah until 'Alī had been killed. (Then) he left and joined al-Ḥasan and witnessed the peace agreement between him and Mu'āwiyah. He returned to al-Baṣrah where his things were and carried them away together with a small amount of property from the treasury, saying, "These are my arzāq."

Abū Zayd said that he reported that to Abū al-Ḥasan (al-Madā'inī), who denied it and claimed that Ibn 'Abbās was in Mecca when 'Alī was killed and that it was 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās who witnessed the peace treaty between al-Ḥasan and Mu'āwiyah.

In this year 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib (peace be upon him) was killed, but there are different opinions about the date of his death. According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—[anonymous]—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar:

835. Tamīm and Qays were both counted to Muḍar.
836. This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to this Ibn al-Mujjā'ah.
837. Ḍarabū wujūh ba'ḍihim 'an ba'ḍin.

'Alī was killed in the month of Ramaḍān, on a Friday when seventeen days of it had elapsed, in the year 40. Al-Wāqidī reported similarly, as al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad) told me from Ibn Sa'd from al-Wāqidī. But Abū Zayd (Ibn Shabbah) told me that according to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī), 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed in al-Kūfah on a Friday when eleven (it is also said thirteen) days remained of Ramaḍān in the year 40. (It has also been said that it was in Rabī' II of the year 40.)[838]

The Circumstances of the Murder and Death of 'Alī

According to Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Masrūqī—'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥarrānī Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Ismā'īl b. Rāshid:[839] In the story about Ibn Muljam and his companions it is told that Ibn Muljam, al-Burak b. 'Abdallāh, and 'Amr b. Bakr al-Tamīmī[840] met and discussed the way things were. They decried their governors and talked [3457] about the people killed at the canal, asking for God's mercy upon them. They said, "We have achieved nothing by surviving them, our brethren who were summoners of the people to the worship of their Lord and who did 'not fear, for the cause of God, the reproach of anyone.'[841] What if we 'sell our souls'[842] and go to the imāms of error, seek to kill them, deliver the land from them, and thus achieve vengeance for our brethren?"

838. The days of the weeks and the dates given do not tally. In the year A.H. 40, the 15th of Ramaḍān should have been a Friday. 17 Ramaḍān 40 = Sunday 24 January 661. Rabī' II 40 = August–September 660. For the following section, see *EI*², s.v. Ibn Muldjam, where extensive references to further sources are provided.

839. For Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Masrūqī (d. 258/871–72), see al-Mizzī, Tahdhīb, XXIX, 98–100. The Cairo edition calls him Mūsā b. 'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

840. For variants in the ism and nisbah of Ibn Muljam, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. 'Abdarraḥmān b. Mulǧam; for the Banū Murād b. Mālik of Madhḥij, see ibid., s.v.; al-Burak is said to have belonged to the Banū Ṣuraym of Tamīm, 'Amr to the Banū Sa'd of Tamīm.

841. See Qur'ān 5:54.

842. Fa-law sharaynā anfusanā. It is said that the early Khawārij called themselves shurāt because of their willingness to "sell" their souls for the cause of God. See Qur'ān 9:111: "God has bought (ishtarā) from the Believers their souls and their wealth."

Ibn Muljam, who was one of the men of Egypt, said, "I will take care of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib for you!" Al-Burak b. 'Abdallāh said, "I will take care of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān." And 'Amr b. Bakr said, "I will take care of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ." They made a joint covenant and agreement by God, "No man of us shall turn away from the one against whom he has been sent until he kills him or himself dies first." They took their swords and put poison on them and agreed that when seventeen days had elapsed of Ramaḍān, each of them would make an attempt on the man against whom he had been sent.

Each of them went to the town in which was the one whom he sought. Ibn Muljam al-Murādī, who was counted to Kindah,[843] joined his clansmen in al-Kūfah, but kept his business from them, being wary lest they reveal anything of it. One day he saw several men of Taym al-Ribāb,[844] ten of whom 'Alī had killed at the canal, and they were remembering their slain. On the same day he met a woman of Taym al-Ribāb called Qaṭāmi bint al-Shijnah, whose father and brother 'Alī had killed at the canal. She was of surpassing beauty and when he saw her she confused his mind and he forgot what he was about. He asked to marry her but she said, "I will not marry you until you give me what I want."[845] He asked, "What will satisfy you?" and she answered, "Three thousand dirhams, a slave, [3458] a singing girl, and the killing of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib."

He said, "That is a fitting dowry for you, but as for the killing of 'Alī, I would not have thought that you would mention it to me, while wanting me."[846] She said, "Indeed yes. Look out for when he is off his guard and if you get him you will have satisfied yourself and myself, and life with me will be good for you. If you are killed, then what is with God is better than this world and its adornments and those of its people."[847] He replied, "By God, it was the very

843. Ibn Sa'd III/1, 23, says that he was a ḥalīf of the Banū Jabalah of Kindah (for Jabalah b. 'Adī of Kindah, see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v.).

844. Ribāb was a confederation that included the Banū Taym b. 'Abd Manāt (hence known as Taym al-Ribāb) and various others, allied with the Banū Sa'd of Tamīm (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ribāb).

845. Hattā tashfiya lī; for shafā in the sense of "to satisfy," see Gloss., s.v.

846. Lā arāki (urāki!) dhakartihi lī wa-anti turīdīnī; see Wright, Grammar, II, 32b, for wa with following subjunctive.

847. See Qur'ān 28:60.

killing of 'Alī that brought me to this town. What you ask for is yours." She said, "I will seek out for you someone who will aid you and support you in your task." She sent to a man of her tribe of Taym al-Ribāb who was called Wardān and spoke with him, and he agreed.

Ibn Muljam went to a man of the Banū Ashja'[848] called Shabīb b. Bajarah and asked him, "Would you like honor in this world and the next?" He replied, "How?" and Ibn Muljam said, "The killing of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib." "May your mother be bereaved of you![849]" he answered, "Then you would have done something grave.'[850] How will you be able to get to him?" Ibn Muljam said, "I shall lay in wait for him in the mosque and when he comes out for the morning prayer we shall attack him and kill him. If we escape, we shall have satisfied ourselves and attained our revenge. If we are killed, then what is with God is better than this world and what is in it."[851] Shabīb said, "Woe to you! If it were anyone other than 'Alī, it would be a matter of less importance to me. But you know how much he has been tested in Islam and his precedence in following the Prophet. I do not think I could find it in me to be happy at his killing." Ibn Muljam said, "Do you not know that he killed the people of the canal, the righteous servants of God!" "Indeed yes," he replied. "Then let us kill him for those of our brethren whom he killed!" And Shabīb assented.

They went to Qaṭāmi who was in the great mosque practising "withdrawal."[852] They said to her, "We have agreed to kill 'Alī," and she said, "When you want to do that, come to me." Then Ibn Muljam went back to her on the night before the Friday in the [3459] morning of which 'Alī was killed in the year 40, and he said to her, "This is the night when I promised my two companions that each one of us would kill his man." She called for silk to be brought to 848. The Banū Ashja' b. Rayth of Ghaṭafān.

849. Thakilatka ummuka; the expression is understood not as an insult, but as an expression of surprise or concern (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. umm).

850. See Qur'ān 19:89.

851. See Qur'ān 28:60.

852. Mu'takifah, a term that would usually indicate the religious practice of i'tikāf, a sort of retreat (usually in a mosque) associated especially with Ramaḍān (see *EI*², s.v. I'tikāf).

them and bound it around them[853] and they took their swords and sat before the door out of which 'Alī would come. When he appeared, Shabīb struck at him with his sword but it hit the door post or the arch; Ibn Muljam struck him on the top of his head with his sword.

Wardān fled and went into his house, where one of his half-brothers came in upon him. Wardān was unwinding the silk from his breast and the visitor asked about it and the sword. Wardān told him what had happened. The visitor went away, and then came back with his sword and set about Wardān and killed him.

Shabīb set off toward the gates of Kindah[854] while it was still dark just before dawn, but the cry went up and a man of Ḥaḍramawt called 'Uwaymir[855] came upon him. Shabīb had his sword in his hand but 'Uwaymir seized it from him and attacked him. When he saw that the people had come seeking Shabīb whose sword he had in his own hand, however, 'Uwaymir was afraid for his own life and let Shabīb go. He escaped in the confusion.

They fell on Ibn Muljam and seized him, but not before a man of the Banū Hamdān with the kunyah of Abū Admā' had taken his sword, struck at his leg, and felled him.

'Alī remained where he had fallen[856] and had Ja'dah b. Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb[857] stand up behind him and lead the morning prayer. Then 'Alī said, "Bring him to me," and Ibn Muljam was brought in. 'Alī said, "Enemy of God, did I not do good to you?" "Yes, indeed," he answered. "Then what led you to do this?" "I sharpened my sword for forty mornings and I asked God to kill the worst of His creatures 853. The significance of this ritual is not evident.

854. Referred to in the singular (bāb Kindah) in a report about the entry of the Qarāmiṭah into al-Kūfah (see Ṭabarī, III, 2261 [= vol. XXXVIII, 163, of this translation]).

855. Ḥaḍramawt here indicates tribal rather than geographical origin. According to the Muslim genealogical system, Ḥaḍramawt (possibly to be identified with the Hazarmaveth of Genesis, 10:26), after whom the region of southwest Arabia is named, was one of the earliest ancestors of the southern descent group. Ḥaḍramawt are related to, but distinct from, Ḥimyar and Kindah (Ibn al-Kalbī has no entry for Ḥaḍramawt).

856. Ta'akhkhara.

857. See p. 99 and n. 401, above.

with it," he said. "Alī replied, "But I think that you must be slain with it, for you must be one of the worst of His creatures." [3460]

They say that, before he struck 'Alī, while he was sitting among Bakr b. Wā'il, Ibn Muljam saw the bier of Abjar b. Jābir al-'Ijlī, father of Ḥajjār, passing.[858] Abjar was a Christian and there were a number of Christians round about it and some Muslims[859] walking at one side with Ḥajjār because of his status among them. Among them was Shaqīq b. Thawr.[860] Ibn Muljam asked who they were and was told, and he began to compose:

If Ḥajjār b. Abjar is (really) a Muslim, the bier of Abjar would have been kept away from him;
But if Ḥajjār b. Abjar is an infidel, then this sort of infidelity is not inappropriate.[861]
Do you accept this—that a priest[862] and a Muslim are together before a bier? Shameful spectacle!
If it were not for what I intend to do, I would scatter their company with a sword polished, burnished, shining, and drawn from its scabbard.
But my intention with that (sword) is as an instrument of access to God or this man ('Alī). Take that or leave it.

---

858. See Ibn al-Kalbī, s.vv. Abǧar b. Ǧābir and Ḥaǧǧār b. Abǧar for these two leaders of the Banū 'Ijl of Bakr b. Wā'il. The Christian father was active in pre-Islamic times and the son, in events in al-Kūfah down to the fall of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr. The following verses seem to imply that the son has accepted Islam by this time, for Ibn Muljam's objection is to the presence of a Muslim at the funeral of (i.e., in the presence of the corpse of) a non-Muslim. The reasons for this objection are not made clear. In general and in practice Muslims are respectful toward, and may participate in, the funerals of non-Muslims (see *EI*², s.v. Djanāza; T. P. Hughes, Dictionary of Islam, s.v. Burial). In ḥadīth, however, it may be possible to see traces of a difference of opinion on this issue. It is usually held that, in contrast with Judaism, Islam does not regard the presence of a corpse as polluting (Wensinck, " Die Entstehung," 63), but there seems to be uneasiness about the performance of prayer at tombs or in graveyards. It may be significant that the ḥadīth usually cited to justify the view that the human corpse is not destructive of ritual purity in Islam in fact says that the Muslim (sometimes Mu'min) does not pollute, whether alive or dead (see Wensinck, Concordances, s.v. najisa).

859. Unās, here indicating Muslims rather than simply "people."

860. See p. 59 and n. 247, above.

861. Leiden has kufūr (infidelity), Cairo kafūr (infidel).

862. Following Ann., A.H. 40 §32, in reading qass for qays.

It is reported that Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah[863] said: By God, I was performing the prayer ritual in the great mosque on that night when 'Alī was stabbed. I was among a large number of men of the garrison town who were praying near the door. They were continuously standing, bowing, and prostrating without wearying, from the beginning of the night until the end when 'Ali came out for the morning prayer. He began to call out, "People! Prayer, prayer!" but I do not know whether he had come through the door and said these words, or not. I noticed something glitter and I heard, "Authority (al-ḥukm) belongs to God, 'Alī, not to you or your accomplices'!" and I saw a sword and then a second. I heard 'Alī say, "Do not let him escape," and the people rushed on the attacker from every side. I remained there until Ibn Muljam was taken and led in to 'Alī.
[3461] I, too, went in among those who did, and I heard 'Alī saying, "A life for a life. If I die, kill him as he killed me. If I live, I will consider what to do."

It is reported that the men rushed in fear to al-Ḥasan on account of what had happened regarding 'Alī. While they were with him (and Ibn Muljam was shackled before him), Umm Kulthūm the daughter of 'Alī, weeping, called to Ibn Muljam, "Enemy of God, there is no harm to my father, may God dishonor you!" He replied, "Then for whom do you weep? By God, I bought my sword for a thousand dirhams and I have spent another thousand on poisoning it. If this blow had fallen upon all the people of this town, not one of them would have survived it."

It is reported that Jundab b. 'Abdallāh[864] went in to 'Alī and asked him, "Commander of the Faithful, if we have lost you—and may we not—we will give the oath of allegiance to al-Ḥasan." 'Alī said, "I do not order you to do so, and neither do I forbid it. You people are best fitted to see." Jundab repeated to him what he had said.[865]

---

863. One of the themes of the following is the relative authority of the three sons of 'Alī—al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (his sons by Fāṭimah) and Muḥammad (his son from the Ḥanafī woman).

864. Of Azd (see Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ǧundab b. 'Abdallāh); for his presence at Ṣiffīn and reports from him about events there, see pp. 11, 89, above.

865. This report would be relevant for disputes about the imamate between Sunnīs and Shī'īs and between different Shī'ī groups. According to the Shī'ī doctrine of naṣṣ, an imam was legitimate only if he had been nominated by his predecessor during his lifetime, and each imam made known who his successor should be. See further Moojen Momen, An Introduction to Shī'ī Islam, index, s.v. (The *EI*² article s.v. Naṣṣ is concerned mainly with a different doctrine.)

'Alī called Ḥasan and Ḥusayn and said, "I commend to you both fear of God and that you do not seek this world even if it seeks you. Do not weep for anything that is taken away from you, speak the truth, show compassion for the orphan, succor those who are anxious, act on behalf of the foolish,[866] be enemies to the wrongdoer and helpers to the wronged, act according to the Book, and let no man's censure affect you while you work for God." Then he turned to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah and said, "Have you committed to heart what I have commended to your brothers?" "Yes," he replied. 'Alī said, "And I commend the same to you and also reverence for your two brothers to whom you owe a great duty. Follow their commands and do not decide any matter without them." Then he said to Ḥasan and Ḥusayn, "And I commend him to you two for he is your brother and your father's son, and you know that your father loved him."

He said to al-Ḥasan,

> I commend to you, my son, fear of God, the holding of prayer at its appointed times, the payment of the zakāt on its due date,[867] and a scrupulousness in performing ritual ablution, for there is no prayer without purification and the prayer of one who holds back the zakāt is not accepted.[868] And I commend to you the pardoning of sin, the suppression of anger, observance of the ties of relationship, maturity in the face of coarseness (al-ḥilm 'inda al-jahl), acquiring knowledge of religion (al-tafaqquh fī al-dīn), firmness in authority, frequent mindfulness of the Qur'ān, fulfilment of the duties of hospitality (jiwār), commanding the good and forbidding the evil,[869] and keeping clear of immorality (al-fawāḥish). [3462]

When death came to 'Alī he made his testament as follows:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, this is the testament of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. He testifies that 866. Wa'ṣna'ā li al-akhraq; Cairo has lil-ākhirah.

867. Iqām al-ṣalāt li-waqtihā wa-ītā' al-zakāt 'inda maḥillihā; see Qur'ān 21:73, 24:37. For the zakāt, see EI[1], s.v.; and n. 739, above.

868. In the traditions about the wars of the Riddah, apostasy from Islam is signaled by the refusal to perform the ṣalāt and pay the zakāt.

869. See n. 400.

there is no god but God alone "without partner"[870] and that Muḥammad is His servant and messenger "whom He sent with right guidance and the religion of truth to make it triumphant over every other even though the polytheists abhor it."[871] "My prayer and my ritual (nusukī), my life and my death, belong to God, the Lord of the worlds, Who has no partner. Thus I was commanded and I am one of those who submit (al-muslimīn)."[872] I commend to you, Ḥasan, and all of my offspring and family, the fear of God your Lord. "Die only as Muslims and hold fast together to the rope of God, not separating."[873] I heard Abū al-Qāsim[874] saying, "The restoration of unity is better than all your prayer and fasting."[875]

Look to your relatives and unite them, that God may make easy for you the reckoning. Fear God, fear God with regard to the orphans, and neither restrain their entreaties nor let them be lost while in your care.[876] Fear God, fear God with regard to those who have a right to your protection and hospitality (jīrānukum), for they are the commen-

870. Qur'ān 6:163.

871. See Qur'ān 9:33; 61:9.

872. Qur'ān, 6:162–63, but note that min al-muslimīn replaces the Qur'ānic awwalu al-muslimīn.

873. Qur'ān 3:102–3.

874. That is, the Prophet Muḥammad.

875. See al-Tirmidhī, Ṣaḥīḥ, K. al-Qiyāmah, bāb 56.

876. (?) Allāha Allāha fī al-aytām fa-lā tu'annū afwāhahum wa-lā yaḍī'unna bi-ḥaḍratikum; literally, "do not restrain their mouths and do not cause them to be lost/neglect them in your presence." For tu'annū only the first ḍammah is indicated in the text—there are no other vowels and no shaddah. See, however, Gloss., s.v. '-n-y, which indicates the shaddah and suggests "ne cohibeatis vocem eorum flagitantium." Presumably the suggested reading is the jussive of '-n-w, form II, although a similar sense could be obtained with '-n-n, form IV, jussive. Gloss. refers to Lane, Lexicon, s.v. '-n-w, form II, which cites TA for a saying of 'Alī at Ṣiffīn including the expression 'annū bi al-aṣwāt, which Lane interprets as a prohibition of raising a confused and unintelligible clamor. (Cf. the reading at Ṭabarī, I, 3282–83: wa-ghuḍḍū al-abṣār wa-akhfiḍū al-aṣwāt.) SNB, XVII, 5, reads lā tughibbū (but notes a variant lā tughayyirū) and lā tuḍayyi'ū, interpreting the former as an injunction not to cause them to starve and the latter as an injunction not to abandon them. Afwāh, literally, "mouths," might be a metonym for eating or for speaking. Ann., A.H. 40 §33, uncharacteristically avoids the problem by resorting to the briefest paraphrase of the whole passage.

dation of your Prophet, who never ceased to commend them so that we thought he would include them as heirs.[877]

Fear God, fear God with regard to the Qur'ān and do not allow anyone to do more than you in acting in accordance with it. Fear God, fear God with regard to the prayer, for it is the pillar of your religion. Fear God, fear God with regard to the house of your Lord[878] and do not leave it as long as you live for, if it is abandoned, there will never be another to be compared with it.[879] Fear God, fear God with regard to jihād in the path of God with your property and your lives. Fear God, fear God with regard to the zakāt, for it quenches the anger of the Lord. Fear God, fear God with regard to the protection (dhimmah) granted by your Prophet and do not allow the dhimmī[880] to be oppressed among you. Fear God, fear God with regard to the Companions of your Prophet, for the Messenger of God commended them to us. Fear God, fear God with regard to the poor and the destitute and give them a share in your livelihood. Fear God, fear God with regard to what your right hands possess.[881] Observe the prayer always! [3463]

Do not fear before God the blame of any man[882]—He is sufficent protector for you against anyone who has designs upon you and oppresses you. "Speak good to the people"[883] as God has commanded you and do not abandon the commanding of the good and the forbidding of the evil, so that the worst ones among you obtain power: then you will call but no answer will be given to you. You must pursue mutual harmony and generosity, avoiding mutual opposition, sep-

877. That is, the Prophet emphasized the duty of a man to his jīrān (see Qur'ān 4:36 for the command of kindness to the jār) so strongly that it was thought he would entitle them to a share in the part of the inheritance that is apportioned among the relatives of the dead man. On the rules of inheritance in Islam, see *EI*², s.v. Mīrāth, and *EI*¹, s.v. Waṣiyya.

878. That is, the sanctuary at Mecca.

879. See Gloss., s.v. n-ẓ-r, form III, which suggests that bihi ghayruhu is to be understood after lam yunāẓar.

880. For the ahl al-dhimmah, the tolerated and protected non-Muslims, see *EI*², s.v. Dhimma.

881. That is, your slaves; the phrase is of frequent Quranic occurrence.

882. See Qur'ān 5:54.

883. Qur'ān 2:83.

aration, and fragmentation. "Help one another in piety and fear of God but not in sin and enmity to Him. Fear God for His retribution is mighty."[884] May God preserve you as members of a family and your Prophet as one of you. I entrust you to God and I bid you farewell, and the mercy of God be upon you.

He (may God be pleased with him) spoke no more before he died except to say that there is no god but God. He died in the month of Ramaḍān of the year 40. His two sons al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn [3464] washed his body, together with 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far.[885] He was dressed for burial in three robes without a qamīṣ,[886] and al-Ḥasan made nine takbīrahs[887] over him.

Then al-Ḥasan assumed authority for six months. 'Alī had forbidden him to inflict mutilation for his murder.[888] He had said, "Oh Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib,[889] let me not find you plunging into the blood of the Muslims saying, 'The Commander of the Faithful has been killed! The Commander of the Faithful has been killed!' No one shall be killed except my killer. Wait and see, Ḥasan. If I die from this blow of his, then inflict on him blow for blow. But do not inflict mutilation on the man, for I heard the Messenger of God say, 'Avoid mutilation, even on a vicious dog.' "[890]

When 'Alī (peace be upon him) died, al-Ḥasan sent to Ibn Muljam, who said to him: "Will you let me put something to you? By God, I never made a promise to God that I did not fulfill. I made God a promise by the ḥaṭīm[891] that I would kill 'Ali and Mu'āwiyah or die. If you wish, release me so that I may get at Mu'āwiyah and,

---

884. Qur'ān 5:2.

885. The son of 'Alī's brother.

886. For the qamīṣ, a shirt or shift with sleeves that is worn beneath other clothes, see Dozy, Vêtements, s.v. Possibly laysa fīhā indicates "not counting" rather than "without."

887. Repetition of the formula Allāhu akbar, "God is most great."

888. Kāna 'Aliyyun nahā al-Ḥasana 'an al-muthlah.

889. That is, the descendants of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf, the grandfather of both 'Alī and the Prophet.

890. For *ḥadīth*s prohibiting al-muthlah, see Wensinck, Concordances, s.v., and see too s.v. 'aqūr.

891. The name is used variously with reference to features of the sanctuary at Mecca. It seems that its most common application is to the semicircular wall that encloses the area of the Ḥijr immediately adjoining the Ka'bah on the northwest, but see Hawting, "Muslim Sanctuary," esp. 34–36.

as God is my witness, if I do not kill him, or if I kill him and survive, I will come to you and place my hand in yours." Al-Ḥasan replied, "By God, not until you see Hell!" and he had him brought forward and killed him. Then the people took him, wrapped him in some straw mats, and set fire to him.

As for al-Burak b. 'Abdallāh, on the night when 'Alī was stabbed, he waited for Mu'āwiyah. When he came out to make the morning prayer, al-Burak rushed at him with his sword, but it only landed on Mu'āwiyah's buttock and the assailant was seized. He said to Mu'āwiyah, "I have something good to tell you secretly but, if I do, then will you let me have something in exchange for it?" Mu'āwiyah said, "Yes," and he continued, "One of my brethren has killed 'Alī on this same night." Mu'āwiyah said, "Perhaps he was [3465] not able to carry it out." "Indeed yes," said al-Burak, "'Alī comes out without any guard to protect him."

Mu'āwiyah ordered that al-Burak be killed, and then he sent to al-Sā'idī,[892] who was a doctor. He examined Mu'āwiyah and said, "Choose one of two things that I shall put before you: either I heat up an iron and put it on the wound, or else I will give you a potion that will make you infertile but you will recover from your wound. Your wound is poisoned." Mu'āwiyah said, "As for the fire, I cannot stand it. As for infertility, in Yazīd and 'Abdallāh I have already that which delights my eye." So he gave him that potion, and he recovered but had no children subsequently.

It was then that Mu'āwiyah instituted the maqṣūrah in the mosques, the night guard, and the stationing of men (shuraṭ) at his head when he prostrated in prayer.[893]

As for 'Amr b. Bakr, on that night he sat waiting for 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ but he did not appear, for he was suffering from stomach pains. Instead he ordered the commander of his guard, Khārijah b. Ḥudhāfah of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy,[894] to lead the prayer. Khārijah went out to do so and 'Amr b. Bakr fell upon him, stabbing and killing him, thinking that it was 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. The men seized the assailant and hastened with him to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, whom they 892. This is his only appearance.

893. For the maqṣūrah, the "reserved area" in a mosque, see *EI*², s.v. Masdjid; for the shuraṭ, s.v. Shurṭa.

894. See Ibn al-Kalbī, II, index, s.v. Ḥāriğa; he was a Qurashī and sub anno 27/647–48 is described as being in charge of the qaḍā' of Egypt.

greeted as amīr. Ibn Bakr asked, "Who is this?" and they told him, "'Amr." "Then who is it that I have killed?" Told that it was Khārijah b. Ḥudhāfah, Ibn Bakr said, "By God, you wicked man (fāsiq)! I was sure it was you!" 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ replied, "You wanted me, but God wanted Khārijah!" Then he had 'Amr b. Bakr brought forward and killed him.

[3466] When Mu'āwiyah heard about that, he wrote to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ:

The fate of a shaykh of Lu'ayy b. Ghālib[895] was murder, and many are the causes of death.
Oh 'Amr, take it easy. You were his paternal uncle and his companion, above his male relatives.
You escaped, but the Murādī[896] has moistened his sword
(with blood) from the son of Abī Ṭālib, the shaykh of al-Abṭaḥ.[897] Another like him (i.e., like Ibn Muljam) struck me with a sword, and this was a blow that continues to afflict us,
While you, every day and night, in that Egypt of yours, speak honeyed words to fair-skinned ladies, like gazelles going to pasture.

When news of 'Alī's death reached 'Ā'ishah,[898] she said:

And she threw down her staff and settled upon her place of abode, like the traveler happy to return home.[899]

She asked who had killed him and, when told that it was a man of Murād, she said:

Even though he was far away, there has announced his death a young man (ghulām) in whose mouth there was no dust.[900]

Zaynab, the daughter of Abū Salamah,[901] said, "Are you saying this about 'Alī?" and 'Ā'ishah replied, "I am forgetful, and, if I forget,

---

895. That is, Khārijah.
896. That is, Ibn Muljam.
897. A name applied to several places in and around Mecca; here it is probably synonomous with Mecca (see *EI*², s.v. Makka).
898. The widow of the Prophet, and the opponent of 'Alī at the Camel.
899. Ann., A.H. 40 §32, says that the verse is proverbial and is cited to indicate pleasure at something.
900. That is, he told the truth.
901. See nn. 812, 813, above.

remind me."[902] He who brought tidings of 'Alī's death was Sufyān b. 'Abd Shams b. Abī Waqqāṣ al-Zuhrī.[903]

Ibn Abī Mayyās al-Murādī[904] said about the killing of 'Alī:

You upon whom be blessings, we have struck Ḥaydar[905]
Abū Ḥasan with a blow to the head and he was split apart.
We have removed kingship from his concerns, with the blow of a sword, since he waxed high and mighty.
We are noble and powerful in the dawn, when death puts on and wraps itself in death. [3467]

He also said:

I never saw a dowry provided by any generous man, whether Arab or other, like that of Qaṭāmi:
Three thousand dirhams, a slave, and a singing girl, and the stabbing of 'Alī with the piercing blade.
There is no dowry, however costly, more costly than 'Alī, and no killing above that performed by Ibn Muljam.

Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī said:

Indeed, say to Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥarb, and may those who gloat not rejoice:
"Do you afflict us in the month of fasting with the loss of the best of all men?[906]
You have killed the best of those who ride mounts and put the saddle upon them, the best of those who sail the seas;
The best of those who wear sandals and make them, the best of those who recite the mathānī and the mubīn.[907]
If you looked at the face of Abū al-Ḥusayn, you saw the full moon that delighted those who looked.

---

902. The words of 'Ā'ishah are obscure in meaning, possibly ironic.
903. That is, the nephew of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ (see n. 422, above).
904. This is Ṭabarī's only citation of this poet of Ibn Muljam's tribe.
905. Literally, "the Lion," a name frequently given to 'Alī.
906. The implication may be that Mu'āwiyah was behind the murder of 'Alī.
907. The two Arabic nouns are both Quranic and associated with the idea of scripture: some interpreters apply them to the Qur'ān itself. On the former, see Rubin, "Seven Mathānī."

Quraysh knew, wherever they were,
that you ('Alī) were the best of them in status and in religion."

There are different opinions about 'Alī's age on the day he was [3468] killed. Some said that he was fifty-nine but, according to Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh,[908] 'Alī's son al-Ḥasan used to say, "When my father was killed he was fifty-eight." According to some, he was sixty-five when he was killed, but according to Abū Zayd ('Umar b. Shabbah)—Abū al-Ḥasan (al-Madā'inī)—Ayyūb b. 'Umar b. Abī 'Amr—Ja'far b. Muḥammad:[909] 'Alī was sixty-three when he was killed. This last report is the best option.

According to 'Umar (b. Shabbah)—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Ḥimmānī—Sharīk—Abū Isḥāq:[910] When 'Alī was killed he was sixty-three. According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī): When 'Alī assumed authority he was fifty-eight and some months. His caliphate lasted for five years, all but three months, and then Ibn Muljam, whose name was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Amr, killed him in Ramaḍān, seventeen days of it having elapsed. His rule lasted for four years and nine months and he was killed in the year 40 at the age of sixty-three.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): 'Alī was killed aged sixty-three early on the Friday morning, seventeen nights of Ramaḍān having passed in the year [3469] 40. He was buried by the congregational mosque in the governor's residence (Qaṣr al-Imārah).

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: 'Alī was stabbed early on the Friday morning. He survived for the Friday and the Friday night, and died on the Saturday night when eleven nights were left of Ramaḍān in the year 40. He was sixty-three years old.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Alī b. 'Umar and Abū Bakr al-Sabrī—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Aqīl:[911] I heard Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah saying in "the year of the deluge" (al-juḥāf), "This year of 81 has begun and I am sixty-

908. That is, Muṣ'ab al-Zubayrī, the compiler of Kitāb nasab Quraysh.
909. That is, Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, the sixth imam of the Imamis and Ismā'īlīs; for the form of Ayyūb's name, see Add. et emend.
910. That is, 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh Abū Isḥāq al-Hamdānī al-Sabī'ī (?).
911. That is, the grandson of 'Alī's brother 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib.

five years old?[912] I have passed the age of my father." He was asked how old his father had been at his death and he said, "He was sixty-three when he was killed."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: Similarly. And that is our firm opinion.

The Length of His Caliphate

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit (al-Rāzī)—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar:[913] 'Alī's caliphate was five years, all but three months. According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: 'Alī's caliphate was five years, all but three months. [3470]

According to Abū Zayd—Abū al-Ḥasan: 'Alī's rule was four years, nine months and a day—or several days.

His Physical Appearance

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah—Isḥāq b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Farwah: I asked Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī,[914] "What did 'Alī look like?" and he said, "A tawny man, markedly so, with heavy and large eyes, corpulent, bald, tending to shortness."

His Ancestry

He was 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. Abū Ṭālib's personal name was 'Abd Manāf b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf. 'Alī's mother was Fāṭimah the daughter of Asad b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf.

His Wives and Children

The first wife he married was Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God, and he took no other wife while she lived. Fāṭimah bore him al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (it is reported that she also bore him another son called Muḥassin,[915] who died while still a baby), Zaynab the elder, and Umm Kulthūm the elder.

912. In fact, at Ṭabarī, II, 1039–40 [= vol. XXII, 187, of this translation], 80 A.H. is called the 'ām al-Juḥāf; it was so called because of a flash flood at Mecca.

913. See n. 88, above.

914. That is, Muḥammad al-Bāqir, the great-grandson of 'Alī.

[3471] Then subsequently he married Umm al-Banīn bint Ḥizām (Ḥizām was Abū al-Majl b. Khālid b. Rabī'ah b. al-Waḥīd b. Ka'b b. 'Āmir b. Kilāb). She bore him al-'Abbās, Ja'far, 'Abdallāh, and 'Uthmān, who were killed with al-Ḥusayn at Karbalā'—only al-'Abbās had progeny.

He also married Laylā, daughter of Mas'ūd b. Khālid b. Mālik b. Rib'ī b. Sulmā[916] b. Jandal b. Nahshal b. Dārim b. Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm, who bore him 'Ubaydallāh and Abū Bakr. Hishām b. Muḥammad claimed that these last two were killed with al-Ḥusayn at al-Ṭaff.[917] However, Muḥammad b. 'Umar claimed that it was al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd who killed 'Ubaydallāh at al-Madhār,[918] and that neither 'Ubaydallāh nor Abū Bakr had any descendants.

'Alī also married Asmā', daughter of 'Umays, al-Khath'amiyyah. She bore him—according to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Yaḥyā and Muḥammad, the youngest (of the three with that name). Hishām said that neither of them had progeny. Al-Wāqidī, however, said (according to the report of al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī) that Asmā' bore 'Alī his two sons Yaḥyā and 'Awn. Some say that the youngest Muḥammad was born of a concubine (umm walad)—that was what al-Wāqidī said, and he said that the youngest Muḥammad was killed with al-Ḥusayn.

From the woman called al-Ṣahbā' (who was Umm Ḥabīb bint [3472] Rabī'ah b. Bujayr b. al-'Abd b. 'Alqamah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Utbah b. Sa'd b. Zuhayr b. Jusham b. Bakr b. Ḥubayb b. 'Amr b. Ghanam b. Taghlib b. Wā'il; she was a concubine from among the captives taken by Khālid b. al-Walīd when he raided the Banū Taghlib at 'Ayn al-Tamr) 'Alī was father of 'Umar and Ruqayyah. 'Umar b. 'Alī was granted eighty-five years of life, having a half share of 'Alī's inheritance and dying at Yanbu'.[919]

---

915. Cairo: Muḥsin.

916. Cairo: Salmā.

917. That is, at Karbalā' (see n. 831, above, for al-Ṭaff).

918. Slightly north of al-Baṣrah (Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 42–43), this was the site, in 67/687, of a significant defeat inflicted on al-Mukhtār by the army of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr, the governor of al-Baṣrah.

919. The port of Medina on the Red Sea.

'Alī also married Umāmah bint Abī al-'Āṣī b. al-Rabī' b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manāf. Her mother was Zaynab, the daughter of the Messenger of God, and she bore him the second of his sons who were called Muḥammad.

The eldest of his sons with that name is known as Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah. His mother was Khawlah, the daughter of Ja'far b. Qays b. Maslamah b. 'Ubayd b. Tha'labah b. Yarbū' b. Tha'labah b. al-Duwal b. Ḥanīfah b. Lujaym b. Ṣa'b b. 'Alī b. Bakr b. Wā'il. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah died in al-Ṭā'if[920] and Ibn 'Abbās made the funeral prayer over him.

'Alī also married Umm Sa'īd bint 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib b. Mālik al-Thaqafī. She bore him Umm al-Ḥasan and Ramlah the elder.

'Alī had daughters also by various mothers whose names have not been given to us. Among these daughters were Umm Hāni', [3473] Maymūnah, Zaynab the younger, Ramlah the younger, Umm Kulthūm the younger, Fāṭimah, Umāmah, Khadījah, Umm al-Kirām, Umm Salamah, Umm Ja'far, Jumānah, and Nafīsah. Their mothers were various concubines.

He also married Maḥyāt, the daughter of Imru' al-Qays b. 'Adī b. Aws b. Jābir b. Ka'b b. 'Ulaym of Kalb. She bore him a girl who died while still little. Al-Wāqidī said that this little girl used to go out to the mosque while she was a child, and they would ask her, "Who are your mother's people?" and she would answer, "Woof woof!"[921] meaning Kalb.

The total number of 'Alī's progeny was fourteen males and nineteen females.[922]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī: Five of 'Alī's sons had descendants: al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah, al-'Abbās the son of the Kilābī woman, and 'Umar the son of the Taghlabī woman.

His Governors

In al-Baṣrah his governor in this year was 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās—and we have already mentioned the difference of opinion about that.

920. In the Ḥijāz to the southeast of Mecca.
921. Wah wah, the name of her mother's tribe, Kalb, means "dog."
922. Text has "seventeen."

Under his control were the ṣadaqāt, the army, and the ma'āwin[923] for the whole of his period of office. When he departed he left a deputy in place, as I have confirmed previously. Over the judiciary [3474] there 'Alī had appointed Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī. And I have reported what happened regarding the appointment of Ziyād and then 'Alī's sending him to Fārs in charge of its warfare and kharāj. 'Alī was killed while Ziyād was in Fārs and doing that.

'Alī's governor over al-Baḥrayn and its environs and al-Yaman and its makhālīf was 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās until there occurred what we have reported about the events concerning him and Busr b. Abī Arṭāt.

His governor over al-Ṭā'if and Makkah and their dependencies was Qutham b. al-'Abbās, and over al-Madīnah Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī (but it is also said Sahl b. Ḥunayf) until what happened to him when Busr came, as we have previously reported.

Aspects of His Conduct

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Abī Dhi'b—'Abbās b. al-Faḍl, the mawlā of the Banū Hāshim—his father—his grandfather, Ibn Abī Rāfi', who was 'Alī's treasurer: One day 'Alī came in and found his daughter had been dressed up in finery and saw her wearing a pearl from the treasury. He recognized it and said: "Where did she get this? It is my duty to God to cut off her hand!" When I saw that he was serious about that, I said: "By God, Commander of the Faithful, I adorned my brother's daughter[924] [3475] with it. Where would she have got it if I had not given it to her?" And he was silent.

According to Ismā'īl b. Mūsā al-Fazārī—'Abd al-Salām b. Ḥarb—Nājiyah al-Qurashī—his paternal uncle, Yazīd b. 'Adī b. 'Uthmān: I saw 'Alī leaving the Banū Hamdān[925] and he saw two parties

923. Al-ma'āwin is the plural of al-ma'ūnah, on which see n. 653, above. The three areas of responsibility specified for Ibn 'Abbās perhaps cover taxation in general (or perhaps only taxation of property other than land), financial matters concerning the regular troops, and financial matters concerning the irregulars.

924. The expression is to be understood honorifically rather than literally. Ibn Abī Rāfi' ('Ubaydallāh) was the son of a mawlā (freed slave) of the Prophet. For the father, and reference to the son as a scribe of 'Alī, see Ṭabarī, I, 1778–79.

925. Presumably referring to their quarter in al-Kūfah.

fighting with one another. He separated them and then continued on his way. He heard a voice crying, "Oh, help me for God's sake!" He set off toward it hurriedly and I heard the tread of his sandal and he was saying, "Help is at hand." He saw a man grasping another and the man said, "Commander of the Faithful, I sold this robe to him for nine dirhams, but imposed a condition on him that he would not give me in exchange any suspect or clipped coins (that was the usual contract at that time). (He paid me with bad coins so) I brought him these dirhams to exchange for me but he has refused. I persisted with him and he hit me." 'Alī said, "Change them for him." And he said, "You must show proof of the hitting." The plaintiff showed him the proof and 'Alī made the assailant sit down, and said to the plaintiff, "Here you are! Take retaliation." But he said, "I pardon him, Commander of the Faithful." 'Alī said, "I merely wanted to protect your rights." Then he gave the assailant nine lashes and said, "This is the right of the governing authority" (sulṭān).

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umārah al-Asadī—'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Iṣbahānī—al-Mas'ūdī—Nājiyah—his father: We were standing at the gate of the governor's residence (qaṣr) when 'Alī came out to us. When we saw him, we moved aside from in front of him out of respect for him. And when he had passed we formed up behind him. At that point, someone shouted out, "Oh help, for [3476] God's sake!" There were two men fighting together. 'Alī smote each one of them in the chest and then said, "Move aside!" One of them said, "Commander of the Faithful, this one bought a sheep from me and I stipulated that he should not give me any suspect or clipped coins, but he gave me a suspect dirham. I gave it back to him and he struck me." 'Alī said to the other, "What do you say?" "He has spoken the truth, Commander of the Faithful," he replied. 'Alī said to him, "Give him what he stipulated," and then, "Sit down!" To the one who was struck he said, "Take retaliation," but the latter replied, "May I pardon him, Commander of the Faithful?" 'Alī said, "Yes, you may."

When the plaintiff had gone away, 'Alī said, "Band of Muslims, seize this one!" They did so and he was carried on someone's back just like the pupils of the school are carried, and then he gave him fifteen lashes and said, "This is an exemplary punishment (nakāl) for your profanation of his inviolacy (ḥurmah)."

According to Ibn Sinān al-Qazzāz—Abū 'Āṣim—Sukayn b. 'Abd al-'Azīz—Ḥafṣ b. Khālid—his father, Khālid b. Jābir: When 'Alī was killed I heard al-Ḥasan, who had arisen to give a khuṭbah, say, "Tonight you have killed a man on a night in which the Qur'ān came down,[926] a night in which Jesus the son of Mary was taken up, and a night in which Joshua the son of Nun, the champion of Moses, was killed.[927] By God, none of those who were before him are ahead of him and none of those who will come after him will overtake him. By God, if the Prophet sent him on a raid, Gabriel was at his right hand and Michael at his left. By God, he did not leave (at his death) gold or silver except for 800 or 700 dirhams, which he set aside for a servant woman."[928]

926. Traditionally, the Prophet is said to have received his first revelation in the month of Ramaḍān (see Qur'ān 2:181).

927. See the article on Ramaḍān in EI[1] for various other events associated with the month; the death of Joshua is not mentioned there.

928. Cairo: "for his servant."

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XVIII

Between Civil Wars: The Caliphate of Muʿāwiyah

TRANSLATED BY MICHAEL G. MORONY

The Events of the Year

[1]

40 (cont'd)

(MAY 17, 660-MAY 6, 661)

The Rendering of Allegiance to al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī

In the year 40 (May 17, 660–May 6, 661), allegiance was rendered to al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī for the Caliphate. The first to render allegiance to him is said to have been Qays b. Saʿd who said to him, "Hold out your hand, and I will pledge allegiance to you on condition [that you follow] the Book of God, Almighty and Great, and the example (sunnah) of His Prophet, and fight the violators."[1] Al-Ḥasan answered him, ". . . on condition [that I follow] the Book of God and the example of His Prophet, for that includes every stipulation." So Qays rendered allegiance to him and was silent, and the people (also) pledged their allegiance to him.

(According to) ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Mattawayhi[2] al-Marrūdhī[3]—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Yūnus al-Zuhrī:[4]

---

1. Al-muhillūn were originally a group of pre-Islamic tribes west of al-Madīnah whose members attacked caravans during the sacred truce months. See Jāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, VII, 216–17; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 314–15; and Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, VI, 12. This became a term for those who permitted shedding blood, especially the blood of members of Muḥammad's family.

2. Cairo reads: "Shabbawayhi." ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh al-Marwazī was a well-known authority on ḥadith. There is no manuscript authority for the reading, Mattawayhi, at least in this passage.

3. Al-Marrūdh was the popular pronunciation of Marw al-Rūdh, "Marw of the River," a city in eastern Khurāsān on the Murghāb River approximately 160 miles upstream from Marw. See Le Strange, Lands, 404–5.

4. Muḥammad b. Muslim b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī (ca.

ʿAlī put Qays b. Saʿd in charge of his Iraqi advance forces (marching) toward Adharbayjān,[5] and in charge of Adharbayjān's territory.[6] He also put him in charge of the Shurṭat al-Khamīs[7] which the Arabs instituted. This was a force of forty thousand men who pledged allegiance to ʿAlī until death. Qays continued to postpone that expedition until ʿAlī was killed and the people of Iraq chose al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī as Caliph. Al-Ḥasan did not favor[8] fighting, but intended to take for himself what he could from Muʿāwiyah and then join the community. He knew that Qays b. Saʿd did not agree with his point of view, so he dismissed him and appointed ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās[9] as commander. When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās learned what al-Ḥasan intended to take for himself, he wrote to Muʿāwiyah asking him for a guarantee of safe-conduct with the added condition that he be allowed to keep the wealth which he had acquired. So Muʿāwiyah stipulated that for him. [2]

(According to) Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Masrūqī[10]—ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd (or Ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān) al-Majāzī al-Khuzāʿī[11] Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Ismāʿīl b..Rāshid: The people pledged their allegiance to al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī as Caliph. Al-Ḥasan then left with them and stayed at al-Madā'in.[12] He sent Qays b. Saʿd (forward) in charge of his vanguard with twelve

---

50–124 (670–742)) lived at al-Madīnah until about 700, then settled in Damascus about 720. See A. A. Duri, "Al-Zuhri," 1–12. Al-Zuhrī's account tends to be unfavorable towards al-Ḥasan. For a more favorable account see Balādhurī, Ansāb, IVA, 138.

5. Adharbayjān is the province in northwestern Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 159–71.

6. C reads: "Of Iṣbahān," a city in western Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 202–7.

7. C reads: "shurṭah of the army." This "Thursday shurṭah" was an elite force or bodyguard. Shurṭah (pl. shuraṭ) was also the term for the police force in Muslim Arab garrison cities. See EI[1], s.v. Shurṭa.

8. C reads: "intend."

9. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. 68(697/8)) was a cousin of Muḥammad and had been governor of al-Baṣrah from 36(656/7) until 38 (658/9) when he had broken with ʿAlī. See EI[2], s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. al-ʿAbbās.

10. O reads: al-Khuzāʿī.

11. C reads: "al-Ḥarrānī," from Ḥarrān, a town in upper Mesopotamia. See EI[2], s.v. Ḥarrān, and Le Strange, Lands, 103.

12. Al-Madā'in, "the cities", was the former Sasanian metropolis and winter capital on both sides of the Tigris River below Baghdād. See EI[1], s.v. al-Madā'in.

thousand men. Mu'āwiyah also advanced with the Syrians and camped at Maskin.[13] While al-Ḥasan was at al-Madā'in someone in the army announced, "Qays b. Sa'd has surely been killed, so flee!" So they fled, having plundered the pavilion of al-Ḥasan, even fighting him for a carpet that was under him. Al-Ḥasan left and stayed at the White Palace[14] in al-Madā'in. At that time the paternal uncle of al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd,[15] Sa'd b. Mas'ūd, was the governor of al-Madā'in. Al-Mukhtār, who was a young boy, asked him, "Would you have wealth and honor?" When Sa'd asked him what he meant, al-Mukhtār said, "Put al-Ḥasan in fetters and use him to ask Mu'āwiyah for a guarantee of safe-conduct."[16] Sa'd responded, "God's curse upon you! Shall I fall upon the son of the daughter of God's Messenger and put him in fetters! What an evil man you are."[17]

[3] When al-Ḥasan saw that rule was beyond his grasp, he sent to Mu'āwiyah seeking peace, and Mu'āwiyah sent 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir[18] and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah b. Ḥabīb b. 'Abd Shams[19] to him. When they came to al-Ḥasan at al-Madā'in, they granted him what he wished and arranged peace with him on condition that, among other things, he be allowed to take five million (dirhams) from the treasury of al-Kufāh.[20] Al-Ḥasan

13. Maskin was the district along the Dujayl Canal west of the Tigris River above Baghdād. See Le Strange, Lands, 51.

14. The White Palace was the former Sasanian royal residence in that part of al-Madā'in called al-Madīnah al-'Atīqah, "the Old City," (i.e., Ctesiphon) by the Arabs. It remained in use until its demolition was begun by the Caliph al-Manṣūr (136–58/754–75), and then it remained in ruins until it was completely demolished by Caliph al-Muktafī (289–92/902–8) in about 290/903). Al-Muktafī had the materials used to build the Tāj Palace in Baghdād. See EI[1], s.v. al-Madā'in.

15. Al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd (d. 67/687) was to lead a Shī'ī rising in al-Kūfah, 66–67/685–87). See Kharbūtlī, Al-Mukhtār al-Thaqafī, and 'A. A. 'Abd Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 25–76.

16. O reads: "bring him to Mu'āwiyah."

17. C reads: "what an evil man that would make me."

18. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amir (5–59/626–80) was a native of Mecca who had conquered Fārs and Khurāsān as governor of al-Baṣrah, 29–35/649–55) See EI[2], s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Āmir.

19. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah (d. 50/670) was a native of Mecca, conquered Sijistān under 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, 31–35/651–55) and joined Mu'āwiyah in Syria after the Battle of the Camel in 36/657) See C. E. Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 17–22; and EI[2], s.v. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samura.

20. Al-Kūfah was the Muslim Arab garrison city (miṣr) and provincial capital on the Euphrates River near modern Najaf. See EI[2], s.v. al-Kūfah.

then rose among the people of Iraq saying, "O people of Iraq, three things make me glad to be rid of you: your killing of my father, your stabbing of me, and your plundering of my possessions." The people submitted to Muʿāwiyah, and, when Muʿāwiyah entered al-Kūfah, the people rendered allegiance to him.

(According to) Ziyād b. ʿAbdallāh—ʿAwānah[21] gave an account similar to that of al-Masrūqī—ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. He added to it: Al-Ḥasan wrote to Muʿāwiyah concerning peace and asked for a guarantee of safe-conduct. When he told al-Ḥusayn[22] and ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar[23] about it, al-Ḥusayn said to him, "I implore you, by God, not to believe the story of Muʿāwiyah but to believe the story of ʿAlī." Al-Ḥasan retorted, "Shut up! I know more about the matter than you do." Now when the letter of al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī reached Muʿāwiyah, the latter sent ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah, who came to al-Madāʾin, and granted al-Ḥasan what he wanted. Al-Ḥasan then wrote to Qays b. Saʿd, who was in charge of his vanguard with twelve thousand men, ordering him to submit to Muʿāwiyah. At that, Qays b. Saʿd rose among the people saying, "O people, choose [between] submitting to a [4] leader of error or fighting without a leader." They replied, "No, we choose instead to submit to a leader of error." So they rendered allegiance to Muʿāwiyah and Qays b. Saʿd left them. Al-Ḥasan had already made peace with Muʿāwiyah on condition that he concede to him what was in his treasury plus the revenue (kharāj)[24] of Dārābjird[25] and that ʿAlī not be reviled in his hearing. So he took what was in his treasury at al-Kūfah which amounted to five million dirhams.

---

21. ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī (d. 147/764 or 153/770) was a blind Kūfan narrator who composed two historical works on the life of Muʿāwiyah and the Banū Umayyah. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAwāna b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī.

22. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī (4–61/626–80) was al-Ḥasan's younger brother. See *EI*², s.v. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī.

23. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib (d. 80/699 or 85/704) was a nephew of ʿAlī. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. Djaʿfar.

24. Kharāj was a form of tax or tribute. See D. Dennett, Conversion and the Poll Tax, 12–13; and F. Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation, index.

25. Dārābjird is a city and district in eastern Fārs. See Le Strange, Lands, 288–9.

In this year al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah[26] led the people in the pilgrimage. (According to) Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Khuzā'ī[27] Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Ismā'īl b. Rāshid: When it was time for the pilgrimage—that is, in the year in which 'Alī was killed—al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah wrote a letter which he forged according to Mu'āwiyah's style,[28] and led the people in the pilgrimage in this year. It is said that he stood at 'Arafat on the Day of Moistening and slaughtered on the Day of 'Arafat,[29] fearing lest his position be noticed. It was also said that al-Mughīrah did so because he learned that 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān would replace him the following morning as the official in charge of the (pilgrimage) season, and he therefore rushed the pilgrimage.

In this year Mu'āwiyah was rendered allegiance as Caliph in Jerusalem (Īliyā).[30] (According to) Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Ismā'īl b. Rāshid: He was previously called Commander[31] in Syria. I was told according to Abū Mushīr—Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-'Azīz: 'Alī was called Commander of the Faithful (Amīr al-Mu'minīn) in Iraq, while Mu'āwiyah was called Commander in Syria. But when 'Alī was killed,[32] Mu'āwiyah was called Commander of the Faithful. [5]

26. Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was a native of Ṭā'if, a member of the Banū Thaqīf, and had been governor of al-Baṣrah, 15–17(636–38).

27. C reads: al-Ḥarrānī.

28. According to Ibn Khayyāt, Ta'rīkh, I, 234, al-Mughīrah forged a document in the style of al-Ḥasan.

29. The Day of Moistening (yawm al-tarwiyah) is the eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah when the pilgrims provide their animals and themselves with water for standing at 'Arafat on the following day. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj.

30. Īliyā in Arabic comes from Aelia Capitolina, the Roman name for Jerusalem. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳuds.

31. "Commander" (amīr) was used of generals and military governors. See *EI*², s.v. Amīr.

32. O reads: "when 'Alī died."

The Events of the Year

41

(MAY 7, 661–APRIL 25, 662)

Among the events of this year was al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī's surrender of power to Muʿāwiyah, the latter's entry into al-Kūfah, and the rendering of allegiance to Muʿāwiyah as Caliph by the people of al-Kūfah.

I was told by ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marrūdhī—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Yūnus—al-Zuhrī: When the people of Iraq acknowledged al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī as Caliph, he began to impose conditions on them, (saying), "You must be totally obedient, make peace with whom I make peace, and fight whom I fight." The people of Iraq had misgivings about their situation when he imposed these conditions upon them, and they said, "This is no master for us since he does not want to fight." So shortly after they acknowledged him, al-Ḥasan was stabbed (and wounded, but) not fatally. His dislike for them increased, and he grew more afraid of them. He corresponded with Muʿāwiyah and sent conditions to him saying, "Grant me this and I shall be totally obedient, provided that you fulfill (these conditions) for me." Al-Ḥasan's scroll came into Muʿāwiyah's hand. Muʿāwiyah, however, had previously sent al-Ḥasan a blank scroll sealed at the bottom and had written to him, "Put whatever condition you wish [to make] on this scroll which I have [6] sealed at the bottom[33] and it will be yours." When [the scroll] reached al-Ḥasan, he doubled the conditions which he had asked of Mu'āwiyah previously and kept it with him. Mu'āwiyah meanwhile kept the scroll of al-Ḥasan which contained the requests the latter had sent him.

When Mu'āwiyah and al-Ḥasan met, al-Ḥasan asked him to grant him the conditions made by him in the document which Mu'āwiyah had sealed at the bottom. But Mu'āwiyah refused and said, I grant you the requests you made originally in your letter to me, for I had done so already when I received your letter." Al-Ḥasan replied, "[But] I had conditions when I received your letter, and you agreed to fulfill them." Since they argued over them, none of al-Ḥasan's conditions were met.[34]

When they assembled at al-Kūfah, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ[35] had been talking with Mu'āwiyah, and urged him to bid al-Ḥasan rise and address the people. But Mu'āwiyah disliked that and asked, "Don't you want me to address the people?"[36] 'Amr replied, "I intend to show the people his incompetence," and he kept it up until Mu'āwiyah gave in to him and went out and addressed the people. Then he ordered someone to call upon al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī, "Rise, O Ḥasan, and speak to the people." So [al-Ḥasan] began a spontaneous impromptu speech with the shahādah[37] and then continued, "O people, God has guided you with the first of us, and spared your blood with the last of us. This regime has a certain duration, and the world is subject to change. God, Almighty and Great, said to His Prophet, "If I knew, per-

33. For examples of first (seventh) century Arabic protocols and documents sealed at the bottom, see A. Grohmann, From the World of Arabic Papyri.

34. According to Balādhurī. Futūḥ, 299, Mu'āwiyah assigned 'Ayn al-Ṣayd to al-Ḥasan in return for the Caliphate.

35. 'Amr b. al-'Aṣ (d. ca. 42[663]), the Muslim conqueror of Egypt (19–21 [640–42]), had joined Mu'āwiyah after the Battle of the Camel during the first civil war. He was Mu'āwiyah's representative at the arbitration at Adhruḥ, 38(658), and his governor of Egypt. See *EI*², s. v. 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣ.

36. C reads: "Why do you want me to have him speak to the people?"

37. The shahādah is the Muslim declaration that there is only one God and Muḥammad is His Messenger. For an example of the form of the shahādah that may have been used during the reign of Mu'āwiyah, see below, p. 171 [Ṭabarī, II, 163]. See also *EI*¹, s.v. Shahāda.

haps it is a temptation for you and a delight for a while.'"[38] When he said that, Mu'āwiyah told him to sit down, and remained furious with 'Amr saying, "This was your idea!" Al-Ḥasan stayed at al-Madīnah.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad:[39] Al-Ḥasan surrendered al-Kūfah to Mu'āwiyah, and Mu'āwiyah entered it five (days) before the end of Rabī' I (before July 30, 661)—or, alternatively, before the end of Jumādā I 41 (before September 27, 661). [7]

Al-Ḥasan's Surrender of al-Kūfah to Mu'āwiyah

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān b. al-Faḍl—'Abdallāh—Yūnus[40]—al-Zuhrī: When 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās learned that al-Ḥasan intended to ask Mu'āwiyah for a guarantee of safe-conduct for himself, he (also) wrote to Mu'āwiyah asking him for security on condition that he be allowed to keep the wealth that he had acquired. So Mu'āwiyah stipulated that for him. And when Mu'āwiyah sent Ibn 'Āmir to him with a large force of cavalry, 'Abdallāh went out to them at night and joined them, leaving the army of which he was in charge, including Qays b. Sa'd, without a commander. (When) al-Ḥasan made terms for himself (and) acknowledged Mu'āwiyah, the shurṭat al-khamīs made Qays b. Sa'd their commander. He and they pledged to fight Mu'āwiyah until terms should be made to allow the supporters and followers of 'Alī to keep their wealth and their lives and what(ever) they had acquired during the civil war.

When Mu'āwiyah was finished with 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās and al-Ḥasan, he was free to employ stratagems against (the) man whom he considered to be the most important person in this respect[41] and who had forty thousand (men) with him. Muʿā-[8] wiyah, ʿAmr, and the Syrians had camped with them. Muʿāwiyah (now) sent (a message) to Qays b. Saʿd to remind him of God, saying, "For whom are you fighting, since he to whom you gave your obedience has acknowledged me?" But Qays refused to yield to him until Muʿāwiyah sent him a document which he had sealed at the bottom and told (him), "Write what you want on this document and it will be yours." When ʿAmr told Muʿāwiyah not to give him that but to fight him, Muʿāwiyah replied, "Calm down! We would not be able to kill them until they had killed an equal number of Syrians, and what good would life be after that? By God, I will never fight him until I have no other alternative." When Muʿāwiyah sent that document to him, Qays asked in it that he and the supporters of ʿAlī be exempt from punishment for the lives and wealth they took. He did not ask Muʿāwiyah for wealth in that document of his.[42] When Muʿāwiyah granted his request, Qays and those who were with him submitted to him.

38. Qur'ān 21: 111. That is, God had guided them by means of 'Alī, and al-Ḥasan's abdication had prevented further bloodshed. Mu'āwiyah's power would not last forever, and at some future date others might have the opportunity to take power.

39. 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sayf, Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī (135–231 [752–845]) belonged to the 'Abd Shams clan of Quraysh. He was born at al-Baṣrah, lived at al-Madā'in, and died in Baghdād. He is credited with over two hundred works on history and literature. See *EI*², s. v. al-Madā'inī.

40. O reads: Yūnus b. Mūsā.

When the civil war broke out, five persons were regarded as the most cunning. The Arabs who had (useful) opinions and stratagems were said to be Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah, and Qays b. Saʿd, as well as ʿAbdallāh b. Budayl al-Khuzāʿī among the Muhājirūn. Qays and Ibn Budayl sided with ʿAlī, while al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah and ʿAmr sided with Muʿāwiyah, although al-Mughīrah remained neutral[43] at Ṭāʾif[44] until both arbiters were chosen and met at Adhruḥ.[45]

According to another report, peace was concluded between al-Ḥasan and Muʿāwiyah in Rabīʿ II 41 (August 4–September 1,

---

41. I.e., with respect to strategems.

42. C reads: "Muʿāwiyah granted him whatever wealth he requested in that document of his."

43. Muʿtazilan, used of Muslim neutralists beginning in the first civil war.

44. Al-Ṭāʾif is a town in western Arabia, southeast of Mecca. See EI[1], s.v. al-Ṭāʾif.

45. Adhruḥ is an oasis in southern Jordan where the arbitration between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiyah took place in Shaʿbān 38 (January 2–30, 659). The arbiters condemned the murderers of ʿUthmān and recognized Muʿāwiyah's right to vengeance, but they were unable to agree on a Caliph. See E. L. Petersen, ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya, 186–95.

661) and Mu'āwiyah entered al-Kūfah at the beginning of Ju- [9] mādā I (September 2, 661). Yet another account claims that he entered it in the month of Rabī' II. This is what al-Wāqidī[46] says.[47]

In this year 'Alī's sons, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, left al-Kūfah for al-Madīnah.

The Departure of al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn for al-Madīnah

When peace was made between al-Ḥasan and Mu'āwiyah at Maskin, (al-Ḥasan) rose—as I have been told on the authority of Ziyād al-Bakkā'ī—'Awānah—to speak to the people, saying, "O people of Iraq, I am glad to be rid of you for three reasons: your killing of my father, your stabbing of me, and your plundering of my possessions." Then al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn, and 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far left with their servants[48] and baggage and went to al-Kūfah. When al-Ḥasan arrived there, having recovered from his wounds, he went out to the mosque (masjid) of al-Kūfah and said, "O people of al-Kūfah, be God-fearing toward your neighbors and guests and toward the members of the family of your Prophet, from whom[49] God removed sinfulness and whom He purified completely." And the people began to weep. Then they departed for al-Madīnah. 'Awānah continued: The people of al-Baṣrah[50] refused him the revenue (kharāj) of Dārābjird, saying, "It is our booty (fay')."[51] And when al-Ḥasan left 46. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī (130–207/747/8–822/3) was a native of al-Madīnah who moved to Baghdād and authored works on historical and religious subjects. See EI[1], s.v. al-Wāḳidī.

47. According to Ilyās of Naṣībīn, al-Ḥasan made peace with Mu'āwiyah on Sunday, twenty-one Rabī' (July 25, 661). See F. Baethgen, Fragmente, 25; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 234, reports that peace was concluded either in Rabī' II (August) or in Jumādā I (September).

48. C reads: "army."

49. 'anhum, that is, the family.

50. Al-Baṣrah was the Muslim Arab garrison city (miṣr) and provincial capital near the Tigris-Euphrates estuary in lower Iraq, just to the south of the modern city. See EI[2], s.v. al-Baṣra.

51. Fay', "permanent booty," was the income from tribute or taxes from which the stipends of Muslim soldiers were paid.

for al-Madīnah, people confronted him at al-Qādisiyyah[52] and accused him of having demeaned the Arabs.

During this year the Khārijites[53] who stood aside at Shahrazūr[54] in the days of 'Alī rebelled against Mu'āwiyah.

The Khārijites at Shahrazūr

[10] I was told on the authority of Ziyād—'Awānah: Before al-Ḥasan left al-Kūfah, Mu'āwiyah came and halted at al-Nukhaylah.[55] At that, the five hundred Ḥarūriyyah[56] who had been standing aside at Shahrazūr with Farwah b. Nawfal al-Ashja'ī said, "Since someone about whom there is no doubt has come, [let us] march against Mu'āwiyah and wage jihād[57] against him." They approached, with Farwah b. Nawfal in charge of them, and entered al-Kūfah. When Mu'āwiyah dispatched some of the Syrian cavalry against them, they routed the Syrians. So Mu'āwiyah said to the Kūfans, "By God, you will have no guarantee of safe-conduct where I am concerned until you deal with your own misfortunes." When the Kūfans went forth against the Khārijites and fought them,[58] the latter said to them, "Woe unto you! What do you want from us? Is not Mu'āwiyah both our enemy and yours? Leave us alone so that we may fight him. If we should defeat him, we will have protected

---

52. Al-Qādisiyyah was a town south of modern Najaf, nineteen miles from al-Kūfah, where the Muslims had defeated the Persians in 16(637) and marked the border of Iraq. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳādisiyya.

53. The Khārijites (Khawārij, sg. Khārijī) were "seceders" who had rebelled against 'Alī after he agreed to arbitration at Ṣiffīn. See *EI*², s.v. al-Khawāridj.

54. Shahrazūr was a town north of Ḥulwān on the border between Iraq and Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 190.

55. Al-Nukhaylah was the mustering and demobilization point for Kūfan soldiers just outside the city. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 176; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 665; and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 771. S. El-'Alī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfa," 238, has identified its location near the modern Jisr al-'Abbāsiyyāt.

56. The Ḥarūriyyah were those opponents of 'Alī's agreement to arbitration who had seceded to the village of Ḥarūrā' near al-Kūfah in 37(658) This continued to be a common designation for the Khārijites. See *EI*² s.v. Ḥarūrā'.

57. Jihād is making an effort on God's behalf, including warfare against unbelievers. Its use implies that they considered their enemies to be unbelievers. See *EI*² s. v. Djihād.

58. For a Khārijite account of al-Ḥasan's part in pursuading the Kūfans to fight them, see Sirhān b. 'Umar b. Sa'īd, Kashf al-ghummah, f. 211a.

you from your enemy; and if he should defeat us, you will have been protected from us." They replied, "No, by God [not] until we fight you." Then they said, "May God have mercy on our brothers among the people [who fought at] al-Nahr.[59] They knew you better, O people of al-Kūfah." [The clan of] Ashja' took their commander, Farwah b. Nawfal—who was the chief of the folk—and they put 'Abdallāh b. Abī al-Ḥurr—a man of the Ṭayyi'—at their head. [The Kūfans] fought them, and [the Khārijites] were killed.

When Mu'āwiyah put 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ in charge of al-Kūfah, al-Mughīrah b. Shū'bah came to Mu'āwiyah, saying, "You put 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr in charge of al-Kūfah while 'Amr is in charge of Egypt. You are between the jawbones of the lion." So [Mu'āwiyah] dismissed ['Abdallāh] from al-Kūfah, and put al-Mughīrah in charge there. When 'Amr learned what al-Mughīrah had said to Mu'āwiyah, he went to Mu'āwiyah and asked, "Did you put him in charage of the revenues?" [When] he replied that he had, ['Amr] said, "If you put al-Mughīrah in charge of the revenues, he will seize the wealth and vanish, and you won't get anything from him. Put someone who fears and respects you in charge of the revenues." So [Mu'āwiyah] dismissed al-Mughīrah from [control of] the revenues and put him in charge of worship. When al-Mughīrah confronted 'Amr, he asked, "Did you give the Commander of the Faithful the same advice that I gave him concerning 'Abdallāh?" 'Amr replied that he had. Then al-Mughīrah told him, "This for that." But from what I've heard, 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ never left for al-Kūfah nor arrived there. [11]

When Ḥumrān b. Abān[60] took possession of al-Baṣrah in this

59. Al-Nahr, "the canal," refers to Nahrawān, a town and canal with the same name east of al-Madā'in where the Khārijites were defeated by 'Alī on the ninth of Ṣafar 38 (July 17, 658). Their exit from al-Kūfah prior to this battle is the probable origin of the Khārijite name. See *EI*², s.v. al-Khawāridj; Le Strange, Lands, 57–61.

60. Ḥumrān b. Abān, as a Jewish child called Ṭuwayd, had been taken captive by the Muslims at 'Ayn Tamr during the conquest of Iraq. He became a mawlā of 'Uthmān, but was deprived of his protection when he gave a false report about the governor of al-Kūfah. He had then settled at al-Baṣrah where he was given 'Abbādān as a land grant. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 247, 368; Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 435–6; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII[1], 108; and Ṭabarī, I, 2122.

year, Mu'āwiyah sent Busr[61] to him, having ordered (Busr) to kill the sons of Ziyād.[62]

Mu'āwiyah's Order to Kill the Sons of Ziyād

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī made peace with Mu'āwiyah at the beginning of this year, Ḥumrān b. Abān seized al-Baṣrah and took control there. Mu'āwiyah wanted to send a member of the Banū al-Qayn[63] there, but 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās persuaded him not to do so and to send someone else. So he sent Busr b. Abī Arṭāt who claimed that (Mu'āwiyah) had ordered him to kill the sons of Ziyād.

I was told by Maslamah b. Muḥārib:[64] He seized one of Ziyād's sons and imprisoned him. At that time Ziyād was in Fārs[65] where 'Alī had sent him against the Kurds who had rebelled there. Ziyād defeated them and stayed at Iṣṭakhr.[66] He continued: Abū Bakrah[67] asked Busr for a postponement while he rode to Mu'āwiyah, who was at al-Kūfah. So (Busr) gave him a week's delay, going and coming. He travelled seven days and wore out two mounts beneath him, and when he spoke to Mu'āwiyah the latter wrote (to Busr) to leave (Ziyād's sons) alone.

---

61. Busr b. Abī Arṭāt was an Arab general belonging to the Banū 'Āmir clan of Quraysh. He lived until the time of 'Abd al-Malik or his son al-Walīd. See *EI*², s.v. Busr b. Abī Arṭāt.

62. Ziyād b. Abīhi was an Arabized mawlā of the Thaqīf from al-Ṭā'if. During the conquest he had migrated to al-Baṣrah where he became a protégé of al-Mughīrah b. Shū'bah and served in the finance administration for twenty years before he became governor of Fārs for 'Alī during the first civil war. See H. Lammens, "Ziād ibn Abihi;" K. A. Fariq, "Ziyād ibn Abih."

63. The Banū al-Qayn were a branch of the Qudā'ah living in Syria. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Ḳain.

64. C reads: Makhlad.

65. Fārs is a province in southwestern Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 248–98.

66. Iṣṭakhr was a district and city, near Persepolis, in northern Fārs. The city was a Magian religious center and the capital of Fārs under the Sasanians and in the early Islamic period until the foundation of Shīrāz in 64(684). See *EI*², s.v. Iṣṭakhr.

67. Abū Bakrah, Nufay' b. Masrūḥ (d. 51 or 52[671–72]) was a former slave of Thaqīf from Ṭā'if, and Ziyād's half-brother on his mother's side. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Bakra.

He continued: One of our learned people told me that Abū Bakrah approached al-Baṣrah on the seventh day, when the sun had risen. Meanwhile Busr brought out the sons of Ziyād, awaiting sunset in order to kill them if necessary. The people assembled for that, while their leaders were eagerly anticipating Abū Bakrah. Suddenly he came into view on a camel or steed [12] with he urged on, exhausted and strained. He rose upon it, dismounted, waved his cloak, and exclaimed, "God is great!." And the people said likewise. He then approached quickly on foot[68] in order to reach Busr before he killed them. When he handed (Busr) Mu'āwiyah's letter, he released them.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When Busr spoke on the pulpit (minbar)[69] of al-Baṣrah, he reviled 'Alī. Then he said, "I implore God, that anyone who knows that I am truthful should say so, or likewise if I am a liar." When Abū Bakrah said, "By God! We know you only as a liar," (Busr) ordered him to be strangled. But Abū Lu'lu' al-Dabbī jumped up, threw himself at (the man who was carrying out the order) and restrained him. Afterwards Abū Bakrah assigned (Abū Lu'lu') one hundred jarībs.[70] Abū Bakrah was asked, "What did you wish to do?" He replied, "When he adjures us by God, should we not tell him the truth?" Busr remained in al-Baṣrah for six months; then he left. We don't know whether he put anyone in charge of his police force (shurṭah).[71]

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Sulaymān b. Bilāl—al-Jārūd b. Abī Sabrah: When al-Ḥasan made peace with Mu'āwiyah and left for al-Madīnah, Mu'āwiyah sent Busr b. Abī Arṭat to al-Baṣrah in Rajab 41 (October 31–November 29, 661), while Ziyād was fortified in Fārs. Mu'āwiyah wrote to Ziyād, "Since you have some of God's wealth, having been put in charge of administration, bring the money you have." Ziyād wrote (back) to him, "I don't have any money left, having spent what I had properly, deposited some of it

68. C reads: "he rode his female camel."

69. A minbar is the pulpit in the masjid.

70. A jarīb is sixty sq. dhirā'ah, between 1,592 and 5,837 1/3 sq. meters depending on the length of the dhirā'ah. See W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 65–6.

71. See above, n. 7.

with folk in case of misfortune, and delivered the rest to the Commander of the Faithful." Mu'āwiyah wrote to him, "Come to me and we will examine that with which you were entrusted and that which happened under your administration. If the matter is straightened out between us, so be it; if not, you [13] may return to your place of safety." When Ziyād (still) did not come to Mu'āwiyah, Busr seized Ziyād's oldest sons—'Abd al-Raḥmān, 'Ubaydallāh, and 'Abbād—imprisoned them, and wrote to Ziyād, "You had better go to the Commander of the Faithful or I will surely kill your sons." Ziyād wrote (back) to him, "I'm not leaving this place where I am until God decides between me and your master. If you kill any son of mine in your possession, then the outcome is up to God, Praise Him, and we will face the reckoning 'and those who do evil will know such a destiny that they will be utterly overthrown.'"[72]

When Busr intended to kill them, Abū Bakrah came to him saying, "You seized my sons and nephews as innocent youths although al-Ḥasan had made peace with Mu'āwiyah on condition of a guarantee of safe-conduct for 'Alī's companions, wherever they might be. So you don't have any way to get at them or their father." Busr said, "Your brother has wealth which he took, and he refused to deliver it." Abū Bakrah replied, "He doesn't have anything, so leave my nephews alone until I bring you a letter from Mu'āwiyah [telling you] to release them." Busr granted him a few days' delay, saying, "I shall kill them unless you bring me Mu'āwiyah's letter to release them, or Ziyād goes to the Commander of the Faithful." When Abū Bakrah came to Mu'āwiyah, he interceded with him for Ziyād and his sons. Mu'āwiyah wrote to Busr to leave them alone and let them go, so he did.

I was told by Aḥmad b. 'Alī[73]—'Alī—a shaykh of Thaqīf—Busr b. 'Ubaydallāh: When Abū Bakrah went to Mu'āwiyah at al-Kūfah, Mu'āwiyah asked him, "O Abū Bakrah, have you come to visit or because you need something?" He replied, "To tell you the truth, I only came out of necessity." Mu'āwiyah said, "Intercede, O Abū Bakrah, and we will consider favoring you with regard to [your request] since you deserve that. What is it?" He answered, "Give my brother, Ziyād, a guarantee of safe-conduct and write to Busr to release his children and to stop bothering them" Mu'āwiyah replied, "As far as the sons of [14] Ziyād are concerned, we shall write for you what you have asked on their behalf. As far as Ziyād is concerned, he has wealth belonging to the Muslims. When he pays it, we will have no way to get at him." Abū Bakrah said, "O Commander of the Faithful, if he had anything, he would not withhold it from you, God willing." So Mu'āwiyah wrote on Abū Bakrah's behalf to Busr telling him not to interfere with any of Ziyād's children.

72. Qur'ān 26: 228.
73. Cario reads: Aḥmad b. Zuhayr.

Mu'āwiyah then said to Abū Bakrah "Will you make a pact with us, O Abū Bakrah?" The latter replied, "Yes, I entrust you, O Commander of the Faithful, to watch over yourself and your flock and to act virtuously. For you have taken a great thing upon yourself—the Caliphate of God over His creation. So fear God, for you have a goal which you will not avoid, while behind you there is a slow but persistant Pursuer.[74] You are about to reach the destination. The Pursuer will overtake you, and you will come to One who will ask you about what you were doing, while He knows more about it than you. Instead it will be an accounting and an apprehension. You will certainly not prefer anything over the satisfaction of God, Almighty and Great."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Salamah b. 'Uthmān: Busr wrote to Ziyād, "If you don't present yourself, I shall surely crucify your sons." Ziyād wrote back to him, "If you do, that would be worthy of you, because the son of the eater of livers[75] sent you." Abū Bakrah then rode to Mu'āwiyah and said, "O Mu'āwiyah, the people did not give you their allegiance for the killing of children." He asked, "How's that, O Abū Bakrah?" The latter replied, "Busr intends to kill the children of Ziyād." Mu'āwiyah then wrote to Busr, "Release any children of Ziyād you have."

Mu'āwiyah had written to Ziyād after 'Alī's assassination,

74. Qur'ān 7: 72.

75. That is, Mu'āwiyah, whose mother, Hind, had eaten the liver of Muḥammad's uncle, Ḥamzah, in revenge at the Battle of 'Uḥud.

threatening him. I was told by ʿUmar b. Shabbah—ʿAlī—Ḥabbān b. Mūsā—al-Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī:[76] When ʿAlī was killed, [15] Muʿāwiyah wrote to Ziyād threatening him. So he got up to speak, saying, "How amazing is the son of the eater of livers, cavern of hypocrisy, and head of the factions. He wrote to me threatening me, while there are two nephews of the Messenger of God—that is, Ibn ʿAbbās and al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī—between me and him. They have ninety thousand men who put their swords on their shoulders, unbending. If I were free of this business, he would feel the most biting of heavy sword blows." Ziyād remained as governor of Fārs until al-Ḥasan made peace with Muʿāwiyah, and Muʿāwiyah had arrived at al-Kūfah. Ziyād fortified himself in a stronghold which is called the Fortress of Ziyād.

In this year Muʿāwiyah put ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir in charge of al-Baṣrah and of military matters in Sijistān[77] and Khurāsān[78]

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir Put in Charge of al-Baṣrah

I was told by Abū Zayd[79]—ʿAlī: When Muʿāwiyah intended to send ʿUtbah b. Abī Sufyān to be in charge of al-Baṣrah, Ibn ʿĀmir spoke with Muʿāwiyah, saying, "I have wealth and deposits there, and if you don't put me in charge of it, I shall leave." Muʿāwiyah then put him in charge of al-Baṣrah, Khurāsān, and Sijistān. He wanted to put Zayd b. Jabalah in charge of his police force, but the latter refused. So he put Ḥabīb b. Shihāb al-Shaʿmī[80] in charge of his police— according to another report it was Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī. He also appointed ʿAmīrah b. Yathribī al-Ḍabbī, the brother of ʿAmr b. Yathribī al-Ḍabbī, as judge (qāḍī).

---

76. Abū ʿAmr ʿĀmir b. Sharāḥīl al-Shaʿbī (19/20–110[640/41–728]) was a Kūfan official, agent for his tribe of Ḥamdān (75–81[694–700]), envoy for ʿAbd al-Malik, and judge. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Shaʿbī.

77. Sijistān is the province of Sīstān in the Helmand Valley of western Afghanistan. See Le Strange, Lands, 344–51.

78. Khurāsān is the province in northwestern Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 382–434.

79. Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī, Saʿīd b. Aws (d. 214[830] or 215[831]) was a Baṣran grammarian and lexicographer. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī.

80. O reads: al-Shibāmī; C reads: al-Taymī.

I was told by Abū Zayd—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When Ibn 'Āmir was governor for Mu'āwiyah, Yazīd b. Mālik al-Bāhilī, The Broken-nosed, rebelled. He was called The Broken-nosed [16] because of a blow which he had received on his face. When he rebelled with Sahm b. Ghālib al-Hujaymī and went to Jisr[81] in the morning, they met 'Ibādah b. Qurṣ al-Laythī[82] worshipping there. He belonged to the Banū Bujayr, and had been a Companion (of Muḥammad). They rebuked him, killed him,[83] and then asked for a guarantee of safe-conduct afterwards. Ibn 'Āmir guaranteed their safety and wrote to Mu'āwiyah, "I gave them your guarantee of protection." Mu'āwiyah wrote back to him, "You may violate that guarantee of protection, (since) you weren't asked for it." They thus remained in guaranteed security until Ibn 'Āmir was dismissed.[84]

In this year 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās[85] was born. According to another report he was born in the year 40 (660/661) before 'Alī was killed, and this is what al-Wāqidī says.

'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage in this year according to Abū Ma'shar.[86] I was told that by Aḥmad b. Thābit—whoever told him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā. As for al-Wāqidī, Aḥmad reported according to his informant that he used to say: 'Anbasah b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage this year.

---

81. That is, "the bridge." According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 235, this was the subdistrict (nāḥiyah) called Jisr al-Baṣrah.

82. Or 'Ibādah b. Qurt al-Laythī. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 107.

83. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 107, 'Ibādah was killed in al-Ahwāz. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 235, reports that Sahm also killed Sa'd, a mawlā of Qudāmah b. Maẓ'ūn, and that Ibn 'Āmir killed several of their comrades but granted them both safe-conducts.

84. They were killed after Ziyād became governor of al-Baṣrah in 45(665). See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 108.

85. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās (41–117(661–735/6)) was the ancestor of the 'Abbāsid caliphs. See *EI*², s.v. 'Alī b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-'Abbās.

86. Abū Ma'shar, Najīḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān (d. 170(787)) was a former slave from Yaman who lived in al-Madīnah until 160(776/7) when he moved to Baghdad. His book on early Muslim campaigns was based on Madinan authorities. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Ma'shar.

The Events of the Year

42

(April 26, 662–April 14, 663)

During this year the Muslims raided the Alāns.[87] They also raided the Byzantines and inflicted a shocking defeat on them, reportedly killing several generals (baṭāriqah).[88]

It was said that al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf[89] was born in this year.

In this year Mu'āwiyah made Marwān b. al-Ḥakam[90] governor of al-Madīnah, and Marwān appointed 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal as judge. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām was (the governor) in charge of Mecca; al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was in [17] charge of al-Kūfah on his[91] behalf, while Shurayḥ[92] super-

87. The Alāns were an Iranian people living north of the Caucasus, the ancestors of the modern Ossets. See *EI*², s.v. Alān.

88. Baṭrīq (pl. baṭāriqah) in Arabic comes from the Latin patricius via the Greek patrikios. In Arabic usage a baṭrīq meant to the Byzantines what a qā'id (general, leader) meant to the Arabs.

89. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf (42–95[662–714]) was a member of the Thaqīf from al-Ṭā'if and governor of Iraq and the East, 75–95(694–714). According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 236, al-Ḥajjāj was born in 41(661/2) See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj.

90. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam (d. 65[685]) was Mu'āwiyah's cousin and founded the Marwānid dynasty of caliphs. See *EI*², s.v. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

91. Most probably Mu'āwiyah is meant here.

92. Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith al-Kindī (d. bet. 78[697] and 80[699]). He had been vised rendering judgment there. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir was in charge of al-Baṣrah, while 'Amr b. Yathribī was in charge of rendering judgment, and Qays b. al-Haytham was in charge of Khurāsān on behalf of 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir.

(According to) 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl al-'Absī—his father: 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir sent Qays b. al-Haytham to be in charge of Khurāsān when Mu'āwiyah appointed the former to be governor of al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān. Qays remained in Khurāsān for two years. Another report about the governorship of Qays is that of Ḥamzah b. Ṣāliḥ[93] al-Sulamī —Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ: When his affairs were settled, Mu'āwiyah sent Qays b. al-Haytham to Khurāsān. He then added Khurāsān to (the territory under) Ibn 'Āmir, who left Qays in charge of it.

During this year the Khārijites who had separated from those Khārijites who were (later) killed at al-Nahrawān were stirred into action, along with those who had been carried, wounded, from the battlefield at al-Nahrawān. Having recovered from their wounds the latter had been forgiven by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

What Happened to the Khārijites

(According to) Hishām b. Muḥammad[94]—Abū Mikhnaf[95]—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥabīb—Jarīr b. Mālik b. Zuhayr b. Jadhīmah al-'Absī—Ubayy b. 'Umārah al-'Absī: Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān[96] al-Sulamī held the view of the Khārijites and was among the wounded who were carried from the battlefield at al-Nahrawān. 'Alī included him among the four hundred of those who were wounded at the Battle of al-Nahr whom he forgave. Ḥayyān stayed with his family and clan, waiting for about a sent to Iraq by the caliph 'Umar as judge in 19(640). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 90–100.

---

93. Cairo reads: Ḥamzah b. Abī Ṣāliḥ.

94. Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib, Abū al-Mundhir, al-Kalbī (120–204 (737–819) or 206(821)) was a Shī'ite native of al-Kūfah. credited with over one hundred fifty works on all subjects. See *EI*², s.v. al-Kalbī.

95. Abū Mikhnaf, Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Mikhnaf al-Azdī (ca. 70–132 (689–745)) was an early collector of historical traditions at al-Kūfah. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf.

96. O consistently has Ṭaybān.

month or so. Then he left for al-Rayy[97] with men who held Khārijite views. They stayed at al-Rayy until they heard about 'Alī's assassination. At that, Ḥayyān summoned his compan-[18] ions—they were about ten men, one of whom was Sālim b. Rabī'ah al-'Absī—and they came to him.

After Ḥayyān praised and extolled God, he said, "O Brothers of the Muslims. I have heard that your brother, Ibn Muljam,[98] brother of the Murād, lay in wait to kill 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib in the pre-dawn darkness opposite the door of the congregational mosque [masjid]. He remained motionless, waiting for 'Ali to come out, until he did come out when it was time for the dawn worship. (Then) he attacked 'Alī and struck his head with his sword. 'Alī only lasted two nights until he died." Sālim b. Rabī'ah al-'Absī exclaimed, "May God not cut off the right hand of whoever struck his skull with the sword!" The folk began to praise God for 'Alī's death, may peace be upon him and may God be satisfied with him and not be satisfied with them.

Al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ (said): Afterwards, during the governorship (imārah) of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr,[99] I asked Sālim b. Rabī'ah about what he had said with regard to 'Alī. He confirmed it for me, saying, "I held their view for a while, but I have since abandoned it." We agreed that he had abandoned it. Whenever that was mentioned to him, he was consumed (with regret).

Then Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān said to his companions:

> By God, no one lives forever. Nights and days and years and months will not continue indefinitely for a son of Adam until he tastes death and will part from the virtuous brothers and leave the world over which only weaklings weep, a world which is always harmful for whoever has concern and worry. Then let us be off, may God have mercy upon you, to our city [miṣr].[100] Let us join our brothers and summon them to commanding good and forbid-

97. Al-Rayy was a city in northern Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 214–15. Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV A, 143, adds that he went to fight the Daylām.

98. 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Muljam al-Murādī assassinated 'Alī in 40(661). See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Muljam.

99. Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr was governor of al-Baṣrah for his brother, the counter-Caliph, 'Abdallāh, 67–72(686–91). See *EI*¹, s.v. Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubair.

100. That is, al-Kūfah.

ding evil[101] and to striving [jihād][102] against the factions. For we have no excuse for being inactive while our rulers are oppressive, and while guiding precedent [sunnah] is abandoned and our vengeance remains unexacted against those who killed our brothers in the assemblies.[103] If God gives us victory over them, let us turn afterwards to that which is more correct and satisfying and upright. God will thereby heal the hearts of believers. If we are killed, we would have repose in parting from the oppressors, while our forefathers have set an example for us. [19]

So they said to him, "We all say the same, and praise the view that you expressed. Then lead us to the city, for we are satisfied with your guidance and your command."

Ḥayyān left and they left with him, proceeding to al-Kūfah. That was when he said:[104]

My friend, I have neither solace nor composure, nor skill after the victims[105] at al-Nahr,
Only camels rising[106] with numerous squadrons.
You will call upon God and in Him you will prevail.
My mule has left Qusṭānat al-Rayy[107] behind;
I shall never approach it again.
But I am leaving soon, even if my supporters are few, so I would not shame you two,[108] with whom he goes.

Ḥayyān proceeded until he settled at al-Kūfah where he remained until Mu'āwiyah came to power and sent al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah to be governor there. Al-Mughīrah liked things to 101. Qur'ān 3:104, 110. The Khārijites were among the first Muslims to emphasize this responsibility.

---

102. See above, n. 57.

103. That is, the assemblies [al-majālis] of the Khārijites.

104. These lines are ascribed to Sālim b. Rabī'ah al-'Aḍdī in Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV A, 143.

105. The text reads: muṣābīn, "the victims"; O reads: muṣallīn, "worshippers."

106. The text reads: nahaḍāt, "camels rising"; C reads: nahaghāt, "scouting parties."

107. Qusṭanāh or Qisṭānah was a village one day's journey from al-Rayy on the road to Sāwah. See Yaqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 94–5.

108. O reads: "spur on you two."

run smoothly; he behaved well with people and did not ask sectarians about their sects. People would be brought to him, [20] and he would be told that so-and-so holds Shī'ite views, and so-and-so holds Khārijite views. But he would say, "God has decided that you will continue to disagree. And God will judge between His creatures concerning that in which they disagree."[109] So people felt safe with him.

The Khārijites would meet each other, and recalling the circumstances of their brethren at al-Nahrawān, they would consider deceit and ruin to lie in staying, while merit and reward lay in striving (jihād) against the people of the qiblah.[110]

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ—Ubayy b. 'Umārah: In the days of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah the Khārijites turned to three persons, one of whom was al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah. The latter rebelled with three hundred men and headed toward Jarjarāya[111] on the banks of the Tigris. (According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Ja'far b. Ḥudhayfah of the family of 'Āmir b. Juwayn—al-Muḥill b. Khalīfah: In the days of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah the Khārijites turned to three persons: al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah al-Taymī of Taym al-Ribāb, Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān al-Sulamī, and Mu'ādh b. Juwayn b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ṭā'ī al-Sinbisī, who was the nephew of Zayd b. Ḥuṣayn. Zayd was one of those whom 'Alī killed at the Battle of al-Nahrawān. This Mu'ādh b. Juwayn was among the four hundred wounded who were carried off the battlefield and pardoned by 'Alī.

The Khārijites assembled at the dwelling of Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān al-Sulamī and deliberated about whom they should appoint to be in charge. Al-Mustawrid addressed them, "O Muslims and believers, may God give you what you desire and remove from you what you hate. Appoint whomever you like over you. By Him who knows the secret in one's eyes and what 109. See Qur'ān 42:10. Deferring to God's judgment in order to avoid conflict in this way amounts to the position later identified as Murji'ite. See W. Montgomery Watt, The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, 119–28.

---

110. The qiblah is the direction of the Ka'bah in Mecca toward which Muslim's face when they worship. The Khārijites called nominal Muslims "people of the qiblah."

111. Jarjarāyā was a town near the place where the Nahrawān Canal emptied into the Tigris River. See Le Strange, Lands, 37.

is hidden in one's heart, I don't care which of you would govern me. We do not seek[112] the glory of this world, and there is no way to remain in it. We desire only immortality in the abode of [21] immortality." At that, Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān said, "As for me, I have no need to rule, and I am satisifed with every one of my brethren. Look, then, upon whomever of you that you wish and name him. I shall be the first to render allegiance." Mu'ādh b. Juwayn b. Ḥuṣayn then spoke to them, "Since you both say you are thus [content to follow another] while you are both leaders of the Muslims and possessors of their lineages as regards virtue, religion, and standing, who shall lead the Muslims? For they are not all virtuous enough for that command. However, when Muslims are equal in virtue, the most perspicacious of them in war, the most learned of them in religion, and the most capable of them in carrying out strongly that which is imposed must take charge. Both of you, God be praised, are among those who are satisfactory for this command. Let one of you two take charge." They both replied, "You be in charge for we have been satisfied with you, for you, praise God, are perfect in your religion and your views." He then responded to both of them, "You are both older than I, let one of you two take charge."

At that moment, a group of the Khārijites who were present said, "We are satisfied with the three of you. Put in charge whomever of you that you prefer." At that, each of the three men said to his companion, "You be in charge, for I am satisfied with you and I have no desire for rule." After that had continued among (the three of) them for a long time, Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān declared, "Since Mu'ādh b. Juwayn said, 'Don't put me in charge of both of you since you are both older than I,' I say the same to you that he said to us. Hold out your hand that I may render allegiance to you." So al-Mustawrid held out his hand and Ḥayyān rendered allegiance to him, followed by Mu'ādh b. Juwayn and then by the entire group. That was in Jumāda II (August 22–September 20, 662). The folk agreed to equip and prepare themselves, and to be ready. They were to rebel at the beginning of the new moon, that is, the new moon of Sha'bān 43 (November 8, 663). So they were equipped and ready.

112. The text reads: nurīdu; O reads: yazīdu, that is, "the glory of this world does not increase."

[22] It was said that in this year Busr b. Abī Arṭāt al-'Āmirī set out for al-Madīnah, Mecca, and al-Yaman. He killed various Muslims during that journey, according to al-Wāqidī. I have (previously) mentioned those who differ with him about the time Busr made that journey. Al-Wāqidī claimed that he was told by Dāwūd b. Ḥayyān—'Aṭā' b. Abī Marwān: Busr b. Abī Arṭāt stayed at al-Madīnah for a month investigating the people. He killed everyone who was said to have helped against 'Uthmān. (According to) 'Aṭā b. Abī Marwān—Ḥanẓalah b. 'Alī al-Aslamī: Busr found some of the Banū Ka'b and their youths at one of their wells, so he threw them in it.

In this year Ziyād came to Mu'āwiyah. This is according to what I was told by 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan[113]—Sulaymān b. Abī Arqam:[114] Ziyād came to Mu'āwiyah from Fārs and reached a settlement with him in return for the wealth which he brought to Mu'āwiyah. The reason why he came after having refused at one of the strongholds of Fārs is (in) the following account that I was told by 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Maslamah b. Muḥārib: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah used to be in charge of Ziyād's property in al-Baṣrah. Mu'āwiyah learned that Ziyād had wealth with 'Abd al-Raḥmān. When Ziyād feared for things which 'Abd al-Raḥmān held for him, he wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān ordering him to safeguard his property. When Mu'āwiyah sent to al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah to investigate Ziyād's wealth, al-Mughīrah came and took 'Abd al-Raḥmān aside saying, "Your father may have done me wrong, but Ziyād treated me well." He then wrote to Mu'āwiyah, "I didn't find anything in 'Abd al-Raḥmān's possession which I am free to take." Mu'āwiyah wrote back to al-Mughīrah to torture him. Some authorities reported that al-Mughīrah tortured 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī [23] Bakrah when Mu'āwiyah wrote to him, although he wanted to be excused. When Mu'āwiyah learned of this, he said, "Perse-

113. That is, 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī.

114. Cairo reads: Sulaymān b. Arqam. Sulaymān's father was commonly called al-Arqam b. Abī al-Arqam. See *EI*², s.v. al-Arḳam.

vere in what your kinsman ordered you to do." So al-Mughīrah covered 'Abd al-Raḥmān's face with silk, and moistened it with water so that it would stick, and the latter fainted. Al-Mughīrah did that three times, released him, and wrote back to Mu'āwiyah, "I tortured him but did not get anything from him." Thus he earned Ziyād's gratitude.

I was told by 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan—'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abdallāh al-Thaqafī—shaykhs of the Thaqīf: Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah entered Mu'āwiyah's presence, and upon seeing him Mu'āwiyah said:

The place of a man's secret, if he reveals the secret, is his sincere brother.
So if you reveal a secret, let it be to someone sincere who will keep it secret, or don't disclose it.

Al-Mughīrah replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you should place your trust in me, you would do so with someone who is sincere, sympathetic, Godfearing, and dependable. What is it, O Commander of the Faithful?" Mu'āwiyah replied, "I remembered Ziyād clinging to the land of Fārs and his defiance there, and I didn't sleep last night." Al-Mughīrah wanted to downplay Ziyād, so he asked, "What is Ziyād over there, O Commander of the Faithful?" Mu'āwiyah replied, "What a miserable, low, incompetent, trickster of an Arab. He holds wealth fortified in a fortress of Fārs. He contrives subterfuges and lies in wait. I am not reassured that he won't acknowledge a man belonging to the people of this house.[115] If so he will have renewed the war against me deceitfully." Al-Mughīrah then asked, "Do you give me permission to go to him, O Commander of the Faithful?" He answered, "Yes. Go to him and be polite."

Al-Mughīrah then came to Ziyād, and when he learned about al-Mughīrah's approach, Ziyād remarked, "He only came on an important mission." Then he admitted al-Mughīrah, who entered his presence, while Ziyād was in his reception hall facing [24] the sun. Ziyād greeted him saying, "May the visitor prosper." To which al-Mughīrah replied, "The news ends with you, Abū Mughīrah.[116] Mu'āwiyah was so carried away with fear that he sent me to you. He didn't know anyone who attempted this matter[117] except al-Ḥasan. Since the latter has already rendered allegiance to Mu'āwiyah, take [something] for yourself before settling down [somewhere]. Mu'āwiyah has no need of you." Ziyād responded, "Confidentially, give me the best practical advice you can." Al-Mughīrah answered, "A frank opinion might be distasteful but there is no use watering it down.[118] I think you should attach your rope to Mu'āwiyah's and travel to him." Ziyād replied, "I will see, and God will decide."

115. The text reads: ahl hādhā al-bayt, that is, a member of Muḥammad's family, in particular a relative of 'Alī. See *EI*², s. v. Ahl al-Bayt.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib: When Ziyād had remained in the fortress for over a year, Mu'āwiyah wrote to him, "Why do you destroy yourself? Come to me and tell me how much wealth you collected as taxes, what you spent, and what remained with you; you will be guaranteed a safe-conduct. If you would like to remain with us, then do so; and if you prefer to return to your place of safety, then return." At that, Ziyād left Fārs. When al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah learned that Ziyād had decided to come to Mu'āwiyah, he set out for Mu'āwiyah before Ziyād set out from Fārs. Ziyād set out from Iṣṭakhr to Arrajān[119] and came to Māh Bahrādhān.[120] Then he took the Ḥulwān[121] Road until he reached al-Madā'in. 'Abd al-
[25] Raḥmān then left for Mu'āwiyah, to inform him of Ziyād's coming. Then, when Ziyād had reached Syria, and al-Mughīrah arrived a month later, Mu'āwiyah said to the latter, "O Mughīrah, Ziyād's journey was a month longer than yours and you left before he did, and yet he arrived before you." Al-Mughīrah replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, if one clever person

116. That is, "You are the object of my visit."

117. This probably means attempting to resist him.

118. The text reads: al-madhīq, that is, milk mixed with water.

119. Arrajān was a town and district in northwestern Fārs. See Le Strange, Lands, 268–69.

120. Māh Bahrādhān was the district of Nihāwand in the Jibāl, also called Māh Dīnār. See Ṭabarī, I, 2633–34; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 406; and EI[1], s.v. Nihāwand.

121. Ḥulwān was a town on the main road at the border of the Jibāl and Iraq. See Le Strange, Lands, 91.

speaks with another, his argument will silence him." Mu'āwiyah responded, "Watch out! Keep your secret from me." So al-Mughīrah said, "Ziyād came hoping for gain [ziyādah], while I came fearing loss, so that explains how we traveled."

Mu'āwiyah questioned Ziyād about the wealth of Fārs that he had collected. So Ziyād told him how much he had sent to 'Alī and how much he had spent properly on necessary expenses. Mu'āwiyah believed him concerning what he had spent and what he had left, and he collected the remainder from Ziyād, saying, "You have been the most reliable of our deputies [khulafā']."

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī[122]—'Abū Mikhnaf, Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Iṣfahānī, Salamah b. 'Uthmān, a shaykh of the Banū Tamīm, and others who may be trusted: When Mu'āwiyah wrote to Ziyād while the latter was in Fārs asking him to come to him, Ziyād set out from Fārs with al-Minjāb b. Rāshid al-Dabbī and Ḥārith b. Badr[123] al-Ghudānī. Mu'āwiyah also dispatched 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim to Fārs with a contingent, saying, "Should you meet Ziyād en route, seize him." Ibn Khāzim journeyed to Fārs—some said that he met Ziyād at Sūq al-Ahwāz;[124] others (said that) he met him at Arrajān. When they met, Ibn Khāzim seized the reins of Ziyād ('s horse) demanding, "Dismount, O Ziyād!" At that, al-Minjāb b. Rāshid shouted to him, "Let go, O son of a black, or I shall tie[125] your hand in the reins!" It is also said that Ibn Khāzim caught up with them while Ziyād was sitting and spoke to him rudely, whereupon al-Minjāb reviled Ibn Khāzim. Ziyād then asked him, "What do [26] you want, O Ibn Khāzim?" He answered, "I want you to come to al-Baṣrah." When Ziyād replied, "Indeed, I am going there," Ibn Khāzim went off embarrassed by him.

(According to) some authorities: Ziyād and Ibn Khāzim met at Arrajān and quarreled. Ziyād told Ibn Khāzim, "I have received Mu'āwiyah's safe-conduct, so I intend to go to him. This is his letter to me." Ibn Khāzim replied, "If you intend to go to the Commander of the Faithful, there is no way to get at you."

---

122. C reads: Abū al-Ḥasan.
123. C reads: Zayd.
124. Sūq al-Ahwāz was a city in Khuzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 232–34.
125. The text reads: 'allaqtu; C reads: 'aqaltu, "hobble."

Ibn Khāzim then departed for Sābūr,[126] while Ziyād left for Māh Bahrādhān, and came to Mu'āwiyah who asked him about the wealth of Fārs. Ziyād answered, "I spent it, O Commander of the Faithful, on provisions, stipends, and campaigns. I deposited the remainder with folk for safekeeping."

Ziyād thus kept putting off Mu'āwiyah while he wrote letters to folk, among whom was Shu'bah b. al-Qil'im, "You know how I trust you, so consider the verse of the Book of God, Almighty and Great, 'We offered the trust to the heavens and the earth and the mountains . . .'[127] Take care of what you can." He also designated in the letters the amount which he had confirmed for Mu'āwiyah, and he concealed the letters with his messenger, ordering him to pass by some (people) who would inform Mu'āwiyah. So his messenger did that until (word of) it spread and he was seized and brought to Mu'āwiyah. Mu'āwiyah then told Ziyād, "If you are not going to deceive me, I need these letters." So Mu'āwiyah read them, and (the amount) was indeed the same as Ziyād had confirmed for him. Mu'āwiyah said, "I fear that you may have (already) deceived me. Make peace with me in return for whatever you wish." At that, Ziyād made peace with him for part of what he told Mu'āwiyah he had, and delivered it. Ziyād then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I had wealth before becoming governor. I would like to keep that wealth and to give up what I acquired as governor."

Then Ziyād asked Mu'āwiyah's permission to settle at al-Kūfah. When he gave it, Ziyād proceeded to al-Kūfah.[128] Al-Mu-
[27] ghīrah would honor and praise Ziyād, and Mu'āwiyah wrote to al-Mu-ghīrah, "Urge Ziyād, Sulaymān b. Ṣurad,[129] Ḥujr b. 'Adī[130]

126. Sābūr was the city of Bishāpūr in Fārs. See Le Strange, Lands, 262–63.

127. Qur'ān 33:72.

128. C adds: "So he settled in it after he gave permission."

129. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzā'ī (d. 65/685) had settled in al-Kūfah with his tribe. He had been among those who protested the land policy of Sa'īd b. al-'Ās, there. He fought on 'Alī's side at the Battle of Ṣiffīn, but had objected to the arbitration agreement. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 182, 198, 210; EI[1], s.v. Sulaimān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzā'ī; S. H. M. Jafri, Shī'a Islam, 82.

130. Ḥujr b. 'Adī al-Kindī (d. 50/70) had commanded the Muslim right wing at Jalūlā'. He was among those who protested the land policy of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, and had pursuaded the Kūfans to join 'Alī before the Battle of the Camel. He Shabath b. Rib'ī,[131] Ibn al-Kawwā',[132] and 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq[133] to worship with the assembly." Consequently they would be present with him at worship.[134]

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī—Sulaymān b. Arqam:[135] I learned that Ziyād arrived at al-Kūfah, and, when it was time for worship, al-Mughīrah said to him, "Come forward and lead the worship." Ziyād replied, "I won't. You have more right than I to lead worship during your regime [sulṭānikum]." Ziyād also entered al-Mughīrah's presence while Umm Ayyūb bt. 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah was with him. Al-Mughīrah seated her in front of Ziyād, saying, "You will not be concealed from Abū al-Mughīrah." When al-Mughīrah died, Ziyād married her, while she was (still) young. Ziyād would order that an elephant of his be made to stand and Umm Ayyūb would look at it. As a result (that place) was called Bāb al-Fīl.[136]

'Anbasah b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage this year. I was told this by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Ishāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

---

was wounded at Ṣiffīn, witnessed the arbitration agreement, commanded 'Alī's right wing at al-Nahrawān, and was a potential rival of the family of al-Ash'ath b. Qays for the leadership of the Kindah at al-Kūfah. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 135, 154, 176, 187, 209, 223, 238; *EI*², s.v. Ḥudjr b. 'Adī al-Kindī; Jafri, Shī'a Islam, 82. For his disruption of worship see below.

131. Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Tamīmī, who had followed the false prophetess Sajāḥ as a youth, fought on 'Alī's side at Ṣiffīn, was put in charge of fighting by the Ḥarūriyyah, but commanded 'Alī's left wing at al-Nahrawān. He became the chief of the Banū Ḥanẓalah at al-Kūfah. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 223, 243; Ṭabarī, I, 1919, 3270, 3349, 3380, 3388.

132. 'Abdallāh b. al-Kawwā' al-Yashkūrī had favored judgment according to the Qur'ān at Ṣiffīn. He was put in charge of worship by the Ḥarūriyyah, and was one of the Khārijite leaders who fought at al-Nahrawān. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 176, 209; Ṭabarī, I, 2921.

133. C reads: 'Umar b. al-Ḥamiq. 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq al-Khuzā'ī was one of the notables who had opposed 'Uthmān in 33(653/4) and had helped to kill 'Uthmān. He fought on 'Alī's side at Ṣiffīn, and witnessed the arbitration agreement. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 176, 209; and Ṭabarī, I, 2921.

134. The point is that all of those whose loyalty was suspect were required to attend public worship led by the governor as a sign that they accepted the current regime.

135. C reads: Abū al-Ḥasan b. Arqam.

136. That is, "the Gate of the Elephant." See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 288.

The Events of the Year

43

(April 15, 663–April 3, 664)

Among these events was Busr b. Abī Arṭāt's[137] campaign against the Byzantines. Al-Wāqidī claimed that Busr spent the winter in their territory until he reached Constantinople. But some experts in historical matters have denied that, saying that Busr never spent the winter in Byzantine territory.

In this year 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ died in Egypt on Yawm al-Fiṭr[138]
[28] (January 6, 664). He had been its governor for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb for four years, and for 'Uthmān for four years minus two months, and for Mu'āwiyah for two years minus one month.

In this year Mu'āwiyah appointed 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ governor of Egypt after the death of his father. Al-Wāqidī claimed that he was it's governor for about two years.

In Ṣafar of this year (May 15–June 12, 663) Muḥammad b. Maslamah[139] died in al-Madīnah. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the prayers over him.

---

137. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 238, calls him Busr b. Arṭāt.

138. Yawm al-Fiṭr is the day celebrating the end of the month-long fast of Ramaḍān.

139. Muḥammad b. Maslamah b. Khālid b. 'Adī was an early Muslim convert

In this year al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah, the Khārijite, was killed, as Hishām b. Muḥammad claimed. Others have claimed that he was killed in the previous year.

The Killing of al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah[140]

We have already reported[141] the meeting of the remaining Khārijites who were carried off wounded at the Battle of al-Nahr, those who withdrew to al-Rayy and others. They met with the three persons whom I named previously, one of whom was al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah. We reported how they rendered allegiance to him and gathered for revolt at the beginning of the new moon of Sha'ban 43 (November 8, 663).

(According to) Hishām—Ja'far b. Hudhayfah al-Ṭā'ī—al-Muhill b. Khalīfah: Qabīṣah[142] b. al-Dammūn,[143] who was in charge of the police came to al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, saying, "Shimr b. Ja'wanah al-Kilābī came and informed me that the Khārijites have gathered at the house of Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān al-Sulamī, and have agreed among themselves to rebel against you at the beginning of Sha'bān (November 8, 663)." Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah then told Qabīṣah b. al-Dammūn, who was an ally of the Thaqīf (they claimed that he came from al-Ṣadif in Ḥadramawt), "Take the police to surround the house [29] of Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān, and bring him to me." They were convinced that he was the commander of those Khārijites. Qabīṣah took the police and many other people, and, before Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān realized it, they were at his house at noon.[144] Mu'ādh b. Juwayn and about twenty of their companions were with Ḥayyān at that time. Ḥayyān's wife, an umm walad of his,[145] who had fought at the Battle of Badr. He helped to kill Ka'b b. al-Ashraf; killed the Jew, Marḥab, after the conquest of Khaybar; and had been put in charge of al-Madīnah when Muḥammad went to Tabūk. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 492, 550–51, 761, 896.

---

140. This account is summarized by Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV A, 143–47.

141. O begins: "Abū Ja'far, may God have mercy on him, said."

142. O and Cairo read: Qubayṣah.

143. O reads: al-Dammūr; C reads: al-Zanbūr.

144. O adds: ṣakkahu 'ammī "my uncle locked it."

145. C reads: "and an umm walad of his." An umm walad was a slave woman who had borne a child to her master. Such a woman was normally freed and her child recognized as legitimate after their master died.

jumped up, and took their swords which she threw under the bedding. Some of the folk sought to defend themselves with their swords, but, when they did not find them, they surrendered. Qabīṣah took them away to al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah who asked them, "What prompted you to want to split the stick of the Muslims?" They replied, "We didn't want anything of the sort," to which he responded, "Yes indeed! I heard that about you, and then your gathering confirmed it for me." They answered, "As far as our gathering in that house is concerned, Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān taught us to recite the Qur'ān, so we meet with him in his house in order to recite it to him." Al-Mughīrah ordered, "Take them to the prison." They remained there for about a year.

When their brethren heard about their arrest, they were (more) cautious.[146] Al-Mustawrid b. ʿUllifah, their leader (ṣāḥib), left (al-Kūfah) and settled at a house in al-Ḥīrah next to the Qaṣr al-ʿAdasiyyīn[147] of the Kalb. He sent to his brethren, who would visit him frequently, and equip[148] themselves. When their frequent visits increased, their leader, al-Mustawrid b. ʿUllifah al-Taymī, said to them, "Let us leave this place, for I fear that you will be discovered." Some of them said to each other, "Let us go to this place;"[149] others said, "that [30] place."

Ḥajjār b. Abjar looked down upon them from a house in which he and a group of his family were staying. Suddenly they would see two horsemen arrive and enter that house in which the folk were (gathered). Then, before long, two others would come and enter, and shortly afterwards another would come and enter, then still another who would enter. That would concern him.[150] They would also leave close together. So Ḥajjār said to the lady of the house in which he was staying, while she was

146. O reads: jaddadū, "they started over."

147. The Qaṣr al-Adasiyyīn was one of the fortified enclosures at the town of al-Ḥīrah, about six km from al-Kūfah. It belonged to the Banū ʿAmmār b. ʿAbd al-Masīh, and was named after their ancestress, ʿAdasah bt. Mālik b. ʿAwf al-Kalbī. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 244; Ibn al-Faqīh, Buldān, 183; and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 116.

148. C reads: yajtahidū, "exerted."

149. C reads: "to what place does he bid us go?"

150. C reads: "all that bothered him."

nursing a boy[151] of hers, "Woe unto you! Who are these horsemen whom I see entering this house?" She replied, "By God, I don't know who they are except that men visit this house frequently and continuously, on foot and on horseback. We have disapproved of that for days, but we don't know who they are."

Ḥajjār then rode out on his horse, accompanied by one of his young servants (ghulām). He proceeded until he reached the door of their house, where one of their men was in charge. Whenever one of their men came to the door, the doorkeeper went in to his master and informed him, and the latter admitted the visitor. But if a man well-known to them came to the doorkeeper, he would enter without asking permission. When Ḥajjār came to the doorkeeper, the latter did not recognize him, so he asked, "Who are you, may God have mercy on you, and what do you want?" Ḥajjār replied, "I want to meet my comrade."[152] The doorkeeper then asked, "And what is your name?" He told him, "Ḥajjār b. Abjar." He said, "Stay as you are until I inform them about you, then I will come out to you." So Ḥajjār said to him, "Enter, rightly guided." At that the man entered, and Ḥajjār followed him quickly until he reached the door of a large ṣuffah[153] where they were. The doorkeeper had entered their presence meanwhile and said, "This man asks permission to see you. I refused him, saying, 'Who are you?' He replied, 'I am Ḥajjār b. Abjar.'" Ḥajjār then heard them becoming alarmed and exclaiming, "Ḥajjār b. Abjar! By [31]
God! Ḥajjār b. Abjar did not come for any good purpose." When he heard what they said,[154] he wanted to leave, having confirmed his suspicion about what they were doing. But he wouldn't let himself leave until he saw them for himself. Approaching until he stood between the curtains of the door of the ṣuffah, he said, "Peace be upon you!" He looked, and there before him was a large group of men, weapons in full view, and coats of mail. Ḥajjār exclaimed, "O God! May He gather them for some good purpose. Who are you, God save you?" 'Alī b. Abī Shimr b. al-Ḥusayn of the Taym al-Ribāb recognized him.

151. C reads: "boys."
152. O reads: "I want to meet al-Riyāḥī."
153. A ṣuffah was a covered place attached to a house and open on one side.
154. O reads: "what was said about him."

This 'Alī was one of the eight Khārijites who were put to flight at the Battle of al-Nahr. He was a horseman of the Arabs and one of their pious ascetics, and he was among the best of them. 'Alī said to him, "O Ḥajjār b. Abjar, if you came looking for information,[155] then you have found it, and if you came for something else, then enter and tell us why you came." Ḥajjār replied, "I don't need to enter." And he left.

At that, they said to each other, "Catch and hold him, for he is going to inform on you." A group of them went out right after him—that was just at sunset. When they caught up with him while he rode his horse, they said to him, "Tell us your story and why you came." He replied, "I didn't come for anything which should alarm or frighten you." So they said to him, "Wait until we draw near you and speak with you or until you draw near to us. Inform us, and we will let you know our business and state our concern." He then told them, "I won't draw near to you, and I don't want you to draw near to me." At that 'Alī b. Abī Shimr b. al-Ḥusayn asked him, "Can we trust you not to inform on us for tonight, which would be charitable of you, because we share kinship and a just claim?" Ḥajjār replied, "Yes, you are safe from me for tonight and all nights forever." Then he hurried off and entered al-Kūfah, taking his [32] family with him. The others, meanwhile, said to each other, "We aren't certain that he won't inform on us, so let's leave this place at once."

After they had performed the sunset worship, they left, dispersing from al-Ḥīrah. Their leader told them, "Join me at the house of Sulaym b. Maḥdūj al-'Abdī of the Banū Salamah." He then left al-Ḥīrah and proceeded until he came to the 'Abd al-Qays. When he came to the Banū Salamah, he sent to Sulaym b. Maḥdūj, who was related to him by marriage. When he came to him, Sulaym took him in along with five or six of his companions. Meanwhile, Ḥajjār b. Abjar returned to his dwelling, and they expected to hear that he had reported them to the authorities or to the people. But he reported them to neither one, and the Khārijites did not hear anything about him that they disliked in that respect.

155. The text reads: khabar; C reads: khayr, "good."

During his term as governor, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah learned that the Khārijites were rebelling against him, and that they had rallied to one of their men. So al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah rose before the people, and after praising and extolling God, he continued:

> Now then, you know, O people, that I have always desired well-being for your community and have averted harm from you. You also know, by God, that I feared that that would be[156] an evil example for the impudent [sufahā'] among you, but not for the forbearing [ḥulamā'] and Godfearing. By God, I feared lest I would ever find that the forbearing and Godfearing were punished for the crime of impetuous fools. So restrain the impudent among you, O people, before misfortune overcomes the general public. It has been reported to me that some men among you desire to foment divisions and controversy openly in the city.[157] By God, they will not rebel in any Arab district in this city, but I shall destroy them and make them an exemplary warning for whomever comes after them. So let folk look to themselves before [they] regret [it]. I have taken this stand desiring proof and excuses. [33]

At that, Ma'qil b. Qays al-Riyāḥī rose before him, saying "O amīr, was any one of those folk named to you? If so, then let us know who they are. If they should belong to us, we would satisfy you with respect to them. If they should belong to others, order those who are obedient among the people of our city to have every tribe bring you its impudent ones." Al-Mughīrah replied, "None of them was named to me, but I have been told that a group intends to rebel in the city." Ma'qil then told him, "May God make you prosper, I shall go among my folk and satisfy you about those who belong to them. Let every man among the leaders thus satisfy you about his folk."

Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah then descended[158] and sent to summon the leaders of the people. Then he told them, "You already know what has taken place regarding this matter, and you have heard what I have said, so let every man among the leaders satisfy me with regard to his folk. If not, then by Him than whom there is no other god! I shall surely change from someone you like into someone you will hate. For a vile person only disgraces himself, while he who admonishes is absolved from guilt."

156. The text reads: yakūna; C reads: takrahūna, "that you would detest."
157. That is, al-Kūfah.
158. The text reads: nazala; C reads: taraka, "left."

The leaders then left for their clans, and implored them by God and Islām to point out whomever they thought intended to incite discord or to withdraw from the community. Ṣaʿṣaʿah b. Ṣūḥān also came and stayed among the ʿAbd al-Qays.

(According to) Ḥishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Al-Aswad b. Qays al-ʿAbdī—Murrah b. al-Nuʿmān: Ṣaʿṣaʿah b. Ṣūḥān stayed with us, and, by God, some news had reached him that al-Taymī[159] and his companions were staying at the house of Sulaym b. Maḥdūj. But in spite of his differences with them and his hatred for their views, he detested having them seized while they were with his clan. He also detested the evil treatment of the People of the House[160] by his folk. So he said something nice. At that time we had many notables and there were a good number of us.

[34] Ṣaʿṣaʿah stood before us after he performed the afternoon worship, saying:

> O assemblage of God's worshippers, when God, much praise be unto him,[161] distributed merit among the Muslims, He bestowed the best part of it on you. So you decided in favor of God's religion, which He chose for Himself and was satisfied with for his angels and messengers [rusul]. Then you adhered to it until God took His Messenger.[162] Then, afterwards, the people quarreled, one faction standing firm, while another apostatized. One faction were hypocrites, while another waited. You, however, persevered in God's religion, and had faith in Him and His Messenger. You fought the apostates until the religion was 159. That is, al-Mustawrid.

160. See above, n. 115.
161. C reads: "to whom be praise [and] much wealth."
162. That is, he died.

established and God destroyed the evildoers. In return, God continued to increase the good He bestowed on you in everything and in every circumstance, until the community quarreled among its members. One faction said, "We want Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, and 'Ā'ishah,[163] while another faction said, "We want the people of the West."[164] Yet another faction said, "We want 'Abdallāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī, [that is, the] Rāsib of the Azd."[165] But you said, "We only want the People of the House, through whom God first gave us dignity," [hoping for] a reward from God to you and a settlement. You thus continued to be in the right, adhering to it, and observing it, until God destroyed by means of you and those whose guidance and views were similar to yours, the faithless at the Battle of the Camel[166] and the renegades at the Battle of al-Nahrawān.

He said nothing about the Syrians because the government was theirs at that time.

No folk are worse enemies of God, you, the family of your Prophet, and the community of the Muslims, than these mistaken renegades who separated from our Imām[167] and allowed our blood to be shed, and who accuse us of unbelief. Beware lest you shelter them in your houses or be secretive about them, for no Arab alive should be worse enemies of them than you. By God, it has been reported to me that some of them are among the living. I am investigating [35] that and asking questions. If I should find that out, truly I 163. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh (d. 36[656]) had led 'Alī's opponents along with al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām (d. 36[656]) and 'Ā'ishah bt. Abī Bakr (ca. 614–78), Muḥammad's favorite wife, at the Battle of the Camel where both Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr were killed. See N. Abbott, Aishah the Beloved of Mohammad; *EI*², s.v. 'Ā'isha Bint Abī Bakr; *EI*¹, s.v. Ṭalḥa b. 'Ubaydallāh; and al-Zubair b. al-'Awwām.

164. That is, Mu'āwiyah and the Syrians.

165. 'Abdallāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī (d. 38[658]) had led the Khārijites at the Battle of al-Nahrawān where he was killed. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Wahb al-Rāsibī.

166. The Battle of the Camel was fought outside al-Baṣrah in Jumādā II 36 (December 656). See *EI*², s.v. al-Djamal.

167. That is, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

would win favor with God by shedding their blood, for that is permitted.

Then he continued:

O assemblage of the 'Abd al-Qays, these governors of ours know you and your views better than anyone, so don't give them grounds to take action against you, for they would be swifter than anything toward you and those like you.[168]

Then he stepped aside and sat down, and all his folk said, "God curse them!" and "May God be rid of them! By God, we shall not shelter them, and should we know where they are we shall surely point them out to you." The only exception was Sulaym b. Maḥdūj who didn't say anything. But he returned to his folk depressed and despondent, not liking to evict his companions from his dwelling. They would blame him, for they were related by marriage and relied on each other. He also disliked having them sought in his house, for they would perish and he with them. When he had arrived, he entered his dwelling. The companions of al-Mustawrid also arrived, coming to him. Every one of them informed al-Mustawrid of what al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah had done with the people and of how their leaders had come to them and stood before them. They told him, "Let us leave. By God, we aren't certain we won't be taken in our clans."

Al-Mustawrid asked them, "Don't you think that the head of the 'Abd al-Qays stood before them just as the heads of the [other] clans stood before their clans?" They replied, "Yes, by God, we think so." He remarked, "Indeed, my host hasn't mentioned anything to me." They said, "We think, by God, that he is embarrassed by you." So he called Sulaym and he came to al-Mustawrid who said, "O Ibn Maḥdūj, I have learned that the heads of the clans stood before them and approached them concerning me and my companions. Did anyone stand before you[169] reporting anything of that to you?" He replied, "Yes, Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Ṣūḥān stood before us requesting us not to shelter anyone sought by them, and they said many things which I disliked mentioning to you. You may consider that something of your business was a burden for me." Al-Mustawrid told him, "You [36] have honored your dwelling and acted well. Now we, God willing, shall depart from you." At that, Sulaym exclaimed, "By God, if they want [to take] you in my dwelling, they won't reach you or one of your companions until I die first." Al-Mustawrid replied,[170] "God protect you from that."

168. The text reads: amthalikum; C reads: qatlikum, "and for killing you."
169. C adds: "Summoning you."

Those in al-Mughīrah's prison learned that the people of the city had agreed to expel and to seize the Khārijites among them. Concerning that Mu'ādh b. Juwayn b. Ḥuṣayn said:

Indeed, O Sellers![171] the time has come for one, who sells himself to God, to depart.

Will you remain out of ignorance in the house of those who err, while everyone of you is hunted down to be killed?

For the enemies[172] assaulted the folk and they set you up for slaughter by a mistaken opinion.

Indeed, O folk, strive for the goal which, when it is mentioned is more righteous and more just.

If only I were with you on the back of a swimmer [sābiḥ],[173] powerful, short-legged, armored, not defenseless.

If only I were with you opposing your enemy, for I am given first the cup of fate to drink.

It is hard for me that you are afraid and driven out.
When I draw out [my sword] unsheathed among the violators,

---

170. O reads: "they said to him."

171. Shārūn was a term the Khārijites used for themselves, referring to the doctrine that they sold themselves to God for the reward of heaven.

172. The text reads: 'udāh; C and O read: ghadāh, "this morning they."

173. Swimmer is a metaphor for a horse on a battlefield.

When every glorious [person] scatters their group, when you would say he had turned away and fled, he would come back,

Showing the blade of the sword in the heat[174] of the tumult, he regards steadfastness as exemplary in some places.

It is hard for me that you are wronged and decrease, and I become sorrowful as a prisoner[175] in chains.

If I were with you while they headed for you,
then I would stir up dust between the two factions,

For many a group have I broken up, and many an attack have I experienced, and many an opponent have I left dead on the ground.

Al-Mustawrid sent word to his companions, telling them, [37] "Leave this tribe. Let no Muslim person be disgraced unwittingly because of us." Among them[176] were some who shared their views. They agreed [to go to] Sūrā,[177] and they left for that town, four, five, and ten at a time. Three hundred men in all presented themselves at Sūrā. Then they set out for the Ṣarāt[178] and spent the night there."

When al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was informed about them, he summoned the leaders of the people, saying, "Destruction and an evil opinion have sent forth these wretches, so whom do you think I should send against them?" 'Adī b. Ḥātim[179] stood

174. The text reads: ḥamas; O reads: hawmah, "in the turmoil of battle."
175. The text reads: asīr; C reads: amīr, "a commander in chains."
176. That is, among the 'Abd al-Qays.
177. Sūrā was an old Jewish town on the upper Nahr Sūrā (the modern Shaṭṭ Hindiyyah branch of the Euphrates) where there was a bridge across the river for the main road from al-Kūfah to al-Madā'in, near the later site of Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. See Ibn al-Faqīh, Buldān, 183–84; and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 184.
178. The Ṣarāt Canal was the section of the Nahr Sūrā below the bridge of al-Qāmighān. See Suhrāb, 'Aja'ib, 25; and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 377–78.
179. 'Adī b. Ḥātim b. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd al-Ṭā'ī (d. 68[687/88]) was the son of the famous poet, Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī, and had converted to Islam from Christianity. He was the leader of the Ṭayyi' tribe at al-Kūfah, and he fought on 'Alī's side at the Battle of the Camel and at Ṣiffīn. See *EI*², s.v. 'Adī b. Ḥātim.

up, saying, "We are all their enemy, consider their opinion to be foolish,[180] and remain obedient to you, so whomever of us you wish will set out for them." Ma'qil b. Qays then arose, saying, "You should only send against them one of the notables of the city whom you see around you, whom you find to be attentive and obedient, who differs with them and desires their destruction. I don't think, may God preserve you, that you would send anyone of the people against them who is a greater enemy of their's and more violently against them than I am. So send me against them, and, with God's permission, I will protect you from them." Al-Mughīrah replied, "Go in God's name." Three thousand men were then equipped for his expedition. Al-Mugīrah told Qabīṣah b. al-Dammūn, "Bring me 'Alī's faction, and send them out with Ma'qil b. Qays, because he was one of the leaders of his companions." When word was sent to the members of his faction who were known, they gathered together. They were also the strongest in allowing the blood of these renegades to be shed, and were more courageous against them than others, as they had fought them previously.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Aswad b. Qays—Murrah b. Munqidh b. al-Nu'mān: I was among those assigned (to go) with him[181] at that time. He continued: Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Ṣūhān had stood up after Ma'qil b. Qays, saying, "Send me against them, O amīr. By God, I permit their blood to be shed and think [38] lightly of bearing responsibility for it." But al-Mughīrah replied, "Sit down! You are (only) an orator," and that offended Ṣa'ṣa'ah.

Indeed al-Mughīrah said that because he heard that Ṣa'ṣa'ah would censure 'Uthmān b. 'Affān,[182] and would constantly mention 'Alī and prefer him. He had summoned him previously, saying, "As for you, I have heard that you censure 'Uthmān to one of the people, and I have also heard that you openly proclaim something of 'Alī's superiority. But you do not mention any superiority of 'Alī about which I am ignorant. Moreover, I know more about that [than you]. But this regime has appeared, and we have been ordered to announce ʿAlī's faults to the people. So we leave out much of that which we are supposed to do, and mention [only] what we must in order to protect ourselves from these folk by means of dissimulation. If you discuss ʿAlī's superiority, do it secretly among your companions in your homes. As far as [doing this] publicly in the mosque is concerned, the Caliph does not permit this to us, nor does he forgive us for it." Ṣaʿṣaʿah would then tell al-Mughīrah, "Yes, I will do so." But then al-Mughīirah would hear that Ṣaʿṣaʿah had resumed doing what he had forbidden him to do.

180. The text reads: musfih; C reads: mubshid, "detestable."

181. That is, Ma'qil b. Qays.

182. That is, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, the third Commander of the Faithful (23–35 [644–55]).

Thus, when Ṣaʿṣaʿah stood before him, saying, "Send me against them," al-Mughīrah found that the former's dispute with him had aroused his hatred towards Ṣaʿṣaʿah. So he said, "Sit down! You are [only] an orator." When al-Mughīrah thus offended him, Ṣaʿṣaʿah replied, "Am I nothing but an orator? Yes indeed, by God! I favor orators [who are] firm leaders. By God! If you had seen me under the banner of the ʿAbd al-Qays at the Battle of the Camel, where the lances clashed splitting the shafts lengthwise and making the heads fall off,[183] you would have known that I am the lion, the beast." At that, al-[39] Mughīrah said, "That's enough now. By my life, you were granted an eloquent tongue." Qabīṣah b. al-Dammūn lost no time in sending out the army with Maʿqil. They were three thousand [men who were] the pick of the Shīʿah and their horsemen.

[According to] Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ—Sālim b. Rabīʿah: I was sitting with al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah when Maʿqil b. Qays came to pay his respects and bid him farewell. Al-Mughīrah told him, "O Maʿqil b. Qays, I have sent with you horsemen whom I ordered to be selected from the people of the city. So go against this renegade band who withdrew from our community and accused it[184] of unbelief. Summon them to repent and to [re]join the community. If they do so, then accept them and hold back from them; and if they do not, then fight them and seek God's help against them." Maʿqil b. Qays replied, "We shall summon them and excuse them. But, by God, I don't think they will accept, and if they don't accept the truth, we won't accept the false from them. Have you found out, may God cause you to prosper, where the folk are camped?" Al-Mughīrah answered, "Yes, Simāk b. 'Ubayd al-Absī"[185]—who was his governor over al-Madā'in—"wrote to me informing me that they set out from the Ṣarāt and proceeded until they halted at Bahurasīr,[186] and that they intended to cross over to al-Madīnah al-'Atīqah,[187] which contains the residences of the Khusraws and the White [Palace] of al-Madā'in. When Simāk prevented them from crossing, they stayed in the city of Bahurasīr. So take the field against them and pursue them until you catch them. Don't give up on them. They are forbidden to stay for more than an hour in any territory where you summon them. So if they accept, fine, and if not, then oppose them; for they would not stay in a territory for two days without corrupting everyone who associates with them." [40]

183. The text reads: tukhtalā; O reads: takhtallu, "totter."
184. C reads: "us."

Ma'qil left that very day and spent the night at Sūrā. Meanwhile, al-Mughīrah ordered his mawlā, Warrād, and the latter went out to the people in the congregational mosque and announced, "O people, Ma'qil b. Qays has gone against these renegades and has spent[188] the night at Sūrā. Let none of his companions[189] do differently, lest the amīr go out against every Muslim among them. He adjures them not to spend the night at al-Kūfah. Whoever was assigned to this expedition whom we find at al-Kūfah after today will have outlawed himself."[190]

[According to] Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥabīb[191]—'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī: I was among those who

185. O reads: al-Qaysī.

186. Bahurasīr or Behrasīr was the round, walled, Sasanian city of Veh-Artakhshatr west of the Tigris which formed the western part of al-Madā'in. See G. Gullini, "Problems of an excavation in northern Babylonia," 25.

187. "The Old City" was the Arabic name for Ctesiphon, the northernmost part of al-Madā'in on the east bank of the Tigris. See S. El-'Alī, "Al-Madā'in and its surrounding area in Arabic literary sources," 422–25.

188. O reads: "is spending."

189. That is, those men assigned to go with him.

190. That is, they will have made it permissible to have their blood shed.

191. C reads: Jundab.

went out with al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah, and I was the youngest man among them. We went out until we came to the Ṣarāt and stayed there until everyone in our group had arrived. Then we went forth until we reached and entered Bahurasīr. Simāk b. 'Ubayd al-'Absī, who was in al-Madīnah al-'Atīqah, had been warned about us, so when we were about to cross the floating bridge to them, he fought us for it, and then he cut it. As a result, we stayed at Bahurasīr.

Al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah summoned me, saying, "Can you write, O my nephew?" I replied that I could, so he called for parchment and an inkwell for me, and said to write as follows:

> From God's Servant ['Abdallāh],[192] al-Mustawrid, Commander of the Faithful, to Simāk b. 'Ubayd. Now then, we take revenge on behalf of our folk for tyranny in judgment, failure to enforce prescriptions,[193] and the monopolization of the fay'.[194] I summon you to the Book of God, Almighty and Great, and the example [sunnah] of His Prophet, and the rule [wilāyah] of Abū Bakr and 'Umar.[195] I also call upon you do disavow 'Uthmān and 'Alī for their innovation in religion [iḥdāth fī al-dīn] and their abandonment of the [41] judgment of the Book. If you accept, you will have come to your senses; and if you do not, we will have run out of excuses for you, and we will permit war against you, and will reject you for your disgraceful act. 'Indeed, God does not love disloyal people.'[196]

---

192. 'Abdallāh (Servant of God) was used as a prefix for the names of caliphs in Mu'āwiyah's inscription near al-Ṭā'if [58[677/8]], on coins of 'Abd al-Malik, al-Ṣaffāh, and al-Manṣūr, and on the official weights and commodity stamps of Sulaymān, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, al-Manṣūr, and al-Mahdī. See Lavoix, Catalogue, 17–24, 26; Miles, "Early Islamic Insciptions," 237; id., Early Arabic Glass Weights and Stamps, Supplement, 4, 8; id., Contributions to Arabic Metrology, I, i, 43–9; id., Numismatic History of Rayy, 23; id., Excavation Coins from the Persepolis Region, 64–7. It also occurs in the heading of a letter ascribed to 'Umar I by Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 350.

193. The text reads: al-ḥudūd, that is, the punishments explicitly prescribed in the Qur'ān.

194. See above, n. 51.

195. That is, to recognize that Abū Bakr and 'Umar had been legitimate rulers.

196. Qur'ān 8:58.

Al-Mustawrid said, "Go off to Simāk with this letter, deliver it to him, and remember what he says to you, and meet me." Al-Ghanawī continued: I was a callow and inexperienced youth when I reached puberty, and did not have much practical knowledge. I replied, "May God cause you to prosper, if you ordered me to throw myself into the Tigris, I would cast myself into it without disobeying you, but can you guarantee to me that Simāk won't detain me and prevent me from [returning to] you? In that case, the jihād I look forward to would elude me." At that, he smiled and said, "O my nephew, indeed you are an envoy, and nothing happens to them. If I feared that would happen, I would not send you. You could not take better care of yourself than I would for you."

So I left and crossed over to them at a ford. When I came to Simāk, there were many people around him, and when I drew near they weren't looking at me.[197] But when I approached them, about ten (of them) intercepted me. I supposed, by God, that they intended to seize me and that they did not respect envoys as my master had told me. At that, I drew my sword, exclaiming, "No! By Him in Whose hand is my soul, don't tangle with me or else God will absolve me of guilt concerning you." They asked me, "O servant of God, who are you?" I replied, "I am a messenger from the Commander of the Faithful, al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah." They then asked, "So why did you draw your sword?" I answered, "Because you were rushing at me, and I feared that you would bind me and be treacherous to me." They answered, "You are safe, and indeed, we came to you to go to your side, to hold the top of your sword,[198] and to see why you came and what you ask." I then asked them, "Will [42] I be safe until you return me to my companions?" They replied, "Of course," so I watched my sword. Then I approached until I stood before Simāk b. 'Ubayd. His companions had already crowded around me. Some of them were holding the top of my sword, and some of them were holding my upper arm.

197. O reads: "they started to look at me."

198. That is, to make certain that he would not draw it. This was diplomatic protocol.

I presented my master's letter to him, and when he had read it, he looked up at me, saying, "Al-Mustawrid would not be my choice for Caliph because of what I have seen of his hypocrisy and baseness in drawing his sword against the Muslims. Al-Mustawrid presents me with the denunciation of ʿAlī and ʿUthmān and calls me to [recognize] his rule. By God, what a wretched shaykh I would be then." He looked at me and said, "O my son, go to your master and tell him, 'Fear God and desist from your views and enter into the community of the Muslims. If you so wish, I will write to al-Mughīrah requesting a guaranteed safe-conduct for you, for you will find him quick to put things right and one who enjoys well-being.'"

I replied to him, "I know what will happen to them on that day.[199] Far from that, indeed we seek security with God on the Day of Resurrection through that which makes you fear us in the temporal world." At that, Simāk responded, "You miserable wretch, how can I be merciful to you?" Then he addressed his companions, "They abandoned [the right way] by what they did. Then they began to recite the Qur'ān to him, pretended to humble themselves, and pretended to weep. So he thought thereby that they had something of the truth. 'Indeed they are only like cattle, nay, rather they are straying from the way.'[200] By God! I never saw folk who were in more manifest error nor a more obvious calamity than those whom you see." I replied, "Say, I did not come to you to revile you, nor to hear your account or that of your companions. Tell me, you give me [43] your answer to what is in this letter; if not, I shall return to my master." At that, he looked at me. Then he said to his companions, "Aren't you astonished at this youth? By God, indeed, he seems greater to me than his father when he says to me 'Are you going to give me your answer to what is in this letter?' Off you go, my son, to your master, however, you may regret [it] if the cavalry should surround you all and the lances are aimed at your breasts. You may wish then you were in your mother's house."

I left him then, and crossed over to my companions. When I

199. That is, what will happen to non-Khārijites on the Day of Judgment.
200. Qur'ān 25:44.

approached my master,[201] he asked, "What did he reply to you?" I answered, "He did not reply positively. I said thus to him, and he said thus to me." I then told him the (whole) story. Al-Mustawrid then said, "It makes no difference to unbelievers whether you warn them or not. They will not believe. God has sealed their hearts and their hearing, and there is a veil concealing their sight. An awful punishment will be theirs."[202]

We stayed in that place of ours for two or three days. Then we realized that Ma'qil b. Qays was marching against us. Al-Mustawrid assembled us, and after praising and extolling God, he said, "Now then, indeed, this senile Ma'qil b. Qays has headed for us. He is one of the weak, lying Sabā'iyyah[203] and is an enemy of God and of you, so give me your advice." Some of us told him, "By God, we only went forth desiring God and to fight against [jihād] whomever attacks God. But they have come to us, so where should we go to escape from them? Let us stand our ground instead, so that God will decide between us and them, for He is the best of judges." Another group said, "Let us withdraw instead and turn aside. Let us summon the [44] people and protest against [our rulers] with supplication." He responded: "O assemblage of Muslims, by God, I did not go forth seeking the temporal world, nor its renown, glory or survival in it. I do not want any of it for myself, and that goes double for the things people compete for in it. I value such things less than the toe of my shoe. I went forth seeking only martyrdom, and that God would guide me to honor by humbling some of those who err. I have considered what I consulted you about. I do not think that I should wait for them to attack me, while they are exceedingly numerous, but I thought that I should move on until I go too far. For when they learn of that, they will go forth in search of me, and will thus become isolated and scattered. We should fight them in those circumstances. So let us go forth in the name of God, Almighty and Great."

---

201. C reads: "our companions."

202. Qur'ān 2:6–7.

203. The Sabā'iyyah were ostensibly named by their enemies after 'Abdallāh b. Saba', an extremist supporter of 'Alī. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Saba'.

At that, we went forth and proceeded along the bank of the Tigris until we reached Jarjarāyā. We then crossed the river and continued as if we were in the territory of Jūkha[204] until we reached Madhār,[205] where we remained. News of our location reached 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, so he asked al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah how he was doing with the army which he had sent against the Khārijites and how many of them there were. He was informed of their number, and was told that al-Mughīrah had considered a leading man of high standing who had fought against the Khārijites along with 'Alī, and had been among the latter's companions. He sent this man along with 'Alī's faction because of their hostility to the Khārijites. 'Abdallāh remarked, "He had the right idea." He then sent to Sharīk b. al-A'war al-Ḥārithī, who shared 'Alī's views, telling him, "Go forth against this renegade, and choose three thousand men[206] from the people. Then pursue them until you drive them out of the Baṣran [45] territory or kill them." He also told him privately, "Go forth against the enemies of God with those Baṣrans who consider killing them to be lawful." Sharīk supposed that 'Abdallāh meant 'Alī's faction by this, but that he disliked naming them. So he chose people, and urged the horsemen of the Rabī'ah who held Shī'ite views, and their leaders agreed. Then he went forth with them, heading for al-Mustawrid at al-Madhār.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥuṣayrah b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith—his father 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith: I was among those who went forth with Ma'qil b. Qays, and I accompanied him. By God, I did not leave him for an hour of the day from the time I left. The first place we stopped was Sūrā. We remained there for a day until most of his men joined him, then we left hurrying swiftly toward our enemy lest he elude us. After we dispatched a vanguard, we departed. Stopping at Kūthā, we spent a day until whoever lagged behind joined us. Then, after 204. Jūkhā was an administrative district east of the Tigris which included the region of the Diyala River and the Nahrawān Canal. See M. Morony, "Administrative geography," 18–21.

205. Al-Madhār was a town across the southeastern border of Jūkhā in the territory of al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 42–3.

206. C reads: "cavalry."

part of the night had passed, he marched us from Kūthā.

We advanced until we drew near al-Madā'in, where the people received us and informed us that the Khārijites had already left. By God, that grieved us; we were certain of trouble and a lengthy search. Ma'qil b. Qays advanced until he halted at the gate of the city of Bahurasīr, without entering it. Simāk b. 'Ubayd went out to him, greeted him, and ordered his servants (ghilmān) and mawālī to bring Ma'qil carrots (jazar),[207] barley, and fodder. They brought enough for him and the army which accompanied him. Ma'qil b. Qays stayed at al-Madā'in for three nights; then he assembled his men, saying, "These misguided renegades have left, going their own directions and hoping that [46] you will hurry after them. Thus you would be isolated and scattered, and you would only overtake them after you were tired and worn out. But nothing of that sort is going to happen to you unless the same happens to them."

Ma'qil then marched us out from al-Madā'in, and sent Abū al-Rawwāgh al-Shākirī ahead with three hundred horsemen. He followed after the Khārijites, while Ma'qil followed him. Abū al-Rawwāgh began to ask about them and to pursue the direction they had taken, until his force crossed over (at) Jarjarāyā in pursuit of them. They followed the direction which the Khārijites had taken and pursued them. He continued persistently until he caught up with them when they were staying at al-Madhār. When he approached them, he took counsel with his men whether or not they should encounter and fight them before Ma'qil's arrival. Some of them told him, "Attack them with us, so we may fight them." Others said, "By God, we don't think you should be in a hurry to fight them until our commander comes and we encounter them with our entire force."

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Tulayd b. Zayd b. Rāshid al-Fā'isī told me that his father was with Abū al-Rawwāgh that day. He said: Abū al-Rawwāgh told us, "When Ma'qil b. Qays sent me ahead of him, he, indeed, ordered me to follow them, and when I caught up with them not to be in a hurry to fight them until he joined me." All his men then answered him, "So matters are clear now. Draw us aside,[208] so we may be near them until our leader reaches us." He then had us draw aside—that was in the evening.

207. C reads: khubz, "bread."

We spent the entire night on guard until morning. At mid-[47] morning they came out against us. So we went out to meet them. There were three hundred of them and three hundred of us. When they advanced and assaulted us, by God, none of us withstood them. We were put to flight for a while, but then Abū al-Rawwāgh shouted to us, "O horsemen of evil, may God shame you the rest of today! Return! Return!" At that, he attacked, and we attacked with him. When we drew near the folk, he wheeled us about and we turned away, while they turned to attack us.[209] They got the better of us for a long time. We were on excellent trained horses; none of us was hit, and our wounds were slight. Abū al-Rawwāgh then told us, "May your mothers be bereaved of you! Let us turn away and wheel around close to them. Let us not separate from them until our commander arrives. For it would be more disgraceful for us to return to the army having been put to flight by our enemy, without having withstood them until the battle had become fierce and many of you had died fighting."

At that, one of our men answered him, "God will not be ashamed of the truth. By God, they routed us." Abū al-Rawwāgh responded, "May God not increase your kind among us! If we don't leave the battle, we won't be routed. As long as we are engaged in close combat with them and keep near them, we will be in good shape until the army arrives. That is, provided we do not turn back, by God, lest it be said, 'Abū Ḥumrān b. Bujayr al-Hamdānī was routed.' I would only care if it is said, 'Abū al-Rawwāgh was routed.' So stay close, and if they come to you, and you can't fight them, then withdraw. And if they attack you, and you are unable to fight them, stay a while, then withdraw to a safe place. When they return against you,

208. C adds: "but not leave our position."

209. The text reads: karrū 'alayna; C reads: kabarū, "they were too difficult for us."

engage them in close combat and keep near them, for the army will arrive in a while."

Whenever the Khārijites were charged, they began to withdraw, and took a defensive position. When they began to counterattack, and their group broke up, Abū al-Rawwāgh and his men pursued them on horseback. The Khārijites saw that they would not break off from them, having pursued them thus from the early morning until the first time of worship. When it was time for the noon worship, al-Mustawrid dismounted to worship, and Abū al-Rawwāgh and his men withdrew a mīl[210] or two away. His men dismounted and performed noon worship, while they appointed two men to stand guard. They held their position until they performed afternoon worship. [48]

A youth then brought them a dispatch from Ma'qil b. Qays to Abū al-Rawwāgh. The villagers and passers-by on the road would pass by them and see them fighting. Those who left them heading in the direction from which Ma'qil was coming, met Ma'qil and informed him about his men's encounter with the Khārijites. He would ask, "How do you think they are doing?" They would reply, "We think the Ḥarūriyyah are driving off your men." So he would inquire, "Do you think my men are engaged in close combat with them, and are fighting them?" They would answer, "Yes, they are engaged in close combat with them and are being routed." So he said, "If my opinion of Abū al-Rawwāgh was correct, he would never approach you having been routed." Then Ma'qil halted them, and sent for Muḥriz b. Shihāb b. Bujayr b. Sufyān b. Khālid b. Minqar al-Tamīmī, and said to him, "Stay behind with the weak people, then set out with them slowly until you reach me." Then he called out to the able-bodied, "Everyone who is able-bodied hurry along with me. Hasten to your brothers for they have encountered their enemy, and I hope that God will destroy the enemy before you reach them."

Ma'qil gathered some seven hundred able-bodied, stalwart men, people with excellent horses, and set out hurriedly. When 210. The mīl was four thousand standard dhirā', or two km. See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 63.

---

[49] he approached Abū al-Rawwāgh, the latter said, "This cavalry is covered with dust. Let us advance towards our enemy so that the army will reach us while we are near them. Thus they won't see that we withdraw from them or fear them." Abū al-Rawwāgh then advanced until he halted opposite al-Mustawrid and his companions, and Maʿqil joined them with his men. When he had drawn near them, the sun set, so he dismounted and worshipped with his men, and Abū al-Rawwāgh dismounted and worshipped with his men on the other side, while the Khārijites worshipped as well. Then Maʿqil b. Qays advanced with his men. When he came up to Abū al-Rawwāgh, he summoned him. When the latter came, Maʿqil told him, "Well done, Abū al-Rawwāgh. You have a reputation for steadfastness and persistence." He replied, "May God cause you to prosper. They are tough and disagreeable, so don't get close to them yourself, but send[211] someone to fight them in front of you. You, yourself, stay behind the people in support of them." At that, Maʿqil remarked, "What an excellent idea you have." By God, no sooner had he said it than they charged him and his men.[212] When they came upon Maʿqil, most of his men broke away from him in fear, but he stood firm, and dismounting, he shouted, "The ground! The ground! O people of Islām!" Abū al-Rawwāgh al-Shākirī and many of the horsemen and guards, some two hundred men, dismounted with him. When al-Mustawrid and his companions came upon them, they met them with lances and swords, Maʿqil's cavalry having broken away in panic temporarily. Then Miskīn b. ʿĀmir b. Unayf b. Shurayḥ b. ʿAmr b. ʿUdas, who was among the most courageous and bravest people that day, shouted to them saying, "O people of Islām! Where would you flee while your commander has dismounted? Aren't you ashamed? Indeed flight is disgraceful, dishonorable, and base." Then he returned to the attack and a [50] large troop of cavalry returned with him and assaulted the Khārijites. Meanwhile Maʿqil b. Qays fought the latter under his banner with those steadfast people who had dismounted with him. Together they assaulted the Khārijites until they forced them to the houses. Shortly thereafter Muḥriz b. Shihāb joined them with the people who had stayed behind. When they arrived, Ma'qil had them dismount. Then he formed them into a line, with a right and a left wing. He put Abū al-Rawwāgh in charge of the right wing and Muḥriz b. Bujayr b. Sufyān in charge of the left wing, while Miskīn b. 'Āmir was in charge of the cavalry. Then he told them, "Do not leave your battle lines until morning, and when morning comes, let us rise up against them and do battle with them." The people thus remained at their stations in their battle lines.

211. C reads: "select."
212. C adds: "and he stood firm."

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab —'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī: When Ma'qil b. Qays caught up with us, al-Mustawrid told us, "Don't leave Ma'qil alone so that he can marshal the cavalry and infantry against you. Assault them in earnest. Perhaps God will bring him down thereby." At that, we attacked them in earnest. They were defeated and scattered, and then broke in panic. However, Ma'qil leapt from his horse when he saw the flight of his men, and raised his banner, and some of his men dismounted with him. They fought for a long time, and they held their own against us. Then they summoned each other against us and pressed upon us from every side. So we retreated until we had the houses at our backs. We had fought them for a long time, but only a few of us were wounded and killed.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥuṣayrah b. 'Abdallāh—his father: 'Umayr b. Abī Ashā'ah al-Azdī was killed that day. He was a leader, and he was among those who dismounted with Ma'qil b. Qays. I was among those who dismounted with him. By God![213] I shall not forget the words of 'Umayr b. Abī Ashā'ah [51] while we were fighting together, and he was striking them boldly with his sword:

She knew that I—when they scattered
From me, and the base, the low [were] tormented and tarnished[214]—

213. C reads: "By Him Who has my soul in His hand."
214. The text reads: wuḍḍa'u; C reads: ruḍḍa'u, "ignoble.

[Am] a courageous man, more imposing, for whom fear[215] is insignificant.

He fought fiercely. I never saw anyone fight like him. He wounded many men and was killed. I only know that he killed one person whom he had seized by the neck. 'Umayr fell upon the man's chest and slaughtered him. While he was cutting off the man's head, one of their men attacked him and thrust his lance through the hollow of 'Umayr's throat. He fell down from the man's chest and lay dead on the ground. We assaulted them and drove them back to the village, before withdrawing to our battlefield. I then went to 'Umayr hoping that a spark of life was still in him, but he had expired. So I returned to my companions and remained with them.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab —'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī: We had stationed ourselves in the early part of the night when a man came to us whom we had dispatched at the beginning of the night. Some of those who passed by on the road had informed us that an army was approaching us from al-Baṣrah, but we had paid no attention. We said to a local man whom we employed, "Go and find out if an army has come against us from the direction of al-Baṣrah." He returned while we were waiting for the Kūfans, and told us, "Yes, Sharīk b. al-A'war has come to you. I met a squadron a [52] farsakh[216] (six km) away at the time of the first (morning) worship. I don't think they will camp where you are until tonight or early tomorrow morning." We were bewildered at his words. Al-Mustawrid then said to his companions, "What do you think?" We replied, "We think as you do." He said, "I don't think that I can resist all of them. Let us return in the direction from which we came. The Baṣrans will not pursue us into the territory of al-Kūfah. Only the people of our own city will pursue us then." We then asked him, "Why is that?" And he replied, "Fighting the people of one city is easier for us than fighting the people of both." We responded "Lead us wherever you like." He said, "Dismount so your animals may rest a while, and feed them; then pay attention to what I command you to do."

215. The text reads: raw'; C reads: hayj, "combat."

216. A farsakh was three mil or six km. See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 62.

At that, we dismounted and fed our animals. Then there was a respite for a while between us and the Kūfans. They had withdrawn from the village for fear that we would attack them at night. When we had rested our mounts and fed them, al-Mustawrid gave the order and we mounted our animals. Then he said, "Enter the village, then leave at the rear of it, taking a lout ['ilj] with you who will bring you out the back way. Then he will double back with you until he brings you back to the road by which you came. Leave [Ma'qil's men] where they are; they will not notice you for most of the night or until morning." Then we entered the village. After taking a lout, we left with him leading us, and said, "Take us around behind this line so that we may return to the road by which we came." He did so, bringing us back until we stood on the road by which we had come. Then we returned by that road and advanced until we halted at Jarjarāyā.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥuṣayrah b. 'Abdallāh—his father 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith: I was the first one who noticed their departure.[217] I said, "May God make you prosper. Dealing with this enemy has made me suspicious for a long while. They were stationed; we saw their shape. Then it disappeared [53] after a while. I fear that they are abandoning their position in order to deceive the people." At that, Ma'qil inquired, "What do you fear their strategem is?" I replied, "I fear that they will attack the people at night." When he answered, "By God, I do not feel safe from that," I told him to be prepared for it. He responded, "Stay as you are until I take a look. O 'Attāb, set out with whomever you like so that you may get close to the village, and observe whether you see any of them or hear word of them.[218] Ask the villagers about them." At that he went off with a fifth of the raiders galloping until he observed the village. He began to notice that no one spoke to him. When he shouted to the villagers, some of them came out to him. So he asked them about the Khārijites, and they replied, "They left, and we don't know how they went."

217. The text reads: dhahābihim; O reads: dahā'ihim, "their cunning."
218. Cairo reads: "hear a sound from them."

When ʿAttāb returned to Maʿqil and told him the news, Maʿqil said, "I don't feel safe from night attacks. Where are the Muḍar?" So the Muḍar came, and he said, "Stay here." Then he asked, "Where are the Rabīʿah?" He set the Rabīʿah, the Tamīm, and the Hamdān facing different directions, while the rest of the Yaman faced another direction. Each of those quarters faced a different direction while its back was near the back of the other quarter. Maʿqil made rounds among them until he had stopped at every quarter, saying, "O people, if they come to you, let the others know, and fight them. Don't abandon your position under any circumstances until you receive my order. None of you is to abandon his sector until morning. Then we shall see what we think." They remained on guard until morning, fearing a night attack by the Khārijites. When morning came, they dismounted and worshipped. People came and told them that the Khārijites had returned by the road on which they had come, going back to their starting point.

Sharīk b. al-Aʿwar arrived with an army of Baṣrans and dismounted where Maʿqil b. Qays was. He met Sharīk, and they questioned each other for a while. Then Maʿqil told Sharīk, "I am going to follow in their track until I overtake them. Per-[54] haps God will destroy them, but I am not certain that, if I fail to search for them, their [numbers] will not multiply." Sharīk then got up and assembled some of his outstanding men, including Khālid b. Maʿdān al-Ṭāʾī and Bayhas b. Ṣuhayb al-Jarmī. He proposed to them, "O men, would you like to go with our Kūfan brothers in search of this common enemy of ours until God annihilates them? Then we will return." At that, Khālid b. Maʿdān and Bayhas al-Jarmī replied, "No, by God! We won't do it. We approached them to drive them out from our territory, and to prevent them from entering it. God spare us their inconvenience! We are going back to our city. It is for the Kūfans to defend their own territory from these dogs." He responded, "Woe unto you! Obey me with regard to them, for they are evil folk. There are wages and favor with the regime[219] for you in fighting them." Bayhas al-Jarmī then told him, "By God! then we are as the brother of the Banū Kināʾāh[220] said:

219. C reads: "with God."

Like a wet-nurse for other's children who lets her own sons perish, so she doesn't patch her tatters thereby.

Haven't you heard that the Kurds have rebelled in the mountains of Fārs?" Sharīk replied, "I have heard that." Bayhas continued, "So you order us to go off with you to protect the territory of the Kūfans, to fight their enemy, and to abandon our land." Sharīk responded, "What are the Kurds? Indeed a squadron of you will be enough for them." At that, Bayhas retorted, "And a squadron of Kūfans will be sufficient for this enemy whom you appoint us to deal with. Upon my life! If they were obliged to help us, then we would have to help them, but they don't need us any more. There is strife in our territory similar to that in theirs. Let them take care of what is before them, and we must do likewise. Upon my life! If we obey you with regard [55] to pursuing them, and you pursue them, you will have made bold with your commander. You did what was proper. You should find out his opinion about what he permits you to do."

When he saw that, Sharīk said to his companions: "Go and depart." And he went himself to meet Maʿqil—both of them were sympathetic to Shīʿite views. Sharīk said, "Indeed, by God, I have tried to get those who are with me to follow me so that I can march with you against your enemy, but they prevailed over me." Maʿqil replied, "May God do as much for you. We don't need that. Indeed, by God, had they made an effort, I hope none of them[221] would have escaped to tell the tale."

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaqʿab b. Zuhayr—Abū Imāmah ʿUbaydallāh[222] b. Junādah—Sharīk b. al-Aʿwar: When he said, "By God, had they made an effort, I hope none of them would have escaped to tell the tale," by God, I detested it. I felt sorry for him, and considered[223] such talk[224] to be wrong. By 220. That is, Ibn Jadhl al-Ṭiʾān al-Kināni. See Jāḥiẓ, Hayawān, I, 197; Buḥturī, Hamāsah, 171; Marzūqī, Sharḥ Dīwān al-Hamāsah, 736.

221. That probably is, the Khārijites.

222. C reads: Abū Ramlah ʿAbdallāh.

223. The text reads: ḥasibtu; O reads: khashaytu, "I feared."

224. The text reads: shibh; C reads: sabab, "the reason for."

God, there were no unjust people among us.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥuṣayrah b. 'Abdallāh—his father, 'Abdallāh al-Ḥārith al-Azdī: We were happy when we learned that al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah and his companions had doubled back, saying, "Let's pursue them and confront them at al-Madā'in, and if they draw near to al-Kūfah it would be even more destructive for them. Ma'qil b. Qays then summoned Abū al-Rawwāgh, telling him, "Pursue him with the men who were with you [before] and pin him down for me until I catch up with you."[225] He said, "Give me more men than that, for it will make me stronger against the Khārijites if they want to fight with me before your arrival. We have had trouble with them." Ma'qil then increased his force by three hundred men. Abū al-Rawwāgh thus pursued the enemy with six hundred men.

The Khārijites advanced rapidly until they halted at Jarjarāyā. Abū al-Rawwāgh also advanced quickly on their heels until he caught up with them at Jarjarāyā where they had camped. He also camped there at sunrise. When they saw that it was Abū al-Rawwāgh with the vanguard, they told each other, "Fighting these will be easier than fighting whoever comes after them." They came out against us, sending ten and twenty of their horsemen at a time. We did likewise, and the two troops attacked each other for a while, being mingled together. When they saw that, the Khārijites united and assaulted us in earnest with a single charge. They drove us back until we left the field to them. Then Abū al-Rawwāgh called to his men saying, "O evil horsemen! O evil defenders! How miserably you fought the folk. To me! To me!" He then prevailed upon about one hundred horsemen and engaged the Khārijites in close combat, while saying:

Indeed the youth, every youth, who is not dismayed, when the coward turned away from the blow of the spear point,
She knew that I, when the injury alighted, would frighten, on the day of battle, a bold hero.

225. C reads: "follow you."

When he engaged with them, he fought them for a long time. Then his men engaged them from every side, fighting earnestly with them until they drove the enemy back to their former position. When al-Mustawrid and his companions saw that, they thought that if Ma'qil came to them at that time, he would certainly destroy them. So al-Mustawrid and his companions departed until they crossed the Tigris and entered the territory of [57] Bahurasīr. Abū al-Rawwāgh crossed after them and pursued them, and Ma'qil b. Qays arrived, following Abū al-Rawwāgh, and crossed the Tigris after him. Al-Mustawrid advanced towards al-Madīnah al-'Atīqah, but when Simāk b. 'Ubayd learned of that, he went out and crossed over to it. Then he brought out his men and the people of al-Madā'in. He lined them up at (the city) gate, and set archers on the wall. When the Khārijites learned of that, they went off until they halted at Sābāṭ.[226] Abū al-Rawwāgh also advanced in search of the folk until he passed Simāk b. 'Ubayd at al-Madā'in. When the latter informed him of the direction which they had taken, Abū al-Rawwāgh pursued them until he halted where they were at Sābāṭ.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥabīb —'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī: When Abū al-Rawwāgh halted where we were, al-Mustawrid summoned his companions, saying, "These men who have halted here with Abū al-Rawwāgh are the noble companions of Ma'qil. By God, he only sent his defenders and horsemen ahead against you. By God, if I knew that when I hurried to him, racing with these men of his,[227] I would take Ma'qil by surprise while they were still some way off,[228] I would do so. Let one of you go out, and ask about Ma'qil. Where is he and how far has he gotten?"

I went out myself and met some louts who came from the direction of al-Madā'in. I asked them, "What have you heard 226. Sābāt was a bridgehead on the Kūfan side of the Nahr al-Malik, near the point where that canal emptied into the Tigris, on the main road from al-Kūfah to al-Madā'in. See El-'Alī, "Madā'in," 435; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 569.

227. The text reads: bādartu aṣḥabahu hā'ulā'i ilayhi.

228. The text reads: yuqārifūhu bi-sā'atin; O and Cairo read: yufāriqūhu bi-sā'atin, "were still some distance [lit. "a while"] away from him." See text, p. [62].

about Ma'qil b. Qays?" They replied, "A messenger came to Simāk b. 'Ubayd from Ma'qil. Simāk had sent him to meet Ma'qil, and to see how far he had gotten and where he wished to halt. The messenger returned to Simāk and said 'I left him camping at Daylamāyā'"[229]—it is one of the villages of Bahurasīr on an inlet[230] of the Tigris which belonged to Qudāmah b. al-'Ajlān al-Azdī. I asked him, "How far is this place between [58] us and them?" They responded, "Three farsakhs [eighteen km] or thereabouts."

When I returned to my master and told him the news, he said to his companions, "Ride!" So they did, and al-Mustawrid advanced until he brought them to the Sābāṭ Bridge. This was the bridge over the Nahr al-Malik.[231] He was on the side of the bridge leading toward al-Kūfah, while Abū al-Rawwāgh and his men were on the side leading toward al-Mada'in. We advanced until we stopped at the bridge. Then al-Mustawrid told us, "Let a detachment of you halt." So when about fifty of us halted, he said, "Cut this bridge." So we dismounted and cut it. When Abū al-Rawwāgh's men saw us stopping on horseback, they thought that we wanted to cross over to them. They lined up opposite us and marshalled themselves thereby distracting us from our cutting of the bridge.

We then took a guide from the people of Sābāṭ and told him, "Lead us to Daylamāyā." So he led us, moving quickly, and off we went with our horses taking us swiftly[232] at the amble and the gallop. Shortly afterwards we looked down upon Ma'qil and his men while they were getting underway. When he saw us his men had already separated from him and his vanguard and men were not with him. One squadron of them had been summoned and another squadron had withdrawn. They were taken by surprise. Upon seeing us, Ma'qil set up his standard and dismounted, calling out, "O servants of God! The ground! The 229. C reads: Dīlmayāthā.

230. The text reads: jānit; Cairo reads: jānib, "beside."

231. The Nahr al-Malik was a canal linking the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers, west of al-Madā'in. See Le Strange, Lands, 68.

232. The text reads: talma'u binā, lit. "flashing us"; C reads: ḥatta balagha binā, "until our horses brought us."

ground!" At that, about two hundred men dismounted with him.

When we began to attack them, they met us with the tips of their lances, while kneeling on their knees, and we could not overpower them. Al-Mustawrid then said to us, "Leave these alone since they have dismounted, and attack their horses so that you may come between them and their horses. If you strike their horses, they will be [like] slaughter-camels for you after a while." So we attacked their horses, separating them [59] from the men and cutting their reins. They had tied the horses together, but they now went off in all directions. Then we turned against the people, who were withdrawing[233] and advancing.[234] We attacked them so that we divided them up. Then we advanced toward Ma'qil b. Qays and his men, who were still on their knees. We attacked them, but they did not budge. We attacked them again, but they still did not budge.[235]

At that, al-Mustawrid told us, "Fight them at close quarters. Half of you take the field against them." Half of us dismounted and the rest remained on horseback with him. I was among those on horseback. By God, we wanted to get at them. By God, we fought them, and we believed we had overwhelmed them when the vanguard[236] of Abū al-Rawwāgh's men, who were his noble companions and horsemen, burst upon us. Upon drawing near, they charged us, and at that we all dismounted, and fought them until our master and theirs were both hit. I don't believe there was anyone who escaped from them on that day except me. By God, I believe I was the youngest man there.

[According to] Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥabīb—'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī: My informant related this account to me on two occasions, once during the governorship of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr[237] at Bājumayrā, and once while we were

233. The text reads: mutazaḥḥilīn; C reads: mutarajjalīn, "going on foot."
234. The text reads: mutaqaddamīn; C reads: munfariqīn, "separating."
235. C reads: "They did not budge, so we attacked them, but they were steadfast. Then we attacked them again, but they were steadfast."
236. O reads: "reinforcements from their vanguard."
237. Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr was governor of al-Baṣrah, 67–72[686–91].

with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath[238] at Dayr al-Jamājim.[239] He said, "By God, he was killed that day at Dayr al-[60] Jamājim, the day of the rout, while I saw him coming against the enemy, striking them with his sword." I said to him at Dayr al-Jamājim, "You related this account to me at Bājumayrā with Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr, but I did not ask you how you [alone] escaped among your companions." He replied, "I tell you, by God, when our master was killed, all except five or six of his men were killed."

He continued: We assaulted a group of about twenty men of the enemy until they gave way. I reached a horse standing with its saddle and bridle on it. I did not know what the story was with its master, whether he had been killed, or had dismounted to fight and left it. I went up to it and, taking its bridle, I put my foot in the stirrup and seated myself firmly upon it. By God, Ma'qil's men assaulted me, and reached me, but when I touched the side of the horse, by God, it was better than serviceable. Some of them[240] galloped after me, but they did not keep up with me. I then proceeded, galloping the horse, and that was in the evening. When I knew that I had discouraged them, and felt safe, I began to ride (at a) trot. I continued at that pace, and when I met a lout, I told him, "Lead me quickly to where I can leave the main road, the Kūfah Road." He did so, and, by God, shortly afterwards I reached Kūthā. I went on until I came to a wide part of the river. I plunged the horse into it and crossed it. Then I rode onward. When I came to Dayr Ka'b, I halted. I hobbled my horse and let him rest, and took a nap myself. Then I awoke quickly and mounted upon the horse. Thus I traveled for part of the night, (rested), and spent the rest of the night travelling. I worshipped in the early morning at al-

238. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī was to lead a major revolt against al-Ḥajjāj, 80–82(699–701) or 83(703) See *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath.

239. Dayr al-Jamājim, the "monastery of the skulls", was the place near al-Kūfah where al-Ḥajjāj defeated Ibn al-Ash'ath for the first time in Sha'bān 82 (September 701). See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 652; and *EI*² s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath.

240. C reads: "a group of them."

Muzāḥimiyyah, two farsakhs (twelve km) distant from Qubbayn.[241]

I then proceeded until I entered al-Kūfah in broad daylight. After a while I came to Sharīk b. Namlah al-Muḥāribī, and I informed him about myself and about his companions. I also asked him to meet al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah and get a guarantee of safe-conduct from him for me. He told me, "You will obtain the guarantee of safe-conduct, God willing, and you have come with good news." By God, I spent the night grieved by the affairs of the people. Sharīk b. Namlah al-Muḥāribī went quickly until he came to al-Mughīrah, asked his permission (to enter), and was admitted. Sharīk said, "I have good news and a request, so grant my request and then I shall announce my good news to you." Al-Mughīrah replied, "Your request is granted, so give your good news." Sharīk continued, "Grant a guarantee of safe-conduct to 'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī, for he was with the folk." He answered, "I grant him a guarantee of safe-conduct. By God, I wish that you would bring me all of them so that I could grant them a guarantee of safe-conduct." Sharīk said, "I announce that all of the folk have been killed. My friend was with the folk, and according to what he told me, none of them but he escaped." Al-Mughīrah asked, "So how did Ma'qil b. Qays do?" Sharīk replied, "May God cause you to prosper, he doesn't know anything about our companions." [61]

Before he had finished his speech, Abū al-Rawwāgh and Miskīn b. 'Āmir b. Unayf arrived bringing good news of the victory. They related that Ma'qil b. Qays and al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah each sent against his opponent, a lance in al-Mustawrid's hand and a sword in Ma'qil's hand. Thus they encountered each other, and when al-Mustawrid thrust his lance at Ma'qil's breast so that the spearhead went out his back, Ma'qil struck him with the sword on his head so that it sank into the midst of his brain. Thus they both fell dead.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥuṣayrah b. 'Abdallāh—his father: When al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah saw us halting at Sābāṭ where he was, he approached the bridge and cut it. We were thinking that he wanted to cross to us. We went up from the dark cultivated land of Sābāṭ to the desert that was between al-

241. Qubbayn was a village just across the bridge of Sūrā. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 35.

[62] Madā'in and Sābāṭ. We were arrayed and deployed. But we waited a long time without seeing them coming out to us. Abū al-Rawwāgh then said, "Indeed they are up to something. Is there someone who will inform us about them?" At that, I said, "I and Wuhayb b. Abū Ashā' al-Azdī will inform you about that and bring you news about them." When both of us went close to the bridge on our horses and found it severed, we supposed that the folk had only cut it out of fear of us and out of alarm at us. We then returned galloping quickly until we reached our master and informed him about what we saw. Abū al-Rawwāgh asked, "What do you suppose?" We replied, "They only cut the bridge in fear of us and out of alarm at us which God put in their hearts." He remarked, "By my life! The folk did not rebel[242] desiring flight, but they have deceived you. Do you hear? By God, I certainly think they said that Ma'qil sent Abū Rawwāgh against you only with his noble companions. If you could leave the latter where they are and make a forced march[243] toward Ma'qil and his men, you may find them peacefully unguarded when you come upon them. Thus they cut the bridge in order to divert you from catching up with them until they come upon your commander by surprise. To the rescue! Rescue lies in searching." We took it to heart that it was as he had said. We shouted to the people of the village, and when they came quickly, we told them, "Tie the bridge quickly." We urged them on, and in a short while they were finished with it. Then we crossed over it and pursued (the enemy) quickly without caring about anything else. We kept after them, and, by God, we did not cease to ask about them. We were told, "So far they have been ahead of you."

By God, we did not cease to seek them fervently, desiring to [63] catch up with them, until the first person who fled from them met us. Ma'qil's men had been routed without one person caring about another. When Abū al-Rawwāgh met them, he shouted to the people, "To me! To me!" The people came to him and took refuge with him. He then said, "Woe unto you! Why are you coming?" They replied, "We don't know. We were certainly surprised. The folk were with us among our army while we were separated from each other. For they assaulted us and split us up." Abū al-Rawwāgh asked, "What did the commander do?" Someone told him, "He dismounted and was fighting." Someone else said, "I certainly saw him killed." Abū al-Rawwāgh told them, "O People! Return with me. If we reach our commander alive, we shall fight along with him. And if we find that he has perished, we shall fight them. For we are horsemen of the people of the city selected for this enemy. Let neither the opinion of your commander, nor those of the people of the city about you be spoiled[244] there. I swear by God, if you should see the Khārijites after they had killed Ma'qil, it would not be proper for you to disengage from them until you take revenge on them or perish. Set out with God's blessing." He then set out and we did likewise. He began to shout to each person he met, bringing him back. He summoned his outstanding men, saying, "Strike the faces of the people and turn them back."

242. O reads: "gather."
243. C reads: "begin to march."

We advanced turning the people back until we reached the army. Suddenly we were where the standard of Ma'qil b. Qays was set up. Two hundred or more cavalrymen of the people were with him while their outstanding men were only with them on foot. They were fighting the fiercest battle that people ever heard of. When we burst upon them, suddenly we were among the Khārijites who had almost overwhelmed our companions, while the latter, holding out against that, were fighting them. When they saw us, they returned to the attack, and then assaulted the Khārijites. The Khārijites withdrew a short [64] distance from them, and we reached our companions.

Abū al-Rawwāgh looked at Ma'qil, and saw that he was summoning, encouraging, and inciting his men. He asked Ma'qil, "Are you alive? May all my uncles be your ransom." He replied that he was and then assaulted the folk. At that, Abū al-Rawwāgh called out to his men, "Don't you see your commander is alive? Assault the folk!" He attacked and we attacked the folk all together. We delivered a jolting shock to their cavalry, while Maʿqil and his men assaulted them.

244. The text reads: yafsudanna; O reads: yuqbalna, "be disapproved."

At that, al-Mustawrid dismounted and shouted to his companions, "O band of Sellers! The ground! The ground! By God, besides Whom there is no god save He, Paradise belongs to whomever is killed with the genuine intention of jihād against these oppressors and their expression of enmity." They all dismounted then, and we did likewise. We then advanced against al-Mustawrid with unsheathed swords and clashed with them[245] for much of the day. It was as violent as any battle the people had ever fought. However al-Mustawrid called out to Maʿqil, saying, "O Maʿqil, show yourself to me!" So Maʿqil went out to him, and we said to Maʿqil, "We implore you not to go out against this dog of whose soul God has despaired." He replied, "No, by God, no man ever challenged me to a duel that I shrank from." So he marched against him with a sword while the other went out against him with a lance. We shouted to Maʿqil to meet his opponent with a lance like his but he refused. Al-Mustawrid approached him and transfixed him so that the spearhead went out his back, while Maʿqil struck him with his sword so that it sank into the midst of his (opponent's) brain. Al-Mustawrid fell down dead, and Maʿqil was killed.

Maʿqil had said to us when he showed himself to al-Mustawrid, "If I perish, your commander is to be ʿAmr b. Muḥriz b. Shihāb al-Saʿdī, then al-Minqarī"[246] So when Maʿqil perished, ʿAmr b. Muḥriz took the standard, and said, "If I am killed, Abū al-Rawwāgh is to be in charge of you, and if Abū al-Rawwāgh is killed, your commander is to be Miskīn b. ʿĀmir b.
[65] Unayf," who at that time was a raw youth. Then he charged with his standard and ordered the people to assault the enemy. Before long they had killed the Khārijites.

The events of this year included the appointment of ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim b. Ẓabyān as governor of Khurāsān by ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir, and the departure of Qays b. al-Haytham from that post. According to what Abū Mikhnaf reported from Muqātil b.

245. That is, with the swords.
246. That is, belonging to the Minqarī subdivision of the Banū Saʿd.

Ḥayyān, the cause of that was that Ibn ʿĀmir wanted to dismiss Qays b. al-Haytham because he considered him to be slow in (delivering) the tax revenues. Ibn Khāzim told him, "Appoint me governor of Khurāsān, and I will satisfy you with regard to it and with regard to Qays b. al-Haytham." Qays learned that Ibn ʿĀmir disapproved of him because of his contempt for him and his suspension of gifts, and that he had appointed Ibn Khāzim governor. When he feared that Ibn Khāzim would make trouble for him and go over his accounts, he abandoned Khurāsān and approached (Ibn ʿĀmir at al-Baṣrah). As a result, Ibn ʿĀmir's anger at him increased, and he said, "You abandoned the frontier region." He beat and imprisoned Qays and sent a man belonging to the Banū Yashkur to be in charge of Khurāsān. (According to) Abū Mikhnaf: Ibn ʿĀmir sent Aslam b. Zurʿah al-Kilābī when he dismissed Qays b. Al-Haytham.

(According to) ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Thaqafī—his shaykhs: Ibn ʿĀmir put Qays b. al-Haytham in charge of Khurāsān during the rule of Muʿāwiyah. Ibn Khāzim told Ibn ʿĀmir, "You sent a weak man to Khurāsān. I fear that if he encounters war that he will be put to flight with the people. You would thus destroy Khurāsān, and your uncles[247] would be dishonored." Ibn ʿĀmir asked, "What would you suggest?" He replied, "Write a pledge for me that if Qays abandons your enemy I will take his place." Ibn ʿĀmir wrote that for him. When a group from Ṭukhāristān[248] rose up, Qays b. al- [66]
Haytham sought advice, and Ibn Khāzim advised him to draw back (his forces) until his outposts joined him. Thereupon, he drew back. When he had marched one or two days' journey from his position, Ibn Khāzim made his pledge public, took over the affairs of the people, encountered the enemy, and put them to flight. The news reached the two cities[249] and Syria. At that, the Qaysiyyah[250] became angry, saying, "Ibn Khāzim deceived Qays and Ibn ʿĀmir." Their anger increased until they complained to Muʿāwiyah. When the latter sent for Ibn Khā-

247. That is, Ibn ʿĀmir's family.

248. Ṭukhāristān is the region to the south of the upper Oxus River. See Le Strange, lands, 426–7.

249. That is, al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah.

250. That is, the faction of Qays b. Haytham.

zim, he came and apologized for what was said about him. Mu'āwiyah told him, "Stand up and apologize to the people tomorrow." Ibn Khāzim returned to his companions and said, "Indeed, I was put in charage of the sermon (khuṭbah), but I am not a master of speech. So sit around the pulpit (minbar), and when I speak, show your approval." He then stood up on the morrow and after praising and extolling God, he spoke, "Indeed, a leader of worship (imām) must either deliver the sermon, finding no escape from it, or he stupidly pours [it] out from his head heedless of what goes forth from him. I am neither kind. Whoever is acquainted with me knows that I am aware of opportunities, leaping at them, stopping at dangers, penetrating with the raiding party, and distributing with equality. I implore you, by God, whoever has known that about me, say that I am right." His companions around the pulpit responded, "You are right." He then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, indeed, you are among those I implored. Say what you know." Mu'āwiyah replied, "You are right."

(According to) 'Alī—a shaykh of the Banū Tamīm called Mu'ammar—some knowledgeable people: Qays b. al-Haytham came to Ibn 'Āmir from Khurāsān unwillingly because of Ibn Khāzim. So Ibn 'Āmir beat him one hundred (times), shaved him, and imprisoned him. When his mother interceded for him, he released him.

[67] According to what is said, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the people in the pilgrimage this year, while he was in charge of al-Madīnah. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām was in charge of Mecca and al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was in charge of al-Kūfah, while Shurayḥ was in charge of rendering judgment. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir was in charge of al-Baṣrah, Fārs, Sijistān, and Khurāsān, while 'Umayr b. Yathribī was in charge of rendering judgment there.[251]

---

251. Most probably at al-Baṣrah. C reads: quḍā'i Baṣratan, "rendering judgment at al-Baṣrah."

The Events of the Year

44

(April 4, 664–March 24, 665)

Among the events that occured during this year was the invasion of Byzantine territory by the Muslims led by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Walīd, their winter campaign there, and Busr b. Abī Arṭāt's raid at sea.

In this year Mu'āwiyah also dismissed 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir (as governor) of al-Baṣrah. The reason for this was that Ibn 'Āmir was easy-going and generous and would not restrain the impudent. Al-Baṣrah was ruined because of that while he was governor there for Mu'āwiyah. (According to) 'Umar b. Shabbah —Yazīd al-Bāhilī: Ibn 'Āmir complained to Ziyād about the corruption of the people and the manifestation of evildoing. When Ziyād advised, "Unleash the sword among them," Ibn 'Āmir responded, "Indeed, I hate to reform them by my own corruption."

(According to) 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan: Ibn 'Āmir was gentle and easy-going, governing smoothly; he would not punish (anyone) during his regime, nor cut off (the hand of) a thief. When he was spoken to about that, he replied, "I am on intimate terms with the people. How can I look at a man whose father's or brother's hand I have cut off?"

(According to) 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muhārib: Ibn al-Kawwā'—Ibn al-Kawwā''s name was 'Abdallāh b. Awfah[252]—visited Mu'āwiyah. When the latter asked him about the peo-
[68] ple Ibn al-Kawwā' said, "As far as the people of al-Baṣrah are concerned, the impudent among them have prevailed over them while their governor is weak." When Ibn 'Āmir learned what Ibn al-Kawwā' had said, he appointed Ṭufayl b. 'Awf al-Yashkurī governor of Khurāsān. At that time there was a mutual estrangement between him and Ibn al-Kawwā'. At that Ibn al-Kawwā' remarked, "Indeed, this Ibn Dajājah[253] doesn't know me very well. Did he think that the governorship of Ṭufayl over Khurāsān would displease me? I would like for every Yashkurī remaining on earth to be hostile to me as long as he appointed them as governors." Mu'āwiyah then dismissed Ibn 'Āmir and sent al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh al-Azdī.

(According to) al-Qaḥdhamī: Ibn 'Āmir asked, "Who among the people is the worst enemy of Ibn al-Kawwā'?" When he was told that it was 'Abdallāh b. Abī Shaykh, Ibn 'Āmir appointed him governor of Khurāsān, and Ibn al-Kawwā' said what he did.

(According to) 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan—a shaykh of the Thaqīf and Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Iṣbahānī: Ibn 'Āmir sent a delegation to Mu'āwiyah, so they were there at the same time as a delegation of Kūfans, among whom was Ibn al-Kawwā' al-Yashkurī. When Mu'āwiyah asked them about Iraq and especially about al-Baṣrah, Ibn al-Kawwā' told him, "O Commander of the Faithful, indeed, impudent persons have devoured the people of al-Baṣrah while their government was too weak to deal with them, and it has paralyzed and weakened Ibn 'Āmir." At that Mu'āwiyah told him, "You talk about the Baṣrans while they are present." When the delegation returned to al-Baṣrah, and informed Ibn 'Āmir of that, he was angry and asked, "Who among the people of Iraq[254] is the worst enemy of Ibn al-Kawwā'?" When he was told that it was 'Abdallāh b. Abī Shaykh al-Yashkurī, Ibn 'Āmir appointed him governor of Khurāsān. When Ibn al-Kawwā' heard about it, he said what he did.

---

252. Cairo reads: Abū Awfāh.

253. Ibn 'Āmir's mother was Dajājah bt. Asmā' b. al-Ṣalt Sulamī. See Ibn al-\thīr, Usd, III, 191.

254. O reads: "of the Arabs."

(According to) 'Umar—'Alī: When Ibn 'Āmir was too weak for his job, and the (disruptive) conditions spread in al-Baṣrah, Mu'āwiyah wrote to him, asking him to visit. 'Umar (said): Abū al-Ḥasan told me that that was in this year, and that Ibn [69]
'Āmir appointed Qays b. al-Haytham as his deputy over al-Baṣrah. He came to Mu'āwiyah, and the latter returned him to the (same) position. When Ibn 'Āmir took leave of him, Mu'āwiyah told him, "Indeed I would ask three things from you, so say 'they are yours.'" He replied, "They are yours as I am Ibn Umm Ḥakīm." Mu'āwiyah said, "Return my position to me and don't be angry." Ibn 'Āmir replied, "I have done so." Mu'āwiyah said, "Give me your property at Arafat." Ibn 'Āmir responded as before. Mu'āwiyah said, "Give me your houses at Mecca." Ibn 'Āmir answered the same way. Mu'āwiyah remarked, "You were attached by kinship." Ibn 'Āmir then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I ask three things from you, so say 'they are yours.'" Mu'āwiyah replied, "They are yours as I am Ibn Hind." Ibn 'Āmir said, "Return my property at Arafat to me." Mu'āwiyah replied, "I have done so." Ibn 'Āmir said, "Don't investigate anyone who was an official of mine when I was governor and don't investigate me." Mu'āwiyah answered as before. Ibn 'Āmir said, "Marry me to your daughter, Hind." Mu'āwiyah replied the same way. It is also said that Mu'āwiyah told him, "Choose whether I should investigate you and ask you for an accounting of what you got and return you to your position, or whether I should allow you to keep what you got and dismiss you." So Ibn 'Āmir chose to be allowed to keep what he got and be dismissed.

In this year Mu'āwiyah also attached the lineage of Ziyād b. Sumayyah to his own father, Abū Sufyān, as it is said. (According to) 'Umar b. Shabbah: They claimed that a man belonging to the 'Abd al-Qays accompanied Ziyād when he visited Mu'āwiyah. The man said to Ziyād, "Indeed, I have influence with Ibn 'Āmir, and if you permit me I would go to him. Ziyād replied, "On condition that you report to me what happens between you and him." When the man agreed to do so, Ziyād gave his permission, and the man went to Ibn 'Āmir who told him, "Hey! Hey! Ibn Sumayyah investigates me and exposes my officials. Indeed, it grieved me to bring witnesses from Qu-raysh swearing that Abū Sufyān never saw Sumayyah." When the man returned, Ziyād questioned him, but he refused to in-[70] form him. Ziyād didn't leave him alone until the man informed him.

Ziyād then told Muʿāwiyah about it, who instructed his chamberlain (ḥājib), "When Ibn ʿĀmir comes, turn the face of his mount away from the most distant gates." When the chamberlain did so, Ibn ʿĀmir came to Yazīd and complained to him about it. Yazīd asked him, "Did you mention Ziyād?" Ibn ʿĀmir replied that he had, whereupon Yazīd rode with him so that he had him enter. But when Muʿāwiyah noticed him, he got up and went inside. Yazīd told Ibn ʿĀmir, "Sit here, you might stay a long time at home away from his audience." After a long time, Muʿāwiyah came out with a stick in his hand with which he struck the gates while he was quoting:

We have a reputation and you have one too, which the companions have known.

Then he sat down and said, "O Ibn ʿĀmir, you were saying what you were about Ziyād. Indeed, by God, the Arabs knew that I was more noble than they during the Jāhiliyyah[255] and that Islām only increased my nobility, and that I was not increased from insignificance by Ziyād and did not become noble from baseness through him. But I understood his right, so I set him in his place." Ibn ʿĀmir replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, we will do what Ziyād likes." Muʿāwiyah responded, "Then we will do what you like." Ibn ʿĀmir then went off to Ziyād and tried to appease him.

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣāliḥ—ʿAmr b. Hāshim—ʿUmar b. Bashīr[256] al-Hamdānī—Abū Isḥāq: When Ziyād came to al-Kūfah, he said, "I have come to you about a matter for which I sought only you." They replied, "Call upon us for whatever you wish." Ziyād said, "Attach my lineage to Muʿāwiyah." They replied, "As far as false testimony is concerned, no." He then came to al-Baṣrah and someone testified for him.

---

255. The Jāhiliyyah was the time of lawless ignorance before Islam. See *EI*², s.v. Djāhiliyya.

256. C reads: Bishr.

Mu'āwiyah led the people in the pilgrimage this year.

In this year Marwān made the maqṣūrah,[257] and Mu'āwiyah also made one in Syria according to what was reported.

The officials in the provincial capitals during this year were the same officials whom we mentioned for the previous year. [71]

257. A maqṣūrah was a protective lodge in the mosque for the ruler or governor during public worship.

The Events of the Year

45

(March 24, 665–March 13, 666)

Among these events was Mu'āwiyah's appointment of al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh al-Azdī as governor over al-Baṣrah. I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Mu'āwiyah dismissed Ibn 'Āmir and made al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh al-Azdī governor of al-Baṣrah at the beginning of this year. Al-Ḥārith stayed at al-Baṣrah four months, then Mu'āwiyah dismissed him. He was said to be al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr and Ibn 'Abd and Ibn 'Amr,[258] and he was a Syrian. Mu'āwiyah had dismissed Ibn 'Āmir in order to make Ziyād governor, so he made al-Ḥārith governor as the stalking horse. Al-Ḥārith put 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. Ghaylān al-Thaqafī in charge of his police. Then Mu'āwiyah dismissed al-Ḥārith and put Ziyād in charge of al-Baṣrah.

Ziyād's Governorship over al-Baṣrah[259]

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—some knowledgeable people: When Ziyād came to al-Kūfah, al-Mughīrah supposed that he came as governor over al-Kūfah. Ziyād stayed in the house of Salmān b.

258. Cairo reads: Ibn 'Abd 'Amr.

259. C reads: "In this year Mu'āwiyah dismissed al-Ḥārith from al-Baṣrah and made Ziyād governor."

Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī, and al-Mughīrah sent Wā'il b. Ḥujr al-Ḥaḍramī, Abu Hunaydah to him, saying, "Inform me about him." Wā'il came to Ziyād, but wasn't able to get anything out of him, so he left for al-Mughīrah. He was superstitious, and when he saw a crow cawing, he returned to Ziyād, saying, "O Abū al-Mughīrah, this crow urges you to depart from al-Kūfah." Then he returned to al-Mughīrah, and Mu'āwiyah's [72] messenger came to Ziyād that very day (saying), "Go to al-Baṣrah."

As for 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī, he told me—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Isḥāq, that is, Ibn Yaḥyā—Ma'bad b. Khālid al-Jadalī: Ziyād who is called Ibn Abī Sufyān came to us from Mu'āwiyah. He stayed at the house of Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī, waiting for Mu'āwiyah's instructions. When al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was governor over al-Kūfah, he heard that Ziyād expected that his own appointment as governor over al-Kūfah would arrive. So al-Mughīrah summoned Qaṭan b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥārithī, and asked, "Would you be good enough to take care of al-Kūfah for me until I come back to you from the Commander of the Faithful?" He replied, "I am not the one for that." Al-Mughīrah then summoned 'Uyaynah[260] b. al-Nahhās al-'Ijlī, and asked him. When he agreed, al-Mughīrah went to Mu'āwiyah. Upon arriving, he asked Mu'āwiyah to dismiss him and grant him settlements at Qarqīsiyā[261] between both "backs" of the Qays.[262] When Mu'āwiyah heard that, he feared he might revolt and replied, "By God, indeed, you shall certainly return to your office, O Abū 'Abdallāh." When Mu'āwiyah refused him, al-Mughīrah's suspicion only increased. Mu'āwiyah returned him to his office, and he reached us at night while I was on top of the citadel, guarding it. He struck the gate, but we refused to acknowledge him. When he feared that we might drop bricks on him, he told us his name. So I went down to him, welcoming and greeting him, and he quoted:

260. Cairo reads: 'Utaybah.

261. Qarqīsiyā was a town on the left bank of the Euphrates just above its confluence with the Khābūr River. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳarḳīsiyā.

262. The tribe of Qays 'Aylān had occupied the territory around Qarqīsiyā after the Muslim conquest. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳays 'Aylān.

Be startled, O Umm 'Amr, by the likes of me, whenever a distant journey is imposed on him.[263]

"Go to Ibn Sumayyah and make him leave, so that he is beyond [73] the bridge by morning." So we went off[264] and brought Ziyād and took him out until we had removed him beyond the bridge before morning came.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah and al-Hudhalī and others: Mu'āwiyah appointed Ziyād governor over al-Baṣrah, Khurāsān, and Sijistān. Then he included al-Hind, al-Baḥrayn, and 'Umān in his (territory). Ziyād arrived at al-Baṣrah at the end of Rabī' II or on the first of Jumādā I 45 (July 20, 665). There was open depravity in al-Baṣrah, so he delivered a "free" (al-batrā') speech (khuṭbah) in which he did not praise God. It was also said that he praised God, saying:

Praise be to God for His virtues and His goodness, and we ask Him for the utmost of His blessings. O God, since You have provided us with blessings, inspire us with gratitude for your blessing upon us.[265] Now then, indeed, the terrible things that the impudent among you commit and in which the wise among you are implicated are extreme ignorance, blind error, and the immorality for the perpetrators of which the eternal fire kindles its blazing flame. The young grow up in them, and the old do not abstain from them, as if you did not hear God's signs[266] nor recited the Book of God, nor heard of the generous reward which God reck-

263. In Ṭarafah, Dīwān, 154, this line reads:

So know, O Umm 'Amr, that the likes of me, whenever a distant journey is imposed on him. . .

264. O reads: "I went off."

265. Other versions of this khuṭbah are quoted with minor differences by Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 56–8, according to Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī; by Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn, II, 241–3, according to al-Haytham b. 'Adī; by Ibn A 'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, IV, 177–80; by Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, IV, 110–12, according to Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī from Maslamah b. Muḥārib from Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī; and by Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, Sharḥ Nahj al-balāghah, XVI, 200–3, according to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī. There is a partial English translation by I. Lichtenstadter in "From Particularism to Unity," 268; and a complete translation of the version in Jāḥiẓ by K. A. Fariq in "Ziyād Ibn Abih," 2–4.

266. Āy are signs, miracles or tokens, also used of the verses of the Qur'ān.

oned for people who obey Him, and the painful punishment for unending eternity for people who disobey Him. Are you like someone whose eyes have been dazzled by the world, and whose ears have been closed by desires, and who has preferred the transitory over the permanent? Don't you recall that you have inaugurated misdeeds in Islām that you did not do before, including your abandonment[267] of these established brothels, and the weak women snatched in broad daylight, whose number is not few? Are there not censors among you to restrain the seducers from prowling at night and attacking by day? You have advanced kinship and kept religion away. You excuse yourselves inexcusably, and you condone the thief. Every man [74] among you defends on behalf of his fool an act of one who does not fear punishment,[268] and does not expect the return [to God]. You are not wise, while you follow the foolish and what you regard as shielding them continues, so that they violate the inviolable of Islām.[269] Then they duck behind you as coverts in suspicious hiding places. Food and drink be forbidden to me until I level them to the ground by destruction and burning. Indeed, I think that the end of this business will only be reformed by what was right at first: flexibility[270] without weakness and strength without compulsion and violence.[271] Indeed, I swear by God that unless you straighten yourselves out for me, I shall certainly take the guardian for the ward,[272] the one who stays for the one who leaves, the one who approaches for the one who turns away,[273] the healthy for the sick, until anyone among you who meets his brother shall say, "Save yourself

---

267. Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 57, inserts: "of the weak to be oppressed and his wealth to be taken."

268. The text reads: 'iqāban; C reads: 'āqībatahu, "its consequences."

269. The text reads: ḥuram al-Islāmī; O reads: ḥurrat al-Muslimīn, "a free woman of the Muslims."

270. The text reads: līnin; O reads: kays, "intelligence."

271. The text reads: jabariyyatⁱⁿ wa 'anfⁱⁿ; C reads: jabarūtiyyati 'anfⁱⁿ, "tyranny of violence."

272. The text reads: al-walī; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, IV, 111 reads: al-mawlā, "the client."

273. Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 58, adds: "the obedient for the disobedient."

Sa'd, for Sa'īd has perished!" Indeed, lies from the pulpit[274] remain well-known, so if you catch me in a lie it is permissible for you to disobey me.[275] Whoever among you is burglarized, I will be guarantor for whatever of his was stolen. Beware of night-prowling too, for no prowler will be brought to me but I shall shed his blood. I will postpone this for you for as long as it takes for the news to reach al-Kūfah and return to me.[276] Beware also of the summoning of the Jāhiliyyah,[277] for I shall cut out the tongue of anyone I find appealing to it. You have also invented misdeeds which did not exist [before], and we have invented a punishment for every crime. Whoever drowns folk, I shall drown; whoever burns folk, we shall burn; whoever breaks into a house, I shall break into his heart; and whoever digs [75] up a grave, I shall bury him alive. So spare me your hands and tongues, and I shall spare you my hand and my harm.[278] I shall behead anyone of you who seems contrary to your belief in general. There have been hatreds between me and some folks, but I have put all that behind me.[279] Whoever of you was beneficent, let him increase his beneficence; and whoever was offensive, let him renounce his offense. Indeed, if I should know that one of you was overcome with incurable hatred toward me, I would not expose him nor disclose him unless he shows [it] to me openly. If he does so, I shall not argue with him. So resume your affairs, and help yourselves. Perhaps someone who is worried by our arrival may be pleased, and someone who is pleased with our arrival may be grieved.

O people, we have become your rulers and protectors. We rule you by the authority [sulṭān] of God, which He

274. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, IV, 111 reads: "of the amīr."

275. Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 58, adds: "And if you hear it from me disparage me for it, and know that it is the same with me.

276. C reads: "to Syria and return to al-Baṣrah and to you."

277. The "summoning of the Jāhiliyyah" was the pre-Islamic custom of calling upon relatives for support or revenge.

278. The text reads: 'adhāya. Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 58; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, IV, 112; Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, Nahj, XVI, 202 read: lisānī, "my tongue."

279. Lit: "behind my ears and beneath my foot."

gave us, and protect you with the fay'[280] of God, which He bestowed on us. So you owe us obedience in whatever we desire, and we owe you justice in whatever we were assigned. So be worthy of our justice and our fay' by your loyalty. Know also that whatever I may fail to do, I shall not fail to do three [things]: I shall not be unavailable to anyone of you who has a request, even if he comes to me knocking at night; nor delay payment of provisions and stipends; nor prolong your expeditions. So pray to God for the righteousness of your leaders, for they are your rulers. They set the example for you, and [they are] your shelter[281] whence you take refuge. As long as you are righteous, they will be righteous.[282] Do not let your hearts imbibe hatred for them, for your rage will be aggravated and your grief lengthened thereby, and you will not achieve your desire. Even if [your desire] were granted to you, it would be evil for you. I ask God to help everyone for everyone's sake,[283] and if you see me give an order then carry it out literally. I swear by God that I have many [potential] victims among you, so let every man among you beware lest he be among them. [76]

At that, 'Abdallāh b. Ahtam stood up, saying, "O amīr, I testify that you have been granted wisdom and unmistakable judgment." Ziyād responded, "You have lied. That was the prophet of God, David."[284] Al-Aḥnaf[285] said, "You have spoken and did it well, O amīr. But praise [comes] after performance and commendation after the stipend. We should not praise until we experience." Ziyād replied, "You have spoken the truth." At that Abū Bilāl, Mirdās b. Udayyah,[286] got up mut-280. C reads: taqwā, "piety." Concerning fay', see above, n. 51.

281. Lit: "cave."

282. Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 59; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, IV, 112 read: "as long as they are righteous, you are righteous."

283. The text reads: 'alā kullin; O reads: ma'a kullin, "with everyone."

284. Referring to Qur'ān 38:20.

285. Al-Aḥnaf, "the deformed", was Abū Baḥr Ṣakhr b. Qays b. Mu'āwiyah al-Tamīmī al-Sa'dī (d. 67[686/7]), who was the leader of the Banū Tamīm at al-Baṣrah. See EI[2], s.v. al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays.

286. Mirdās b. Udayyah (d. 61[680/81]) was a Khārijite leader at altering and saying, "God imparted differently from what you said. God, Almighty and Great, said, 'And Abraham who fulfilled his mission. One sinner shall not bear the burden of another and a man will only have what he achieved [himself].'[287] So God promised us better than what you did, O Ziyād." Ziyād responded, "Indeed we cannot find a way to what you and your companions want until we plunge into blood for it."

[According to] 'Umar—Khallād b. Yazīd—someone—al-Sha'bī: Every time I heard someone speaking well, I wanted him to be silent for fear that he would spoil it except for Ziyād. For whenever he would continue, his speech was most excellent.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah: Ziyād appointed 'Abdallāh b. Ḥiṣn to be in charge of his police. He then granted the people a respite until the news reached al-Kūfah and [word of] the arrival of the news at al-Kūfah came back to him. He also used to delay the evening worship so that he was the last to worship. Then he would worship, commanding someone to recite slowly the sūrah of "the Cow" or something similar from the Qur'ān. When he had finished, Ziyād granted a respite for as long as it would take for a man to reach al-Khuraybah.[288] Then he ordered the commander of his police to go forth. So he went forth and killed every man he saw. One night he caught a bedouin and brought him to Ziyād, who asked, "Did you hear [77] the announcement?" He replied, "No, by God, I arrived with my milch-camel, and when the night descended upon me, I lacked a place for her. I waited for morning to come, without knowing what the amīr had done." Ziyād declared, "By God, I believe you are telling the truth, but there will be a good example for this community in your death." Then he gave the order and the man was beheaded.

Ziyād was the first one who consolidated the government's Baṣrah who had fought at Nahrawān but opposed the use of violence afterwards. He is considered to be one of the first of the inactive Khārijites. See EI[1], s.v. Mirdās b. Udaiya.

287. Qur'ān 53:37–38.

288. Al-Khuraybah was the location of two deserted Persian forts on the outskirts of al-Baṣrah where the original Muslim settlement had been. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 341, 346.

business and secured the monarchy for Mu'āwiyah. He compelled the people to obey, implemented punishment, unsheathed the sword, arrested on (mere) suspicion, and meted out dubious punishment. The people feared his government greatly so that some of them felt safe with each other. If a man or woman dropped something, no one would touch it until its owner came and picked it up. Women spent the night without locking their doors. He ruled the people with an administration the like of which had never been seen. The people feared him with a dread that they never had of anyone before him. He also lavished stipends and built the provision depot.

When Ziyād heard a sound from the house of 'Umayr, he asked, "What's that?" He was told that it was a watchman, so he said, "Desist from this! I will be guarantor for whatever of his may be lost as far away as Iṣṭakhr." Ziyād also established the police force at four thousand men, headed by 'Abdallāh b. Ḥiṣn, one of the Banū 'Ubayd b. Tha'labah, owner of the Cemetery of Ibn Ḥiṣn, and by al-Ja'd b. Qays al-Tamīmī,[289] the owner of the Arch of al-Ja'd. They were both in charge of his police force together. One day while Ziyād was going along, they both went in front of him with two spears, competing (with each other). Ziyād ordered, "O Ja'd, throw down your spear." So he threw it down, and Ibn Ḥiṣn remained in charge of his police until Ziyād died. It was said that Ziyād put al-Ja'd in charge of dealing with the evil doers, and that he would [78] pursue them.

When Ziyād was told that the roads were dangerous, he said, "My efforts are confined to the city until I prevail over it and reform it. If the city should prevail over me, victory over anything else would be more difficult. When the city has been brought under control, what is outside of it will be tackled." Thus he consolidated his control. He would say, "If a rope should be lost between me and Khurāsān, I would know who took it." He also inscribed five hundred of the Baṣran shaykhs among his companions, and provided them with three hundred to five hundred dirhams. So Ḥārith b. Badr al-Ghudānī said of him:

289. C reads: al-Numayrī.

Who will tell Ziyād about me?
what a wonderful brother of the Caliph and Amīr!

For you are an imām of justice and aspiration, and determination when the affairs attend you.

Your brother is the Deputy of God,[290] son of Ḥarb, and you his assistant,[291] what a wonderful assistant!

You obtain what is desired and there comes
To your friend that which the conscience conceals for us.

Victorious by God's command, helping,
when the flock goes astray, you do not oppress.

Plentiful milk streams through your hands of what they wanted from the world for themselves.

You apportion equally, and neither rich nor poor complains to you about injustice.

You were energetic, and came at a wicked time when evils were manifest.

When men divided its desire among themselves, and the breasts would not disguise their grudges,

And city-dwellers feared and every one in the desert, remaining out of fear or going.

So when the sword of God arose among them,
Ziyād arose bright, illuminated,

Powerful, not inexperienced among the young, nor anxious, nor very old.

---

290. Khalīfat Allāh.
291. Wazīr.

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Ziyād [79] sought help from a number of Companions of the Prophet, among whom were 'Imrān b. al-Ḥusayn al-Khuzā'ī, whom he put in charge of rendering judgment at al-Baṣrah, al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī, whom he put in charge of Khurāsān, Samurah b. Jundab, Anas b. Mālik, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah. When 'Imrān asked to resign from his position, Ziyād relieved him and appointed 'Abdallāh b. Faḍālah al-Laythī as judge, then his brother, 'Āṣim b. Faḍālah, then Zurārah b. Awfā al-Jurashī, whose sister, Lubābah, was with Ziyād. It was also said that Ziyād was the first to have people go in front of him with spears and walk in front of him with clubs. He made use of the guard, a unit of five hundred men, and appointed Shaybān, owner of the Cemetery of Shaybān among the Banū Sa'd, to be in charge of them. They were stationed at the mosque.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī: Ziyād divided Khurāsān into four parts and appointed 'Umayr b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī over Marw, Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī over Abrashahr, Qays b. al-Haytham over Marw al-Rūdh, al-Fāryāb and al-Ṭāliqān, and Nāfi' b. Khālid al-Ṭāḥī over Harāt, Bādhghīs, Qādis, and Bushanj.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib and Ibn Abī 'Amr, shaykh of the Azd: Ziyād rebuked Nāfi' b. Khālid al-Ṭāḥī, imprisoned him, and made him sign a note for one hundred thousand dirhams—some say, eight hundred thousand. The reason for Ziyād's bad feeling towards him was that Nāfi' had sent him a table with gem-encrusted legs by means of a servant (ghulām) of his, called Zayd, who was Nāfi''s steward [80] over all his affairs. But Zayd slandered Nāfi', and told Ziyād, "He has cheated you and taken one of the legs of the table, and substituted a leg of gold for it." Some of the leading men of the Azd then went to Ziyād. Among them was Sayf b. Wahb al-Ma'walī, who was noble and about whom the poet says:

Apply to Sayf for generosity and liberality, and apply to Ṣabrah[292] for the greatest deeds.

292. Ṣabrah b. Shaymān b. 'Ukayf b. Kuyyūm was a leader of the Azd at the Battle of the Camel. See Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 299.

They entered Ziyād's presence while he was brushing his teeth, and when Ziyād saw them he quoted:

> Recall for us the stopping place of our horses, > at the bend,[293] since you are in need of us.

As far as the Azd are concerned, they say, "No, Sayf b. Wahb Abū Ṭalḥah al-Ma'walī quoted that line instead, when he entered Ziyād's presence." So Ziyād replied, "Yes." However, it reminded Ziyād of the time when Ṣabrah had protected him, so he called for the note and erased it with his toothbrush and released Nāfi'.

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī—Maslamah: Ziyād dismissed Nāfi' b. Khālid al-Ṭāḥī, Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī, and 'Umayr b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī, and appointed al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr b. Mujaddah[294] b. Ḥidhyam[295] b. al-Ḥārith b. Nu'aylah[296] b. Mulayk.[297] Nu'aylah was the brother of Ghifār b. Mulayk but they were few so they wound up with Ghifār. According to Maslamah:[298] Ziyād ordered his chamberlain, saying, "Invite al-Ḥakam to come to me," meaning al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ al-Thaqafī. So the chamberlain went out and upon seeing al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī, he admitted him. Ziyād remarked, "Here is a man with nobility who has companionship [81] with the Messenger of God," and appointed him over Khurāsān. Then Ziyād said, "I did not want you, but God, Almighty and Great, wanted you."

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Abū al-Raḥmān al-Thaqafī and Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl—his father: When Ziyād became governor of Iraq, he appointed al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī as governor over Khurāsān. He also appointed men along with him over the districts and ordered them to obey al-Ḥakam. They were in charge of collecting the tax revenue. They were Aslam b. Zur-

293. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 349–50.

294. C reads: Muhaddaj; O reads, Makhdūj. Mukhaddaj is given as an alternative by Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 154.

295. C reads: Jurthum; O reads: Khulaym b. Ḥulwān; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 36, 153 reads: Jidhyam.

296. Ibn Hajar, Iṣābah, I, 346 reads: Tha'labah.

297. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 154; Ibn Hajar, Iṣābah, I, 346 read: Mulayl b. Damrah b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah.

298. O adds: "Salamah told us."

'ah, Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī, Nāfi' b. Khālid al-Ṭāḥī, Rabī'ah b. 'Isl al-Yarbū'ī, 'Umayr b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī, and Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān al-Bāhilī. Al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr died after he had raided Ṭukhāristān taking great booty and had appointed Anas b. Abī Unās b. Zunaym as his deputy. He had written to Ziyād, "Indeed I have recommended him to God, to the Muslims, and to you." Ziyad remarked, "O God, indeed I do not approve of him for Your religion, nor for the Muslims, nor for me." Ziyād wrote to Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī about the governorship of Khurāsān. Then he sent al-Rabī' b. Ziyād al-Ḥārithī to Khurāsān with fifty thousand men, twenty-five thousand from al-Baṣrah and twenty-five thousand from al-Kūfah. Al-Rabī' was in charge of the Baṣrans and 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Aqīl was in charge of the Kūfans, while al-Rabī' b. Ziyād was in charge of the entire group.

It is also said that in this year Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the people in the pilgrimage while he was in charge of al-Madīnah. The previously mentioned governors and officials in charge of the provincial capitals during this year were al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah in charge of al-Kūfah, while Shurayḥ was in charge of rendering judgment there, and Ziyād in charge of al-Baṣrah, and the (other) officials whom I have mentioned previously.

During this year 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd led the winter raid against Byzantine territory.

The Events of the Year 46

(March 13, 666–March 2, 667)

[82] Among these events was the winter raid of Mālik b. 'Ubaydallāh against Byzantine territory. According to alternative accounts this raid was led by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd or by Mālik b. Hubayrah al-Sakūnī.

During this year, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd departed from Byzantine territory to Homs. Ibn Uthāl al-Naṣrānī[299] is said to have slipped him a poisoned drink, and when he drank it, it killed him.

The Death of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd

The reason for that was what I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd had become great in Syria and the Syrians favored him because of the reputation among them of his father, Khālid b. al-Walīd, and because of his usefulness to the Muslims in Byzantine territory, as well as his bravery. They favored him so much that

299. "The Christian."

Mu'āwiyah feared him. He was afraid for himself with regard to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, because of the affection of the people for him. So he ordered Ibn Uthāl to plot to kill him, and guaranteed to Ibn Uthāl that, if he did so, his tax (kharāj) would be revoked for as long as he lived and that he would be put in charge of the collection of the tax revenues (kharāj) of Homs. As a result, when 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid reached Homs, returning from Byzantine territory, Ibn Uthāl slipped him a poisoned drink with some of his slaves. He drank it and died at Homs. Mu'āwiyah then fulfilled for Ibn Uthāl what he had guaranteed to him. He put Ibn Uthāl in charge of (collecting) the tax revenues (kharāj) of Homs and revoked his own tax (kharāj). Khālid b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd came to al-Madīnah, and one day he sat with 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr. When Khālid greeted him, 'Urwah asked him who he was. When he replied, "I am Khālid b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd," 'Urwah [83] asked him, "What did Ibn 'Uthāl do?" At that, Khālid got up from his presence and departed, heading for Homs. Then he lay in wait for Ibn Uthāl there. When he saw Ibn Uthāl riding one day, Khālid b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān stood in his way and struck him with his sword, killing him. When he was brought to Mu'āwiyah, the latter imprisoned him for several days and fined him Ibn Uthāl's blood price, so that no one retaliated against Khālid for killing him. When Khālid returned to al-Madīnah, he came to 'Urwah and greeted him. When 'Urwah asked him, "What did Ibn Uthāl do?" he replied, "I took care of Ibn Uthāl for you, but what did Ibn Jurmūz do?" At that, 'Urwah became silent. When Khālid b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān struck Ibn Uthāl, he said:

I am the descendent of the Sword of God, so know me!
Only my noble descent and my religion last,
And a trenchant sword with which my right hand assailed.

During this year al-Khaṭīm and Sahm b. Ghālib al-Ḥujaymī rebelled, proclaiming, "Judgment belongs only to God."[300] I was told about their affair by 'Umar—'Alī: When Ziyād became governor, Sahm b. Ghālib al-Ḥujaymī and al-Khaṭīm, who was Yazīd b. Mālik al-Bāhilī, feared him. As for Sahm, he went off to al-Ahwāz and caused mischief, proclaiming, "Judgment belongs only to God." Then he returned, hid, and sought a guarantee of safe-conduct. Ziyād did not grant him that, but sought him, killed him, and crucified him on his door. As for al-Khaṭīm, Ziyād exiled him to Baḥrayn, then he allowed him to come back, saying to him, "Stay in your city." Ziyād also told Muslim b. 'Amr to vouch for him, but Muslim refused, saying, "If he spends the night away from his house, I shall let you know." Muslim then came to Ziyād and said, "Al-Khaṭīm did [84] not spend the night in his house." At that, Ziyād ordered him to be killed and (his corpse) thrown into (the district of) the Bāhilah (tribe).[301]

300. The text reads: ḥakkama, which means "to say the Khārijite slogan, la ḥukmah illa li-llāhi."

'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage this year. The officials and governors were the same as during the previous year.

---

301. C reads: "the gate of his kinsmen."

The Events of the Year

47

(March 3, 667–February 19, 668)

The winter campaign of Mālik b. Hubayrah against Byzantine territory occurred during this year, as well as the winter campaign of Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Qaynī against Anṭākiyah.

In this year also, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ was dismissed from (the governorship of) Egypt, and Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj was put in charge there. According to al-Wāqidī, Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj set out westward; he was an ʿUthmānī.[302] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr, who had come from al-Iskandariyyah, marched past him, saying to him, "O Muʿāwiyah, indeed, by my life, you took your reward from Muʿāwiyah. You killed Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr in order to be made governor of Egypt, and you have become its governor." Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj replied, "I only killed Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr for what he did to ʿUthmān." At that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān replied, "However, if you were seeking [revenge for] the blood of ʿUthmān, you would not have participated in what Muʿāwiyah did, since ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ treated al-Ash'arī the way he did.[303] You were the first person to jump up and declare allegiance to Mu'āwiyah.

302. An ʿUthmānī was one of those who demanded revenge for the death of ʿUthmān and the punishment of his murderers during the first civil war.

Some of the biographers said that in this year Ziyād sent al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī to Khurāsān as governor. He raided the mountain of al-Ghūr and Farāwandah. He defeated the people there with the sword by force, conquered the territory, and acquired much booty and captives. I shall mention those who [85] differ with this account later if God Most High wills. The one who told this account mentioned that al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr returned from this raid of his and died at Marw.

There is disagreement over who led the people in the pilgrimage this year. Al-Wāqidī said 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān was put in charge of the pilgrimage in this year. Others said the one who led the pilgrimage in this year was 'Anbasah b. Abī Sufyān. The governors and officials in charge of the provincial capitals were the same as those whom I mentioned for the preceding year.

303. This refers to 'Amr's deception of Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī during the arbitration at Adhrūh.

The Events of the Year

48

(February 20, 668–February 8, 669)

The winter campaign of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Qaynī against Anṭākiyah occurred during this year, as well as the summer campaign of ʿAbdallāh b. Qays al-Fazārī, the sea raid of Mālik b. Hubayrah al-Sakūnī, and the joint sea raid of ʿUqbah b. ʿĀmir al-Juhanī with the Egyptians and the people of al-Madīnah. Al-Mundhir b. al-Zuhayr was in charge of the people of al-Madīnah, and Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd was in charge of them all.

According to some authorities, Ziyād sent Ghālib b. Faḍālah al-Laythī to be in charge of Khurāsān. Ghālib had been a Companion of the Messenger of God.

Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the people in the pilgrimage this year, according to most biographers. He expected to be dismissed due to Muʿāwiyah's ill will towards him and because Muʿāwiyah had taken back Fadak after having granted it to him. The governors of the provincial capitals and their officials during this year were the same as those during the preceding year.

The Events of the Year 49

(February 9, 669–January 28, 670)

[86]

The winter campaign of Mālik b. Hubayrah al-Sakūnī into Byzantine territory occurred during this year.

The raid of Faḍālah b. 'Ubayd against Jarabbah also occurred during this year. He spent the winter at Jarabbah, conquered it, and took many captives there.

The summer campaign of 'Abdallāh b. Kurz al-Bajalī occurred during this year.

The sea raid of Yazīd b. Shajarah al-Rahāwī occurred during this year. He spent the winter with the Syrians.

The sea raid of 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' occurred during this year, and he spent the winter with the Egyptians.

The raid of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah against the Byzantines occurred during this year. He reached Qusṭanṭīniyyah accompanied by Ibn 'Abbās, Ibn 'Umar, Ibn al-Zubayr, and Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī.

[87] In this year Mu'āwiyah discharged Marwān b. al-Ḥakam from al-Madīnah, in the month of Rabī' I (April 9–May 8, 669). He appointed Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ as governor over al-Madīnah in the month of Rabī' II (May 9–June 6, 669)—it is also said, in the month of Rabīʿ I in this year.[304] Altogether, Marwān was Muʿāwiyah's governor of al-Madīnah for eight years and two months. When Marwān was dismissed, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal was in charge of rendering judgment at al-Madīnah for him—that is what al-Wāqidī claims. When Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ was put in charge, he dismissed ʿAbdallāh from that post and appointed Abū Salimah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Awf as judge.

It was said that in this year the plague struck al-Kūfah. Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah fled the plague, and when it lifted, he was asked, "Why don't you return to al-Kūfah?" So he went back and was stricken and died. It has also been said that al-Mughīrah died in the year 50(670/671). Muʿāwiyah added al-Kūfah to Ziyād's (territory). He was thus the first one to have al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah combined (under his jurisdiction).

In this year Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ led the people in the pilgrimage. The governors and officials during this year were the same as those during the previous year, except for the governor of al-Kūfah. There are differences regarding the date of al-Mughīrah's death, for some biographers said he perished in this year while others said it was in the following year.

---

304. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 245, this happened in the year 48(668/9)

The Events of the Year 50

(JANUARY 29, 670-JANUARY 17, 671)

The raid of Busr b. Abī Arṭāt and Sufyān b. Awf al-Azdī in Byzantine territory occurred during this year. It was also said that the sea raid of Faḍālah b. 'Ubayd al-Anṣārī took place during this year.

The death of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah occurred in this year according to al-Wāqidī and al-Madā'inī. (According to) Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Thaqafī—his father: Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was a tall man with an injured eye which had been wounded at Yarmūk.[305] He died in (the month of) Sha'bān (August 24–September 21, 670), at the age of seventy. As for 'Awānah, he said: According to what I was told by Hishām b. 'Ubayd,[306] al-Mughīrah perished in the year 51(671/672). Others said: No, he perished in the year 49(669/670).

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Ziyād was in charge of al-Baṣrah and its districts until this year. When al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah died at al-Kūfah while he was its 305. The decisive battle in the Muslim conquest of Syria was fought at Yarmūk, in northern Jordan, in Rajab 15 (August 636). See EI[1], s.v. al-Yarmūk.

306. C and Cairo read: Muḥammad.

governor, Mu'āwiyah wrote to Ziyād assigning him to be in charge of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. He was the first one to have al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah combined (under his jurisdiction). Ziyād appointed Samurah b. Jundab as his deputy over al-Baṣrah and set out for al-Kūfah. Ziyād would stay in al-Kūfah for six months and in al-Baṣrah for six months.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib: When al- [88]
Mughīrah died, Iraq was combined under Ziyād's jurisdiction, so he came to al-Kūfah, ascended the pulpit, praised and glorified God, and then said, "Indeed, when that matter came to me while I was at al-Baṛah, I wanted to set out for you with two thousand of the police force of al-Baṣrah. Then, when I remembered that you are people of truth, and that your truth often rejected the false, I came to you with my family. God be praised, Who removed from me what the people imposed and preserved for me what they lost . . . " until he finished the speech. When he was pelted with pebbles on the pulpit, he sat down until they ceased. Then he summoned some of his henchmen and commanded them to seize the gates of the mosque. He then said, "Let every man of you take the one sitting next to him, and do not say, 'I don't know who was sitting next to me.'" He then ordered a seat[307] to be put at the gate of the mosque for him, and summoned them, four at a time, to swear by God, "None of us threw pebbles at you." He freed whoever swore and arrested and set aside whoever did not swear until there were thirty men—it is also said, eighty. He then cut off their hands on the spot. Al-Sha'bī said: By God, we never accused him of lying. Whenever he promised us good or evil, he carried it out.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Salamah b. 'Uthmān—al-Sha'bī: The first man Ziyād killed at al-Kūfah was Awfā b. Ḥiṣn. Ziyād had heard something about him, but when he sought him, he fled. When Ziyād inspected the people, Awfā marched past him. Ziyād asked, "Who is this?" When he was told that he was Awfā b. Ḥiṣn, Ziyād quoted, "His feet brought misery."[308] At that Awfā recited:

---

307. A kursī was a chair, throne, or judgment seat.
308. Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 21–22; tr. G. W. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia I, 25.

Indeed, Ziyād, Abū al-Mughīrah, does not hurry, while the people have haste.

I feared you, by God, so know my oath, fear of the serpents,[309] the attack of the vipers.

[89] You came when the land was confined, so there was no refuge upon it for someone fearful.

Ziyād asked, "What is your opinion about 'Uthmān?" Awfā replied, "Husband of two daughters of the Messenger of God. I have not disowned him. That is my general opinion." Ziyād continued, "What, then, do you say about Mu'āwiyah?" Awfā answered, "Generous, forbearing." Ziyād then asked, "And what do you say about me?" Awfā responded, "I heard that you said in al-Baṣrah, 'I shall certainly seize the healthy for the sick and the one who comes for the one who turns away.'" Ziyād replied, "That's true." Awfā said, "You acted arbitrarily."[310] Ziyād retorted, "The braggart is nothing but an evil flute," and killed him. At that, 'Abdallāh b. Hammām al-Salūlī said:

God thwarted the effort of Awfā b. Ḥiṣn, when he became the sorcerer's chicken.

Destruction and misery led him to a lion of a thicket and a deaf viper.

When Ziyād came to al-Kūfah, 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ came to him saying, "'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq is assembling some of the faction of Abū Turāb."[311] 'Amr b. Ḥurayth asked him, "What leads you to report what you are not certain about and do not know what the result might be?" Ziyād then said "Both of you are wrong to talk with me about this openly,

---

This proverb is ascribed to al-Ḥārith b. Jabalah al-Ghassānī who said it to al-Ḥārith b. 'Ayyāf al-'Abdī who had satirized him, when the latter was brought captive to him. It is also ascribed to 'Ubayd b. al-Abraṣ who said it to al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir.

309. Al-ḥafāfīth, pl. of ḥufāth: a large, mottled, red snake with a great head.

310. Lit. "You flailed about in the dark."

311. That is, "Father of Dust," an appellation of uncertain origin used of 'Alī by his enemies. See E. Kohlberg, "Abū Turāb," 347–52.

while 'Amr would refute what you say. Both of you go to 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq and say to him, "What is this group that you assemble? If anyone wants to speak with you, or you with him, do so in the mosque." 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq is also said to have been accused of that by Yazīd b. Ruwaym who told Ziyād, "'Amr has made both cities fester." At that, 'Amr b. al-Ḥurayth remarked, "Yazīd has never been occupied with anything useful at any given time." Ziyād then told Yazīd b. Ruwaym, "As for you, you would have allowed 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq's blood to be shed; and as for 'Amr [b. al-Ḥurayth], you would have spared his blood. Even if I knew that the marrow of his leg had liquified out of hatred for me, I would not be furious with him until he should rebel against me." Ziyād also made use of the maqṣūrah[312] when the people of al-Kūfah pelted him with pebbles. When Ziyād set out from al-Baṣrah for al-Kūfah, he put Samurah b. Jundab in charge (of al-Baṣrah). [90]

I was told by 'Umar—Iṣḥāq b. Idrīs[313]—Muḥammad b. Sulaym: I asked Anas b. Sīrīn if Samurah b. Jundab had killed anyone. He replied, "Can those whom Samurah b. Jundab killed be counted? Ziyad made him deputy over al-Baṣrah and came to al-Kūfah. When he returned, Samurah had killed eight thousand people. Ziyād asked him, 'Aren't you afraid that you might have killed someone who was innocent?' Samurah replied, 'Even if I should kill as many more of them, I would not fear [it],' or words to that effect."

I was told by 'Umar—Mūsā b. Ismā'īl—Nūḥ b. Qays—Ash'ath al-Ḥuddānī—Abū Sawwār al-'Adawī: On one morning Samurah killed forty-seven men of my folk who had collected the Qur'ān.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Ja'far al-Sadafī—Awf: Samurah approached from al-Madīnah. When he was at the dwellings of the Banū Asad, a man went out from one of their alleys, and suddenly attacked the first cavalry. Someone among the folk then attacked the man, piercing him with a spear. The cavalry then advanced, and Samurah b. Jundab came upon the man as he lay wallowing in his blood. Samurah asked, "Who is this?" and was told, "The first cavalry of the amīr struck him." Samurah remarked, "If you hear that we have ridden, avoid our spearheads."

312. See above, n. 257.
313. O reads: Uways.

I was told by 'Umar—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Jarīr—Ghassān b. Muḍar—Sa'īd b. Zayd: Qarīb and Zuḥḥāf rebelled while Ziyād was at al-Kūfah and Samurah at al-Baṣrah. We[314] went out by night and camped with the Banū Yashkur, who were seventy men—that was in Ramaḍān (September 22–October 21, [91] 670). They then came to the Banū Ḍubay'ah, who were seventy men. As they went past one of their shaykhs called Ḥakkāk, he saw them and said, "Welcome to Abū al-Sha'thā.'"[315] They thought that the shaykh was Ibn Ḥiṣn,[316] so they killed him and dispersed among the places of worship belonging to the Azd. A group of them came to the plaza (raḥbah) of the Banū 'Alī, and another of the Mosque of al-Mu'ādil. At that, Sayf b. Wahb went forth against them with his friends and killed whomever came his way. Youths of the Banū 'Alī and of the Banū Rāsib also went forth against Qarīb and Zuḥḥāf, shooting arrows at them. Qarīb asked, "Is 'Abdallāh b. Aws al-Ṭāḥī among the folk?" while he was contending with him. Upon being told that he was, Qarīb exclaimed, "Onward, then, to the contest!" 'Abdallāh then killed him and brought (back) his head. Ziyād arrived from al-Kūfah, and began to rebuke him, saying, "O best of the Ṭāḥīs, if you had not succeeded against the folk, I would have removed you to the prison." Qarīb belonged to the Iyād and Zuḥḥāf to the Ṭayyi', and they were cousins. They were both the first ones to rebel after the people of al-Nahr. Ghassān said: I heard Sa'īd saying that Abū Bilāl said, "God did not bring Qarīb close.[317] I swear by God that I would rather fall from the sky than do what he did," (that is, act ruthlessly).[318]

I was told by 'Umar—Zuhayr—Wahb—his father: Ziyād treated the Ḥarūriyyah more harshly after Qarīb and Zuḥḥāf. He killed them and ordered Samurah to do the same. Ziyād would 314. Cairo: "they both," would seem to be the preferred reading.

---

315. Abū al-Sha'thā' means "one with matted or disheveled hair."
316. That is, the commander of Ziyād's police force.
317. Qarīb means "close" or "near."
318. According to Ibn al-Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 260–64, these events occurred in the year 53(672/3).

appoint Samurah deputy over al-Baṣrah whenever he went to al-Kūfah. So Samurah killed many of them. I was told by 'Umar—Abū 'Ubaydah: At that time Ziyād spoke from the pulpit, "O people of al-Baṣrah, By God, take care of these for me or I shall certainly start with you. By God, if a single man of them escapes, you won't get one dirham of your stipends for the [entire] year." So the people rose up against them and killed them.

[92] (According to) Muḥammad b. 'Umar: In this year Mu'āwiyah ordered[319] that the pulpit of the Messenger of God be transported[320] to Syria. When it was moved, the sun was eclipsed so that the stars were seen plainly that day. When the people considered that to be very momentous, Mu'āwiyah said, "I didn't want to move it; rather, I feared that it would have become wormy, so I paid attention to it." Then he draped it that day. Muḥammad b. 'Umar also mentioned that Khālid b. al-Qāsim told him that, according to Shu'ayb b. 'Amr al-Umawī.

(I was told by) Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Dīnār—his father: Mu'āwiyah said, "Indeed, I thought that the pulpit and staff of the Messenger of God should not be left at al-Madīnah because [its people] were the enemies and murderers of the Commander of the Faithful, 'Uthmān," When Mu'āwiyah arrived, he looked for the staff, and Sa'd al-Qaraẓ had it. Abū Hurayrah and Jābir b. 'Abdallāh then came to him, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, we remind you of God, Almighty and Great. Do not do this. For it is not right for the pulpit of the Messenger of God to be removed from the place where he put it, nor for his staff to be removed to Syria. Would you remove the mosque!" At that, Mu'awiyah refrained and added six steps to the pulpit. As a result, today it has eight steps.[321] He also apologized to the people for what he did.

(According to) Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Suwayd[322] b. 'Abd al-Azīz—Isḥāq b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Farwah—Abān b. Sāliḥ—Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb: 'Abd al-Malik[323] was concerned about the

319. O reads: "wanted to pull up the pulpit."
320. C reads: "and transport it."
321. See also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 66.
322. C reads: Mūsā.
323. 'Abd al-Malik was Caliph from 65[685] until 86 [705]. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.

pulpit. So Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb said to him, "I remind you of God, Almighty and Great, [warning] not to do this and not to transfer it. Indeed, when the Commander of the Faithful, Mu'āwiyah, moved it, the sun was eclipsed. The Messenger of God said, 'Whoever swears an oath upon my pulpit sinfully, his resting place shall be in the fire.'[324] You would remove it from al-Madīnah while it is part of the rights among the people at al-Madīnah." As a result, 'Abd al-Malik refrained from that and [93] abstained from mentioning it. When al-Walīd[325] was (ruler) and made the pilgrimage, he was interested in that, saying, "Tell me about it. I certainly think that I shall do [it]." Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib then sent to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz,[326] saying, "Tell your master, 'Fear God, Almighty and Great, and don't be exposed to God, to whom be praise, nor to His wrath.'" When 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz spoke to him, al-Walīd refrained and abstained from mentioning it. When Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik[327] made the pilgrimage, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz informed him about what al-Walīd had been interested in and the message Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib had sent to him. At that, Sulaymān remarked, "I did not like for that to be mentioned about 'Abd al-Malik or about al-Walīd. This is arrogance, and is not for us or for this pulpit. We took over the world, and it is in our hands, and we want to support one of the symbols of Islām sent to it by transporting it to our presence. This is not righteous."

In this year Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj was dismissed from Egypt and Ifrīqiyyah. Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān had sent 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' al-Fihrī to Ifrīqiyyah before he put Maslamah in charge of Egypt and Ifrīqiyyah. 'Uqbah conquered Ifrīqiyyah and laid out is (city of) Qayrawān.[328] Muḥammad b. 'Umar claimed that its location, a thicket, was undesirable because of beasts of prey

---

324. This is a well-known hadīth. See Wensinck, Handbook, 198.

325. Al-Walīd was the son and successor of 'Abd al-Malik as Caliph from 86(705) until 98(715) See EI[1], s.v. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.

326. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was the governor of al-Madīnah for his cousin, al-Walīd. He was Caliph from 99(717) until 101(720) See EI[1], s.v. 'Omar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz.

327. Sulaymān was Caliph from 98(715) until 99(717) See EI[2], s.v. Sulaimān b. 'Abd al-Malik.

328. Qayrawān (Kairouan) is in central Tunisia, 156 km south of Tunis. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 247; and EI[2], s. v. al-Ḳayrawān.

and snakes and other kinds of animals. When God, Almighty and Great, summoned them, none of them remained but they all fled as the beasts of prey carried off their cubs. (According to) Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mūsā b. 'Alī—his father: 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' announced, "Indeed when we settled they departed, blaming us, and went out fleeing from their dens."

I was told by al-Mufaḍḍil b. Faḍālah—Zayd b. Abī Ḥabīb—a man from the Egyptian army: We arrived with 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' who was the first person to lay out (the city). He divided it up [94] into dwellings and houses for the people, and built its mosque. We stayed with him until he was dismissed. He was the best of governors and the best commander.

Then in this year, Mu'āwiyah dismissed Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj from Egypt and 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' from Ifrīqiyyah, and he put Maslamah b. Mukhallad in charge of all of Egypt and the West. He was the first one for whom the entire West, Egypt, Barqah, Ifrīqiyyah, and Ṭarābulus were combined. Maslamah b. Mukhallad put a mawlā of his called al-Muhājir in charge of Ifrīqiyyah, dismissed 'Uqbah b. Nāfi', and removed him from affairs of government. Maslamah remained as governor over Egypt and the West, while Abū al-Muhājir was in charge of Ifrīqiyyah on his behalf, until Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān died.

In this year Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī died. It has also been said that the death of Abū Mūsā occurred in the year 52(672)

There is a difference of opinion about who led the people in the pilgrimage this year. Some people said Mu'āwiyah led them in pilgrimage. Others said his son Yazīd led them in the pilgrimage. In this year the governor of al-Madīnah was Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, while Ziyād was in charge of al-Baṣrah, al-Kūfah, the East, Sijistān, al-Sind, and al-Hind.

In this year Ziyād sought al-Farazdaq,[329] while the Banū Nahshal and Fuqaym incited (Ziyād) against him. As a result, al-Farazdaq fled from Ziyād to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, who was then governor of al-Madīnah for Mu'āwiyah. He sought refuge with Sa'īd, and the latter granted him asylum.

329. Al-Farazdaq, "the lump of dough", was the famous poet, Hammām b. Ghālib who died ca. 110(728) or 112(730) See *EI*², s.v. al-Farazdaḳ.

Al-Farazdaq's Flight from Ziyād

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—Abū 'Ubaydah and Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī and others: When al-Farazdaq satirized the Banū Nahshal and the Banū Fuqaym . . . Abū Zayd did not add to the chain of authorities (isnād) of his report more than I have mentioned. As for Muḥammad b. 'Alī, he told me according to [95] Muḥammad b. Sa'd[330]—Abū 'Ubaydah—A'yān b. Labaṭah b. al-Farazdaq—his father—his father: When I satirized al-Ashhab b. Rumaylah and al-Ba'īth they were both disgraced. The Banū Nahshal and the Banū Fuqaym incited Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān against me. Others claimed that Yazīd b. Mas'ūd b. Khālid b. Mālik b. Rib'ī b. Salmā b. Jandal b. Nahshal also incited against him. A'yan said: Ziyād did not recognize (who al-Farazdaq was) until he was told, "The bedouin youth who clutched his coin,[331] and threw off his clothing."

(According to) Abū 'Ubaydah—A'yan b. Labaṭah—his father—his father: My father, Ghālib, sent me with his caravan and merchandise in order to sell it and purchase items for him and to buy clothing for his family. Upon arriving at al-Baṣrah, I sold the merchandise, took the money it brought, and put it inside my clothes, holding on to it. Then a man confronted me who seemed to me like a devil. When he remarked, "How often you check it," I responded, "And what prevents me?" He replied, "Now then, if it were someone else I knew, he would not keep it." At that, I asked, "And who is he?" He replied, "Ghālib b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah." So I summoned the people of the Mirbad,[332] and saying "Take it!" I scattered the money upon them. When someone said, "Cast off your robe, O son of Ghālib," I cast it off. When another said, "Cast off your shirt," I cast that off. Yet another said, "Cast off your turban." So I cast that off until I was left in underwear. But when they said, "Cast off your underwear," I replied, "I shall not cast it off and go naked. I am not insane." When the news reached Ziyād, he sent cavalry to the Mirbad to bring me to him. But a man of the Banū al-

330. O reads: Sa'dān.

331. The text reads: waraqahu; O reads: ridfahu, "his backside;" C reads: rizqahu, "his ration."

332. The Mirbad was an open space in al-Baṣrah used as a market-place.

Hujaym came on horseback, saying, "They are coming for you. To the rescue!" He mounted me behind him, and galloped off until we escaped. When the cavalry arrived, I had already left.

Ziyād then took my two uncles, Dhuhayl[333] and al-Zuḥḥāf, [96] the sons of Ṣa'ṣa'ah, who were registered in the dīwān for two thousand dirhams apiece. Since they were there, he imprisoned them. I sent word to them both, "If you wish, I would come to you." But they both replied, "Don't come near us. Indeed, this is Ziyād. What might he do to us, although we have not committed any crime?" They both stayed several days. Then some people interceded with Ziyād, saying, "These are two attentive and obedient shaykhs who have committed no crime except for what a bedouin youth belonging to the desert people did." At that, Ziyād released them, and they both said to me, "Inform us about your entire business for your father—provisions or clothing?" I then told them both everything. They bought it, and I went off to Ghālib, bringing everything with me. When I came to him, the news about me had already reached him. When he asked me, "How did you do?" I told him what had happened. He remarked, "Indeed you did well." And he rubbed my head.

At that time al-Farazdaq was not composing poetry, but he composed poetry afterwards. Ziyād thus harbored that (escapade) against him.

Then al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, Jāriyah b. Qudāmah of the Banū Rabī'ah b. Ka'b b. Sa'd, al-Jawn b. Qatādah al-'Abshamī,[334] and al-Ḥutāt b. Yazīd Abū Munāzil one of the Banū Ḥuwayy[335] b. Sufyān b. Muhjāshi' travelled to visit Mu'āwiyah b. Alī Sufyān. He assigned each of them stipends of one hundred thousand dirhams, while he assigned al-Ḥutāt a stipend of seventy thousand. When they were on the road, they questioned each other and told about their stipends. Since al-Ḥutāt had received only seventy thousand, he returned to Mu'āwiyah. When the latter asked him, "What brought you back, O Abū Munāzil?" he replied, "You have disgraced me among the Banū Tamīm. Is not my lineage sound? Am I not old? Am I not obeyed by my clan?" When Muʿāwiyah replied that he was, he asked, "Why then did [97] you belittle me before the folk?" Muʿāwiyah explained. "Indeed I purchased their faith from the folk and entrusted you with your faith and your views about ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān"—al-Ḥutāt was an ʿUthmānī. At that he said, "Me, too; purchase my faith from me." So Muʿāwiyah ordered the full stipend of the folk for him. But al-Ḥutāt disparaged his stipend, so Muʿāwiyah withheld it. Al-Farazdaq then said about that:[336]

333. O reads: Zunbīl.

334. For al-Jawn b. Qatādah see Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 312–13.

335. C reads: Jawn. For al-Ḥutāt b. Yazīd see Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 379, which has a version of this account explaining that al-Aḥnaf and Jāriyah had been supporters of 'Alī.

Both your father and my uncle, O Muʿāwiyah, bequeathed an inheritance. So his relatives own the inheritance.[337]

Why did you take [338] the legacy of al-Ḥutāt, while the liquidity of Ḥarb's legacy is frozen for you?

For if this matter had happened during the Jāhiliyyah,
You would have known whose auxiliary cavalry is insignificant.

And if it was during [the time of] faith [something] like this would be hateful to you.
We have our rightful possession,[339] or he choked on the water he drank.[340]

And if it happened when we were [there], while the hand was generous, a sharp [sword] would determine its blow, penetrating you.

(Muḥammad b. ʿAlī recited: While there was abundance[341] in the palm of the hand.)

---

336. Other versions of this poem are in Boucher, Divan, III, 139; Bevan, Naḳāʾiḍ, 608–9; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 37; Ṣāwī, Sharḥ, 56–7. The first eight lines are quoted by Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 379.

337. Boucher, Divan reads: "relatives are the first to inherit."

338. Boucher, Divan reads: "devour."

339. Boucher, Divan reads: "And if this matter happened in someone else's kingdom, you would fulfill it."

340. See Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 429; Freytag, Proverbia, II, 943: "He eats an elephant and chokes on an insect," said of someone who tries to avoid lying.

341. O reads: "something pleasant."

You were hurled at something, O Mu'āwiyah, before which are huge chasms whose steepness is difficult,

While I did not give[342] half[343] from powerlessness except yourself. Even if his squadrons were hostile to me,

Am I not the most respected of people with regard to relatives and clan? [98] and more forbidding than they towards neighbors when his side is wronged?

And no [woman] bore after the Prophet and his family the likes of me, a stallion among men resembling him.

My father is Ghālib, and the man is a confidant whose descent is traced to Ṣa'ṣa'ah,[344] so who is there related to him?[345]

The courtyard of my house is beside the Pleiades, and before it the full moon passing among its stars.[346]

My ancestors are stoney[347] mountains, as many as pebbles, and my lineage is the lineage of generosity, so who would call it to account?

I am the son of one who gives life to the wa'īd[348] and a guarantor against fate when its profits were difficult.

---

342. Boucher, Divan reads: "was not given."
343. That is, submission and obedience to the government. See Ṣāwī, Sharḥ, 57.
344. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 609 reads:

My forefather is Ghālib and the man
Ṣa'ṣa'ah who traces his descent to Dārim.

Dārim b. Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah was one of the main tribal divisions of Tamīm.
345. The previous four lines are in the Naḳā'iḍ but not in the Divan.
346. This line occurs in the Dīwān after the following line as:

The courtyard of my house is spacious. . . .

347. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "lofty."
348. A wa'īd is an unwanted child condemned to be buried alive.

How many forefathers I have, O Mu'āwiyah, who are still more illustrious;[349] what his side turns away competes with the wind.

The branches of the two Māliks[350] augmented him, and your father, who was from 'Abd al-Shams, does not resemble him.[351]

You see him as the blade of the sword shaking for generosity, noble,[352] achieving glory, when his mustache sprouted,

Long of sword-belt, since he was,
Quṣayy and 'Abd al-Shams are not among those who address him.[353]

[99] Mu'āwiyah then returned thirty thousand dirhams to the family of al-Ḥutāt, and that also made Ziyād angry with al-Farazdaq. When Nahshal and Fuqaym complained about al-Farazdaq, Ziyād's anger against him increased. But when he sought him, al-Farazdaq fled and came to 'Isā b. Khuṣaylah b. Mu'attib b. Naṣr b. 'Ilāṭ b. Khālid al-Sulamī.

Ibn Sa'd said: Abū 'Ubaydah and Abū Mūsā al-Faḍl b. Mūsā b. Khuṣaylah told me: When Ziyād drove out al-Farazdaq, the latter came at night to my uncle, 'Isā b. Khuṣaylah, saying, "O Abū Khuṣaylah, indeed this man has frightened me, and my friend and everyone in whom I was placing my hopes have rejected me. I have come to you to hide." Abū Khuṣaylah welcomed him, and al-Farazdaq stayed with him for three nights. Then al-Farazdaq told him, "It seems to me that I should go to Syria." Abū Khuṣaylah replied, "You are welcome to stay with me for as long as you like, and if you should depart, this Arḥabiyyah[354] she-camel is yours." So he rode off after a night, and 349. The text reads: agharra, lit. a horse with a blaze on its forehead, bright, esteemed.

350. The lineage of the Banū Dārim went back to Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm.

351. Boucher, Divan reads: "is not on speaking terms with him."

352. Boucher, Divan reads: "generous."

353. This line is in the Naḳā'iḍ but not in the Divan.

354. The Arḥabiyyah was a breed of fast she-camel named after the Banū Ar-

'Isā sent someone with him until he got beyond the houses. By morning he had gone more than a three-nights' journey. Al-Farazdaq said about that:[355]

Al-Bahzī bestowed[356] a mount[357] on me, no matter who disapproved of the people, and the crimes of the criminal are feared.

And who, O 'Isā, would blame his guest?
Your guest is well-treated, his food delicious.[358]

He said, "Know that she is an Arḥabiyyah [100] and that she is at your disposal for your night journey.[359]

When morning came I put al-Mulqā and Ḥanbal[360] behind me.
She did not go forth until its darkness lifted [from] the star.[361]

She moves away from the people of al-Ḥufayr[362] as if she were a male ostrich whose female ostriches compete during the darkness of night.

She saw Duwayyah[363] before her eyes and the dawn appeared for her [leaving] from smooth peaked Ṣa'l,[364] ḥab branch of the Banū Hamdān, who owned camels famous for their speed, descended, according to legend, from a fantastic camel stallion that came once a year to mix with the tribe's herds. See Boucher, Divan, I, 233.

355. Other versions of this poem are in Boucher, Divan, III, 87; Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, II, 610; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 30–1; and Ṣāwī, Sharḥ, 763–4.

356. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ; Boucher, Divan read: "satisfied" or "protected."

357. Boucher, Divan reads: "all together."

358. This line is in the Naḳā'iḍ but not in the Divan.

359. This is the second line in the Divan.

360. Ḥanbal was a marsh or meadow in the territory of the Banū Tamīm. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 350.

361. That is, until the star rose from its darkness. The Naḳā'iḍ and the Divan have "the night" instead of "the star." This the eleventh line in the Divan.

362. Al-Ḥufayr was the first stop on the road from al-Baṣrah to Mecca. "She" is the riding camel. This is the eighth line in the Divan.

363. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ; Boucher, Divan read: Ruwayyah. The latter was a hill near Ḥanbal.

364. This is the twelfth line in the Divan.

As a sail which has the stream of her halter on the Tigris [Dijlah] except [for] its nose and the corners of its mouth.[365]

When you went past al-Ghāriyyān,[366] then be safe, and the ravines of Falj turned away behind me.

He also said:

The means of 'Isā saved me from ruin, and whoever's protector he is, is not alone.[367]

It is a long qaṣīdah.

When Ziyād heard that al-Farazdaq had left, he sent 'Alī b. Zahdam, one of the Banū Nawlah[368] b. Fuqaym, in search of him. A'yan said: 'Alī sought him in the house of a Christian [101] woman called Bint Marrār of the Banū Qays b. Tha'labah who dwelt in Qaṣīmah Kāẓimah.[369] She pulled him out through a crack in her house and 'Alī was unable to catch him. Al-Farazdaq said about that:[370]

I came to the daughter of al-Marrār, who took the opportunity to desire.
and the likes of me is not desired below stairs.[371]

---

365. Boucher, Divan reads:

As if a neck, her halter doubled on it, from al-Sāj, if not her nose and its throats.

366. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "When I passed beyond al-Ghāriyyān;" Boucher, Divan reads: "When al-Furayyān came before me." Al-Furayyān was a mountain in the territory of the Banū Asad between al-Nibāj and al-Nakrah. This is the thirteenth line in the Divan.

367. Ṣāwī, Sharḥ reads: "Al-Bahzī bestowed her on me, myself his ransom." This is also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 610.

368. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: Banū Maw'alah.

369. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: Quṣaybah. Qaṣīmah Kāzimah was on the Gulf coast below al-Baṣrah. A qaṣīmah is a tract of sand covered with small shrubs.

370. These lines are also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 611, and Boucher, Divan, 66.

371. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 611 reads:

You refused the daughter of al-Marrār, who ripped up in order to desire,
And the likes of me is not desired behind the barn;

But my desire, if you wish our meeting[372] [is] the vast expanse[373] of the deserts, not desire[374] for jungles.

She is said to have been Rabī'ah bt. al-Marrār b. Salāmah al-'Ijlī, the mother of Abū al-Najm al-Rājiz.

(According to) Abū 'Ubaydah—Misma' b. 'Abd al-Mālik: Al-Farazdaq reached al-Rawḥā'[375] and settled among the Bakr b. Wā'il and was safe. He thus said, eulogizing them:[376]

When she compared whither to journey,[377] she did not find for her rising up[378] [anyone] like the tribe of Bakr b. Wā'il,

More virtuous and more faithful towards an obligation which they contract, when the top of the summits balanced the upper backs.[379]

It is a long qaṣīdah. He also eulogized them in other qaṣīdahs.

Al-Farazdaq would live in al-Kūfah when Ziyād lived in al-Baṣrah, and when Ziyād lived in al-Kūfah, al-Farazdaq would live in al-Baṣrah. Ziyād would live in al-Baṣrah for six months and in al-Kūfah for six months, When Ziyād learned about what al-Farazdaq did, he wrote to his official in charge of al-Kūfah, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd, "Al-Farazdaq is a wild male [102] beast grazing in the wastelands. When people come upon him, he becomes frightened and leaves them for other territory, where he pastures. So seek him until you seize him."

Boucher, Divan, 66 reads:

You came to the daughter of al-Marrâr, who tears off her veil, and the likes of me is not desired beneath the cushions [or trees].

372. Boucher, Divan reads: "my desire."
373. Boucher, Divan reads: "wide."
374. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ; Boucher, Divan read: "hiding."
375. Al-Rawḥā' is said to be a place between al-Madīnah and Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 828–9.
376. These lines are also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 612, and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 31–2.
377. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "She had been inclined between the departure."
378. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "for her private parts."
379. Explained in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ: "The humps became like the withers from drought and sparse pasture."

Al-Farazdaq said: I was sought most diligently so that those who used to shelter me began to turn me out of their homes. As a result, the land was restricted for me. While I had my head wrapped up in my garment upon the road, whoever came in search of me passed me by.

When it was night, I came to some of my uncles belonging to the Banū Ḍabbah while they were celebrating a wedding. I had not tasted food before that. When I said I came for their (wedding feast), I got some food. But while I was sitting, I noticed someone leading a horse, and the tip of a spear had gone through the doorway of the house and was entering where we were. My hosts went up to a reed wall, lifted it up, and I went out under it. Then they said, "We didn't see him." After they searched for a while, the searchers left. When it was morning my relatives came to me, saying, "Leave for the Ḥijāz, out of Ziyād's reach, so he won't seize you. For if he had seized you last night, you would have destroyed us." They collected the price of two female riding camels, and spoke for me to Muqā'is, one of the Banū Taym Allāh b. Tha'labah who was a guide who conveyed merchants.

We then went out to Bāniqyā until we reached one of the inhabited fortresses. Since the gate was not opened for us, as it was a moonlit night, we threw down our saddlebags beside the wall. I asked, "O Muqā'is, do you think that if Ziyād should send men after we reach al-'Atīq, that they would overpower us?" He replied, "Yes, they are watching for us, but they would not be going beyond al-'Atīq"—the latter was a defensive fortification (khandaq) which had belonged to the Persians.[380] I asked, "What do people say?" He replied, "They say, 'Give him [103] a respite of a day and a night, then take him,' so set out." He added, "Indeed, I fear the lions." At that, I responded, "Lions are easier than Ziyād."

We then set out and left behind anything we saw, while a figure accompanied us without leaving us. I said, "O Muqā'is, do you see this figure? We leave behind everything else we pass, but indeed this figure has been keeping up with us since nightfall." He replied, "This is the lion." At that, it seemed to understand our conversation, and went forward until it lay down in the middle of the road. When we saw that, we halted and tied both forelegs of both our she-camels with two hobbles. I took my bow while Muqāʿis said, "O Thaʿlab! Do you know from whom we fled to you? From Ziyād." At that, it flicked pebbles with its tail so that the dust settled on us and on both of our she-camels. I asked, "Should I shoot at it?" And he replied, "Don't stir him up. When morning comes, he will leave." The lion then began to roar like thunder while Muqāʿis menaced it until daybreak. When the lion saw that (it was dawn), it turned away, and al-Farazdaq composed the following:[381]

380. It was part of the Khandaq Sābūr. See Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, I, 2286; Ibn Rustah, A'lāq, 107–8; Bakrī, Mu'jam, 914; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 476; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 111, 347–8; Nyberg, "Die sassanidische Westgrenze," 318; Frye, "The Sasanian System of Walls for Defense." 8–11.

I did not consider myself a coward after what I experienced at night beside the canals,

A lion, as if it were a camel [when it stands] on its paws strong clawed, firm[382] clawed,

When I heard it's roar, I burst into tears for myself, and said, "Whither shall I flee?"[383]

While I encouraged myself, and said, "Be steadfast," and cinched up my clothing in the anxiety of the situation.

So you are easier to confront[384] than Ziyād, go to you! O render of journeys![385]

(According to) Ibn Saʿd—Abū ʿUbaydah—Aʿyan b. Labaṭah—his father—Shabath b. Ribʿī al-Riyāḥī: These verses were recited to Ziyād, and he seemed to take pity on al-Farazdaq, saying, "If he should come to me, I would grant him a guaran- [104]

381. These lines are also in Bevan, Naḳāʾiḍ, 617.
382. The text reads: muʾjadah; O reads: mūkhazah, "stabbing."
383. Lit: "Where is my flight?"
384. Bevan, Naḳāʾiḍ reads: "with us."
385. Bevan, Naḳāʾiḍ: "render of travellers" is better.

teed safe-conduct and a stipend." When al-Farazdaq heard about that, he said:[386]

This heart recalled a memory about its longing, remembered a longing that it will never forget.

It remembered Ẓamyā' whom it does not forget even if nearly ten pilgrimages[387] have passed since having contact with her.

And there is no gazelle with her fawn in the lowlands, the lowlands of Tihāmah, grazing on[388] arāk[389] in its luxurient[390] vegetation,[391]

Tan-skinned,[392] with dark-red[393] tear ducts,[394] she watches over a fawn which she considers to be weak,[395]

Who fell into a snare in the valley[396] of Walwalān so she struggled until they thought she would escape,[397]

Lovelier than Ẓamyā' on a day when she ventured,[398] nor rain clouds whose thunder-head went away in the evening.

---

386. This poem is also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 617–18, and Boucher, Divan, 20–21.

387. That is, "years."

388. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "watching out for."

389. Arāk is a spiny shrub on which camels graze and from which toothbrushes are made.

390. The text reads: manābitihi; C reads: makhāzimihā, "pasture;" Boucher, Divan reads: makhārimihā, "openings."

391. Boucher, Divan reads: "ravines."

392. Al-udm, when refering to deer, is a light brown, almost white color. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XII, 10–12. Boucher, Divan reads: "bending."

393. Ḥawwā' is the color of a lip between red and black. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XIV, 207.

394. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: ḥawrā', "very black and very white eye."

395. The text reads: fatrā; C reads: qaṭrā, "stingy."

396. The text reads: bi-wādī; Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ; Boucher, Divan read: bi'a'lā, "on the summit."

397. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 618 reads: "you thought she would break."

398. Boucher, Divan reads: "when I encountered her."

How many protectors are around her with a bridle.[399] while enemies of folk are vowing [to shed] my blood.

When they threatened me in the presence of Ẓamyā', such threats [105] grieved her, and she said, "Don't abuse him."

Ziyād summons me for the stipend, but I would not come to him as long as someone with a noble lineage distributes wealth.[400]

With Ziyād, if he wants their stipend, are many men in whom poverty is seen,

Sitting before the gates, petitioners for a need because of serious[401] needs or a new need.

When I feared that his stipend would be black fetters or twisted brown whip-cords,

I reached a lean she-camel, emaciated from travelling by night and traversing the desolate land.

She exhales in a wide open space from the hollow[402] when the protruding ends of her ribs expand the girth.[403]

You see her when the day reaches noon as if she seeks to outrace a camel stallion, or to steal a wager from him.

She wades when the echo rings out after slumber of the early night, roaring, its dark[404] thickets.

---

399. The text reads: fi-ṣarīmah, which can also mean "in an isolated patch of sand."

400. This and several following lines are also in Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, Iqd, V, 320.

401. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, Boucher, Divan, 21 read: "somewhat old."

402. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "the air."

403. A dafr is a strap made of plaited goat's hair used as a camel-saddle girth.

404. Khudrā refers to the darkness of long winter nights. This line is in the Naḳā'iḍ but not in the Divan.

[106] So, if she swerved aside [it was] obliquely, or a waterless desert made her[405] hurry, you see the dusty cracks from it.

They gallop past reddish[406] pebbles as if they crushed[407] coals thereby from every gravel bed.

How many a secret enemy has she gone past in fear of him until she is a bridge for herself.[408]

One directs her to the desert who does not regard[409]
the son of Abū Sufyān as having nobility or an excuse.

Don't rush me, my two companions, for perhaps
I will reach the watering place before an early-flying[410] kudrah.[411]

In the bosom of the darkness of night, I set out with a youth who was nodding his head, whose drowsiness had intoxicated him.

Drowsiness struck him on the head until he was as one whose skull was wounded by rocks which left a crack in it.

From the journey and travelling all night,[412] you would think that[413]

---

405. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "us."
406. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "grayish."
407. Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ reads: "shattered."
408. Boucher, Divan, 21 reads:

> On the back of a galloper as if its sides > were backs of hard tracts of soil appearing red.

409. Boucher, Divan reads: "Whom you do not regard as having."
410. Ghādiyah are birds that fly out in the morning or morning clouds. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XV, 118.
411. A kudrah is a swiftly-flying desert bird. This is the last line in the Divan.
412. Boucher, Divan reads: "journeying uninterruptedly."
413. Boucher, Divan reads: "until it was as though."

drowsiness gave him wine to drink in every stopping place.

We dragged along, and took care of him until it seemed as though he saw the first rays of dawn, a troop of golden horsemen.

We proceeded and reached al-Madīnah while Sa'īd b. al-'Aṣ b. Umayyah was in charge of it. As he was in a funeral procession, I followed him and found him sitting while the corpse was being buried. I went up and stood before him, saying, "This is the place of refuge for a man who is not guilty of [shedding] blood or [stealing] property." Sa'īd replied, "I hereby grant you refuge if you have not been guilty of either." Then he asked, "Who are you?" I answered, "I am Hammām b. Ghālib b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah. I have praised the amīr, and if he saw fit to give me permission, I would let him hear it, so do so." At that Sa'īd said, "Let me have it." So I recited:[414] [107]

By great-humped [camels] which please the guests as a well and become heavy in their kneeling-places, until I came to the end, and Marwān said:[415]

Sitting, they looked at Sa'īd.

I responded, "By God, indeed you are standing up, O Abū 'Abd al-Malik."

Ka'b b. Ju'ayl also spoke up, "This, by God, is the dream that I saw last night." Sa'īd asked, "What did you see?" He replied, "I saw myself walking in one of the streets of al-Madīnah. All at once I was with Ibn Qitrah in a hole, and it seemed as though he wanted to get me, so I avoided him. Al-Ḥuṭay'ah[416] then rose up and split the space between myself and Ibn Qitrah 414. This line is from a qaṣīdah which is also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 619, and Boucher, Divan, 35.

415. Boucher, Divan, 37 reads: "Standing, they looked at Sa'īd." See also Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 619, and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 21.

416. Al-Ḥuṭay'ah, "the deformed," was the Arab poet Jarwal b. Aws (b. ca. 582) who appears to have been still alive when Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ was governor of al-Madīnah. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥuṭay'a.

so that he went past me, saying, "Say what you want, for you know whoever has departed, while whoever has remained does not know you." Ka'b told Sa'īd, "This, by God, refers to poetry which will not be explained from this day on."

Al-Farazdaq remained in al-Madīnah for a while and in Mecca for a while, and he said about that:[417]

Who would inform Ziyād about me?
ambling on, the courier [barīd] conveys the message,

That I have fled to Sa'īd, and whoever Sa'īd defends is untouched.

[108] I fled to him from a wild lion whose prey the [other] lions leave alone.

So, if you like, you were related to the Christians, and, if you like, you were related to the Jews,

(It is also transmitted: And you and I were related to the Jews),

And, if you like, you were related to Fuqaym, and you would be related to me and I would be related to the monkeys,

And more loathsome to me than they are the Banū Fuqaym, but I will do what you want.

He also said:[418]

Threats came to me from Ziyād, so I did not sleep, while a flood of agony [was] before me and the hill of the plains,

I thus spent the night as if I felt a Khaybariyyah fever coursing through my veins or the poison of a snake.[419]

---

417. These lines are also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 619; with variants, and in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 31.

418. These lines are also in Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, 20, and Boucher, Divan, 114.

419. Al-arāqim are snakes colored black and white. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XII, 249–50.

I wouldn't think that you would leave me alone, Ziyād son of Ḥarb, and one with a grudge, I have shamed him not unjustly.

('Amr also recited to me: And with the grudge you have shamed me not unjustly),

A qaṣīdah from me fought Iraq hurling invectives, with sharp, piercing points,

Light on the mouths of narrators, heavy on their opponent, settling in the seasons.[420]

It is a long (poem). Al-Farazdaq remained between Mecca and al-Madīnah until Ziyād perished.

In this year the death of al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī oc- [109] curred at Marw. This happened after he had returned from a raid against the people of the mountain of al-Ashall.

Al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr Raids al-Ashall

I was told by 'Umar b. Shabbah—Ḥātim b. Qabīsah—Ghālib b. Sulaymān—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ: I was with al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr in Khurāsān. Ziyād wrote to (Ibn) 'Amr, "The weapons of the people of the mountain of al-Ashall are felts and their vessels are gold." So Ibn 'Amr raided them until his force reached the middle (of the pass), whereupon the enemy took to the mountain trails and roads and surrounded him. At that he dispaired of the matter and put al-Muhallab[421] in charge of the war. Al-Muhallab continued to strive until he captured one of their leading men and said to him, "Choose whether I should kill you or whether you will get us out of this pass." The man then told him, "Light a fire in one of these roads, order the baggage brought up, and turn towards that road so the folk will think that you have already started to travel along it. At that, they will gather [there] for you and abandon the other roads.

420. The text reads: mawāsim, "seasons"; these were times of poetic competition.

421. Al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah al-Azdī (ca. 8–82[630–701/2]) became a famous Baṣran general. See EI[1], s.v. al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufra.

Then leave them for another, and they will not overtake you until you have left the pass." They did so, and escaped, taking great amounts of booty.

We were told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr returned from the mountain of al-Ashall he put al-Muhallab in charge of his rear guard. They travelled on narrow mountain roads, and the Turks resisted them, taking to the roads against them. On one of those mountain trails they found a man singing two verses from behind a wall:

[110] You are consoled by steadfastness and your good fortune. You don't see an outstanding refuge other than the former nights,

As if my heart, from my memory of the refuge and the people of refuge, has the feathers of a bird fluttering in it.

When he was brought to al-Ḥakam, the latter asked him about his circumstance. The man explained, "I competed with my cousin, so I left. I went upand down in the land until I settled in this country." Al-Ḥakam took him to Ziyād in Iraq. Al-Ḥakam escaped from (the pass) so that he reached Harāt, and then he returned to Marw.

I was told by 'Umar—Ḥātim b. Qabīsah—Ghālib b. Sulaymān—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ: Ziyād wrote to al-Ḥakam, "By God, if you survive, I would certainly behead you!" That was because Ziyād had written to him when the news reached him about what booty he had taken, "Indeed the Commander of the Faithful has written to me to select gold, silver, and precious objects for him so don't move anything until you take that out." Al-Ḥakam had written back to him, "Now then, indeed, your letter arrived [in which] you mention that 'the Commander of the Faithful has written to me to select all [the] gold, silver, and precious objects for him, so don't move anything.' Indeed, the Book of God, Almighy and Great, is prior to the letter of the Commander of the Faithful. Indeed, by God, if the heavens and the earth were of one piece[422] a servant must fear

422. Qur'ān 21:30.

God, Almighty and Great. God, praise be to Him, Most High, gave him a way out." He also told the people to go and take their booty, so they did, while he had set aside the fifth. He divided that booty among them equally. Al-Ḥakam then said, "O God, if I have done what You consider good, then take me." [111]
Thus he died in Khurāsān at Marw. [According to] 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When al-Ḥakam was dying at Marw, he appointed Anas b. Abī Unās as his deputy—that was in this year.

The Events of the Year

51

(JANUARY 18, 671–JANUARY 7, 672)

Among the events during this year were the winter campaign of Faḍālah b. ʿUbayd against Byzantine territory, the summer raid of Busr b. Abī Arṭāt, and the execution of Ḥujr b. ʿAdī and his companions.

Ḥujr b. ʿAdī's Execution

Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Saʿīd, al-Ṣaqʿab b. Zuhayr, Fuḍayl b. Khadīj, and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿUqbah al-Marādī have all told me some of this narrative, so their account was combined with what I transmitted of the narrative about Ḥujr b. ʿAdī al-Kindī and his companions: When Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān put al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah in charge of al-Kūfah in Jumādā 41 (September 2–October 30, 661), he summoned him. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "Now then, indeed a forbearing person has been admonished in the past.[423] Al-Mutalammis[424] has said:

423. See Freytag, Proverbia, I, 55–7.

424. Jarīr b. ʿAbd al-Masīh (or ʿAbd al-ʿUzzah) al-Mutalammis (d. ca. 569) was

A forbearing person has been admonished in the past, and man was taught only in order to learn.

The wise might do what you want without instruction. Although I have wanted to advise you about many things, I left them alone, trusting in your discernment of what pleases me, what helps my regime and what sets my subjects [ra'iyyah] on [112] the right path. I would continue to advise you about a quality of yours—do not refrain from abusing 'Alī and criticizing him, nor from asking God's mercy upon 'Uthmān and His forgiveness for him. Continue to shame the companions of 'Alī, keep them at a distance, and don't listen to them. Praise the faction of 'Uthmān, bring them near, and listen to them." At that al-Mughīrah responded, "I have experienced [others], and [they] have experienced me. Before working for you I worked for others. I do not mind rejection, nor promotion, nor demotion. After you have experienced [me], you will praise or blame [me]." Mu'āwiyah replied, "No, we shall praise if God wills."

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—al-Sha'bī: We never had a governor like him afterwards, even if previously there had been good officials.

Al-Mughīrah remained governor of al-Kūfah for Mu'āwiyah for seven years and (some) months. He was the best behaved and the most (strongly) in favor of well-being, in spite of the fact that he would not stop blaming 'Alī for what had happened and for killing 'Uthmān. He continued to curse those who had killed the latter, while he called for mercy and forgiveness for 'Uthmān and vindication for his companions. When Ḥujr b. 'Adī heard that, he used to say, "May God rebuke and curse you instead." Then he stood up and said, "Indeed, God, Almighty and Great, says, 'Be custodians in fairness, witnesses for God.'[425] I testify that the one you rebuke and condemn is more deserving of merit, and the one you vindicate and extol is more entitled to blame." Al-Mughīrah would then tell him, "O Ḥujr, your arrow was shot; now I am governor over you. O Ḥujr, woe unto you. Fear the regime. Fear its wrath and its power. Indeed [113] a minor pre-Islamic poet from Baḥrayn. See 'Abd al-Qādir al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al-adab, III, 73, Vollers, "Mutalammis," and Zirkilī, al-A'lām, II, 119.

---

425. Qur'ān 4:135.

the fury of the regime can destroy many of the likes of you." Then he would desist and forgive Ḥujr. He continued thus until, at the end of his governorship, al-Mughīrah arose and said what he used to say about 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah, which was, "O God, have mercy on 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and don't punish him, but reward him for his best work. For, indeed, he acted according to Your Book and the example [sunnah] of Your Prophet. He united our speech, and prevented our blood from being shed, and yet, he was wrongly killed. O God, have mercy also on his adherents, supporters, friends, and those who seek vengeance for him." He would also call for 'Uthmān's murderers (to be punished). At that, Ḥujr b. 'Adī jumped up, and let out a scream at al-Mughīrah that everyone who was in the mosque and outside of it heard, saying, "You certainly do not understand what men burn for, because of your senility,[426] O man. Order our rations and stipends for us, for you have certainly withheld them from us, and that is not your right, and no one who preceded you has desired that. You have become passionate about blaming the Commander of the Faithful and praising the criminals." At that, more than two-thirds[427] of the people stood up with him saying, "By God. Ḥujr was right and honest. Order our rations and stipends for us, for this talk of yours doesn't do us any good, and it gives us nothing profitable." And they increased this kind of talk.

At that, al-Mughīrah descended (from the pulpit) and entered (the governor's residence). When his folk asked permission to attend him, he admitted them, and they said, "Why do you leave this man alone who makes this statement and whose insolence is so bold during your regime. Indeed, you acquire two faults thereby. The first is the degradation of your regime. The other is that if it should reach Mu'āwiyah, it would make him [114] angry with you." 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Aqīl al-Thaqafī was the most severe of them (in) speaking to him about the matter of Ḥujr and its importance. Al-Mughīrah answered, "I have killed him. He will come to a governor after me, and will regard him like me and treat him in the same way as you see him treating

426. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 2: "What he burns for, or are you senile?"
427. O reads: "thirty of;" Iṣfahānī, Aghānī: "thirty men."

me. As a result, that governor will seize Ḥujr at once, and kill him in an evil way. Indeed my appointed time draws near, and my actions have become weak. I do not want to start the people of this city killing the best among themselves and shedding their blood. They are fortunate thereby, while I am miserable. Mu'āwiyah will grow strong in this world, while al-Mughīrah will be humbled on the Day of Resurrection. But, I shall receive those who are pleasing and forgive those who are displeasing. I shall praise the prudent and admonish the impudent until death should separate me from them. They will remember me if they should put officials to the test after me."[428]

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—'Uthmān b. 'Uqbah al-Kindī—a shaykh of the district who related this account: By God we put them to the test, and found him to be the best of them. He was the most commendable toward the innocent, the most forgiving toward those who were offensive, and the most receptive to excuses.

(According to) Hishām—'Awānah: Al-Mughīrah became governor of al-Kūfah in Jumādā 41(661/662), and he died this year. Al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah were then combined for Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān. Ziyād advanced until he entered the citadel at al-Kūfah. Then he ascended the pulpit, and after he had praised and extolled God, he said, "Now then, indeed, we have been put to the test and we have tested. We have ruled and rulers have ruled us, and we have found that this matter would only be set right in the end by that which set it right at the beginning: tractable obedience, the same in secret as openly, when people are absent as when they are present, and [in] their hearts as [on] their tongues. We found that only flexibility without weakness and strength without violence would reform the people. As for myself, by God, I shall not undertake a matter with [115] you unless I carry it out to its smallest detail. There is no lie to which God and the people are witness greater than the lie of an imām upon the pulpit." Then he mentioned 'Uthmān and his companions, and praised them, and mentioned his murderers, and cursed them. Ḥujr then got up and did as he had done to al-Mughīrah.

428. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 4.

Whenever Ziyād would return to al-Baṣrah he would put 'Amr b. al-Ḥurayth in charge of al-Kūfah.[429] When he had returned to al-Baṣrah, he heard that the partisans of 'Alī had gathered to Ḥujr and had openly cursed and disavowed Mu'āwiyah, and that they had thrown pebbles at 'Amr b. al-Ḥurayth. At that, he set out for al-Kūfah and, upon arriving there, he entered the citadel. Then he went out and ascended the pulpit wearing a robe of silk brocade and a green silk scarf, having parted his hair, while Ḥujr was sitting in the mosque surrounded by more of his companions than before. After Ziyād had praised and extolled God, he said, "Now then, injustice and transgression have fatal consequences. Indeed, these [people] gathered and did evil. They felt safe from me, so they took liberties with me. I swear by God, if you do not straighten out, I shall cure you with your [own] medicine." He continued "I shall have accomplished nothing if I don't protect the plaza of al-Kūfah from Ḥujr and make him an example for whoever should come after him. Woe unto your mother, O Ḥujr! You found a wolf for dinner." Then he recited:

Tell Nuṣayḥah about the herdsman of her camels, that he found a wolf for dinner.[430]

Regarding the cause of the matter concerning Ḥujr, someone other than Awānah said that which I was told by 'Alī b. Ḥasan—Muslim al-Jarmī—Makhlad b. al-Ḥasan—Hishām—Muḥammad b. Sīrīn:[431] Ziyād spoke one Friday,[432] and by pro-[116] tracting the sermon he delayed the ṣalāṭ (worship). At that, Ḥujr b. 'Adī said to him, "The ṣalāṭ!" But he continued speaking. Ḥujr then repeated, "The ṣalāṭ!" But he continued speaking. When Ḥujr was afraid the (proper time for) worship would be past, he took a fist-full of pebbles and stood up to worship,

429. C reads: "he stayed in al-Kūfah six months, then he put 'Amr b. al-Ḥurayth in charge of it."

430. Lit: "dinner found a wolf for him." That is, he went out looking for dinner and chanced upon a wolf, so the wolf ate him, said of someone whose pursuit of his own needs leads him to destruction. See Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 329; Freytag, Proverbia, I, 599–600.

431. Muḥammad b. Sīrīn (34–110/654–728) was an early Baṣran authority on ḥadīth. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 140–50.

432. The text reads: fī al-jum'ah.

and the people stood up with him. When Ziyād saw that, he descended (from the pulpit) and led the people in worship. When he had finished, he wrote to Muʿāwiyah about the matter of Ḥujr and exaggerated it. Muʿāwiyah then wrote back to him, "Clamp him in irons, then deliver him to me." When Muʿāwiyah's letter arrived, and Ḥujr's folk wanted to protect him, Ḥujr said, "No, pay heed and obey instead."

When he had been clamped in irons, he was delivered to Muʿāwiyah. When Ḥujr entered the latter's presence, he said, "Peace be upon you, O Commander of the Faithful, and the mercy of God and His blessings." But Muʿāwiyah replied to him, "Commander of the Faithful! By God, I will not be addressed by you or consider speaking to you. Take him out and behead him." Upon being taken out from Muʿāwiyah's presence, Ḥujr said to those who were in charge of dealing with him, "Give me leave until I perform two prostrations." They replied, "Perform them." When he had performed two prostrations which he shortened, he said, "Lest you suppose that I am doing other than what I am, I would have liked for my prostrations to take longer than they did. These two prostrations are as good as any previous devotions." Then he told whomever of his folk attended him, "Don't undo the irons, and don't wash the blood off of me. I may meet Muʿāwiyah in the future on the street." Then he was brought forth, and his head was cut off.

(According to) Makhlad—Hishām: Whenever Muḥammad was asked about washing martyrs, he used to tell them the account of Ḥujr. Muḥammad said, When ʿA'ishah, the Mother of the Believers, met Muʿāwiyah (Makhlad said: I suppose he was in Mecca), she asked, "O Muʿāwiyah, where was your forbearance (ḥilm) towards Ḥujr? He replied, "[Someone] rightly-guided did not attend me on that occasion, O Mother of the Believers." Ibn Sīrīn said, "We heard that when his death was immanent he began to make a gurgling sound saying, "My day [117]
[of death] is long because of you, O Ḥujr."

(According to) Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Ismāʿīl b. Nuʿaym al-Namirī—Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh al-Hamdānī: When I was in the police force of Ziyād, he said, "One of you hurry off to Ḥujr, and summon him." At that the commander of the police, who was Shaddād b. al-Haytham al-Hilālī, told me to go and summon him. When I came to him, saying, "Comply with the governor," his friends said, "Don't go to him or show respect." Upon returning to Ziyād and informing him, he ordered the commander of the police to send men with me, so he sent several men. We then came to Ḥujr, saying, "Comply with the governor." When they cursed and reviled us, we returned to Ziyād, and informed him about it. At that, Ziyād rushed to the notables of the Kūfans, saying, "O people of al-Kūfah, do you break with one hand while you console with the other? Your bodies are with me, while your affections are with this obsessed, stupid, crazy Ḥujr. By God, this comes from your plotting and your deceit. By God, demonstrate your innocence to me, or I shall bring against you folk by whom I shall bring about your downfall and your humiliation." At that, they rushed to Ziyād saying, "God forbid, may He be praised, that we have any other view in this situation than obedience to you and to the Commander of the Faithful. Command us to do whatever will satisfy you and demonstrate our obedience and our disagreement with Ḥujr." Ziyād replied, "Then let every one of you go to this group around Ḥujr and summon your brother, son, relative, and whoever of your clan obeys you, so that you make every one [of them that] you can stand up and leave him." They did this and made the majority of those (who were) with Ḥujr b. 'Adī stand up.

When Ziyād saw that the majority of those with Ḥujr had stood up and left him, he told Shaddād b. al-Haytham al- [118]
Hilālī—it is also said, Haytham b. Shaddād—the commander of his police, "Hurry off to Ḥujr. If he complies with you[r request], bring him to me, and if not, order whoever is with you to pull out the clubs of the marketplace.[433] Then assault them with the clubs so that you may bring him to me, and beat whoever resists." Al-Hilālī then came to Ḥujr, saying, "Comply with the governor!" The friends of Ḥujr replied, "No, there shall be no satisfaction.[434] We shall not comply with him." Al-Hilālī then told his men, "Seize the clubs of the marketplace." At that, they rushed to pull out the clubs, and advanced with them. 'Umayr b. Yazīd al-Kindī of the Banū Hind—that is Abū al-'Amaraṭah—said, "Indeed, I am the only man among you who has a sword, and that will not be enough for you." Ḥujr asked, "What do you think?" 'Umayr replied, "Get away from this place, and join your family. Your folk will defend you." As Ziyād stood watching them while he was upon the pulpit, the police came with clubs. One of the Ḥamrā', called Bakr b. 'Ubayd, struck the head of 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq with a club, felling him. Abū Sufyān b. 'Uwaymir and 'Ajlān b. Rabī'ah, who both belonged to the Azd, came to him and carried him (off). They brought him to the house of a man who belonged to the Azd called 'Ubaydallāh b. Mālik. They concealed him there, and he stayed hidden until he left.[435]

433. The text reads: 'umud. Ziyād's guard (ḥaras) was armed with staffs or clubs. Since a payment was levied on the people of the marketplace to support the guard, they may have patrolled the marketplace with their clubs. The clubs were probably stored in a bin in the mosque. See Behrnauer, "Mémoire," 467; Ṭabarī, II, 79.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—'Abdallāh b. 'Awf[436] b. al-Aḥmar: When we left for the campaign of Bājumayrā, one year before the death of Muṣ'ab (in 71[679]), I was accompanied by an Aḥmarī.[437] By God, I had not seen him since the day on which 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq was struck, and I did not think that I would recognize him if I saw him. When I saw him then, I supposed that he was Bakr. As we were still in view of the houses of al-Kūfah, I disliked asking him if he was the man [119] who had struck 'Umar b. al-Ḥamiq, lest he contradict me. As a result, I told him, "I have not seen you since the day on which you struck the head of 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq with the club in the mosque; I recognize you now." He answered me, "You have not lost your eyesight. How strong your vision is. That was the Devil's matter. Indeed, I had heard that it was a righteous matter, and I have regretted that blow, so I ask God's forgiveness." At that, I said to him, "Don't you think, by God, that you and I should not part until I hit you a blow on your head like that

434. Lit: "no comfort for an eye."
435. See the account in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 3–4.
436. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī: 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Awn.
437. O reads: "that blow," but see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 4. An Aḥmarī was one of the Ḥamrā', a group of Iranian soldiers settled at al-Kūfah.

which you struck 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq, [so that] either I die or you die?" He then adjured and implored me by God, but I refused him and summoned a young servant of mine called Rashīd, one of the captives from Iṣbahān, who had his firm spear with him. When I took it from Rashīd, I attacked Bakr with it. He then dismounted from his animal, and I caught him when both of his feet were level with the ground. I grazed the top of his head with the spear so that he fell on his face. I then went on my way, and left him. He recovered afterwards, and I met him two more times. Each time he would say, "God is between you and me." And I would reply, "God, Almighty and Great, is between you and 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq."

Then he resumed the previous account: When Bakr struck 'Amr that blow and those two men carried him off, the friends of Ḥujr withdrew to the gates of the Kindah. A man of Ḥudhām who was in the police was striking a man called 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī with a club. He struck him a blow and knocked him down, saying extemporaneously:

She knew on the day of tumult, my friend, that I, whenever my troop flees,

[120] And its enemies multiply or diminish, that I am lethal on the morning it started.

The hand of 'Ā'idh b. Ḥamalah al-Tamīmī was also struck and his eyetooth was broken, so he said:

If they break my eyetooth and the bone of my forearm,
Indeed, I have the force of experience,
And the strife of the battling hero.

Wresting a club from one of the police, he fought with it, protecting Ḥujr and his friends until they left the front of the gates of the Kindah. Ḥujr's mule had been [left] standing, and Abū al-'Amarraṭah brought her to him, saying, "They are all bastards except you. By God, I certainly think that you have killed yourself and killed us with you." Ḥujr then put his foot in the stirrup, but he was unable to mount, so Abū al-'Amarraṭah lifted him onto his mule. Abū al-'Amarraṭah then rushed to his own horse, and had just mounted when Yazīd b. Ṭarīf, who had a slight limp, reached him. He struck Abū al-ʿAmarraṭah with his club on the thigh, and Abū al-ʿAmarraṭah drew this sword and struck the head of Yazīd b. Ṭarīf with it so that he fell on his face. He recovered afterwards, and ʿAbdallāh b. Hammām al-Salūlī says about him:

I blame the son of baseness, except for you, openly,
to a hero, courageous and unyielding,

Returning the blow of the armored ones with his sword, on the top of the head when there is dismay, other than base,

To a horseman of both attacking [sides] the day you both met, [121] at Ṣiffīn, a sire, the best offspring of sires.

I considered[438] fighting with Ibn Barṣā al-Ḥitār[439] as you fought with Zayd on the Day of Dār Ḥakīm.

That sword was the first one which was employed to strike at al-Kūfah in the disputes among the people.

Ḥujr and Abū al-ʿAmarraṭah proceeded until they both reached Ḥujr's residence. Many of his supporters gathered to Ḥujr, and Qays b. Qahdān al-Kindī went forth on his donkey, setting out for the assemblies of the Kindah, saying:

O folk of Ḥujr, resist and contend on behalf of your brother for a while, so fight.

Let Ḥujr not be abandoned by you.
Is there not among you a lancer and an archer,

And an armored horseman, and infantryman, and swordsman who does not quit?

But many of the Kindah did not join Ḥujr, and Ziyād said, while he was on the pulpit, "Let the Hamdān, Tamīm, Hawāzin, the sons of Aʿṣur, the Madhḥij, Asad, and the Ghaṭafān rise

438. Cairo reads: "You considered."
439. Lit: "circle of the rump."

up and come to the cemetery of the Kindah. Whoever gathers there is to proceed to Ḥujr and bring him to me." Then, since he disliked to dispatch a troop of the Muḍar together with a troop of the people of al-Yaman, because discord and disagreement might occur between them, and fanaticism might ruin [122] their relationship, he said, "Let the Tamīm, Hawāzin, the sons of A'ṣur, the Asad, and the Ghaṭafān stay, and let the Madhḥij and Hamdān proceed to the cemetery of the Kindah. Then let them go to Ḥujr and bring him to me. Let the rest of the people of the Yaman go and halt at the cemetery of the Ṣā'idiyyīn, and [then] proceed to their companion, and bring him to me." At that, the Azd, Bajīlah, Kath'am, Anṣār,[440] Khuzā'ah, and Quḍā'ah went out and halted at the cemetery of the Ṣā'idiyyīn. The Ḥaḍramawt did not go out with the people of the Yaman because of their position among the Kindah. They disliked having to go out in pursuit of Ḥujr, because the Ḥaḍramawt traditionally called upon the Kindah for support (in war).[441]

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Mikhnaf: indeed I was with the people of the Yaman in the cemetery of the Ṣā'idiyyīn when the leaders of the people of the Yaman assembled deliberating about the matter of Ḥujr. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf told them, "I offer you advice. If you should accept it, I would hope that you would be safe from blame and offense. I think you should delay a little, for soon youths of the Hamdān and Madhḥij will save you the trouble of what you dislike doing, namely the misdeed of your folk concerning your companion." They agreed on that. As a result, by God, it was only when, and certainly not until, we learned that the Madhḥij and Hamdān had entered and taken every one they found of the Banū Jabalah,[442] that the people of the Yaman marched past along the sides of the houses of the Kindah as an excuse. When Ziyād heard about that, he praised the Madhḥij and Hamdān, and blamed the rest of the people of the Yaman.

---

440. The Anṣār, "Helpers," were Muslims from al-Madīnah who had settled in al-Kūfah.

441. See above, n. 277.

442. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī reads: "among the Banū Bajīlah." That is, those who were friends of Ḥujr.

When Ḥujr reached his house, and saw how few of his folk were with him and heard that the Madhḥij and Hamdān had [123] halted at the cemetery of the Kindah and the rest of the people of the Yaman at the cemetery of the Ṣā'idiyyīn, he said to his companions, "Depart, for by God, you won't be able to deal with those of your folk who have gathered against you. I don't want to subject you to destruction." As they were about to depart, the lead cavalry of the Madhḥij and Hamdān caught them. So 'Umayr b. Yazīd, Qays b. Yazīd, 'Ubaydah b. 'Amr al-Baddī, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥriz al-Ṭumaḥī, and Qays b. Shimr engaged them in battle. The cavalry fought against him[443] for a while, inflicting wounds. Qays b. Yazīd was captured while the rest of (Ḥujr's) folk escaped. At that, Ḥujr told them, "Scatter! Don't fight! I shall take to one of the side streets, then take a road near the Banū Ḥūt."[444] He went off until he reached the house of one of their men called Sulaym b. Yazīd. Ḥujr entered Sulaym's house, while (Ziyād's) folk came seeking him until they reached that house. At that, Sulaym b. Yazīd took his sword, and was about to go out to them, while his daughters wept. So Ḥujr asked him, "What do you intend?" Sulaym replied, "I want, by God, to ask them to leave you. If they do so, [fine]; and if not, I shall protect you, fighting them with this sword of mine as long as its blade is firm in my hand." Ḥujr told him, "You are no bastard. Then what a miserable thing I will have brought upon your daughters." Sulaym answered, "Indeed, by God, they will only be safe and provided for with the Living [One], Who does not die. I shall never exchange shame for anything, and you shall not go out of my house as a prisoner while I am alive and possess my sword-blade. If I am killed protecting you, then you should do what seems good to you." Ḥujr asked, "Is there no wall in this house of yours which I could break through or an opening I could get out through? Perhaps God, Almighty and Great, will save me from them and save you as well. If [Ziyād's] folk do not capture me in your house, they will not harm you." Sul- [124] aym replied, "Yes, here is an opening which will get you out to

443. C and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī read: "against them."
444. The manuscripts and Cairo and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī read: Banū Ḥarb.

the houses of the Banū al-'Anbar and to others of your folk."

He then went out, past the Banū Dhul, who told him, "[Ziyād's] folk have already gone by in search of you, following your tracks." He told them, "I am fleeing from them." He then went out, with their youths showing him the way. They took him through the alleys until he reached the Nakha'. At that point he told them, "Depart, may God have mercy upon you." At that, they left him, and he came to the house of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, the brother of al-Ashtar, and entered it. As soon as he came in, 'Abdallāh threw down the cushions, rolled out the carpets, and received him joyfully with good cheer. Then he learned that the police were asking about him among the Nakha'. That was because a black slave girl called Admā' met them and asked, "Whom do you seek?" When they answered that they were seeking Ḥujr, she responded, "There he is. I saw him among the Nakha'." At that, they went off towards the Nakha'. Ḥujr then left the home of 'Abdallāh in disguise, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith rode with him at night until he came to the house of Rabī'ah b. Nājid al-Azdī, among the Azd, where he stayed for a day and a night.

When they were unable to capture Ḥujr, Ziyād summoned Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, and told him, "O Abū Maythā', by God, either bring Ḥujr to me or I shall chop down every single palm tree of yours and demolish every single house. Then you will not be safe from me until I cut you to pieces." He answered, "Grant me a respite so that I may look for him." Ziyād replied, "I grant you a respite for three days. If you bring him, [125] [fine]; if not, consider yourself doomed." Muḥammad was taken out red faced, and pushed roughly towards the prison. At that, Ḥujr b. Yazīd al-Kindī said to Ziyād, "Let me vouch for him, and release him to search for his companion. If he were freed, his faculties would be more adequate to capture him than if he were imprisoned." Ziyād asked, "Will you vouch for him?" He replied that he would and Ziyād declared, "However, by God, if he escapes from you, I shall certainly make you visit death, even if you are honored by me now." Ḥujr b. Yazīd answered, "Indeed, he will not do it, so release him." Then Ḥujr b. Yazīd interceded with him for Qays b. Yazīd, who had been brought to Ziyād as a prisoner. Ziyād told them, "Don't worry about Qays. We have known his views about 'Uthmān and his bravery at the Battle of Ṣiffīn with the Commander of the Faithful." Then he sent for Qays. When he was brought to him, Ziyād told him, "Indeed, I knew that you did not fight along with Ḥujr because you shared his views, but you fought along with him out of solidarity. I have forgiven you for it because of what I know about your good views and the excellence of your bravery, but I will not leave you alone until you bring me your brother, 'Umayr." Qays answered, "I will bring him to you, if God wills." Ziyād said, "Then give me someone who will vouch for him along with yourself." Qays replied, "This Ḥujr b. Yazīd will vouch for him along with me." Ḥujr b. Yazīd said, "Yes, I vouch for him on condition that you grant him security for his property and his blood." Ziyād replied, "You have that." Then they both hurried off and brought 'Umayr in his wounded condition. Ziyād ordered for him to be weighed down with iron. Then the men took 'Umayr and lifted him until, when he was waist-high, they threw him down so he fell on the ground. Then they lifted him up again and threw him down. They did that with him several times. At that, Ḥujr b. Yazīd got up and asked Ziyād "Did you not guarantee his property and his blood? May God reform you." Ziyād replied, "Of course, I guaranteed his property and his blood, and I am not shedding his blood or taking his property." Ḥujr b. Yazīd retorted, "May God reform you, he is almost cured to death by it." Ḥujr b. Yazīd drew near to 'Umayr while those people of the Yaman [126] who were with him rose up, drew near 'Umayr, and spoke to him. Ziyād then asked, "Do you vouch to me for him, so that whenever he commits a misdeed, you will bring him to me?" They said that they would and Ziyād asked, "Do you also vouch to [pay] me blood money for the blows at the place of worship?"[445] When they replied, "We vouch for it," Ziyād let 'Umayr go.

Ḥujr b. 'Adī stayed in the residence of Rabī'ah b. Nājid al-Azdī for a day and a night. Then Ḥujr sent a youth of his called Rashīd, belonging to the people of Iṣbahān, to Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath (saying), "I have heard what this stubborn tyrant did to you. Don't be alarmed at all by him. I will come out to you. Gather a group of your folk, then enter Ziyād's presence and ask him to grant me a guarantee of safe-conduct in order to send me to Mu'āwiyah so he may see what he thinks of me." Ibn al-Ash'ath then went out to Ḥujr b. Yazīd, Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, the brother of al-Ashtar, and brought them. They entered Ziyād's presence, interceded with him, and beseeched him to grant Ḥujr a guarantee of safe-conduct in order to send him to Mu'āwiyah so the latter could see what he thought of him. When Ziyād did so, they sent Ḥujr's messenger back to him informing him that they had gotten what he had asked for, and commanding him to come. When he came and entered Ziyād's presence, Ziyād said, "Welcome to you Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, war in the time of war, and war while the people have made peace. 'A many-colored dog harms its own family.'"[446] Ḥujr replied, "I did not renounce obedience or withdraw from any community. Indeed I am on my allegiance." Ziyād answered, "How wrong, O Ḥujr. You break with one hand and nurse with the other. When God gives you an opportunity, you want us to overlook it. Not at all, by God." Ḥujr asked, "Didn't you grant me a guarantee of safe-conduct so that I should come to Mu'āwiyah and he could see what he thinks of me?" Ziyād replied, "Yes, we have done so. Take him off to the prison." When Ḥujr had been sent out of his presence, Ziyād remarked, "However, by God, if there were no [127] guarantee of safe-conduct, he would not depart without spilling his own heartsblood."[447] (According to) Hishām b. 'Urwah—'Awānah: Ziyād remarked, "By God, I certainly intend to snip the thread of his neck."

445. C reads: "against the Muslims."

(According to) Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf, and al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd—al-Sha'bī, and Zakariyyā' b. Abī Zā'idah—Abū Isḥāq: When Ḥujr was sent out of Ziyād's presence, he shouted at the top of his voice, "O God, I am on my allegiance. I don't revoke it or call for its revocation. Listen to God and the 446. Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 14–15; Freytag, Proverbia, II, 89–90. Such a dog, by barking at others, gives its masters away, so they perish and the dog with them.

447. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 4 reads: "without casting down his sinews."

people." He was wearing a cloak with a hood (burnus) on a cold morning. He was thus imprisoned for ten nights while Ziyād's only labor was to seek the leaders of Ḥujr's companions.

At that, 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq and Rifā'at b. Shaddād left and halted at al-Madā'in. Then they departed until they came to the territory of Mosul. They came to a mountain and hid there. When the official of that subdistrict (rustāq), who was a man belonging to the Hamdān called 'Abdallāh b. Abī Balta'ah, heard that two men had hidden in the mountainside, he suspected their circumstances. He set out for them with cavalry and local people towards the mountain. When he reached them, they both went out. As far as 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq is concerned, he was sick and his belly was billious[448] so he could not resist. But as for Rifā'at b. Shaddād, he was young and strong, and jumped on his race horse. Rifā'at asked 'Amr, "Shall I fight on your behalf?" 'Amr replied, "It would be of no use to me for you to fight. Save yourself if you can." When Rifā'at attacked them, they parted for him, and he went out, his horse bolting with him, while the cavalry went off in pursuit of him. As 'Amr was a good shot, he began to shoot every horseman who overtook him, injuring or wounding him. So they turned away from him. When 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq was taken, they asked him, "Who are you?" He replied, "One who, if you leave him alone, would be peaceful to you, and if you fight him would harm [128] you." Thus they asked him, but he refused to tell them. Ibn Abī Balta'ah then sent him to the governor of Mosul, who was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān al-Thaqafī. When the latter saw 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq, he recognized him, and wrote to Mu'āwiyah with his information. Mu'āwiyah wrote back, "'Amr claimed that he stabbed 'Uthmān b. 'Affān nine times with a dagger that he had with him, so stab him nine times just as he stabbed 'Uthmān." At that, 'Amr was taken out and stabbed nine times, and he died from the first or second blow.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī, and Zakariyyā' b. Abī Zā'idah—Isḥāq: When Ziyād sent in search of the companions of Ḥujr, they began to flee from him, and he seized whomever of them he was able. He sent the commander of the police, who was Shaddād b. al-Haytham, to Qabīṣah b. Ḍubay'ah b. Ḥarmalah al-'Absī. When Qabīṣah summoned his folk and took his sword, Rib'ī b. Ḥirāsh b. Jahsh al-'Absī and a few men belonging to his folk came to him. When he wanted to fight, the commander of the police said to him, "You are secure for your blood and your property, so why would you kill yourself?" His friends then said to him, "You have been granted security, so why do you kill yourself and us with you?" He replied, "Woe unto you! Indeed, by God, if I fall into the hands of this bastard son of the whore[449] I will never be released from him unless he kills me." They answered, "By no means," so he put his hand in theirs and they brought him to Ziyād. When they had entered his presence, Ziyād said, "By the tribe of 'Abs, you are respected by me for the faith. However, by God, I shall certainly make an occupation for you instead of in-[129] citing riots and attacking governors." Qabīṣah said, "I only came to you under a guarantee of safe-conduct." Ziyād ordered, "Take him off to the prison."

448. The text reads: saqā, to be full of yellow water which collects in the stomach from illness.

Qays b. 'Ubād al-Shaybānī also came to Ziyād telling him, "There is a man among us belonging to the Banū Hammām called Ṣayfī b. Fasīl, one of the leaders of Ḥujr's companions. He is the most violent of people against you." When Ziyād had him brought to him, he said to Ṣayfī, "O Enemy of God, what do you say about Abū Turāb?" Ṣayfī replied, "I do not know Abū Turāb." Ziyād asked, "What will make you recognize him?" Ṣayfī answered, "I do not know him." Ziyād asked, "Don't you know 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib?" When Ṣayfī replied that he did, Ziyād responded, "That is Abū Turāb." Ṣayfī rejoined, "Certainly not! He is Abū al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn." At that, the commander of the police said to him, "The amīr says to you that he is Abū Turāb, and you say 'no'?" Ṣayfī responded, "If the amīr lied, do you want me to lie and give false testimony as he did?" Ziyād told him, "This also is added to your crime. Bring me the stick!" It was brought and Ziyād asked, "What do you say?"[450] Ṣayfī answered, "The best words that I was saying about one of God's servants [I say about the Commander][451] of the Faithful." Ziyād commanded, "Beat his shoulder with the staff until he hugs the ground." So Ṣayfī was beaten until he stayed on the ground. Then Ziyād said, "Stop beating him. What do you say about 'Alī?" Ṣayfī replied, "By God, if you slice me up with razors and knives, I would only say what you heard me say." Ziyād said, "Curse him or I shall certainly behead you." Ṣayfī retorted, "Then you have already cut it off, by God. And if you refuse to do anything except cut it off, I will be satisfied with God and you will be wretched." Ziyād commanded, "Push him by his neck," and added, "Load him with iron, and cast him into prison."

449. That is, Ziyād.
450. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, adds: "about 'Alī."

Then he sent for 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī who had been present with Ḥujr and had fought [Ziyād's men] fiercely. Ziyād sent Bukayr b. Ḥumrān al-Aḥmarī, who was an assistant of the officials, for him with some of his companions. When they proceeded in search of him, and found him in the Mosque of 'Adī [130]
b. Ḥātim, they took him out. But 'Abdallāh was formidable. When they wanted to leave with him, he resisted, struggling and fighting with them. So they bashed him, and threw stones at him until he fell down. At that, Maythā', his sister, called out, "O kinfolk of Ṭayyi'! Do you betray Ibn Khalīfah with your tongue and your spearhead?"[452] When al-Aḥmarī heard her summons, he was afraid that the Ṭayyi' would gather and that he would perish. So he fled, and the women of Ṭayyi' went out and brought 'Abdallāh into a house. Al-Aḥmarī hurried off until he came to Ziyād, saying, "Indeed, the Ṭayyi' gathered against me, and I could not withstand them, so I have returned to you." Ziyād then sent for 'Adī,[453] as he was in the mosque, and had him arrested, saying, "Bring him to me." 'Adī had been informed about 'Abdallāh's story, so he asked, "How shall I bring you a man whom the folk have killed?" Ziyād replied, "Bring [him] to me so I may see that they have killed him." 'Adī then made an excuse, saying, "I don't know where he is or

451. Bracketed words added from Isfahānī, Aghānī.

452. The account up to this point is also in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 7 with variants.

453. 'Adī b. Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī was the leader of the Ṭayyi' at al-Kūfah.

what he has done." At that, Ziyād imprisoned him, and everyone in the city belonging to the Yaman and the Rabīʿah and the Muḍar concerned themselves with ʿAdī. They came to Ziyād, and interceded with him on ʿAdī's behalf. Meanwhile, ʿAbdallāh was taken out and hidden with the Buḥtur.[454] He then sent word to ʿAdī, "If you wish me to come out so that I would put my hand in yours, I will do so." At that, ʿAdī sent word back to him, "By God, if you were right under my feet, I would not lift them from you." Ziyād then summoned ʿAdī, telling him, "Indeed, I shall release you on condition that you undertake to expel ʿAbdallāh from al-Kūfah for me and lead him to the mountains." ʿAdī replied that he would, returned, and sent word to ʿAbdallāh b. Khalīfah, "Leave, and if his anger subsides, I shall speak with him about you so that you may return if God wills." Thus ʿAbdallāh left for the mountains.

Ziyād was also brought Karīm b. ʿAfīf al-Khathʿamī, so he asked, "What is your name?" He answered, "I am Karīm b. ʿAfīf." Ziyād responded, "Alas for you or woe unto you! How good is your name and the name of your father,[455] and how evil [131] is your action and your view." ʿAfīf answered, "However, by God, you have only known my view for a short time." Ziyād then sent for the companions of Ḥujr until he had collected twelve men of them in the prison.

Ziyād then summoned the leaders of the fourths,[456] saying, "Testify against Ḥujr about what he did to you." At that time the leaders of the fourths were ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth in charge of the fourth of the people of al-Madīnah, Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah in charge of the fourth of the Tamīm and the Hamdān, Qays b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd Shams b. al-Mughīrah in charge of the fourth of the Rabīʿah and the Kindah, and Abū Burdah b. Abū Mūsā in charge of the Madhḥij and the Asad. There four testified that Ḥujr had gathered crowds about him, openly abused the Caliph, and called for war against the Commander of the Faithful. They also swore that he claimed that matters would only be set right 454. The Buḥtur were a clan of the Ṭayyiʾ. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, IV, 47.

455. Karīm means "noble" or "generous"; ʿAfīf means "decent."

456. The fourths were divisions of the Kūfan army created by Ziyād but were unrelated to the districts in the city as is often claimed.

by the family of Abū Ṭālib, that he attacked the city and drove out the official of the Commander of the Faithful, excused Abū Turāb openly and asked God's mercy on him, and disavowed Abū Turāb's enemy and the people who fought him. They also testified that those persons who associated with him were the leaders of his companions and had views and concerns similar to his. Then Ziyād ordered them to leave. Qays b. al-Walīd returned to him afterwards, saying, "I heard that when they had been escorted out, they reconsidered." At that, Ziyād sent to the Kunāsah[457] and, having purchased stubborn camels, he fastened litters upon them. Then he carried those leaders upon the camels in the public plaza from daybreak until evening, declaring, "Whoever wishes, let him reconsider." But none of them stirred.

When Ziyād had examined the testimony of the witnesses, he said, "I do not consider this testimony to be conclusive, and I would like for there to be more than four witnesses." (According to) Abū Mikhnaf and al-Ḥārith b. Ḥusayrah—Abū al-Kanūd, that is ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUbayd, and Abū Mikhnaf —ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab, and Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid— [132]
Abū al-Kanūd, these were the names of the witnesses: In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, this is what Abū Burdah b. Abī Mūsā testified against him before God, Lord of both worlds. He testified that Ḥujr b. ʿAdī refused obedience, withdrew from the community, cursed the Caliph, called for war and civil discord, and gathered crowds about himself, summoning them to violate the oath of allegience (bayʿah) and depose the Commander of the Faithful, Muʿāwiyah. In the baldest way, he also disbelieved in God, Almighty and Great. Ziyād then said, "Give similar testimony. By God, I shall certainly endeavor to cut the thread of the necks of treacherous fools." At that the leaders of the fourths gave similar testimony to that of Abū Burdah, and there were four of them.

Ziyād then summoned the people, saying, "Give similar testimony to that of the leaders of the fourths." When he read the document to them, the first person to stand up was ʿUnāq b.

457. The Kunāsah (rubbish heap) was the location of a camel-market in al-Kūfah.

Shuraḥbīl b. Abī Dahm al-Taymī of the Taym Allāh b. Tha'labah, saying, "Include my name." At that, Ziyād said, "Start with the names of Quraysh, then write the name of 'Unāq among the witnesses, and whoever else we and the Commander of the Faithful recognize as having sincere advice and integrity." Isḥāq b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh then testified, and Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah, Ismā'īl b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, al-Mundhir b. al-Zubayr, 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Hannād, 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, 'Āmir b. Mas'ūd b. Umayyah b. Khalaf, Muḥriz b. Jāriyah b. Rabī'ah b. 'Abd [133] al-'Uzzā b. 'Abd Shams, 'Ubaydallāh b. Muslim b. Shu'bah al-Ḥaḍramī, 'Unāq b. Shuraḥbīl b. Abī Dahm, Wā'il b. Ḥujr al-Ḥaḍramī, Kathīr b. Shihāb b. Ḥuṣayn al-Hārithī, Qaṭan b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥuṣayn, al-Sarī b. Waqqāṣ al-Ḥārithi—who wrote his testimony while he was absent on duty—al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra' al-Thaqafī, Shabīb b. Rib'ī, 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Aqīl al-Thaqafī, Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah al-Shaybānī, al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī, and Shaddād b. al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith b. Wa'lah al-Dhuhlī, who used to be called Ibn Buzay'ah. Ziyād said, "This one does not have a father to whom he is related. Omit him from the witnesses." Ziyād was then told that Shaddād was the brother of al-Ḥudayn and the son of al-Mundhir. Ziyād ordered for him to be put down with his father's name, and he was. Shaddād heard about it and said, "Woe unto me for the son of the adulteress![458] Wasn't his mother better known than his father? By God, he is only related to his mother, Sumayyah." Ḥajjār b. Abjar al-'Ijlī (was also among the witnesses). The Rabī'ah became angry with these witnesses among the Rabī'ah who testified, and they told them, "You testified against our friends and allies." They answered, "We were only among the people, and many people from among their own folk testified against them." In addition (the witnesses included) Labīd b. 'Uṭārid al-Tamīmī, Muḥammad b. 'Umayr b. 'Uṭārid al-Tamīmī, Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Tamīmī from the Banū Sa'd, Asmā' b. Khārijah al-Fazārī, who used to apologize for his participation, Shāmir b. Dhī al-Jawshan al-'Āmirī, Shaddād and Marwān the two sons of al-Haytham the Hilālīs, Miḥṣan b. Tha'labah from among the allies of Quraysh, al-Haytham b. al-Aswad al-Nakha'ī, who used to apologize to them, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Qays al-Asadī, al-Ḥārith and Shaddād the two sons of al-Azma' [134] the Hamdānīs, then the Wādi'īs, Kurayb b. Salmah b. Yazīd al-Ju'fī, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sabrah al-Ju'fī, Zaḥr b. Qays al-Ju'fī, Qudāmah b. al-'Ajlān al-Azdī, 'Azrah b. 'Azrah al-Aḥmasī. Ziyād also summoned al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd and 'Urwah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah to testify against Ḥujr, but they were evasive. (The list also included) 'Umar b. Qays Dhū al-Liḥyah and Hānī b. Abī Hayyah, the two Wādi'īs.

458. That is, Ziyād.

Thus seventy men testified against Ḥujr. Ziyād then said, "Eliminate everyone except those who have been known for [their] lineage and uprightness in their faith." They did so until they had reached this number. The testimony of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Taghlibi[459] was eliminated. The testimony of these witnesses was recorded on a scroll, then Ziyād presented it to Wā'il b. Ḥujr al-Ḥaḍramī and Kathīr b. Shihāb al-Ḥārithī. He sent them both to the prisoners, ordering them both to take them out. Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith, the judge, and Shurayḥ b. Hāni' al-Ḥārithi were also recorded among the witnesses. As far as Shurayḥ the judge is concerned, he said, "Ziyād asked me about Ḥujr, and I told him that he would fast and worship at night." As far as Shurayḥ b. Hāni' al-Ḥārithī is concerned, he used to say, "I was not a witness. I had heard that my testimony had been recorded, so I said it was a lie and rebuked [Ziyād]."

Wā'il b. Ḥujr and Kathīr b. Shihāb came and brought out the folk in the evening, and the commander of the police accompanied them until he took them out of al-Kūfah. When they reached the cemetery of 'Arzam, Qabīṣah b. Dubay'ah al-'Absī looked at his house, which was in the (district of the) cemetery of 'Arzam, and there were his daughters looking down. Qabīṣah asked Wā'il and Kathīr, "Allow me to counsel my family." They did so. When he drew near them, as they were weeping, he said nothing to them for a while. Then he told them to be silent, so they were. He then said, "Fear God, Almighty and [135] Great, and be steadfast, for I hope for one of two happy endings from my Lord in this destination of mine: either martyrdom which is happiness, or coming back to you in good health. Indeed, the One Who has been providing for you and suffices me for your provisions is God, Most High, Who is alive and does not die. I hope that He will not neglect you, and that He will preserve me along with you." Then he departed, passing by his folk. When his folk began to pray to God for his well-being, he said, "That makes no difference to me. The destruction of my folk is more serious than my circumstance"—meaning, "since they aren't helping me." He was hoping that they would rescue him.

459. Cairo reads: al-Tha'labī.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naṣr b. Ṣāliḥ al-'Absī—'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr al-Ju'fi: By God, I was standing at the door of al-Sarī b. Abī Waqqāṣ when they went past with Ḥujr and his friends. I asked, "Are there not ten groups to rescue these, nor five?" At that, he began to lament, and none of the people answered me. They took them away and brought them to the Gharīyūn where Shurayḥ b. Ḥāni' caught up with them with a letter. He told Kathīr, "Deliver this letter of mine to the Commander of the Faithful." Kathīr asked, "What is in it?" Shurayḥ replied, "Don't ask me. It contains something I need." At that, Kathīr refused, saying, "I don't want to bring the Commander of the Faithful a letter the contents of which I do not know. Perhaps it might not be agreeable to him." Shurayḥ then brought it to Wā'il b. Ḥujr, who accepted it from him. Then they took them away until they brought them to Marj 'Adhrā', which was twelve miles from Damascus.[460]

Those Whom Ziyād Sent to Mu'āwiyah

[136] Ḥujr b. 'Adī b. Jabalah al-Kindī, al-Arqam b. 'Abdallāh al-Kindī from the Banū al-Arqam, Sharīk b. Shaddād al-Ḥaḍramī, Ṣayfī b. Fasīl, Qabīṣah b. Ḍubay'ah b. Ḥarmalah al-'Absī, Karīm b. 'Afīf al-Khath'amī from the Banū 'Āmir b. Shahrān (then from Quḥāfah), 'Āṣim b. 'Awf al-Bajalī, Warqā' b. Sumayy al-Bajalī, Kidām b. Ḥayyān and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān both of the 'Anazah from the Banū Humaym, Muḥriz b. Shihāb al-Tamīmī from the Banū Minqar, and 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawīyah al-Sa'dī from the Banū Tamīm.

460. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 488.

They took them away until they halted at Marj 'Adhrā', where they were imprisoned. Then Ziyād sent two other men after them escorted by 'Āmir b. al-Aswad al-'Iǰlī—'Utbah b. al-Akhnas, from the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr b. Hawāzin, and Sa'd b. Nimrān al-Hamdānī (then al-Nā'iṭī). Thus there were fourteen men. Mu'āwiyah then sent to Wā'il b. Ḥujr and Kathīr b. Shihāb, admitted them both, opened up their letter, and read it to the Syrians. It said:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate and Merciful. To the Servant of God, Mu'āwiyah, the Commander of the Faithful, from Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān. Now then, indeed God blessed the Commander of the Faithful well, deceived his enemies for him, and saved him the trouble of one who wronged him. Indeed, oppressors belonging to this Turābiyyah, Sabā'iyyah, whose leader is Ḥujr b. 'Adī, opposed the Commander of the Faithful, withdrew from the community of Muslims, and declared war on us. God has made us victorious over them, and enabled us to deal with them. I summoned the best people of the city, their notables and [137] > those among them possessed of maturity and faith. They testified against them concerning what they believed and did. I have sent them to the Commander of the Faithful, and have written the [names of] the upright witnesses of the people of the city, and the best of them, at the bottom of this letter of mine.

When he had read the letter and the testimony of the witnesses against them, Mu'āwiyah asked, "What do you think about this group whose own folk testify against them with what you heard?" Yazīd b. Asad al-Bajalī told him, "I think that you should disperse them among the villages of Syria, so it would save you the trouble of dealing with their sedition." Wā'il b. Ḥujr also presented the letter of Shurayḥ b. Hāni' to Mu'āwiyah, so he read it. It said:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate and Merciful. To the Servant of God, Mu'āwiyah, Commander of the > Faithful, from Shurayḥ b. Ḥāni'. Now then, I have heard that Ziyād wrote to you concerning my testimony against Ḥujr b. 'Adī, and indeed my testimony about Ḥujr b. 'Adī is that he is among those who perform the ṣalāt, give charity [zakāt], always perform the rites of pilgrimage [ḥajj] and the 'umrah[461] annually, command good and forbid evil, and [is among those] whose blood and property are forbidden. So kill him if you like, and let him alone if you like.

Mu'āwiyah read Surayḥ's letter to Wā'il b. Ḥujr and Kathīr, and then said, "I only saw this after he had removed himself from your testimony." The folk were thus imprisoned at Marj 'Adhrā' while Mu'āwiyah wrote to Ziyād:

> Now then, I have understood what you related accurately about the matter of Ḥujr and his companions and the testimony against him from your side. I have examined it, and sometimes I thought killing them would be better than leaving them alone, and sometimes I thought granting them pardon would be better than killing them. So Goodby.

At that, Ziyād wrote back to him by means of Yazīd b. Ḥujayyah b. Rabī'ah al-Taymī:

> Now then, I have read your letter and understood your views about Ḥujr and his companions. I was astonished at your doubt about the matter concerning them, since those who are more knowledgeable about them have testified against them with what you have heard. If you have any desire for this city, do not send Ḥujr and his companions back to me.

[138] Yazīd b. Ḥujayyah advanced until he went past the prisoners at 'Adhrā', saying, "O you! By God, I don't see your acquittal, and I have brought a letter calling for slaughter. Instruct me then to do whatever you like, whatever you think would be of advantage to you. I will do it for you and say it." At that, Ḥujr said, "Tell Mu'āwiyah that we preserve our allegience. We don't seek to abrogate it, and we will not abrogate it. On the contrary, enemies and untrustworthy people testified against us." When Yazīd brought the letter to Mu'āwiyah, he read it. Yazīd also told him of Ḥujr's speech. Mu'āwiyah then remarked, "Ziyād is more reliable than Ḥujr as far as we are concerned." At that, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Umar b. Umm al-Ḥakam al-Thaqafī—it is also said, 'Uthmān b. 'Umayr al-Thaqafī —said, "Scrap it! Scrap it!" And Mu'āwiyah responded to him, "Don't encourage reconcilation!" The Syrians went out without understanding what Mu'āwiyah and 'Abd al-Raḥmān had said.[462] Coming to al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr, they told him what Ibn Umm al-Ḥakam had said. Al-Nu'mān explained, "They are as good as dead."

461. The 'umrah, or minor pilgrimage consists of the rites near the Ka'bah, which were customarily performed as a separate ritual during the month of Rajab. See EI[1], s. v. 'Umra.

'Āmir b. al-Aswad al-'Ijlī, who was at 'Adhrā', approached desiring to inform Mu'āwiyah about the two (additional) men whom Ziyād had sent. As he turned to leave, Ḥujr b. 'Adī stood up before him, shackled with chains, saying, "O 'Āmir, listen to me. Tell Mu'āwiyah that my blood is forbidden to him, and inform him that we were given a guarantee of safe-conduct and that we have become reconciled to him. Tell him also to fear God and examine our case." When 'Āmir repeated similar words back to him, Ḥujr repeated it to him several times, while the latter would repeat it back. 'Āmir then said, "I have understood you, you have repeated [it] many times." Ḥujr responded, "I did not speak dishonorably, while he blames me.[463] Indeed, by God, you will be preferred and rewarded, while Ḥujr will be brought and killed. I shall not blame you if you find my speech burdensome. Take your leave." At that, he seemed to be ashamed and remonstrated, "No, by God, that was not my meaning. I shall certainly give notice and make the effort." He [139] seemed to assume that he would do it, while Ḥujr refused to believe him.

'Āmir entered Mu'āwiyah's presence, and informed him about the matter of the two men. Yazīd b. Asad al-Bajalī rose 462. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was probably telling Mu'āwiyah to tear up Ziyād's letter.

463. Cairo reads: "does he blame me?"

saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, give me my two cousins." Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh had written about them, "Two men belonging to my folk from the people of the community, men of sound views. An untrustworthy slanderer libeled them to Ziyād, so he sent them both in the group of Kūfans whom he sent to the Commander of the Faithful. They are among those who do not undertake any innovation in Islam nor do wrong to the Caliph." That was to their advantage with the Commander of the Faithful. When Yazīd asked about them, Muʿāwiyah remembered the letter of Jarīr, so he said, "Your cousin, Jarīr, has written to me about them both, praising them charitably, and he deserves to have his word trusted and his sincere advice accepted. you have asked me about your cousins, so you may have them both." Wāʾil b. Ḥujr also asked for al-Arqam, so Muʿāwiyah let him go. Abū al-Aʿwar al-Sulamī asked for ʿUtbah b. al-Akhnas, so Muʿāwiyah gave him to him. Ḥumrah b. Mālik al-Hamdānī asked for Saʿd b. Nimrān al-Hamdānī, so Muʿāwiyah gave him to him. Ḥabīb b. Maslamah also interceded with him for Ibn Ḥawīyah, so Muʿāwiyah released him.

At that, Mālik b. Hubayrah al-Sakūnī rose addressing Muʿāwiyah, "O Commander of the Faithful, leave my cousin, Ḥujr, to me." But Muʿāwiyah answered, "Indeed, your cousin, Ḥujr, is the leader of the folk, and I fear that if I release him he would corrupt my city for me. Tomorrow we must send you and your friends off to him in Iraq." So Mālik told him, "By God, you were not just to me, O Muʿāwiyah. I fought your cousin along with you. I faced them in a battle like that of Ṣiffīn until your [140] side was victorious, your heel raised up, and you did not fear misfortunes. Then I asked you for my cousin, and you assaulted me and read into what I said things that are of no advantage to me. You were afraid of what you alleged the consequences of the misfortunes [would be]." Then he left and sat at home.

Muʿāwiyah then sent Hudbah b. Fiyyād al-Quḍāʿī of the Banū Salāmān b. Saʿd, al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh al-Kilābī, and Abū Sharīf al-Baddī, and they brought the prisoners in the evening. When al-Khathʿamī saw al-Aʿwar, he said, "Half of us will be killed and half saved." Saʿd b. Nimrān said, "O God, make me one of those who are saved, as long as You are satisified with me." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān al-ʿAnazī said, "O God, make me one of those whose disgrace honors You, as long as you are satisfied with me. How often I presented myself for killing. God thus has willed what He desired."

The messenger of Muʿāwiyah then came to them with orders to release six and to kill eight, telling them, "We have been ordered to let you disavow ʿAlī and curse him. If you do so, we shall release you; and if you refuse, we shall kill you. The Commander of the Faithful also declares that he has been allowed to shed your blood by the testimony of the people of your city against you, although he has refrained from that. So renounce this man, and we shall release you." They replied, "O God, we shall not do that." He then ordered for their graves to be dug, and their shrouds to be brought. They spent the entire night worshipping, so, when morning came, Muʿāwiyah's men said, "Hey you! We saw you last night prolonging worship and doing it well, so inform us of what you have to say about ʿUthmān." They replied, "He was the first who deviated in judgment and acted wrongly." At that, Muʿāwiyah's men declared, "The Commander of the Faithful knew you better." They then stood up in front of the prisoners saying, "Denounce this [141] man!" They replied, "We vindicate him instead, and denounce whoever denounces him." At that, every man took one of them in order to kill him. When Qabīṣah b. Ḍubayʿah fell into the hands of Abū Sharīfah al-Baddī, he told the latter, "The [former] hatred has been changed to peace between my folk and your folk, so let someone else kill me." So Abū Sharīfah answered him, "Kinship helped you," and took al-Ḥaḍramī and killed him, while al-Quḍāʿī killed Qabīṣah b. Ḍubayʿah.

Then Ḥujr told them, "Leave me alone so I may perform ablutions." They told him to do so. When he finished, he told them, "Leave me alone so I can make two prostrations. I certainly swear to God that I have never performed ablutions without making two prostrations." They told him to worship, and he did so. Then he stopped, saying, "By God, I never worshipped more quickly than this, and if you think that I have no anxiety about death, I would have liked to prolong it." Then he added, "O God, we appeal to You for help against our community, since the Kūfans have testified against us, and since the Syrians are killing us. However, by God, if you killed me here, I would be the first Muslim horseman to perish in this valley, and the first Muslim man at whom its dogs barked." When al-Aʿwar Hudbah b. Fiyāḍ strode to him with his sword, Ḥujr's sinews trembled, and al-Aʿwar declared, "Certainly not! You claimed that you were not anxious about death. I will leave you, so renounce your companions." But Ḥujr replied, "Why shouldn't I be anxious, since I see a grave dug, a shroud spread out, and a sword unsheathed. By God, if I were anxious about killing I would not say that which angers the Lord." At that, al-Aʿwar killed him, and they began to kill them one by one until they had killed six.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān al-ʿAnazī and Karīm b. ʿAfīf al-Khathʿamī then said, "Send us to the Commander of the Faith-[142] ful, and we shall say what he does about this man." When they sent to Muʿāwiyah informing him of their statement, he sent word back to them, "Bring both of them to me." When they had entered his presence, al-Khathʿamī exclaimed, "God! God! O Muʿāwiyah, indeed, you will be transported from this transitory abode to the eternal abode hereafter, then questioned about what you hoped to gain by killing us and why you shed our blood." Muʿāwiyah inquired, "What do you say about ʿAlī?" He replied, "I say what you do about him," adding, "Shall I renounce the faith of ʿAlī who used to worship God along with it?" He then fell silent, and Muʿāwiyah did not want to answer him. Shāmir b. ʿAbdallāh of the Banū Quḥāfah got up, asking, "O Commander of the Faithful, give me my cousin." Muʿāwiyah replied, "You have him, except I am going to imprison him for a month." Shāmir would send word to Muʿāwiyah every two days and intercede with him, and the latter told him, "Indeed, I would think you were precious for Iraq if the likes of you were among them." Then Shāmir brought him up again, so Muʿāwiyah said, "We have commuted your cousin's sentence for you." He then summoned al-Khathʿamī and released him on condition that he would not enter al-Kūfah as long as he was ruler. Muʿāwiyah then said, "Choose whichever Arab land you would prefer for me to send you to." Al-Khathʿamī chose Mosul. He used to say, "If Muʿāwiyah should die, I would come to the city." But he died a month before Muʿāwiyah.

Then Muʿāwiyah turned to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿAnazī, and asked him, "O brother of the Rabīʿah, what do you say about ʿAlī?" He replied, "Let me alone, and don't question me. That would be better for you." Muʿāwiyah rejoined, "By God, I shall not leave you alone until you tell me about him." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān declared, "I testify that he was one of those who frequently remember God, order what is right, stand up for justice, and forgive the people." Muʿāwiyah continued, "What then do you say about ʿUthmān?" He replied, "He was the first to open the gate of injustice and lock the gates of righteousness." Muʿāwiyah declared, "You have condemned yourself." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān answered, "No, I have killed you instead." None of the Rabīʿah in the valley would speak when Shāmir al- [143]
Khathʿamī talked about Karīm b. ʿAfīf al-Khathʿamī, and none of Shāmir's folk would speak to him about Karīm. Muʿāwiyah then sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān to Ziyād, and wrote to him, "Now then, indeed, this al-ʿAnazī is the worst one you sent, so give him the punishment he deserves, and kill him in the worst way." When he was brought to Ziyād, Ziyād sent him to Quss al-Nāṭif, and he was buried alive there.

When al-ʿAnazī and al-Khathʿamī were transported to Muʿāwiyah, al-ʿAnazī had said to Ḥujr, "O Ḥujr, may God not take you away. What an excellent brother of Islam you are." Meanwhile al-Khathʿamī said, "Don't be distant, and don't be deprived, for you have commanded good and forbidden evil." Then they were taken away, while Ḥujr followed them with his eyes, saying, "Sufficient for death was a cutter of the rope of relationships." ʿUtbah b. al-Akhnas and Saʿd b. Nimrān were taken away a few days after Ḥujr and released.

Ḥujr's Companions Who Were Killed

Ḥujr b. ʿAdī, Sharīk b. Shaddād al-Ḥaḍramī, Ṣayfī b. Fasīl al-Shaybānī, Qabīṣah b. Ḍubayʿah al-ʿAbsī, Muḥriz b. Shihāb al-Saʿdī, then al-Minqarī, Kidām b. Hayyān al-ʿAnazī, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān al-ʿAnazī whom he sent to Ziyād so he was buried alive at Quss al-Nāṭif. Thus there were seven who were killed, enshrouded, and prayed over. It is alleged that when al-Ḥasan heard about the killing of Ḥujr and his companions, he inquired, "Did they pray over them, bury them, and make them face towards the qiblah?"[464] Upon being told that they had, he remarked, "They were defeated by them, by the Lord of the Kaʿbah."

Ḥujr's Companions Who Were Saved

[144] Karīm b. ʿAfīf al-Khathʿamī, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥawīyah al-Tamīmī, ʿAṣim b. ʿAwf al-Bajalī, Warqāʾ Sumayyah al-Bajalī, al-Arqam b. ʿAbdallāh al-Kindī, ʿUtbah b. al-Akhnas of the Banū Saʿd b. Bakr, and Saʿd b. Nimrān al-Hamdānī. There were seven of them.

When Muʿāwiyah had refused to release Ḥujr to Mālik b. Hubayrah al-Sakūnī—many of Mālik's folk of the Kindah and al-Sakūn, and many people of the Yaman, had gathered to him—he said, "By God, we can do without Muʿāwiyah more than Muʿāwiyah can do without us. We would find a replacement for him among his folk, while he would not find a replacement for us among the people. Set out for his man, and free him." At that, they proceeded to travel, certain that Ḥujr and his companions were at ʿAdhrāʾ and that they had not been killed. Thus their killers met them, having just left there. When they saw Mālik among the people, the killers supposed, however, that he had brought them to rescue Ḥujr from them. Mālik asked, "Why are you coming?" and was told, "The prisoners repented, and we have come to inform Muʿāwiyah." Mālik did not answer them, and proceeded towards ʿAdhrāʾ. When someone who came from there met him, he informed Mālik that the prisoners had been killed. At that, Mālik said, "Bring the folk to me." The cavalry followed Mālik and his men, and, outdistancing them, they entered Muʿāwiyah's presence. When they told him the news—what Mālik b. Hubayrah and the people who were with him had come for—Muʿāwiyah told them, "Be silent! Rather it is a passion that he feels in himself, and is about to die down."

464. See above, n. 110.

Mālik returned, settling in his residence, and he did not come to Muʿāwiyah. Muʿāwiyah sent to him, but he refused to come. When night came, Muʿāwiyah sent one hundred thousand dirhams to Mālik, saying to him, "The Commander of the Faithful is prevented from allowing you to intercede with him about your cousin except [out of] sympathy for you and your friends, lest they resume another war for you. If Ḥujr b. ʿAdī [145] had survived, I fear that he would have caused you and your friends to go to him, and that would have been an affliction for the Muslims which would be more serious than killing Ḥujr." So Mālik accepted it and was in good spirits; coming to Muʿāwiyah on the following day, he entered the latter's presence with throngs of his folk, and Muʿāwiyah was pleased with him.

[According to] Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Mālik b. Nawfal b. Masāḥiq: ʿĀ'ishah sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Ḥishām to Muʿāwiyah concerning Ḥujr and his friends. Upon arriving after Muʿāwiyah had killed them, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān asked him, "Where did the forbearance of Abū Sufyān disappear from you?" Muʿāwiyah replied, "It vanished from me when mild people like you among my folk abandoned me, and Ibn Sumayyah[465] convinced me, so I acquiesced."

[According to]Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Nawfal—ʿĀ'ishah: If changing matters would not have made them worse than before, we would have done differently with regard to the killing of Ḥujr. By God, I used to know him as a Muslim who performed the pilgrimage and the ʿumrah.[466]

[According to] Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Mālik b. Nawfal —Abū Saʿīd[467] al-Maqburī: When Muʿāwiyah made the pilgrimage, he passed by ʿĀ'ishah, so he asked permission to enter her presence, and she admitted him. When he sat down, she asked him, "O Muʿāwiyah, do you trust me not to conceal from you one who would kill you?" He replied, "I have entered a safe

465. That is, Ziyād. As Muʿāwiyah is not likely to have used the derogatory "Ibn Sumayyah," this account appears to be tendentious.

466. See above, n. 461.

467. Cairo reads: Saʿīd. He was Saʿīd b. Abī Saʿīd.

house." She went on, "O Mu'āwiyah, don't you fear God because of the killing of Ḥujr and his companions?" He answered, "It was not I who killed them, rather those who testified against them killed them."

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—Zakariyyā' b. Zā'idah—Abū Isḥāq: I was around people who were saying, "The first disgrace in al-Kūfah was the death of al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī, the killing of Ḥujr b. 'Adī, and the false claim of Ziyād to affinity [with the family of Abū Sufyān]." Abū Mikhnaf (said): It was claimed that at his [146] death, Mu'āwiyah said, "My day was three times as long because of Ibn Adbar," that is, Ḥujr.

(According to) Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—al-Ḥasan: Mu'āwiyah had four flaws, and any one of them would have been a serious offense: (his) appointment of troublemakers for this community so that he stole its rule without consultation with its members, while there was a remnant of the Companions and possessors of virtue among them; his appointment of his son as his successor after him, a drunkard (and) a winebibber who wears silk and plays ṭunbūrs;[468] his allegation about Ziyād, while the Messenger of God has said, "The child belongs to the bed, and the adulterer should be stoned;"[469] and his killing of Ḥujr. Woe unto him twice for Ḥujr and his companions."

Hind bt. Zayd b. Makhramah al-Anṣārī said, while she was escorting (the funeral procession), mourning Ḥujr:[470]

Rise, O shining moon!
Look! Do you see Ḥujr departing,

Departing to Mu'āwiyah son of Ḥarb, to be killed by him, as the amīr claimed?

---

468. A ṭunbūr was a long-necked, stringed instrument with a small sound chest. See EI[1], Supp., s.v. Ṭunbūr.

469. This ḥadīth is often cited with regard to Mu'āwiyah's recognition of Ziyād as the illegitimate son of Abū Sufyān and Sumayyah. See Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, V, 5; Lichtenstadter, "From Particularism to Unity," 225; Pellat, Jāhiz, 84.

470. These lines are also in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 10; and Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 15.

The tyrants sported their power after Ḥujr, and al-Khawarnaq and al-Sadīr were pleasant for them,[471]

While the lands became barren, as though clouds full of rain do not revive them.

O Ḥujr, Ḥujr of the Banū ʿAdī, may safety and happiness receive you.

I fear for you what destroyed ʿAdī,[472] while an old man is roaring in Damascus.

He thinks killing the best is all right for him, who has a wazīr from the worst people.

If only Ḥujr had died a [natural] death, and had not been slaughtered like camels are slaughtered.

If he should perish then every leader of folk of the world will come to destruction.

Al-Kindiyyah said, lamenting Ḥujr—it is also said that the Anṣārī woman was the one to say this:

The tears of my eye are continuous rain that falls [147] weeping for Ḥujr unstinting.[473]

If the bow were upon his captivity, al-Aʿwar would not impose the sword on him.

The poet also said, inciting the Banū Hind of the Banū Shaybān against Qays b. ʿUbād, when he slandered Ṣayfī b. Fasīl:

---

471. Al-Khawarnaq and al-Sadīr were famous pre-Islamic palaces in the neighborhood of al-Ḥīrah. Al-Khawarnaq was about one mile east of modern Najaf. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 490–94, III, 59–61; *EI*², s. v. al-Khawarnaḳ.

472. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī reads: "I fear for you the assault of the family of Ḥarb."

473. The text reads: mā tuqtiru; Cairo reads: mā tafturu, "unabating."

Ibn Fasīl appealed, "O for Murrah!" an appeal, and the tip of the sword encountered the palm of a hand and a wrist.

So incite the Banū Hind whenever you encounter them, and address Ghiyāth and his son saying,

"Let Qutaylah weep for the Banū Hind, just as the wife of Ṣayfī wept while she arranged a funeral."

This Ghiyāth is Ibn 'Imrān b. Murrah b. al-Ḥārith b. Dubb b. Murrah b. Dhūl b. Shaybān who was a noble, while Qutaylah was the sister of Qays b. 'Ubād. The latter lived until he fought alongside Ibn al-Ash'ath in battle. Ḥawshab then told al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, "There is among us a man who is a leader of seditions and risings against the government. There was never a sedition in Iraq without his being eagerly involved in it. He is a Turābī who curses 'Uthmān. He has rebelled with Ibn al-Ash'ath and participated with him in all his battles. He incited the people until, when God destroyed them, he came and sat in his house." When al-Ḥajjāj sent for him and beheaded him, the sons of his father said to the family of Ḥawshab, "But you certainly slandered us." And they replied, "You certainly slandered our friend instead."

[148] Abū Mikhnaf (said): 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī had accompanied Ḥujr b. 'Adī. When Ziyād sought 'Abdallāh, he dropped out of sight. Ziyād then sent the police for him, who at that time were people of the Ḥamrā', and they arrested him. At that, his sister, al-Nawār, went out saying, "O kinfolk of Ṭayyi'! Do you surrender your spearheads and your tongue? 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah!" The Ṭā'īs then assaulted the police, struck them, and snatched 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah from them. When the police returned to Ziyād and informed him, the latter fell upon 'Adī b. Ḥātim while he was in the mosque, saying, "Bring me 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah." 'Adī asked, "What's the matter with him?" When Ziyād told him, he said, "This is something that happened in a tribal district I do not know." Ziyād demanded, "By God, bring him to me." 'Adī retorted, "No, by God, I shall never bring him to you. I brought you my cousin whom you killed. By God, if he were beneath my feet, I would not lift them off of him." At that, Ziyād ordered 'Adī to the prison.

Every Yamanī or Rabaʿī in al-Kūfah then came to Ziyād and interceded with him, saying, "You do this to 'Adī b. Ḥātim, a Companion of the Messenger of God." Ziyād replied, "I would release him under one condition." They asked, "What is it?" He said, "That his cousin should leave me and not enter al-Kūfah as long as I have authority here." When 'Adī was informed of that, he agreed and sent for 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah, saying, "O my nephew, indeed this [man] has been insistent in your case, and has refused everything except your exile from your city as long as he has authority. So get to the two mountains."[474] At that, 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah left and began to write to 'Adī, and 'Adī began to encourage him, so 'Abdallāh wrote to him:

I remembered Laylā and youths in the afternoon and the memory of childhood is a torment for one who remembers.

Youth passes away, so I missed its hardship and, O, what passion you had in it, after it fled away.

Then cease remembrance of youth and its loss [149] and its remnants[475] when it parts from you, and desist.

And weep for friends when they have all gone, while they do not find a source except the spring of death.

Their fates summoned them and he whose day approached of the people, so know that it would not be postponed.

Those were my adherents and refuge the day when I face[476] one whose burning is memorable.

And I did not desire after them as a diversion, anything worldly, nor to have my life prolonged.

474. That is, Mts. Ajah and Salmah of the Jabal Ṭāʾī in northern Arabia.
475. The text reads: āsārahu; Cairo reads: āthārahu, "its vestiges."
476. The text reads: ulfī; C reads: alqā, "encounter."

I say, "By God, I shall not forget to remember them for all time, unless I die and am buried."

Peace upon the people of 'Adhrā', redoubled from God, and let the cumulus clouds give to drink,

And Ḥujr receive in them mercy from God,
For Ḥujr has pleased God and is excused.

And may incessant torrents and perpetual rain continue upon the grave of Ḥujr until he is summoned to be assembled.

So, O Ḥujr, who will bleed the throats of the horses,[477] and of the aggressive king whenever he acts unjustly, [150] And who will preach the truth after you, speaking, about piety, and who, if injustice was mentioned, changed it?

So what a good brother of Islam you were! And I wish for you to be granted immortality and to be delighted.

You used to give the sword its due in the war, and acknowledge good and disavow evil.

O our two brothers of Humaym, you were both protected, and prepared easily for good works, so receive the good news!

O my two Kindifī brothers, receive the good news!
for you were both kept alive in order to be told good news.

O brothers of Ḥaḍramawt and Ghālib and Shaybān, you met an easy reckoning.

---

477. That is, lead them into battle.

You were fortunate, and I did not hear [anything] more proper than your dispute at the time of great death, or more steadfast.

I shall weep for all of you as long as a star shines and the dove coos and rustles in the depth of both valleys.

So I said, not being unjust, "O Gawth son of Ṭayy'i, when I was afraid that I would be made to go among you,

Did you have the opportunity and not defend your brother? [151] while he defended himself until he leaned over, then collapsed.

You separated from me, and I was left deserted, as if I were a stranger squeezed with hands.

Who do you have like me at every attack?
and who do you have like me when courage appears?

And who do you have like me when war starts, while the one who risks his life was active in it and girded?"

So here am I, whose dwelling is in the mountains of Ṭayyi', exiled, and if God willed, He could change it.

My enemy exiled me unjustly from the place to which I migrated, and I was content with what God willed and decreed.

My folk surrendered me for no crime, as if they were not my folk and kinsmen.

If I were accustomed to a dwelling in the mountains of Ṭayyi', and it was a dwelling for a short while and a presence,

I would not be afraid that I would be considered a foreigner.
may God revile whoever reviles Him, and multiply it.

[152] May God revile the Ḥaḍrami foe, Wā'il and may they suffer annihilation from the abundant spearheads.

And may the folk suffer destruction who took sides against us and told a shocking lie.

So folk, do not put me with Gawth son of Ṭayyi', because their fate made them miserable and was changed.

I don't attack them on a caparisoned [horse] and I don't scatter dust upon them at Kuwayfah.[478]

Say to my friend, if you set out heading eastwards,
Jadīlah and the two communities, Ma'n and Buḥtur,

And Nabhān and al-Afnā' from the root of Ṭayyi',
"Am I not a strong possessor of wealth among you?

Do you not remember the battle-day of 'Udhayb, when my strongest oath before you was that I would never be seen turning back?

And my attack against Mihrān, while the group was undefended, and my killing of the heroic, death-defying armband wearer?

[153] And on the day the battle of Jalūlā' occurred, I was not blamed, and the victories of the battle-day Nihāwand andTustar.

And you forget about me on the battle-day of the water hole, while the lances were broken in their shoulders at Ṣiffīn.

May his Lord punish 'Adī b. Ḥātim for me, for my rejection and my disappointment, an ample punishment.

---

478. "Little Kūfah" was a place near Bazīqiyā in central Iraq. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, IX, 312; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 331.

Do you forget my reckless bravery, O son of Ḥātim?
In the evening your aggressiveness did not help you against Ḥidhmir.[479]

I defended you against the folk until they weakened;
I was the most grim, the strongest adversary.

They fled and did not stay where I was, as if they considered me a lion lurking in the reed thicket.

I assisted you when [those] near withdrew and [those] distant fled, and I was made to achieve victory single-handed.

So my repayment [is] that I am deprived among you, imprisoned, and that I am disgraced and captured.

How many promises I have from you that you will return to me, but [even] a fox cannot escape the appointed time with regard to me."

Then I began to tend the old she-camel for a while, and sometimes [154]
I would summon to drink, if the shepherds summoned to drink.

As if I have not ridden a racehorse for a raid, and have not left the armored opponent thrown to the ground,

And I have not opposed attacking cavalry with the sword, when he who retreats goes backwards, then pulls back and forth,

And I have not spurred on the racer right after the troop, heading for the heights of Sijās[480] and Abhar,

---

479. Cairo reads: "Ḥizmir."
480. Sijās is the territory between Hamadhān and Abhar.

And I have not frightened the deer from me in an attack, like the watering-place for the she-camel,[481] then I descend victorious,

And I have not been seen among the cavalry that thrusts at each other with lances, at Qazwīn[482] or Sharwīn,[483] nor have raided Kundur.[484]

And that [was] a time the praiseworthiness of which has departed from me, and what was known about it became unknown for me.

So my folk would not stay away, even if I were absent, and were lost among them and hidden,

And [there is] no good in the world and life after them, even though I were distant of abode, held back from them.

[155] But 'Abdallāh b. Khalīfah died in the two mountains before Ziyād did.

'Ubaydah al-Kindī, then al-Baddī, said, reproaching Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath for his abandonment of Ḥujr:

You surrendered your uncle, you did not fight in front of him in fear, and, but for you, he would have been unassailable.

You killed an envoy of the family of Muḥammad, and you stripped off his swords and armor.

If you were from Asad, you would understand my nobility, and consider the family of al-Hubāb to be an intercessor for me.

---

481. Al-ablam is a she-camel that has not yet had a child. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XII, 54.

482. Qazwīn is a town and its district northwest of al-Rayy [Tehrān] and south of Gīlān. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳazwīn.

483. The Jibāl Sharwīn is on the western border of Ṭabaristān, next to Gīlān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 283–84.

484. There was a village called Kundur near Qazwīn. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 309.

In this year Ziyād sent al-Rabī' b. Ziyād al-Ḥārithī as governor of Khurāsān after the death of al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī. Al-Ḥakam had appointed Anas b. Abī Unās to succeed him in his jurisdiction aftter his death. This Anas was the one who led the prayer over al-Ḥakam when he died. Al-Ḥakam was buried in the house of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, the brother of Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī. Al-Ḥakam had written to Ziyād about his appointment of Anas, so Ziyād dismissed Anas and put Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Hanafī in his place. I was told by 'Umar —'Alī b. Muḥammad: When Ziyād dismissed Anas and put Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī in his place, Anas said:

Who will tell Ziyād about me?
ambling on, the courier [barīd] trots with it.

Do you dismiss me and nourish Khulayd?
Ḥanīfah has found what it wants.

Help yourselves to the Yamāmah[485] and cultivate it, [156] for the first and last of you are slaves.[486]

Ziyād put Khulayd in charge for a month, then dismissed him and put Rabī' b. Ziyād al-Ḥārithī in charge of Khurāsān at the beginning of this year. The people moved with their families to Khurāsān and settled there. Then Ziyād dismissed al-Rabī'.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abān al-Qurashī: Al-Rabī' reached Khurāsān and conquered Balkh peacefully, since they had closed it after al-Aḥnaf b. Qays made peace with them. He also conquered Quhistān[487] by force. There were Turks[488] in its districts, so he killed (some of) them and put (the others) to flight. One of them

485. The Yamāmah is the region in central Arabia from which the Banū Ḥanīfah had come. See EI[1], s.v. al-Yamāma.

486. The Banū Ḥanīfah were farmers in the Yamāmah, but Mu'āwiyah is said to have confiscated land near al-Qaṭā'i in the Yamāmah which he had cultivated by four thousand slaves. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 201.

487. Quhistān is the mountainous region south of Nishāpūr in central Iran. See EI[2], s.v. Ḳūhistān.

488. These "Turks" were probably Hephthalites from Bādghīs, Harāt, and Pūshang. See M. A. Shaban, Abbāsid Revolution, 32; and EI[2], s. v. Hayāṭila.

who survived was Nīzak Ṭarkhān,[489] whom Qutaybah b. Muslim[490] killed when he was governor. I was told by 'Umar—'Alī: Al-Rabī' campaigned and crossed the river [491] accompanied by his servant, Farrūkh, and his slave-girl, Sharīfah. He plundered and returned safely, whereupon he set Farrūkh free. Al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr had crossed the river before him during his governorship, but did not conquer (anything).

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: The first Muslim to drink from the river was a mawlā of al-Ḥakam who scooped (it out)with his shield. Then he handed (it) to al-Ḥakam, so he drank, made his ablutions, and performed two prostrations beyond the river. He was the first of the people who did that; then he returned.

In this year Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah led the people in the pilgrimage. Aḥmad b. Thābit told me that according to whoever recounted it according to Ishāq b. 'Īsā according to Ma'shar, while al-Wāqidī said likewise. The governor over al-Madīnah during this year was Sa'īd b. al-'Aṣ, while Ziyād was in charge of al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah and all of the eastern territory, and Shurayḥ was in charge of rendering judgment at al-Kūfah While 'Umayr b. Yathribī was in charge of rendering judgment at al-Baṣrah.

---

489. Nīzak Ṭarkhān was the Hephthalite ruler of Bādghīs. See Shaban, Abbāsid Revolution, 65

490. Qutaybah b. Muslim (49–96[669/70–715]) was a Muslim general engaged in the conquest of Central Asia as governor of Khurāsān for al-Walīd from 86(705) until 96(715) He killed Nīzak Ṭarkhān after a revolt in 91(709). See Shaban, Abbāsid Revolution, 67; *EI*², s. v. Ḳutaiba b. Muslim.

491. The "river" is the Oxus or Jayḥūn, the modern Amū Daryā. See *EI*², s. v. Amū Daryā.

The Events of the Year

[157]

52

(January 8, 672–December 26, 672)

Al-Wāqidī claimed that the raid of Sufyān b. 'Awf al-Azdī occurred during this year, as well as his winter campaign in Byzantine territory. He also claimed that Sufyān died there and appointed 'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah al-Fazārī as his successor. Others have said that in this year Busr b. Abī Arṭāt led the people in the winter campaign in Byzantine territory, and that he was accompanied by Sufyān b. 'Awf al-Azdī. They also said that Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Thaqafī led the summer raid in this year.

Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ led the people in the pilgrimage in this year according to Abū Ma'shar, al-Wāqidī and others. The officials of the provincial capitals during this year were the same as in the previous year.

The Events of the Year

53

(December 27, 672–December 15, 673)

Among the events that happened during this year was the winter campaign of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam al-Thaqafī in Byzantine territory.

During this year Rhodes,[492] an island in the sea, was conquered. Junādah b. Abī Umayyah al-Azdī conquered it, and, according to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, the Muslims settled there, cultivated it, and acquired wealth there. Cattle grazed about, so when evening came, they brought them into the fortress. They also had a lookout who would warn them about anyone at sea who wanted to surprise them. Thus they would be on guard against them. They were most difficult for the Byzantines, so the latter blockaded them by sea and cut off their ships. Muʿāwiyah used to lavish provisions and stipends on them, and the enemy used to be afraid of them. When Muʿāwiyah died, Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah brought them back.

The death of Ziyād b. Sumayyah also occurred in this year. [158
I was told by ʿUmar—Zuhayr—Wahīb—his father—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. al-Zubayr—Fīl, the mawlā of Zi-492. See EI[1], s. v. Rhodes; Kūfī, Futūḥ, II, 126.

yād: Ziyād ruled Iraq for five years, then he died in this year. I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When Ziyād descended upon Iraq, he lasted until the year 53, then he died at al-Kūfah in the month of Ramaḍān (August 20–September 18, 673), while his deputy in charge of al-Baṣrah was Samurah b. Jundab.

How Ziyād b. Sumayyah Perished

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārik—'Abdallāh b. Shawdhab—Kathīr b. Ziyād: Ziyād wrote to Mu'āwiyah, "Indeed, I have seized Iraq with my left hand while my right hand is empty." So Mu'āwiyah added al-'Arūḍ to him, which is the Yamāmah and what is adjacent to it. At that, Ibn 'Umar prayed against him, so Ziyād caught the plague and died. When he heard the news, Ibn 'Umar said, "Off with you, Ibn Sumayyah, for this world does not remain for you, and you did not attain the other [world]."

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī: Ziyād wrote to Mu'āwiyah, "I have seized Iraq for you with my left hand while my right hand is empty, so fill it with the Ḥijāz." He sent al-Haytham b. al-Asad al-Nakha'ī with that (message), and Mu'āwiyah wrote his pact for Ziyād with al-Haytham. When the people of the Ḥijāz heard that, a group of them came to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb relating that to him. He said, "Pray to God for Him to spare you his trouble." He then faced the qiblah with them and prayed with them. The plague then broke out on Ziyād's [159] finger, and he sent to Shurayḥ, who was his judge (qādī), saying, "You see what happened to me. I was advised to have it cut off, so counsel me." Shurayḥ then advised him, "I fear that there will be scars on your hand and suffering in your heart, and that the appointed time will approach anyway. You would thus meet God, Almighty and Great, mutilated while you had cut off your hand out of aversion to meeting Him. The alternative is that there might be improvement after a while, and since you had cut off your hand, you would live mutilated and be a reproach for your son." At that, Ziyād gave up the idea, and Shurayḥ left. When the latter was asked about it, he informed them of what he had advised Ziyād. At that, they rebuked him, asking, "Why didn't you advise him to cut it off?" He replied, "The Messenger of God said, "The advisor is entrusted."

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh: I heard someone who related that Ziyād sent to Shurayḥ asking his advice about cutting off his hand. Shurayḥ replied, "Don't do it. If you should live, you would be mutilated, and if you perish, you would have sinned against yourself." Ziyād remarked, "I sleep with the plague in one blanket," so he decided to do it. But when he saw the fire and the cauterizing instrument, he became anxious and refrained from doing it.

I was told by 'Umar—'Abd al-Malik b. Qurayb al-Aṣma'ī—Ibn Abī Ziyād: When death attended Ziyād, his son told him, "O my father, I have prepared sixty garments in which I shall wrap you." Ziyād replied, "O my son, better clothing than this has drawn near your father," or "mourning goes quickly." Thus he died and was buried at al-Thuwayyah beside al-Kūfah.[493] He had dispatched Yazīd towards the Ḥijāz as its governor. So Miskīn b. Dārim said;[494]

[160] I saw the "increase"[495] of Islām disappear publicly when Ziyād took leave of us.

Al-Farazdaq said to Miskīn, and he did not satirize Ziyād until after the latter had died:

O Miskīn, God makes your eye weep, however its tears flowed in error, so they descended.

You weep for an unbelieving man from a family of Maysān,[496] like Kisrā in his place or Qayṣar.[497]

---

493. See also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 66–69. According to Dīnawarī, Akhbār al-Ṭiwāl, 239; Ziyād was buried in the cemetery of the Quraysh at al-Kūfah.

494. The following lines are also in the Diwān of al-Farazdaq. See Boucher, Divan, 48–9; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 67; XIX, 28, 32; and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 715.

495. "Ziyād" means "increase."

496. Maysān was the district along the lower Tigris River above al-Baṣrah. See *EI*², s.v. Maysān. However, Ziyād's mother, Sumayyah, is said to have

I say to him when the announcement of his death comes to me, rather him than a dusty gazelle in an isolated patch of sand.[498]

Miskīn then answered him, saying:

O man who does not speak out,
nor lead the folk unless he opposed me!

Bring me then a paternal uncle like mine or a father like mine or a true maternal uncle like mine,

Like 'Amr b. 'Amr or a father like Zurārah, or al-Bishr, on all sides I descended from the hills.

I continue to have things like spears and a swimmer, and a camel[499] after night journeys from my dependents.

So this for days of defense, this for my transportation, and this instrument for my departure.

Al-Farazdaq replied: [161]

Tell Ziyād when you come across his place of destruction, that the female dove has flown from the sanctuary,

Flew and the front feathers of her wing continued to be ascribed to her, until she called for help to the rivers and the reeds.

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Jarīr b. Yazīd: When I saw Ziyād, been a native of Zandaward in the neighboring district of Kaskar and to have belonged to the dihqān of al-Ubullah. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 489.

---

497. Kisrā was the Sasanian emperior, Qayṣar the Byzantine emperor. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳayṣar, Kisrā.

498. A sarīmah is a bridle or an isolated patch of sand. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XII, 339; Bevan, Naḳā'iḍ, III, 438.

499. A khaṭārah is a camel that puts its tail between its legs when it walks. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, IV, 250.

he was red-faced, having a squint in his right eye, with a white triangular beard, wearing a patched shirt (qamīs), while he was on a female mule whose rein he had loosened.[500]

The death of al-Rabī' b. Ziyād al-Ḥārithī, who was the governor of Khurāsān for Ziyād, also occurred in this year.

How al-Rabī' b. Ziyād al-Ḥārithī Died

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Al-Rabī' b. Ziyād was governor of Khurāsān for two years and several months and died in the year in which Ziyād died. He had appointed his son 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī' as his successor. The latter was governor for two months and then he died. Al-Rabī''s letter of appointment from Ziyād reached Khurāsān after he had been buried. 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī' appointed Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī as his successor over Khurāsān.

(According to) 'Alī—Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl—his father: I heard that al-Rabī' b. Ziyād mentioned Ḥujr b. 'Adī one day in Khurāsān, saying, "Arabs will continue to be killed in captivity [162] after him. If they had risen up at Ḥujr's death, no man of them would be killed in captivity, but they acquiesced, so they became despised." Al-Rabī' remained for a week after saying that. Then he went out in white clothing on Friday, saying, "O people, I have become tired of life, and I am offering a prayer." They responded, "Amen." Then he raised his hand after worship, saying, "O God, if I have done good in Your sight, then take me to You at once." And the people said, "Amen!" He then went out, and collapsed before his clothing went out of sight. He was carried to his house, and appointing his son, 'Abdallāh, as his successor, he died that very day. Then his son died, after appointing Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī as his successor. Ziyād then confirmed Khulayd and died himself while Khulayd was in charge of Khurāsān.

Ziyād perished, having appointed 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd over al-Kūfah. Mu'āwiyah then confirmed Samurah as gover nor of al-Baṣrah for eighteen months. (According to) 'Umar—500. According to Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 346, the rope had been folded on the mule's neck underneath the bridle rein.

Ja'far b. Sulaymān al-Ḍuba'ī: Mu'āwiyah confirmed Samurah (as governor) for six months after Ziyād. Then he dismissed him. At that, Samurah exclaimed, "God curse Mu'āwiyah! If I obeyed God as I obeyed Mu'āwiyah, He would never punish me.

I was told by 'Umar—Mūsā b. Ismā'īl—Sulaymān b. Muslim al-'Iṭlī—his father: I passed by the mosque, while a man came to Samurah and brought his wealth as zakāt.[501] Then that man entered and began to worship in the mosque. Another man came and beheaded him, so his head was in the mosque and his body nearby. Abū Bakrah passed by and said, "God, praise Him, says, 'Whoever was purified has prospered, remembered the name of his Lord, and worshipped.'"[502] My father said: I witnessed that. Samurah did not die until a severe frost took him; [163] he thus died an evil death. I witnessed him bringing many people, and setting them before him. He would ask each man, "What is your faith?" The man would reply, "I testify that there is only one single God Who has no partner, and that Muḥammad is His servant and His messenger, and that I am not one of the Ḥarūriyyah." He would then be brought out and beheaded, until there were more than twenty.

In this year Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ led the people in the pilgrimage according to Abū Ma'shar, al-Wāqidī, and others. The governor of al-Madīnah during this year was Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, while 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd b. al-'Āṣ governed al-Kūfah after the death of Ziyād. Samurah b. Jundab governed al-Baṣrah after the death of Ziyād, and Khulayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī governed Khurāsān.

---

501. Zakāt is the Islamic obligation to purify oneself through charity. See EI[1], s.v. Zakāt, and for a variant of this account see Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, Sharh Nahj al-balāghah, IV, 77.

502. Qur'ān 87: 14–15.

The Events of the Year

54

(December 16, 673–December 5, 674)

The winter campaign of Muḥammad b. Mālik in Byzantine territory took place during this year, as well as the summer campaign of Maʿn b. Yazīd al-Sulamī.

The conquest by Junādah b. Abī Umayyah of an island in the sea near Constantinople called Arwād also took place during this year, as al-Wāqidī claimed. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar related that the Muslims stayed there for a while—it is said, seven years—while Mujāhid b. Jabr was there. Tubayʿ, the son of Kaʿb's wife, said, "Do you see this step [darajah]? When it is removed, [word of] our homecoming will arrive." A strong wind then arose and blew away the step, and someone who announced Muʿāwiyah's death arrived, as well as Yazīd's letter about coming home. At this, we returned. The island was uninhabited and ruined after that, and the Byzantines were safe.

[164] During this year Muʿāwiyah also dismissed Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ from al-Madīnah and appointed Marwān b. al-Ḥakam governor over it.

Why Mu'āwiyah Dismissed Sa'īd and Appointed Marwān as Governor over al-Madīnah

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Juwayriyyah b. Asmā'—his shaykhs: Mu'āwiyah used to incite Marwān and Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ against each other. He wrote to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ while the latter was in charge of al-Madīnah, "Demolish the house of Marwān." But Sa'īd did not demolish it, so Mu'āwiyah sent another letter to him about demolishing it. But he did not do it, whereupon Mu'āwiyah dismissed him and made Marwān governor. As far as Muḥammad b. 'Umar is concerned, he related that Mu'āwiyah wrote to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ ordering him to seize all the property of Marwān and make it government property, and to seize Fadak[503] from Marwān—Mu'āwiyah had granted it to Marwān. At that, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ wrote back to him, saying, "He is a close relative." Mu'āwiyah then wrote to him for the second time ordering him to sequester Marwān's property. But Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ refused and took both letters and placed them with a slave-girl. When Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ was dismissed from al-Madīnah and Marwān became its governor, Mu'āwiyah wrote to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam ordering him to seize the property of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ in the Ḥijāz, sending the letter to him with (Marwān's) son 'Abd al-Malik. Marwān told him, "If it were anything but a letter from the Commander of the Faithful, I would reject it." At that, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ called for both letters in which Mu'āwiyah had written to him about the property of Marwān, and in which he had ordered him to seize Marwān's property. Sa'īd took them to Marwān, who remarked, "Sa'īd was more attached to us than we were to him," and desisted from seizing Sa'īd's property. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ also wrote to Mu'āwiyah, "[I am] astonished at how the Commander of the Faithful treated us concerning our kinship, so that we would bear a grudge against each other. The Com- [165] mander of the Faithful in spite of his prudence, steadfastness against those evils he abhors, and forgiveness, has introduced estrangement and enmity between us, while our descendents will possess that as an inheritance. By God, if we were not sons of a single uncle, God would not have united us with him out of support for the wronged Caliph.[504] There was truth for us in the congruence of our speeech so that we would pay attention to that and in which we obtained good." At that, Muʿāwiyah wrote back to him disavowing that, and saying that, for Saʿīd's sake, he would return to the best (behavior) that Saʿīd knew about him.

503. Fadak was a small agricultural town in the northern Ḥijāz. See *EI*², s.v. Fadak.

The account now returns to that of ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: When Muʿāwiyah appointed Marwān governor, he wrote to him, "Demolish the house of Saʿīd." When Marwān (started to) carry out the deed and rode to demolish it, Saʿīd asked him, "O Abū ʿAbd al-Malik, are you going to demolish my house?" Marwan replied, "Yes, the Commander of the Faithful wrote to me, and if he wrote about demolishing my [own] house, I would do it." Saʿīd remarked, "I would not do so." Marwān responded, "Certainly, by God, if he wrote to you, you would demolish it." Saʿīd retorted, "Certainly not, Abū ʿAbd al-Malik." Then he told his servant, "Go off and bring me Muʿāwiyah's letter." The servant then brought Muʿāwiyah's letter to Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ about demolishing the house of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. Marwān remarked, "He wrote to you, O Abū ʿUthmān, about demolishing my house, but you didn't demolish [it], and did not inform me." Saʿīd replied, "I did not demolish your house, yet I am not ensured against you. Muʿāwiyah wanted to incite us against each other." At that, Marwān exclaimed, "May my father and mother be your ransom! By God, you have more plumage[505] than we and offspring." Marwān returned without demolishing Saʿīd's house.

I was told by ʿUmar—ʿAlī—Abū Muḥammad b. Dhakwān al-Qurashī: Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ came to Muʿāwiyah, who asked him, "O Abū ʿUthmān, how did you leave Abū ʿAbd al-Malik?" Saʿīd replied, "I left him taking control of your work and carrying [166] out your command." Muʿāwiyah remarked, "Indeed he is like the owner of a loaf of bread which was baked enough so he ate it." Saʿīd responded, "Certainly not, by God, O Commander of the Faithful, indeed he is with the people. The whip is not used 504. That is, ʿUthmān.

505. The text reads: rīshan; C reads: nasaban, "lineage."

on them, and the sword is not allowed for them. They exchange like the impact of arrows, an arrow for you and an arrow against you."[506] Muʿāwiyah asked, "What separated you from him?" Saʿīd replied, "He was afraid of me for his dignity, and I feared him for mine." Muʿāwiyah asked, "So why is he obliged to you?" Saʿīd answered, "I pleased him when absent, and I pleased him when present." Muʿāwiyah remarked, you left us, O Abū ʿUthmān, in these trifles." Saʿīd responded, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful. I assumed the burden, sufficed for the determination, and was close. If you called, I would answer, and if you left, I would remove."

Muʿāwiyah also dismissed Samurah b. Jundab from al-Baṣrah in this year and appointed ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. Ghaylān as governor there. I was told by ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: Muʿāwiyah dismissed Samurah and made ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. Ghaylān governor. He confirmed him in his post for six months, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr put ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥiṣn in charge of his police.

In this year Muʿāwiyah also made ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād governor of Khurāsān.

How ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād Became Governor of Khurāsān

I was told by ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Salamah b. Muḥārib and Muḥammad b. Abān al-Qurashī: After Ziyād died, ʿUbaydallāh visited Muʿāwiyah, who asked him, "Whom did my brother appoint as his deputy at al-Kūfah?" He replied, "ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd." Muʿāwiyah went on, "And whom did he put in charge of al-Baṣrah?" ʿUbaydallāh answered, "Samurah b. Jundab al-Fazārī." Muʿāwiyah then told him, "If your father had appointed you to a position, I would do so as well." At that, ʿUbaydallāh responded, "I implore you by [167] God, lest someone shall say to me after you, 'If your father and your uncle had made you a governor, I would make you a governor.'"

When Muʿāwiyah wanted to make someone belonging to the 506. See Freytag, Proverbia, III, 238.

Banū Ḥarb a governor, he would make him governor of al-Ṭā'if. If he saw that he performed well and was not astonished at him, he would add the governorship of Mecca to his first position. If he governed well and ably looked after his responsibilities, Mu'āwiyah would combine al-Madīnah with both of his other positions. Thus, when a man was put in charge of al-Ṭā'if, it used to be said, "He is with Abū Jād."[507] Then when Mu'āwiyah put him in charge of Mecca, it was said, "He is with the Qur'ān." And when he put him in charge of al-Madīnah, it was said, "He has been skillful."

When 'Ubaydallāh said what he did, Mu'āwiyah put him in charge of Khurāsān. Then, when he had made him governor, he told him, "I have given trust to you as I do to my officials. Now then, I enjoin you by the ties of kinship, because of your special status with me, not to sell a lot for a little, and restrain yourself, and fulfill any agreement you make with an enemy, so you will reduce the burden for you[rself] and for me from you. Open your door to the people; thus you will have information from them. You and they are equal. When you decide on a matter, express it openly to the people, and no one will expect anything or make demands on you, while you will be able to carry [it] out. When you encounter your enemies, and they defeat you at the border of the territory, do not let them defeat you in its interior. If your companions need you to assist them personally, do so.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ibn Ishāq: Mu'āwiyah appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād as governor, saying, "Seize the sword if it does not cut." He also told him, "Fear God, and don't prefer anything to that, for there is compensa-[168] tion in fearing Him. It preserves [you] from lowering your own reputation. If you make a promise, keep it; don't sell a lot for a little; and don't announce something until you have completely understood it['s consequences]. Once it has been announced, don't let it return to harm you. When you encounter your enemies, let those who are with you be more numerous. Swear to [your subjects] upon the Book of God; don't tempt anyone with that to which he has no right; and don't make anyone feel hopeless regarding his rights." Then 'Ubaydallāh took leave of him.

507. Lit. "the father of improvement", that is, at the beginning of his career.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah: 'Ubaydallāh set out from Syria for Khurāsān at the end of the year 53 (673) when he was twenty-five years old, sending Aslam b. Zur'ah al-Kilābī to Khurāsān in advance. He left Syria accompanied by al-Ja'd b. Qays al-Namarī who recited verses (rajaz) before him in an elegy for Ziyād.

On another occasion, 'Umar reported in his book which he entitled The Book of Information About the People of al-Baṣrah:[508] I was told by Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī that when Mu'āwiyah appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād over Khurāsān, the latter went out wearing a turban—he was handsome—while al-Ja'd b. Qays recited an elegy for Ziyād to him:

Continue to rebuke me, my critic, about what removed my blessing before today.

The benefactor has departed and the permanent protection,

And [having] grace, many sheep,[509] a huge fortune, many camels[510]

And the livestock walking after sleep.

If only all of the excellent [horses] with the folk [169]

Were given poison to drink a while before today,

With four [days] elapsing from the month of fasting.[511]

From it also is:

Tuesday which has past,

---

508. Kitāb akhbār ahl al-Baṣrah.

509. Mu'aththal, from 'aththala, "to have many sheep." See I. Mustafa, et al., Mu'jam, I, 99.

510. Al-ḥawm is a herd of approximately one thousand camels. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XII, 62.

511. That is, the month of Ramaḍān.

A day on which the King decreed what He decreed:

The death of a righteous, glorifying [man], sturdy of strength.

Giving to Jaʿd was hot in him and blazed.

Ziyād was a mountain with difficult peaks,

Astute, if you looked for faults, he refused.

If Ziyād had survived, I would hope that God would not Remove him.

ʿUbaydallāh wept that day until his turban fell off of his head.

ʿUbaydallāh reached Khurāsān, then he crossed the river to the mountain of Bukhārā on camels, He was thus the first to reach the Bukārāns by crossing the mountain with an army. He conquered Rāmīthan and Baykand,[512] both of which belong to Bukhārā, and reached the Bukhārāns from there. (According to) ʿAlī—al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd—his paternal uncle: ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād encountered Turks at Bukhārā. Qabj Khatun, their king's wife, was with the king. When God defeated them, the Turks urged her to put on her slippers. She put on one of them, while the other was left behind. The Muslims acquired the stocking which was worth two hundred thousand dirhams.

[170] I was told by ʿAlī—Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ—ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Maʿmar—ʿUbādah b. Ḥiṣn: I did not see anyone more courageous than ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. An army of Turks encountered us in Khurāsān, and I saw him fighting. He charged them, penetrated their ranks, and disappeared from sight. Then he raised his pennon dripping with blood.

(According to) ʿAlī—Maslamah: There were two thousand Bukhārans, whom ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād brought to al-Baṣrah.

512. Rāmīthan/Rāmitīn and Baykand/Paykand were towns two farsakhs (twelve km) apart in the Bukhārā oasis. See the account of this campaign in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 410. Rāmīthan was considered to be the old city of Bukhārā, while Baykand was a large commercial center, five farsakhs (thirty km) from Bukhārā. See W. Barthold, Turkestan, 116–18.

All of them were excellent archers.[513] Maslamah (said): The army of the Turks at Bukhārā was one of the numerous armies of Khurāsān. We were also told by 'Alī—al-Hudhalī: There were five armies in Khurāsān, four of which al-Aḥnaf b. Qays encountered—(one) which encountered him between Quhistān and Abrashahr,[514] and the three which he met at the Marghāb.[515] The fifth army was that of Qārin which 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim scattered.[516] (According to) 'Alī—Maslamah: 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād stayed in Khurāsān for two years.

Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the people in the pilgrimage in this year.

I was told by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar, while al-Wāqidī and others said likewise: Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was in charge of al-Madīnah in this year, while 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd was in charge of al-Kūfah —some of them said al-Ḍahhāk b. Qays was in charge there— and 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. Ghaylān was in charge of al-Baṣrah.

---

513. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 376, 410–11; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 237; and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 522. However Ziyād himself is said to have built a street in al-Baṣrah for four thousand Bukhārans (Ibn al-Faqīh, Buldān, 191) and to have employed them in his police force at al-Kūfah (Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 152).

514. Abrashahr is the Arabicized form of Aparshahr, the late Sasanian name of the city of Nīshāpūr (Naysābūr), the district capital of western Khurāsān. See *EI*², s. v. Abarshahr.

515. The Marghāb is the Murghāb River in Eastern Khurāsān, on which the city of Marw was located. See *EI*¹, Supp., s.v. Merw al-Shāhidhān.

516. This was in Quhistān in 33(653) See Shaban, Abbāsid Revolution, 26.

The Events of the Year

55

(DECEMBER 6, 674–NOVEMBER 24, 675)

[171] Among the events that happened during this year was the winter campaign of Sufyān b. ʿAwf al-Azdī in Byzantine territory. That is what al-Wāqidī said. However, some said the one who led the winter campaign in Byzantine territory in this year was ʿAmr b. Muḥriz; and others said the one who led the winter campaign there was ʿAbdallāh b. Qays al-Fazārī. Still others said that it was Mālik b. ʿAbdallāh.

During this year Muʿāwiyah dismissed ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. Ghaylān from al-Baṣrah and put ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād in charge.

Why Muʿāwiyah Dismissed ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. Ghaylān and Appointed ʿUbaydallāh over al-Baṣrah

I was told by ʿUmar—al-Walīd b. Hishām and ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (they each differed in some of the narrative): When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. Ghaylān spoke from the pulpit of al-Baṣrah, one of the Banū Ḍabbah threw rocks at him. (According to) ʿUmar —Abū al-Hasan: He was called Jubayr b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, one of the Banū Ḍirār. When ʿAlī ordered the man's hand to be cut off, the latter said:

Attentive obedience and submission are good and more forgiving for the Banū Tamīm.

The Banū Ḍabbah then came to him, saying, "Our companion inflicted what he suffered upon himself, and the amīr has carried out his punishment. We are not assured that, should the report about him reach the Commander of the Faithful, he would not order personal or group punishment. If the amīr sees fit to write a letter for us, one of us will take it to the Commander of the Faithful to inform him that the amīr cut off his hand merely out of suspicion and without clear evidence." So [172] ʿAbdallāh wrote to Muʿāwiyah for them afterwards, and they held onto the letter until the beginning of the year arrived. Abū al-Hasan (said): Less than six months later the Ḍabbīs headed for Muʿāwiyah and visited him, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, he dismembered our companion unjustly, and this is his letter to you." Muʿāwiyah read the letter and remarked, "As far as retaliation against my officials is concerned, it is not allowed, and there is no way against him, but if you should wish, I would pay your companion blood money." They replied, "Then do so." Muʿāwiyah then paid him blood money from the treasury, dismissed ʿAbdallāh, and told them, "Choose whom you would like for me to put in charge of your province." They replied, "Let the Commander of the Faithful choose for us." Since he knew the opinion held by the people of al-Baṣrah about Ibn ʿĀmir, he asked, "How would you like Ibn ʿĀmir, for he is someone about whose distinction, decency, and purity you have known?" They answered, "The Commander of the Faithful knows best." He began to repeat that to them in order to sound them out; then he said, "I have put my nephew, ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, in charge of you."

(According to) ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: In this year Muʿāwiyah dismissed ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr and put ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād in charge of al-Baṣrah, and he put ʿUbaydallāh Aslam b. Zurʿah in charge of Khurāsān. The latter did not raid or conquer any territory there. ʿUbaydallāh put ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥiṣn in charge of his police force and Zurārah b. Awfā in charge of rendering judgment, then he dismissed him and put Ibn Udhaynah al-'Abdī in charge of rendering judgment.

In this year Mu'āwiyah also dismissed 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd from al-Kūfah and put al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī in charge there.[517]

In this year Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the people in the pilgrimage. I was told that by Aḥmad b. Thābit—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

---

517. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 265, this was in year 54[673/4].

The Events of the Year

[173]

56

(November 25, 675–November 13, 676)

Among these events was the winter campaign of Junādah b. Abī Umayyah in Byzantine territory. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Masʿūd is also said to have led this campaign. Yazīd b. Shajarah al-Rahāwī is also said to have raided by sea while ʿIyād b. al-Ḥārith did so by land.

Al-Walīd b. ʿUtbah b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage according to the account I was told by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Iṣḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar.

During this year Muʿāwiyah performed the minor pilgrimage (ʿumrah) during Rajab (May 20–June 18, 676).

During this year Muʿāwiyah summoned the people to acknowledge his son, Yazīd, as his successor, and made him heir apparent (walī al-ʿahd).[518]

Why Muʿāwiyah Made His Son, Yazīd, Heir Apparent

I was told by al-Ḥārith—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū Ismāʿīl-al-Hamdānī and ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—al-Shaʿbī: Al-Mughīrah came to 518. Lit: "possessor of a pact."

Mu'āwiyah, and gave him his resignation, while complaining of weakness. Mu'āwiyah relieved him and wanted to appoint Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ. Al-Mughīrah's secretary heard of that, so he came to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and informed him of this while a Kūfan called Rabī'ah or al-Rabī' of the Khuzā'ah was with him. The latter then came to al-Mughīrah, saying, "O Mughīrah, I certainly think that the Commander of the Faithful disliked you. I saw Ibn Khunays, your secretary, with Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ informing him that the Commander of the Faithful would put him in charge of al-Kūfah." Al-Mughīrah responded, "Does he not say as al-A'shā said;

[174] Or was your master absent so you suffered a need?
and perhaps your master will return with backing.

Go slowly! I will go to Yazīd." Al-Mughīrah then went to see Yazīd, and proposed the acknowledgement to him. When Yazīd conveyed that to his father, Mu'āwiyah reappointed al-Mughīrah to al-Kūfah, ordering him to work for Yazīd's acknowledgement. Al-Mughīrah then departed for al-Kūfah, and his secretary, Ibn Khunays, came to him, saying, "By God, I did not deceive you nor betray you nor did I dislike your government, but I owed Sa'īd a favor, and I was grateful to him for it." Al-Mughīrah was pleased with him and took him back into his chancery. Al-Mughīrah also worked for Yazīd's acknowledgement, and sent an envoy to Mu'āwiyah about it.

I was told by al-Ḥārith—'Alī—Maslamah: When Mu'āwiyah wanted to acknowledge Yazīd (as his successor) he wrote to Ziyād, asking him for advice. Ziyād then sent for 'Ubayd b. Ka'b al-Numayrī, saying, "Everyone who asks advice has trust, and every secret has a place to put it. Indeed people have devised for them two qualities—revealing secrets and giving out advice to people who do not deserve it. The only repository for secrets is one of two men—an otherworldly man who hopes for a reward and a man of this world who has self-respect and discernment which preserves his esteem. I have experienced them both from you, therefore I have praised that on your behalf. I have summoned you about a matter which I hesitate to put in writing. Indeed the Commander of the Faithful has written to me claiming that he has decided to acknowledge Yazīd (as his successor]. However, his is afraid of the people's disapproval. He hopes for their agreement, and asks my advice. Support for Islam and its security is important, while Yazīd is easy-going and neglectful, given his devotion to hunting. So meet the Commander of the Faithful, acting on my behalf, and inform him about Yazīd's actions. Tell him, 'Go slowly in this matter, [175] for it would be more appropriate in order to accomplish what you want. Don't hurry, because attainment with delay is better than haste without success.'"[519]

'Ubayd answered him, "There is an alternative." Ziyād asked, "What is it?" 'Ubayd advised, "Don't disparage Mu'āwiyah's view to him, and don't make him hate his son. I shall meet with Yazīd in secret, informing him on your behalf that the Commander of the Faithful has written to you asking your advice about Yazid's acknowledgement [as successor], and that you fear the disapproval of the people because of flaws which they hold against him. I shall also tell him that you think he should abandon the behavior that is held against him, so that the Commander of the Faithful's argument before the people would be strengthened. What you desire will be easy. Thus you will have prepared Yazīd and satisfied the Commander of the Faithful, as well as having avoided what you fear regarding the community." At that, Ziyād replied, "You have hit the nail on the head.[520] Depart with God's blessing. If you are successful, it will not be disavowed; and if you are mistaken, [it will] not be deception. I do not consider you to be one who makes mistakes, if God wills." 'Ubayd responded, "You say what you think, and God determines in secret what He knows." He then came to Yazīd and conferred with him (about) that, while Ziyād wrote to Mu'āwiyah urging him to be cautious and not to hurry. Mu'āwiyah accepted that, and Yazīd refrained from doing much of what he used to do. Then 'Ubayd came back to Ziyād, and the latter gave him a land-grant.

I was told by al-Ḥārith—'Alī: When Ziyād died, Mu'āwiyah called for a document about appointing Yazīd as his successor and read it to the people. In the event of his death, Yazīd would be heir apparent. He was able to get the people to acknowledge Yazīd except for five persons.[521]

519. The text reads: fawt; C reads: mawt, "death."
520. Lit. "You have hit the matter with its stone."

[176] I was told by Ya'qūb b. Ibrahīm—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Awn—a man at Nakhlah:[522] The people acknowledged Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah except for al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, Ibn 'Umar, Ibn al-Zubayr, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr, and Ibn 'Abbās. So when Mu'āwiyah came (to al-Madīnah) he sent for al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, saying, "O cousin, the people have been able to acknowledge Yazīd except for five persons of the Quraysh whom you lead. O cousin, what is your purpose in disagreeing?" He replied, "Do I lead them?" Mu'āwiyah replied that he did. Al-Ḥusayn said, "So send for them, and if they acknowledge [Yazīd], I would be one of them, and if not, don't be rushing me into something." Mu'āwiyah asked, "And would you do so?" When al-Ḥusayn replied that he would, Mu'āwiyah then obliged him not to inform anyone about their conversation. Although that was difficult for him, al-Ḥusayn granted that, and then left. Ibn al-Zubayr had a man wait for al-Ḥusayn in the street, who said, "Your brother, Ibn al-Zubayr asks you, 'What happened?'" He continued thus with al-Ḥusayn until he got something out of him. Then, after (meeting with) al-Ḥusayn, Mu'āwiyah sent for Ibn al-Zubayr, saying to him, "The people have been able to do this except for five persons of the Quraysh. You lead them, O cousin, so what is your purpose in disagreeing?" Ibn al-Zubayr asked, "Do I lead them?" When Mu'āwiyah replied that he did, Ibn al-Zubayr said, "So send for them, and if they acknowledge, I would be one of them, and if not, don't be rushing me into something." Mu'āwiyah asked, "And would you do so?" When he replied that he would, Mu'āwiyah obliged him not to inform anyone of their conversation. He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, we are in the sanctuary of God, Almighty and Great, and the pact of God, praise Him, is serious." So he refused him and left. Then, after Ibn al-Zubayr, Mu'āwiyah sent for Ibn 'Umar and spoke with him in

521. According to Ibn Khayyāt, Ta'rīkh, I, 248, Mu'āwiyah had the Syrians acknowledge Yazīd in the year 50(670/71).

522. This place is either Nakhlat Muḥmūd, the first stopping-place on the way from Mecca to al-Ṣādir, or Nakhlah al-Yamāniyyah, the valley south of Mecca where the Battle of Ḥunayn was fought. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 769.

words that were softer than those he had used with his companion, saying, "Indeed, I fear that I would leave the community of Muḥammad after me like sheep without a shepherd. It has been possible for the people to do this except for five persons of Quraysh, whom you lead. So what is your purpose in disagreeing?" Ibn 'Umar replied, "What would you think about [177] something that will avoid censure and spare blood while you achieve your purpose thereby?" Mu'āwiyah replied, "I would like that." Ibn 'Umar said, "Set up your throne publicly, then I will come and acknowledge you on condition that I will enter after you into whatever the community shall agree upon. For, by God, if the community should agree upon an Abyssinian slave after you, I would do the same." Mu'āwiyah asked, "And would you do so?" He answered that he would. Then he left, and arriving at his home, he shut his door. People began to come but he would not admit them. Mu'āwiyah then sent for 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr saying, "O Ibn Abī Bakr, by what hand or foot do you come to disobey me?" He replied, "I hope that it would be good for me." Mu'āwiyah responded, "By God, I intended to kill you." He answered, "If you do so, may God cause a curse to follow you in this world for it and make you enter the fire in the next [world] for it." The man at Nakhlah did not mention Ibn 'Abbās.[523]

Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was the governor of al-Madīnah during this year, while al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays was in charge of al-Kūfah, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was in charge of al-Baṣrah, and Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān was in charge of Khurāsān.

The reason why Sa'īd was governor of Khurāsān is in the account which I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ: When Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān asked Mu'āwiyah to make him governor of Khurāsān, the latter replied, "'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād is there." Sa'īd then asked, "Did not my father make you and raise you until you achieved through his effort the utmost point which he was not able to attain nor seek to surpass? But you were not grateful for his favor nor requited him for his benefits. You put this one (that is Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah) ahead of me

523. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 252–57, these events occurred in year 51(671/2) and acknowledged him. By God, I am better than he with respect to father, mother, and self." Muʿāwiyah replied, "As far [178] as your father's favor is concerned, I am obliged to repay him. It was out of gratitude for that that I sought revenge for his blood until matters ran their course, and I will not blame myself for rallying my forces. Regarding the superiority of your father over Yazīd's, your father, by God, was better than I and closer to the Messenger of God. Concerning the superiority of your mother over Yazīd's, it is not denied. A woman from Quraysh is better than a woman from the Kalb. As for your superiority over him, by God, I want the Ghūṭah[524] to be filled by men like you for Yazīd." At that, Yazīd told Muʿāwiyah, "O Commander of the Faithful, he is your paternal cousin, and you are the most worthy to consider his case. He censured me to you, so censure him." Muʿāwiyah then put Saʿīd in charge of the military affairs of Khurāsān and Isḥāq b. Ṭalḥah in charge of collecting taxes there. This Isḥāq was a maternal cousin of Muʿāwiyah, and his mother was Umm Abān bt. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah. When he reached al-Rayy, Ishāq b. Ṭalḥah died, so Saʿīd was put in charge of both the taxes and military affairs of Khurāsān.

I was told by ʿUmar—ʿAlī—Maslamah: Saʿīd left for Khurāsān accompanied by Aws b. Thaʿlabah al-Taymī, the master of Qaṣr Aws, Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf al-Khuzāʿī, al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, and Rabīʿah b. ʿIsl, one of the Banū ʿAmr b. Yarbūʿ. There were bedouin folk barring the road against pilgrims in the depth of a defile. Saʿīd was told, "Here are folk barring the road against pilgrims, and they fear to take to the road lest you take them out with you. Saʿīd then took out some folk of the Banū Tamīm, among whom was Mālik b. al-Rayb al-Māzinī, along with youths who were with him.[525] Concerning them the poet declaimed:[526]

---

524. The Ghūṭah is the fertile cultivated region around Damascus irrigated by the Baradā River. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ghūṭa.

525. For additional details according to Abū ʿUbaydah and Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madāʾinī, see ʿAbd al-Qādir al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al-adab, II, 210; Kūfī, Futūḥ, IV, 187–99.

526. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 163; Ibn Qutaybah, Shuʿarāʾ, 270.

God save you from al-Qasīm,[527] [179]

And from Abū Ḥardabah[528] the evil,

And from Ghuwayth[529] the cutpurse,

And Mālik and his poisoned sword.

(According to) 'Alī—Maslamah: Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān arrived and crossed the river to Samarqand.[530] The people of the Ṣughd[531] came out against him, and they fought each other all day until nightfall, then they disengaged without further fighting.[532] At that, Mālik b. al-Rayb said, criticizing Sa'īd:

You continued to tremble on the Battle-day of the Ṣughd, standing out of cowardice until I feared that you had become a Christian,

And there was not in 'Uthmān anything I knew, except his offspring in his group when he turned back.

If it was not for the Banū Ḥarb, your blood would be sprinkled inside broken and one-eyed vermin.

When the next day came, Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān went out to them and the Ṣughd resisted him. He fought them, routed them, and beseiged them in their city. Then they made peace with him and gave him fifty youths, the sons of their grandees, to be held 527. Al Qaṣīm is a region of the Najd in central Arabia.

528. Abū Ḥardabah was a member of the Banū Athālah b. Māzin. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 163.

529. Ghuwayth was a member of the Banū Ka'b b. Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 163.

530. Samarqand, on the Zarafshān River in Central Asia, was the main city of Soghdia. See Le Strange, Lands, 463–65; Barthold, Turkestan, 83–93.

531. The Ṣughd were the Soghdians who inhabited the region along the Zarafshān River in Central Asia, ancient Sogdiana. Le Strange, Lands, 460–73; Barthold, Turkestan, index: Soghdiana.

532. For this campaign see Balādhuirī, Futūḥ, 411.

as hostages by him. He then crossed (again) and stayed at al-Tirmidh.[533] He did not keep (his agreement) with them and brought the hostage youths with him to al-Madīnah.[534]

Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān arrived in Khurāsān while Aslam b. Zur'ah al-Kilābī was there on behalf of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. Aslam b.
[180] Zur'ah continued to live there until 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād wrote to him about entrusting Khurāsān to him for a second time. When the letter of 'Ubaydallāh reached Aslam, he knocked at night for Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān. At that, a slave girl of Sa'īd's gave birth to a boy prematurely. Sa'īd would say, "I shall certainly kill a man of the Banū Ḥarb [in retaliation] for him." Sa'īd came to Mu'āwiyah, complaining to him about Aslam, and the Qaysiyyah became angry. When Hamām b. Qabīsah al-Namarī entered and Mu'āwiyah noticed that his eyes were reddened, he said, "O Hamām, both your eyes are reddened." Hamām replied, "On the Battle-day of Ṣiffīn they were even redder." That distressed Mu'āwiyah, and when Sa'īd saw that, he held back from Aslam. Aslam b. Zur'ah thus remained in charge of Khurāsān as governor for 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād for two years.

---

533. Al-Tirmidh was the most important town in the district of Saghāniyān, north of the upper Oxus River between its confluence with the Wakhsh and Surkhān rivers. Le Strange, Lands, 440–41; Barthold, Turkestan, 75.

534. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 411, Sa'īd took fifteen, forty or eighty noble youths hostage at Bukhārā. When he forced them into agricultural slavery at al-Madīnah, they are said to have killed him and committed mass suicide. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 117–19; Narshakhī, Tārikh-i Bukhārā, translated by R. Frye as The History of Bukhārā, 40–41.

The Events of the Year 57

(NOVEMBER 14, 676–NOVEMBER 2, 677)

The winter campaign of 'Abdallāh b. Qays in Byzantine territory occurred during this year.

According to al-Wāqidī, Marwān was dismissed from al-Madīnah in Dhū al-Qa'dah 57 (September 5–October 4, 677). According to someone else, Marwān governed al-Madīnah during this year. Al-Wāqidī said: When Mu'āwiya dismissed Marwān, he appointed al-Walīd b. 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān over al-Madīnah. Abū Ma'shar's account is similar to that of al-Wāqidī. I was told that account by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā.

The governor in charge of al-Kūfah during this year was al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays, while 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was in charge of al-Baṣrah and Sa'īd b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān was in charge of Khurāsān.

The Events of the Year 58

(November 3, 677–October 23, 678)

[181] According to Abū Ma'shar, Mu'āwiyah dismissed Marwān from al-Madīnah in Dhū al-Qa'dah (August 25–September 24, 678), and made Walīd b. 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān governor over it. I was told that by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā.

During this year Mālik b. 'Abdallāh al-Khath'amī raided Byzantine territory.

In this year Yazīd b. Shajarah was killed at sea according to al-Wāqidī. 'Amr b. Yazīd al-Juhanī (said): It was Yazīd who led the winter campaign in Byzantine territory. It was also said: The one who raided by sea in this year was Junādah b. Abī Umayyah.

Al-Walīd b. 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage this year. I was told a similar account by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī and others said likewise.

In this year Mu'āwiyah put 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān b. Rabī'ah al-Thaqafī in charge of al-Kūfah. He was the son of Umm al-Ḥakam, the sister of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. Mu'āwiyah had previously dismissed al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays from it.[535] During 'Abd al-Raḥmān's term of office in this year a group of the Khārijites rebelled who previously had recognized al-Mustawrid b. 'Ullifah and whom al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah had held in the prison. Al-Mughīrah had defeated them and put them in the prison. Then, when al-Mughīrah died, they left the prison.

(According to) Hāshim b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah al-Ghanawī: Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān al-Sulamī gathered his companions about him. After praising and extolling God, he addressed them, "Now then, indeed God, Almighty and Great, decreed the jihād for us. Among us there are those whose term has been decided, those who still wait, and those [who are] righteous victors by their superiority. Whoever among us still waits will be one of [182] our predecessors, the ones deciding their term, performing good deeds first. Whoever among you desires God and His reward, let him follow the way of his companions and his brothers. God will grant him the reward of this world and the better reward of the other world, and God is with those who are good."

Mu'ādh b. Juwayn al-Ṭā'ī said, "O people of Islām, by God, if we knew that when we gave up jihād against oppressors and the rejection of injustice, we would have some excuse with God for doing so, abandoning it would be easier for us and lighter than undertaking it. But, since we were created with hearts and ears, we knew and were convinced that there will be no excuse for us until we reject oppression and change injustice by jihād against the oppressors." Then he continued, "Extend your hand and we shall acknowledge you." So Mu'ādh and the folk acknowledged Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān, striking him on the hand. That was during the governorship of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān al-Thaqafī who was the son of Umm al-Ḥakam, while Zā'idah b. Qudāmah al-Thaqafī was in charge of the police.

Then, several days after that, the folk assembled at the residence of Mu'ādh b. Juwayn b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ṭā'ī. Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān addressed them, "Servants of God, advise[me] with your opinion. Where do you instruct me to go." Mu'ādh told him, "I think you should set out with us to Ḥulwān so that we can settle there, for it is a district between the plain and the mountain and between the city and the frontier—that is the frontier of al-Rayy. Thus, whoever shares our view among the people of the city, the frontier, the mountains, and the Sawād[536] would join us." Ḥayyān answered him, "Your enemy would overtake you before the people would gather to you. By my life, they will not leave you until they gather to you. But I thought I would take you out beside al-Kūfah and the salt marsh, or Zurārah and al-Ḥīrah. Then we would fight them until we reach our Lord. By [183] God, I knew that, being less than one hundred men, you would not be able to defeat your enemy, nor inflict severe damage on them. But when God knows that you exert yourselves in jihād against His enemy and yours, you will have His reward and escape from sin." They replied, "Our view is the same as yours."

535. According to Ibn Khayyāt, Ta'rīkh, I, 269, this was in the year 57[676/7].

At that, 'Itrīs b. 'Urqūb, Abū Sulaymān al-Shaybānī told them, "I do not share the view of your group. Take into consideration that I do not think you are ignorant of my knowledge of warfare and my experience with affairs." They told him, "You are certainly as you say, so what is your view?" 'Itrīs said, "I don't think that you should go out against the people at the city. You are a few among many. By God, you would not do more than have them surround you, and you would make them happy by killing you. This is not a shrewd policy, if you prefer to go out against your folk. Outwit your enemy with that which is harmful to them." They asked, "So what is your view?" He said, "You should set out for the district in which Mu'ādh b. Juwayn b. Ḥuṣayn advised setting up camp—that is Ḥulwān, or you should set out with us to 'Ayn al-Tamr and stay there. Then, when our brothers heard about us, they would come to us from every side." At that, Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān told him, "By God, if you set out with us, you and all your comrades, in either of these directions, you would not rest there before the cavalry of the people of the city overtook you. Where then will you heal yourselves? By God, there are not enough of you to expect victory in the world against the aggressive oppressors thereby. Rebel beside this city of yours and [184] fight according to the command of God against whoever violates obedience to Him. Don't wait, and don't bide your time. Thus, you will hurry to Paradise and get yourselves out of the discord thereby." They said, "Since that is the case, we have no other choice.[537] We will not oppose you, so rebel wherever you wish."

536. The Sawād was the "dark" cultivated alluvial plain of Iraq. See EI[1], s.v. Sawād.

Ḥayyān waited until it was the end of the first of Ibn Umm al-Ḥakam's two years (as governor). At the beginning of the (second) year, on the first day of the month of Rabīʿ II (January 31, 678), the comrades of Ḥayyān b. Ẓabyān gathered to him, and he addressed them, "O folk, God has assembled you for a good purpose and with good reasons. By God, other than Whom there is no god, I would never take pleasure in anything in the world after I abandoned my pleasure in order to make this revolt of mine against the sinful oppressors. By God, I do not want the world in its entirety for myself nor for God to deprive me of martyrdom in this revolt of mine. I had thought that we should go out until we halted beside the house of Jarīr. Then, when the factions came out against you, you would fight them." At that, ʿItrīs b. ʿUrqūb al-Bakrī said, "However, if we fought them in the center of the city, the men would fight against us while the women and the boys and the slave-girls would ascend [to the rooftops] and throw rocks on us." One of their men then told them, "Halt us, then, beyond the city [at] al-Jisr"—that was the location of Zurārah; however, Zurārah was built afterwards except for some insignificant buildings that were there previously. Muʿādh b. Juwayn b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ṭāʾī advised them, "No, set out with us and halt at Bāniqyā instead. Before long your enemy will come to you, and when that happens we shall confront the folk with our faces and put the houses at our backs. Thus we would fight them from only one direction." When they rebelled, an army was sent against them and they were all killed.

Then the people of al-Kūfah expelled ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. [185] Umm al-Ḥakam. I was told by Hishām b. Muḥammad: Muʿā-

537. C reads: "we must accept your opinion."

wiyah made Ibn Umm al-Ḥakam governor over al-Kūfah. The latter treated them badly, so they expelled him. He then came to Mu'āwiyah, who was his maternal uncle. The latter told him, "I shall make you governor of Egypt [which is] better than al-Kūfah." Mu'āwiyah did so and sent him there. When the news reached Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj al-Sakūnī, he met Ibn Umm al-Ḥakam two days' journey from Egypt, saying, "Return to your maternal uncle, for, by my life, you shall not treat us the way you treated our Kūfan brothers." He then returned to Mu'āwiyah. When Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj came [to Damascus] as an envoy, the way had been decorated for him—that is, booths of sweet basil were set up for him. He entered Mu'āwiyah's presence while Umm al-Ḥakam was with him. She asked, "Who is this, O Commander of the Faithful?" He answered, "Speak harshly! This is Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj." She remarked, "No welcome to him. It is better to hear about al-Mu'aydī than to see him."[538] At that, Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj said, "Gently, O Umm al-Ḥakam. By God, you married but were not honorable, and you gave birth but were not distinguished. You wanted your sinful son to govern us so he would treat us as he treated our Kūfan brothers. May God not give him that. Should he do so, we would strike him a blow from which he would bend over, even if the [one who is] sitting[539] disliked that." So Mu'āwiyah turned around to her and said, "That's enough."

In this year 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād became more violent against the Khārijites. He killed a large group of them he held captive and another group in combat.[540] Among the captives he killed was 'Urwah b. Udayyah, the brother of Abū Bilāl Mirdās b. Udayyah.

Why 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād Killed the Khārijites

[186] I was told by 'Umar—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—'Īsā b. 'Āṣim al-Asadī: Ibn Ziyād went out for some wager of his. While he sat waiting for the horses, the people gathered, and 'Urwah b. Udayyah, the brother of Abū Bilāl, was with them. he approached Ibn Ziyād, saying, "There were five [faults] among the peoples before us, and they have come to exist among us—'Do you build a monument on every height, commit folly, and occupy large structures that perhaps you might be immortal, and if you struck you struck as tyrants?' "[541] He mentioned two other faults that Jarīr does not remember. When 'Urwah said that, Ibn Ziyād supposed that he would only have the audacity to say that while a group of his companions was with him, so he rose, rode off, and left his wager. At that 'Urwah was asked, "What have you done? You surely know, by God, that he will kill you." When 'Urwah hid, Ibn Ziyād sought him. He came to al-Kūfah, was seized there, and was sent to Ibn Ziyād, who ordered 'Urwah's hands and feet to be cut off. Then he summoned him and asked, "What do you think?" 'Urwah replied, "I think that you ruined this world for me and ruined the other world for yourself." At that, 'Ubaydallāh killed him and sent for his daughter and killed her.

538. This is ascribed to al-Mundhir b. Mā' al-Samā'. See Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 129–31; Freytag, Proverbia, I, 223–24.

539. That is, Mu'āwiyah.

540. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV B, 77–123.

As for Mirdās b. Udayyah, he went out to al-Ahwāz.[542] Ibn Ziyād had imprisoned him previously. This is according to the account I was told by 'Umar. He said: Khallād b. Yazīd al-Bāhilī related to me: Among others, Ibn Ziyād imprisoned Mirdās b. Udayyah. The jailer used to see his [manner of] worship and his zeal and allowed him to leave at night. When dawn arose, Mirdās would return to him and enter the prison. A friend of Mirdās used to converse with Ibn Ziyād at night, and one night Ibn Ziyād mentioned the Khārijites and decided to kill them in the morning. The friend of Mirdās hurried off to the latter's residence and informed them [of this], saying, "Send [word] to Abū Bilāl in the prison to let him know, for he is a dead man." Mirdās heard that. The warden also learned the news, where- [187] upon he had a bad night worrying lest Mirdās know the news and not return. When the usual time came for him to return to the prison, all of a sudden there he was. At that, the jailer asked him, "Did you hear what the governor decided to do?" When

541. Qur'ān 26: 128–30.

542. Al-Ahwāz is the province of Khūzistān or its capital city. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ahwāz, Khūzistān.

Mirdās replied that he had, the jailer said, "Then you came this morning?" He replied, "Yes! You would not be rewarded for your kindness if you were punished because of me." In the morning 'Ubaydallāh came and began to kill the Khārijites. Then he summoned Mirdās, and when the latter was present, the jailer jumped up—he was a milk-brother of 'Ubaydallāh—and seized 'Ubaydallāh's foot, saying, "Grant me this [man]," and he related his story to him. 'Ubaydallāh then granted Mirdās to the jailer who released him.

I was told by 'Umar—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—Yūnus b. 'Ubayd: Mirdās Abū Bilāl, who was one of the Banū Rabī'ah b. Ḥanẓalah, went out to al-Ahwāz with forty men. Ibn Ziyād sent an army against them under Ibn Ḥiṣn al-Tamīmī. The Khārijites fought against his men and defeated him. At that, a man of the Banū Taym Allāh b. Tha'labah said:

Did you claim two thousand believers are among you, while forty fight them at Āsik?[543]

You lied. That is not as you claimed, but the Khārijites are believers.

It is the small group [which] as you have known, is made victorious against the large group.[544]

'Umar said: The last line is not in the account which Khallād b.
[188] Yazīd al-Bāhilī recited to me.

It is said that 'Umayrah b. Yathribī, the judge in al-Baṣrah died in this year and that Hishām b. Hubayrah replaced him there.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam was in charge of al-Kūfah in this year. Some of them said that al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī was in charge there, while 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was in charge of al-Baṣrah and Shurayḥ was in charge of rendering judgment at al-Kūfah.

Al-Walīd b. 'Utbah led the people in the pilgrimage this year. This is also what Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī said.

---

543. Āsik or Āsak was a district of al-Ahwāz between Arrajān and Rāmhurmuz. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 61–2.

544. This is probably an allusion to the Battle of Badr.

The Events of the Year

59

(October 23, 678–October 12, 679)

The winter campaign of ʿAmr b. Murrah al-Juhanī by land in Byzantine territory occurred during this year. According to al-Wāqidī, there was no raid by sea that year, although others said that Junādah b. Abī Umayyah raided by sea.

During this year ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam was dismissed from al-Kūfah and al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī was appointed governor there. We have mentioned previously the reason for Ibn Umm al-Ḥakam's dismissal from al-Kūfah.

In this year Muʿāwiyah made ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād b. Sumayyah governor of Khurāsān.

Why Muʿāwiyah Appointed ʿAbd al-Rahmān b. Ziyād as Governor of Khurāsān

I was told by al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad —Abū ʿAmr—our shaykhs: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād came to [189] visit Muʿāwiyah, and asked, "O Commander of the Faithful, don't we have a claim [on you]?" Muʿāwiyah replied that he did. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān then asked, "So why don't you make me a governor?" He replied, "Al-Nu'mān at al-Kūfah is on the right course, and he is one of the Companions of the Prophet. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād is in charge of al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān, and 'Abbād b. Ziyād is in charge of Sijistān. I don't see a position which is appropriate for you unless I have you share in the position of your brother, 'Ubaydallāh." He said, "Give me a share, for his governorship is so extensive he can stand a partnership." Thereupon, Mu'āwiyah made him governor of Khurāsān.

(According to) 'Alī—Abū Ḥafṣ—'Umar: Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī arrived (in Khurāsān), having been sent by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād. Qays arrested Aslam b. Zur'ah and imprisoned him. Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān arrived and fined Aslam b. Zur'ah three hundred thousand dirhams. (According to) 'Alī—Muṣ'ab b. Ḥayyān—his brother Muqātil b. Ḥayyān: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād reached Khurāsān; thus a generous, greedy, weak man arrived who did not make a single raid, and remained in Khurāsān for two years.

(According to) 'Alī—'Awānah: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād came to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah from Khurāsān after the killing of al-Ḥusayn,[545] while he made Qays b. al-Haytham deputy over Khurāsān. (According to) 'Alī—Muslim b. Muḥārib and Abū Ḥafṣ: Yazīd asked 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād, "How much wealth did you bring with you from Khurāsān?" he replied, "Twenty million dirhams." Yazīd said, "If you wish, we would ask you for an accounting and collect it from you and return you to your governorship. Or, if you wish, we would allow you (to keep it) and dismiss you, provided that you give 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far (b. Abī Ṭālib) five hundred thousand dirhams." 'Abd al-Raḥmān answered, "Rather allow me what you just said, and [190] put someone else in charge there." 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād sent one million dirhams to 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far, saying, "Five hundred thousand are from the Commander of the Faithful and five hundred thousand are from me."

In this year 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād went to visit Mu'āwiah accompanied by the Baṣran notables. Mu'āwiyah dismissed 545. Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was killed on the tenth of Muḥarram 61 (October 10, 680).

'Ubaydallāh from al-Baṣrah, then he put him in charge of it again and confirmed the governorship for him.

How Mu'āwiyah Dismissed and Re-appointed 'Ubaydallāh as Governor of al-Baṣrah

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī: 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād went to visit Mu'āwiyah with the people of Iraq. Mu'āwiyah told him, "I will receive your delegation according to their stations and their dignity." Thus they were permitted to enter; al-Aḥnaf entered with the last of them, since his station was low according to 'Ubaydallāh. When Mu'āwiyah observed him, he welcomed al-Aḥnaf and had him sit with him on his dais. Then he conversed with the folk, and they praised 'Ubaydallāh nicely, while al-Aḥnaf was silent. Mu'āwiyah then asked, "What's the matter with you, O Abū Baḥr? You don't speak." Al-Aḥnaf replied, "If I should converse, I would contradict the folk." At that, Mu'āwiyah announced, "Stand up, for I have dismissed him. Seek a governor whom you approve." Every one of the folk then went to ask one of the Banū Umayyah or one of the Syrian notables. Al-Aḥnaf stayed in his home and did not go to anyone. They spent several days (doing this). Mu'āwiyah then sent for them and assembled them. When they entered his presence, he asked, "Whom did you choose?" They disagreed, and each of their factions named someone (else), while al-Aḥnaf was silent. Mu'āwiyah then asked him, "What's the matter with you, O Abū Baḥr? You don't speak." Al-Aḥnaf replied, "If you make anyone of your family governor over us, we would not consider anyone equal to 'Ubaydallāh, and if you would make anyone else governor, then consider doing so." Mu'āwiyah said, "I have put him back in charge of you." Then he [191] recommended him to al-Aḥnaf, and rebuked the latter's view because he had caused alienation. When the civil strife broke out, no one fulfilled (his obligation) to 'Ubaydallāh except al-Aḥnaf.

During this year, the affair of Yazīd b. Mufarrigh al-Ḥimyarī and 'Abbād b. Ziyād occurred, as well as Yazīd's ridiculing the sons of Ziyād.

Why Yazīd b. Mufarrigh Ridiculed the Sons of Ziyād

I reported on the authority of Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā that Yazīd b. Rabī'ah b. Mufarrigh al-Ḥimyarī accompanied 'Abbād b. Ziyād in Sijistān. He was engaged in war against the Turks for 'Abbād, who was impatient with him. When the army with 'Abbād was concerned about fodder for their mounts, Ibn Mufarrigh said:[546]

If only the beards would turn into hay, we would feed it to the horses of the Muslims.

'Abbād b. Ziyād had a large beard, so that when Ibn Mufarrigh's poem reached 'Abbād, the latter was told, "He meant only you." At that, 'Abbād sought him, but he fled from 'Abbād and satirized him in many qaṣīdahs. Among those verses in which he satirized 'Abbād were:[547]

If Mu'āwiyah son of Ḥarb should perish, spread the good news of a crack to the folk of your cauldron.

So testify that your mother was not touched by Abū Sufyān, taking off the veil,

But it was a matter about which there is uncertainty, in great fear and alarm, and:[548]

Tell Mu'āwiyah son of Ḥarb of a penetration by the Yamānī man.

Are you angry that it be said, "Your father was virtuous" and pleased that it be said, "Your father was an adulterer"?

So I testify that your relationship with Ziyād is like the kinship of the elephant with the offspring of a she-ass.

---

546. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 53.
547. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII. 57.
548. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 60.

Abū Zayd (said): When Ibn Mufarrigh satirized 'Abbād he left him and came to al-Baṣrah while 'Ubaydallāh was visiting Mu'āwiyah. 'Abbād then wrote to 'Ubaydallāh some of the lines in which Ibn Mufarrigh satirized him. When 'Ubaydallāh read the poetry, he entered Mu'āwiyah's presence, recited the lines to him, and asked permission to kill Ibn Mufarrigh. But Mu'āwiyah refused to let 'Ubaydallāh kill him, saying, "Punish him, but don't go so far as to kill him." Ibn Mufarrigh reached al-Baṣrah and sought refuge with al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, who said, "We do not give refuge against Ibn Sumayyah. If you wish, I would protect you from the poets of the Banū Tamīm." Ibn Mufarrigh replied, "That is not what I need to be protected against." He then came to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh who threatened him, and then to Umayyah and to 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar, both of whom threatened him. Finally he came to al-Mundhir b. Jarūd, who protected him and brought him into his house. Since Baḥriyyah bt. al-Mundhir was 'Ubaydallāh's wife, when the latter reached al-Baṣrah, he was informed that Ibn Mufarrigh was staying with al-Mundhir. When al-Mundhir came to greet 'Ubaydallāh, the latter sent the police to the house of al-Mundhir, and they seized Ibn Mufarrigh. Before al-Mundhir even realized it, while he was with 'Ubaydallāh, there was Ibn Mufarrigh standing before him. At that, al-Mundhir stood up before 'Ubaydallāh, saying, "O amīr, I have given him refuge." 'Ubaydallāh replied, "By God, O Mundhir, he praises you and your father while he ridicules me and my father. Then you protect him against me." 'Ubaydallāh ordered for him to be given a laxative to drink. He was to be carried on a donkey with saddle-bags on it.[549] The donkey began to be led about with him on it, while he defecated in his clothing. As he was led through the markets that way, a Persian passed by him, saw him, and asked about him in Persian, "What is this?"[550] Ibn Mufarrigh understood Persian, so he said,[551] [192] [193]

549. In other accounts a sow and a cat were tied to the donkey. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Mufarrigh.

550. In Persian: "În chīst?"

551. These lines in Persian are also in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 51; Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, I, 143; and Ibn Qutaybah, Shi'r, 276.

It is water, it is date wine,
It is the juice of raisins,
And it is white-faced[552] Sumayyah.

Then he satirized al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd:[553]

I renounced being a neighbor of Quraysh, and was a neighbor of the 'Abd al-Qays, folk of al-Mushaqqar,[554]

People who protect us, for their protection was spreading whirlwinds of a fart of Iraq.

So my neighbor from Jadhīmah [555] went to sleep, and only the hard working [person] protects the protected.

He also said to 'Ubaydallāh:[556]

Water will cleanse what you did, but my declaration is firmly fixed for you, as long as the bones last.

Then 'Ubaydallāh transported him to 'Abbād in Sijistān. At that, the Yamanīs interceded with Mu'āwiyah for him in Syria, so he sent a messenger to 'Abbād. 'Abbād then sent Ibn Mufarrigh to Mu'āwiyah. On the way he said:[557]

O 'Adas! 'Abbād does not have authority over you.
Escape, while you carry this [one], freed.

By my life, he has saved you from the abyss of ruin, leader and rope for mankind, strong.

[194] I shall thank you for what good favor you render, and the likes of me ought to thank benefactors.

---

552. The text reads rū-yi sepīd, that is, notorious.

553. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 57.

554. Al-Mushaqqar was a fortress belonging to the 'Abd al-Qays. It guarded the approach to the town of Hajar in al-Baḥrayn. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 541.

555. Jadhīmah b. 'Awf was the branch of the 'Abd al-Qays to which al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd belonged. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Ḳays.

556. From a long qaṣīdah in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 57–8.

557. These lines are also in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 60; and Ibn Qutaybah, Shi'r, 280, with variants. 'Adas is either the name of the mule he was riding or the command used to make mules go. See Wright, Grammar, I, 295.

When he entered Muʿāwiyah's presence, he wept, saying, "What was done to me would not have been done to any Muslim except for a crime or offense." Muʿāwiyah asked, "Are you not the one who recites the qaṣīdah beginning:

Tell Muʿāwiyah son of Ḥarb,
about a penetration by the Yamānī man?"

Ibn Mufarrigh replied, "No, by that which magnified truth for the Commander of the Faithful, I did not say that." Muʿāwiyah inquired "Did you not say:

So testify that your mother was never touched,
by Abū Sufyān, throwing down the veil, among much poetry in which you ridiculed Ibn Ziyād? Go, for I have forgiven you for your offense. However, if you should deal with us [again], what has happened would be nothing [compared to what will happen]. So, be off with you, and settle in any land you wish." Ibn Mufarrigh then settled at Mosul. Then he wanted to go to al-Baṣrah. Upon reaching it, he entered the presence of ʿUbaydallāh who gave him a guarantee of safe-conduct.

As for ʿAbū ʿUbaydah, he recounted Ibn Mufarrigh's settling at Mosul, according to what Abū Zayd told me: He related that when Muʿāwiyah asked, "Are you not the one who recites the lines:

Tell Muʿāwiyah son of Ḥarb,
about a penetration by the Yamānī man?"

Ibn Mufarrigh swore that he did not say it, but that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥakam, the brother of Marwān, said it instead. He also swore that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān imitated him as a means of ridiculing Ziyād, and that he used to reprove ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. At that, Muʿāwiyah was angry with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥakam and withheld his stipend until he hurt him. When someone interceded with Muʿāwiyah for ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, he said, "I will not be pleased with him until ʿUbaydallāh is pleased." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān then came to ʿUbaydallāh in Iraq, telling him:

You [and] Ziyād in the family of Ḥarb, [195]
[are] dearer to me than one of my fingertips.

I regard you as a brother, a maternal uncle, and a cousin, and I do not know what you think of me privately.

'Ubaydallāh was pleased with him and replied, "By God, I think you are a poor poet." Mu'āwiyah then asked Ibn Mufarrigh, "Are you not the one who recites the lines:

So testify that your mother was never touched,
by Abū Sufyān, throwing down the veil?

Don't do it again. We forgive you."

Ibn Mufarrigh proceeded until he settled at Mosul and got married. The morning after the night on which the marriage was consummated, he went out to hunt. He met an oil merchant or a perfume dealer on an ass of his. Ibn Mufarrigh inquired, "Where have you come from?" The merchant replied, "From al-Ahwāz." Ibn Mufarrigh asked, "How is the water of Masruqān[558] doing?" He answered, "As usual." Ibn Mufarrigh then left and headed toward al-Baṣah; his family did not know that he had gone. He proceeded until he came to 'Ubaydallāh at al-Baṣrah and entered his presence, and the latter granted him a guaranteed safe-conduct. Ibn Mufarrigh stayed with him until he asked permission to leave for Kirmān[559] 'Ubaydallāh allowed him to do so, and wrote to his official there to take care of and respect him. Ibn Mufarrigh then left for Kirmān, while at that time the official of 'Ubaydallāh in charge there was Sharīk b. al-A'war al-Ḥārithī.[560]

In this year 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān led the people in the pilgrimage. I was told that by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Iṣḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī and others said the same.

---

558. Masruqān was a canal famous for its white water near Shustar in Khūzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 236.

559. Kirmān is a province and region in south-central Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 299–321; *EI*², s.v. Kirmān.

560. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV B, 79, Ibn Mufarrigh did not settle in Kirmān until 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād had fled from al-Baṣrah to Syria.

The governor in charge of al-Madīnah was al-Walīd b. 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān. Al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr was in charge of al-Kūfah, while Shurayḥ was in charge of rendering judgment there. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was in charge of al-Baṣrah, while Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of rendering judgment there. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād was in charge of Khurāsān while 'Abbād b. [196] Ziyād was in charge of Sijistān and Sharīk b. al-A'war was in charge of Kirmān for 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād.

The Events of the Year 60

(October 13, 679–September 30, 680)

According to al-Wāqidī, the raid of Mālik b. ʿAbdallāh against Sawriyah happened in this year, as well as Junādah b. Abī Umayyah's entry into Rūdas and his destruction of its city.

During this year also, Muʿāwiyah imposed the declaration of allegiance to his son, Yazīd, on the delegation that came to him with ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. When Muʿāwiyah became ill this year, he entrusted to his son, Yazīd, what he did concerning the group that had refused to declare allegiance to Yazīd when he had summoned them to do so. Muʿāwiyah's agreement was what Hishām b. Muḥammad related according to Abū Mikhnaf —ʿAbd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq b. ʿAbdallāh b. Makhramah: When Muʿāwiyah became sick with the illness from which he perished, he summoned his son, Yazīd, saying:

> O my son, I have spared you the effort, made things smooth for you, subdued enemies for you, subjected the necks of the Arabs for you, and created unity for you. I am only afraid that four individuals of Quraysh might challenge you for this matter which was established for you—al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr. As far as 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar is concerned, he is a man whom righteousness has overwhelmed, and if no one else were left, he would acknowledge you. As far as al-Ḥusayn is concerned, the [197] people of Iraq will not leave him alone until they make him rebel. If he rebels against you, and you should defeat him, then pardon him, because he has close kinship and a great claim. As far as Ibn Abī Bakr is concerned, he is a man, who, if he should see his companions doing something, he would do likewise. He is only interested in women and pleasure. As for the one who crouches for you as a crouching lion and tricks you as a sly fox, and if an opportunity enables [him] he would spring, that is Ibn al-Zubayr. If he does that to you, and you are able to overpower him, then tear him limb from limb.

(According to) Hishām—'Awānah: We have heard in another account that when Mu'āwiyah was on the verge of death, which was in this year, Yazīd was absent. Mu'āwiyah summoned al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qāys al-Fihrī, who was the head of his police, and Muslim b. 'Uqbah al-Murrī and counseled them saying:

Tell Yazīd my testament: Pay attention to the people of the Ḥijāz for they are your root. Honor whomever of them should come to you, and take care of whomever is absent. Pay attention to the people of Iraq, and if they ask you to dismiss one of their officials every day, do so. For I would rather have a governor be dismissed than for one hundred thousands swords to be unsheathed against you. Pay attention to the people of Syria, for they are your entourage and your leather bag. If something should befall you from your enemy, be victorious with them. When you are successful with them, return the people of Syria to their land. For if they should stay in another land than their own, they would take on other characteristics than their own. I only fear three persons of the Quraysh—Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. As far as Ibn 'Umar is concerned, he is a man whom religion has overwhelmed, so he would not ask anything from you. As far as al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī is concerned, he is an insignificant man, and I hope that God would protect you from him by means of those who killed his father and deserted his brother. He has close kinship, a great claim, and is a rela-[198] tive of Muḥammad. I don't think the people of Iraq would leave him alone until they make him rebel. If you should overpower him pardon him, for if I were his master, I would pardon him. As far as Ibn al-Zubayr is concerned, he is a heaving reptile, so if he appears to you, stick to him unless he asks for peace from you. If he does, then accept [it] and spare the blood of your folk as much as you can.

In this year Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān perished at Damascus. The time of his death was disputed apart from general agreement that his death occurred in the month of Rajab 60 (April 7–May 6, 680) of the hijrah.[561] Hishām b. Muḥammad (said): Mu'āwiyah died at the new moon of Rajab 60 (April 7, 680). Al-Wāqidī (said): Mu'āwiyah died on the ides of Rajab (April, 21, 680). 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Mu'āwiyah died at Damascus on a Thursday, eight days before the end of Rajab 60 (April 29, 680). Al-Ḥārith told me that according to 'Alī.

The Length of Mu'āwiyah's Reign

I was told by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone—Iṣḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Mu'āwiyah was acknowledged (as caliph) at Adhruh. Al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī acknowledged him in Jumādāh I 41 (September 2–October 1, 661) and Mu'āwiyah died in Rajab 60 (April 7–May 6, 680). His Caliphate lasted nineteen years and three months.

I was told by al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Dīnār al-Sa'dī—his father: Mu'āwiyah died Thursday night on the ides of Rajab 60 (April 21, [199] 680) and his Caliphate lasted nineteen years, three months and seventeen days.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī: The Syrians acknowledged Mu'āwiyah as Caliph in Dhū al-Qa'dah 37 (April 10–May 9, 658), 561. According to Ibn Khayyāt, Ta'rīkh, I, 272, Mu'āwiyah died on a Thursday, eight days before the end of Rajab 59 (May 10, 679).

when the two arbiters split. They had previously acknowledged him in order to demand (vengeance) for the blood of 'Uthmān. Then al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī made peace with him and turned over matters to him in the year 41, five days before the end of the month of Rabī' I (July 31, 661). At that, the people as a whole acknowledged Mu'āwiyah, so it was called "the year of the concord." He died at Damascus, in the year 60, Thursday, eight days before the end of Rajab (April 29, 680). His rule lasted nineteen years, three months and twenty-seven days. It is also said that there were nineteen years, ten months and three nights between the death of 'Alī and the death of Mu'āwiyah. Hishām b. Muḥammad (said): Mu'āwiyah was acknowledged as Caliph in Jumādah I 41 (September 2–October 1, 661). He thus ruled nineteen years and three months except for a few days. Then he died at the new moon of Rajab 60 (April 7, 680).

There is also disagreement about his age and how long he lived. Some said he was seventy-five years old on the day he died.

I was told by 'Umar—Muhammad b. Yaḥyā—Hishām b. al-Walīd—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī: Al-Walīd asked me about the life span of the Caliphs, so I informed him that Mu'āwiyah was seventy-five years old when he died. At that, he exclaimed, "Bravo! Indeed that is a lifetime." Others said he was seventy-three years old when he died.

I was told by 'Umar—Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Mu'āwiyah was seventy-three years old when he died. He [200] is also said to have been eighty years old, while others said he was seventy-eight years old when he died.

I was told by al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Dīnār—his father: Mu'āwiyah died when he was seventy-eight years old. Others said he died when he was eighty-five years old. I was told that by Hishām b. Muḥammad, who reported this according to his father.

Mu'āwiyah's Last Illness

I was told by al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Abū 'Ubaydah—Abū Ya'qūb al-Thaqafī—'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr: When Mu'āwiyah felt heavy, and the people reported that it was death (approaching), he said to his family, "Put antimony all around my eyes, and anoint my head with oil." They did so and made his face shine with oil. Then it was arranged for him to sit. He said, "Prop me up." Then he said, "Allow the people to greet [me] standing, and let no one sit." Men then began to enter and greet (him) standing and to see him treated with kohl and with oil. He was saying, "The people will say that at his end he was the healthiest of people." When they left his presence, Mu'āwiyah said:

By my posing for the gloaters by whom I am seen, indeed I am not ruined by the uncertainties of time.

[201] And when destiny digs in its claws
You will find that every amulet is useless.

He had discharges, and died that very day.

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Isḥāq b. Ayyūb—'Abd al-Malik b. Mīnās al-Kalbī: Mu'āwiyah told his two daughters during his last illness, while they were turning him over, "Turn over[562] [this] shrewd person deftly, [who] accumulated wealth from youth to creeping[563] if he does not enter Hell Fire." Then he quoted:

I have endeavored for you as the runner who is fatigued, and I have saved you from traveling and departure.

This is said to be from the collection of a reliable person.

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī—Sulaymān b. Ayyūb—al-Awazā'ī and 'Alī b. Mujāhid—al-A'lā b. Maymūn—his father: Mu'āwiyah said during his last illness, "Indeed the Messenger of God clothed me with a shirt. One day I held it up while he pared his nails. I then took his parings and put them in a long-necked bottle. So when I die clothe me in that shirt and cut up those parings, grind them up, and sprinkle them in my eyes and in my mouth. Thus God might have mercy on me by their blessing (barakah)." Then he quoted the poem of al-

562. See Mubarrad, Kāmil, 784.

563. From the proverb: "It fatigued me from youth to creeping," said of someone who accumulates from youth until he walks slowly leaning on a staff. See Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 7; Freytag, Proverbia, II, 78.

Ashhab b. Rumaylah al-Nahshalī in which he praises al-Qubā':[564]

When you die, generosity will die and liberality will cease among people except for a few, ice cold.[565]

And the hands of beggars will be turned back and held fast out of religion and the world by a renewing successor.

At that, one of his daughters or someone else said, "Certainly not, O Commander of the Faithful, may God remove [it] from you instead" He then quoted: [202]

And when destiny digs in its claws,
you will find that every amulet is useless.

Then he went blind, but afterwards recovered his sight and told those members of his family who attended him, "Fear God, Almighty and Great, for God, praise Him, protects whoever fears Him, and there is no protector for one who does not fear God." Then he passed away.

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥakam—someone: When Mu'āwiyah was attended by death he ordered for half of his wealth to be returned to the treasury, hoping that the remainder would be good for him, because the Caliph 'Umar had shared with his officials.

Who Led the Prayer over Mu'āwiyah When He Died

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Al-Ḍaḥḥak b. Qays al-Fihrī led the prayer over Mu'āwiyah, while Yazīd was absent, when Mu'āwiyah died. I was also told by Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq b. 'Abdallāh b. Makhramah: When Mu'āwiyah died, al-Ḍaḥḥak b. Qays went out and ascended the pulpit, while Mu'āwiyah's shrouds were visible in his hands. After he praised and extolled God, he said, "Indeed Mu'āwiyah was the stick of the Arabs and the blade of the Arabs, by means of whom God, Almighty and Great, cut off strife, whom He made sovereign over mankind, by means of whom he conquered countries, but now he has died and these are his shrouds. We are wrapping him in them and putting him in his grave, and leaving him and his work. Then there will be the interval[566] until the Day of Resurrection. Whoever of you has wanted to see [203] him, be present at dawn worship." He also sent a courier to Yazīd concerning Mu'āwiyah's pain. Yazīd said about that:[567]

564. Al-Qubā' was al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah al-Makhzūmī, the brother of the poet 'Umar b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah al-Makhzūmī. See Mubarrad, Kāmil, 624.

565. The text reads: muṣarrad. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, III, 248.

The courier has brought a parchment, the rider trots with it, so the heart was apprehensive of its parchment and alarmed.

We said, "Woe unto you, what is in your letter?"
They said, "The Caliph has certainly felt pain."

So the earth was shaken or was about to be shaken under us, as if it raised dust from its severed foundations.

One whose person continues to exceed nobility, the keys of that person are about to drop.

When we arrived, while the door of the house was shut, and [heard] the voice of Ramlah, the heart was alarmed, so it broke.

I was told by 'Umar—'Alī—Isḥāq b. Khulayd—Khulayd b. 'Ajlān, the mawlā of 'Abbād: Mu'āwiyah died while Yazīd was at Huwwārīn;[568] they had written to him when Mu'āwiyah had fallen ill. Yazīd arrived after Mu'āwiyah had been buried, so he came to his grave and worshipped over him and prayed for him. Then he came to his residence and recited the lines:

The courier has brought a parchment . . .

---

566. Qur'ān 23:102. The barzakh is the interval or barrier between this life and the next, between Hell and Paradise, or between the material and spiritual worlds. See *EI*², s.v. Barzakh.

567. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 33.

568. C reads: Ḥawrān, the mountainous plateau south of Damascus. See *EI*², s.v. Hawrān. Huwwārīn was the location of two villages, two days' journey from Tadmur (Palmyra), where Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah died in 64(683/4)

Mu'āwiyah's Lineage and His Agnomen

As for Mu'āwiyah's lineage, he was the son of Abū Sufyān. Abū Sufyān's name was Ṣakhr b. Ḥarb b. Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manāt b. Quṣayy b. Kilāb. Mu'āwiyah's mother was Hind [204]
bt. 'Utbah b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manāf b. Quṣayy. His patronymic (kunyah)[569] was Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

Mu'āwiyah's Wives and Children

One of his wives was Maysūn bt. Baḥdal b. Unayf b. Waljah b. Qunāfah b. 'Adī b. Zuhayr b. Ḥārithah b. Janāb al-Kalbī. She bore Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah for him. 'Alī said: In addition to Yazīd, Maysūn bore Mu'āwiyah a girl, Rabb al-Masāriq, but she died young, and Hishām did not mention her among the children of Mu'āwiyah. Among his wives was also Fākhitah bt. Qaraẓah b. 'Abd 'Amr b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf. She bore Mu'āwiyah two sons, 'Abd al-Raḥmān and 'Abdallāh. 'Abdallāh was foolish and frail and was nicknamed Abū al-Khayr. I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī b. Muḥammad: One day 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah passed a miller who had tied his mule to the mill for the flour and put bells on his neck. So he asked the miller, "Why did you put these bells on the neck of your mule?" The miller answered, "I put them on its neck in order to know if it should stop and not turn the mill." 'Abdallāh then asked, "Have you considered how you would know that he was not turning the mill if he should stop and shake his head?" The miller told him, "This mule, may God make the amīr prosper, does not have intelligence like that of the amīr." As for 'Abd al-Raḥmān, he died young.

Among his wives was Nā'ilah bt. 'Umārah al-Kalbī. I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī: When Mu'āwiyah married Nā'ilah he told Maysūn, "Go off and observe the daughter of your paternal uncle" After she had observed her, he asked, "How did she [205] look to you?" She answered, "Perfectly beautiful, but I saw a mole beneath her navel where the head of her husband will certainly be put in her lap" At that, Mu'āwiyah divorced her, 569. A kunyah is an agnomen, named after a son.

and Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī married her. Then after Ḥabīb, al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī married her. Al-Nu'mān was killed and his head was put in her lap. Among Mu'āwiyah's wives was Katwah bt. Qaraẓah, the sister of Fākhitah. He raided Cyprus[570] while she was with him, and she died there.

Some of Mu'āwiyah's Affairs and Conduct

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī: When allegiance was rendered to Mu'āwiyah as Caliph, he put Qays b. Ḥamzah al-Hamdānī in charge of his police. Then he dismissed him and appointed Zumayl b. 'Amr al-'Udhrī,[571] or al-Saksakī. Mu'āwiyah's secretary and the person in charge of his business was Sarjūn b. Mansūr al-Rūmī. One of his mawālī called al-Mukhtār was in charge of his guard (ḥaras). This is also said to have been a man called Mālik, who was nicknamed Abū al-Mukhāriq, a mawlā of Ḥimyar.[572] Mu'āwiyah was the first to make use of bodyguards. Sa'd,[573] his mawlā, was in charge of his gatekeepers. Faḍālah b. 'Utbah al-Anṣārī[574] was in charge of rendering judgment. When Faḍālah died, Mu'āwiyah appointed Abū Idrīs 'Ā'idhallāh b. 'Abdallāh al-Khawlānī[575] to render judgment. So far this has been the account of Aḥmad according to 'Alī. Others than 'Alī said: 'Abdallāh b. Miḥṣan al-Ḥimyarī was in 570. Cyprus was attacked by Mu'āwiyah in 28(648/9) See *EI*², s.v. Ḳubrus.

571. Zumayl b. 'Amr (or Zamal b. Rabī'ah) b. al-'Anaz b. Khashāf b. Khudayj al-'Udhrī had been a member of his tribe's delegation to Muḥammad. The latter gave him a standard which he kept until he fought at Ṣiffīn along with Mu'āwiyah, where he was one of the witnesses to the arbitration agreement. He witnessed the rendering of allegiance (bay'ah) to Marwān at Jābiyah, and died at the battle of Marj Rāhiṭ in 64(683/4) See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 205; and Ibn Hajar, Iṣābah, I, 551, II, 19. For a slightly different account see Ibn Khayyāt, Ta'rīkh, I, 276.

572. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 276, calls him Abū al-Mukhtār.

573. Ibid.: Abū Ayyub.

574. Faḍālah b. 'Utbah (or 'Ubayd) al-Anṣārī (d. 53(673)) was a Companion of Muḥammad at Ḥudaybiyah, participated in the conquest of Egypt, and settled in Syria where Mu'āwiyah put him in charge of rendering judgment at Damascus when he went to Ṣiffīn. He also led sea raids against the Byzantines. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 182.

575. Abū Idrīs 'Ā'idhallāh b. 'Abdallāh al-Khawlānī (9–ca. 86 (630–ca. 705)) one of the greatest of the Followers, was judge at Damascus from 53(673) until his death. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 99, V, 134.

charge of the department of the seal. Mu'āwiyah was the first one who used a department of the seal. The reason for that was [206] that Mu'āwiyah ordered one hundred thousand dirhams for 'Amr b. al-Zubayr to relieve the latter of his debts. Mu'āwiyah wrote about that to Ziyād b. Sumayyah while the latter was in charge of Iraq. 'Amr then opened the letter and changed the one hundred to two hundred. When Ziyād presented his invoice, Mu'āwiyah disclaimed it, required 'Amr to return the money, and imprisoned him. His brother, 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, paid it on his behalf. At that, Mu'āwiyah established the department of the seal, and he tied up letters, which had not been tied (before).[576]

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārik—Ibn Abī Dhi'b—Sa'īd al-Maqburī[577]—'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: You speak of Kisrā and Qayṣar and their shrewdness while Mu'āwiyah is with you!

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān: I read—'Abdallāh—Fulayḥ: I was told that when 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ visited Mu'āwiyah with the Egyptians, 'Amr told them, "Pay attention when you enter the presence of Ibn Hind lest you greet him as Caliph. That will make you great in his eyes. Reduce him as much as you can." When they came to him, Mu'āwiyah told his gate-keepers, "Indeed, as I know Ibn al-Nābighah, he will have reduced my position with the folk, so pay attention when the delegation enters, shake them as strongly as you can, and don't let a single one of them reach me unless he is concerned about his own destruction." The first one who [207] entered his presence was an Egyptian called Ibn al-Khayyāṭ. He entered shaken, saying, "Peace be upon you, O Messenger of God!" The folk did that in succession, and when they left, 'Amr told them, "God curse you! I forbade you to greet him as amīr, so you greeted him as Prophet."

One day Mu'āwiyah wore his black turban and lined his eyelids with kohl, and he was the most handsome person when he did that. 'Abdallāh doubted whether he heard that about him or not.

576. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 276, adds that 'Ubayd b. Aws al-Ghassānī was Mu'āwiyah's correspondence secretary (kātib al-rasā'il).

577. Sa'īd b. Kaysān was called Sa'īd b. Abī Sa'īd al-Maqburī. See Nawawī, Tahdhīb, I, 219.

I was told by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Abū Muḥammad al-Umawī: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb left for Syria and saw Mu'āwiyah come to receive him with a procession; Mu'āwiyah had gone out to 'Umar with a retinue. At that, 'Umar told him, "O Mu'āwiyah, you go with a retinue, and you leave in the same way. I heard that you start the day in your residence while petitioners are at your door." Mu'āwiyah replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, our enemy is close to us, and they have scouts and spies, so I wanted, O Commander of the Faithful, for them to see that Islām has power." 'Umar answered, "This is the ruse of an intelligent man or the deception of a clever man." Mu'āwiyah then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, instruct me with what you want and I shall fullfill it." 'Umar replied, "Woe unto you! Whenever we discuss something which I disapprove of you doing, you leave me not knowing whether I should order you to do it or forbid you."

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Ma'mar—Ja'far b. Burqān: Al-Mughīrah wrote to Mu'āwiyah, "Now then, indeed my age has become great, my bones are frail, and the Quraysh detest me, so if you see fit to dismiss me, do so." Mu'āwiyah wrote back to him, "Your letter reached me in which you state that your age became great, [208] and by my life, no one but you consumed your life. You state that the Quraysh detest you, and by my life, you obtain good only from them. Since you ask me to dismiss you, I have done so. If you were sincere, I have satisfied you; but if you were deceiving, then I have cheated you."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī b. Muḥammad—'Alī b. Mujāhid: Mu'āwiyah said, "If an Umawī were not taking care of his wealth prudently, he would not be like one of them. And if a Hāshimī were not generous and magnanimous, he would not be like one of them. However, you don't hear about the eloquence, generosity and courage of the Hāshimī.

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—'Awānah and Khallād b. 'Ubaydah: Mu'āwiyah had lunch one day while 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakr and his son, Bashīr, were with him—it is also said, someone other than Bashīr—so he ate a lot, and Mu'āwiyah noticed him. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakr realized it and wanted to signal his son, but he was not able to do so, as his son did not raise his head until he was finished. When they left, he scolded his son for what he did. Then he returned to Mu'āwiyah without his son, So Mu'āwiyah asked, "What did your son, the mouthful, do? "'Ubaydallāh replied "He complained." At that, Mu'āwiyah remarked "I knew that his food would make him sick."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Juwayriyyah b. Asmā': Abū Mūsā came to Mu'āwiyah and entered his presence in a black burnous, saying "Peace be upon you, O Commander of the Faithful." He replied, "And upon you be peace." When he left, Mu'āwiyah commented, "The shaykh came for me to make him a governor, and, by God, I would not make him one."

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Abū Sālih Sulaymān b. Sālih—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārik—Sulaymān b. al-Mughīrah—Ḥumayd b. Hilāl—Abū Burdah: I entered Mu'āwiyah's presence when his abcess afflicted him, so he said, "Come over here, O cousin, and look." I looked, and, behold, it had been probed, so I said, "There is no harm to you, O Commander of the Faithful." Yazīd then entered and Mu'āwiyah said, "If you were in charge of anything regarding the people. I would entrust you with this, since his father[578] was my dear friend"—or words to that effect—"except that I thought differently from him about fighting." [209]

I was told by 'Alī—Shihāb b. 'Ubaydallāh—Yazīd b. Suwayd: Mu'āwiyah admitted al-Aḥnaf, and he had begun his turn. Then Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath entered and sat between Mu'āwiyah and al-Aḥnaf. Mu'āwiyah told (al-Aḥnaf), "We did not admit him before you, and you are ahead of him. You have behaved as someone who felt ashamed of himself. Just as we rule your affairs, we rule your admission. Desire from us what we desire from you, and it will be more lasting for you."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Suḥaym b. Ḥafṣ: Rabī'ah b. 'Isl al-Yarbū'ī spoke for Mu'āwiyah,[579] so Mu'āwiyah said, "Give 578. Abū Burdah's father, Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, had been neutral during the first civil war.

579. That is, he offered to arrange a marriage for Mu'āwiyah.

him sawīq[580] to drink." Muʿāwiyah asked him, "O Rabīʿah, how are the people where you are?" He replied, "Disagreeing about such and such a faction." Muʿāwiyah inquired, "So which of them do you belong to?" He answered, "I don't belong to any of them." At that, Muʿāwiyah remarked, "I think there are more of them than you said."[581] Rabīʿah then asked, "O Commander of the Faithful, assist me with twelve thousand tree-trunks to build my house." Muʿāwiyah asked, "Where is your house?" He answered, "In al-Baṣrah, and it is more than two farsakhs [twelve km] by two farsakhs [square]." Muʿāwiyah inquired, "Is your house in al-Baṣrah or is al-Baṣrah in your house?" Afterwards, one of Rabīʿah's sons entered the presence of Ibn Hubayrah,[582] saying, "May God make the amīr prosper, I am the [210] son of the chief of his folk. My father spoke for Muʿāwiyah." Ibn Hubayrah asked Salm b. Qutaybah, "Who says this?" Salm said, "This is the son of the most foolish of his folk." Ibn Hubayrah inquired, "Did your father marry off Muʿāwiyah?" When he replied that he had not, Ibn Hubayrah remarked, "Then I don't think your father accomplished anything."

I was told by Aḥmad—ʿAlī—Abū Muḥammad b. Dhakwān al-Qurashī: ʿUtbah and ʿAnbasah, two sons of Abū Sufyān, engaged in a dispute. ʿUtbah's mother was Hind while ʿAnbasah's mother was the daughter of Abū Uzayhir al-Dawsī. Muʿāwiyah was rude to ʿAnbasah, who retorted, "The same to you, O Commander of the Faithful!" When Muʿāwiyah responded, "O ʿAnbasah, ʿUtbah is the son of Hind," ʿAnbasah said:

We were getting along properly, our enmity was straightened out formerly. Then Hind began to discriminate between us.

And even if Hind did not bear me, indeed I would be a sword which great men of glory employ.

---

580. Sawīq is a broth of barley or wheat to which sugar, honey, dates, oil, or pomegranate syrup may be added. See EI[1], s.v. Sawīḳ.

581. That is, Rabīʿah himself constituted one more faction.

582. This is either ʿUmar b. Hubayrah, governor of Iraq from 102(720) until 105(724) or his son Yūsuf b. ʿUmar, governor of Iraq from 129(741) until 132(749) See EI[2], s.v. Ibn Hubayra.

Her[583] father a great host in every winter, and a shelter for weak people which does not collapse from strain.

His pots still exist for whoever of the two valleys of Tihāmah and Najd might fear.

At that, Muʿāwiyah said, "I shall never felicitate her in your presence."

I was told by ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Ḥarmalah b. ʿImrān: One night Muʿāwiyah heard that the Byzantine Emperor (Qayṣar) was heading for him with an army, that Nātil b. Qays al-Judhāmī took over Filasṭīn and seized its treasury, that the Egyptians whom he had imprisoned had escaped, and that ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib was headed for him with an army. At that he told his announcer (muʾadhdhin), "Call [to worship] right now"—that was in the middle of the night.ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ then came to him, asking, "Why did you send for me?" Muʿāwiyah replied, "I did not send for you." ʿAmr responded, "The announcer only summoned me just now." Muʿāwiyah explained, "I was shot at by four bows." ʿAmr advised, "As for those who escaped from your prison, [211] they are in the prison of God, Almighty and Great. They are folk who are Sellers; you won't have to go to them. But assign the blood price to whoever brings you one of them or his head, and they will be brought to you. Look to the Emperor [Qayṣar] and be peaceful to him. Offer him wealth and some of the garments of Egypt, and he will accept that from you. Look to Nātil b. Qays. By my life, religion did not motivate him. He only wanted what he got, so write to him, and grant that to him, and congratulate him for it. If you should have power over him, [fine,] and if you don't, then don't be distressed about him. Devote your blade and your iron to this one who has the blood of your cousin upon him." All of the folk had escaped from Muʿāwiyah's prison except Abrahah b. al-Ṣabbāḥ. Muʿāwiyah asked, "What prevented you from escaping with your companions?" Abrahah replied, "I was prevented from that by hatred for ʿAlī, 583. That is, 'Anbasah's own mother.

not by love for you, and I cannot overcome it." Mu'āwiyah then released him.

I was told by 'Abdallāh—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah[584] b. Ḥakamah al-Fazārī from the sons of the family of Badr:[585] Mu'āwiyah moved from one of the districts of Syria to some province of his and settled in a residence in Syria. His camp was spread out for him on the surface of a plain overlooking the road, and he permitted me to stay with him. When the caravans, trains of camels, slave girls, and horses passed by, he said, "O Ibn Mas'adah, may God have mercy on Abū Bakr who did not want this world and this world did not want him.
[212] As for 'Umar"—or Ibn Ḥantamah—"this world wanted him but he did not want it. As for 'Uthmān, he caused losses to this world and it caused losses for him. As for us, we wallow in it." Then he seemed to repent, saying, "By God, it is the sovereignty which God brought us."

I was told by 'Aḥmad—'Alī b. Muḥammad—'Alī b. 'Ubaydallāh: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ wrote to Mu'āwiyah asking him to grant his son 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr what Mu'āwiyah had granted the father with regard to Egypt. Mu'āwiyah remarked, "Abū 'Abdallāh wanted to write, but he babbled. I testify to you that should I outlive him, I would cancel his contract." 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "Whenever I saw Mu'āwiyah reclining on his arm, crossing his legs, blinking his eye, and saying to someone, 'Speak!' I had pity on that man."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī b. Muḥammad: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ asked Mu'āwiyah, "O Commander of the Faithful, am I not the most sincere person towards you?" He replied, "Because of that you have gained what you did."

(According to) Aḥmad—'Alī—Juwayriyyah b. Asmā': Busr b. Abī Arṭāt spoke against 'Alī in the presence of Mu'āwiyah while Zayd b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was sitting (there). At that, Zayd assaulted Busr with a stick and injured him. Mu'āwiyah told Zayd, "You turned on the shaykh of the Quraysh, a chief of the Syrians, and you struck him!" Then he turned to Busr, saying, "You revile 'Alī who is Zayd's grandfather, while Zayd, the son of al-Fārūq,[586] heads the notables. Haven't you considered that he endures that?" Then they were both satisfied. Mu'āwiyah also said, "Indeed I am above letting an offense be more important than my pardon, and foolishness greater than my forbearance, or a flaw which I shall not conceal privately, or a misdeed greater than my beneficence." Mu'āwiyah said, "The beauty of the noble [man] is virtuousness." Mu'āwiyah said, "There is nothing I like better than a bubbling spring in [213] an easy land." 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ then said, "I like nothing better than to spend the night as a bridegroom with the pick of Arab wives." At that, Wardān, the mawlā of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "I like nothing better than generosity between brothers." Mu'āwiyah said, "I am more entitled to that than you." Wardān replied, "Do what you like."[587]

584. Cairo reads: al-Mubārik.

585. 'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah (or Mas'ūd) b. Ḥakamah b. Mālik al-Fazārī was a Companion who settled at Damascus, fought along with Mu'āwiyah at Ṣiffīn, and led raids against the Byzantines. He lived to acknowledge Marwān at Jābiyah. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 255–6.

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm—his father: When Mu'āwiyah's official in charge of al-Madīnah wanted to dispatch the courier to Mu'āwiyah, he used to order his herald to announce, "Whoever has a need should write to the Commander of the Faithful." Zirr b. Ḥubaysh or Aymān b. Khuraym wrote a charming letter and cast it among the others. It contained:

When the men beget their children,[588] and their biceps twitch from age,

And their illness becomes chronic,
they are crops whose harvests approach.

When Mu'āwiyah received the letters and read this one, he remarked, "He has announced my own death to me." Mu'āwiyah also said, "There is nothing sweeter for me than anger which I swallow." Mu'āwiyah told 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ, "O cousin, indeed, you have been very fond of poetry. So beware of flirting with women lest you dishonor honorable ones, and satire lest you dishonor a noble person and provoke 586. The Caliph 'Umar I was called al-Fārūq.

587. See Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 58–60.
588. That is, they had grandchildren.

someone ignoble. Praise is the bait of the shameless, but be proud of the glorious deeds of your folk, and say those proverbs [214] that would adorn you and edify others."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Abū al-Ḥasan b. Ḥammād: Mu'āwiyah observed al-Thumā in a woolen cloak, so he slighted him. At that, al-Thumā said "O Commander of the Faithful, the woolen cloak does not speak to you, but the person who is in it does."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Sulaymān: Mu'āwiyah said, "If two men should die, they would not die, while if one man should die, he would die. If I should die, my son would succeed me, and if Sa'īd should die, 'Amr would succeed him; but if 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir should die, he would die [without a successor]." Marwān heard of it and asked, "Did he mention my son, 'Abd al-Malik?" When he was told that Mu'āwiyah had not, he remarked, "I would not exchange my son for both of theirs."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—'Abdallāh b. Sāliḥ: Someone asked Mu'āwiyah, "Which person do you like the most?" He replied, "The one who shows the most love to the people for me." Mu'āwiyah also said, "Intelligence and forbearance are the best things granted to mankind. If someone is reminded, he should remember; if someone is granted [something], he should be thankful; if someone is tested, he should be steadfast; if someone is angry, he should suppress [it]; if someone has power [over another], he should forgive; if someone does wrong, he should ask forgiveness; and if someone makes a promise, he should carry it out."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī b. 'Abdallāh and Hishām b. Sa'īd —'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr: A man was rude to Mu'āwiyah and did it constantly. When Mu'āwiyah was asked, "Are you gentle with this [man]?" He answered, "I do not come between people and their tongues as long as they do not come between us and our rule."

I was told by Aḥmad—'Alī—Muḥammad b. 'Āmir: Mu'āwiyah criticized 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far about singing. One day he entered Mu'āwiyah's presence while Budayḥ was with him, and Mu'āwiyah had his legs crossed. At that, 'Abdallāh said to Budayḥ, "Well, O Budayḥ, so you sing." When Mu'āwiyah moved his foot,—'Abdallāh asked, "What is it, O Commander of the Faithful?" Mu'āwiyah replied, "The noble is joyful." 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far also came to Mu'āwiyah accompanied by Sā'ib Khāthir, a mawlā of the Banū Layth, who was immoral.[589] Mu'āwiyah told him, "Mention what you need" He did, and mentioned a need of Sā'ib Khāthir as well. Mu'āwiyah then inquired, "Who is this?" When he told him, Mu'āwiyah said, "Admit him." When Sā'ib stood at the door of the audience chamber (majlis), he sang: [215]

The traces of the settlements are desolate, the winds play with them and the dripping rain.

And it has been without occupants for eight or ten years,

And the saffron upon her upper chest, the throat and the upper chest choking with it.

At that, Mu'āwiyah exclaimed, "Well done!" and took care of his needs.[590]

I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Ma'mar—Hammām b. Munabbih—Ibn 'Abbās: "I never saw anyone more suitable for sovereignty than Mu'āwiyah. Indeed people used to find him like the sides of a broad valley. He was not like the narrow, blocked opening," that is, Ibn al-Zubayr.

I was told by 'Abdallāh—his father—Sulaymān b. 'Uyaynah—Mujālid—al-Sha'bī—Qabīṣah b. Jābir al-Asadī: I shall certainly inform you about those with whom I associated. I associated with 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, and I never saw a man more comprehending with regard to knowledge (fiqh), nor better at discussing (things). Then I associated with Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, and I never saw a man who gave more abundantly without being asked than he. Then I associated with Mu'āwiyah, and I never saw a man who liked a friend more than he, or who was 589. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VII, 188: "a merchant."

590. Ibid., 189.

[216] more the same in private and in public. If al-Mughīrah were put in al-Madīnah, he would not exit from any of its doors[591] unless he did so by treachery.[592]

591. The text reads: abwāb, which could also mean "gates", but al-Madīnah is not supposed to have been walled in this period.

592. Co reads: "by excuses." C adds: "end of the tenth volume, and, if God wills, what is subsequent will follow it."

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XIX

The Caliphate of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah

TRANSLATED BY I.K.A. HOWARD

The Events of the Year

60 (cont'd)

(April 22–September 30, 680)

[216]

In this year (60/680) the oath of allegiance was given to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah after the death of his father on 15 Rajab (April 22, 680) in the reports of some, but in the reports of others on the 20 of the month (April 27, 680), as we have mentioned earlier in the account of the death of his father, Mu'āwiyah.[1] Yazīd confirmed 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād[2] as governor of al-Baṣrah[3] and al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr[4] as governor of al-Kūfah.[5]

---

1. The death of Mu'āwiyah, the previous Umayyad Caliph, is dealt with in Ṭabarī, II, 198.

2. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād is one of the sons of Mu'āwiyah's earlier governor in Iraq, Ziyād b. Abīhi, literally 'Ziyād, the son of his father'. Mu'āwiyah had won the father over to his side by recognizing him to be his brother as a result of a liaison between Mu'āwiyah's father, Abū Sufyān, and Ziyād's prostitute mother, Sumayyah. 'Ubaydallāh had also attained prominence and authority. See EI[1], s.v. 'Ubaid Allāh b. Ziyād.

3. Al-Baṣrah is a garrison town of the Arabs, which is located in the south of Iraq. Just to the south is the site of modern Baṣrah. See EI[2], s.v. Al-Baṣra.

4. Al-Nu'man's father, Bashīr b. Sa'd, had been one of the leaders of the Anṣār. After serving the Umayyads, al-Nu'mān later joined Ibn al-Zubayr and was killed in his service. See EI[1], s.v. al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr.

5. Al-Kūfah is a garrison town of the Arabs in Iraq on the Euphrates river. See EI[2], s.v. Al-Kūfa.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī)[6]—Abū Mikhnaf:[7] Yazīd succeeded at the beginning of the month of Rajab in the year 60 (April 8, 680). Al-Walīd b. ʿUtbah b. Abī Sufyān[8] was governor of Medina, al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī of al-Kūfah, ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād of al-Baṣrah, and ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ[9] of Mecca. Yazīd's only concern, when he assumed power, was to receive the oath of allegiance from the individuals who had refused to agree with Muʿāwiyah's demand for this oath of allegiance to Yazīd. Muʿāwiyah had summoned the people to give an oath of allegiance to him that Yazīd would be his heir.[10] Yazīd's concern was to bring their attitude to an end. Therefore he wrote to al-Walīd: "In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from Yazīd, Commander of the Faithful, to Walīd b. ʿUtbah.... Muʿāwiyah was one of the servants of God, whom God had blessed, appointed to authority, and given power and ability. He lived for a measured time and died at an appointed time. May God have mercy on him, for he lived as a praiseworthy man and died as a pious, God-fearing man. Peace be with you." He wrote to him on another parchment as small as a rat's ear: "Seize Ḥusayn, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr[11]

---

6. Hishām b. Muḥammad was also known as Ibn al-Kalbī. He was an important compiler of historical traditions, who died in 204 (819) or 206 (821). See *EI*², s.v. Al-Kalbī. His recensions of the events in Yazīd's caliphate form the basis of Ṭabarī's account.

7. Abu Mikhnaf's name was Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā. He was an important source for the early Iraqī historical tradition. He died in 157 (775). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf.

8. Al-Walīd b. ʿUtbah b. Abī Sufyān was a newphew of Muʿāwiyah, who had a reputation for drinking. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 135. Throughout his career he is involved in the inter-Umayyad dispute over the benefits of power. His quarrel with Marwān indicates this. See p. 3, below.

9. ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ was a prominent Umayyad, who later revolted against the Caliph ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, claiming that Marwān had promised him the succession. Eventually ʿAbd al-Malik had him killed. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAmr b. Saʿīd.

10. Muʿāwiyah's attempt to bring about the succession of Yazīd is reported in Ṭabarī's account of his caliphate. See Ṭabarī, II, 173–77.

11. Al-Ḥusayn, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr were three leading Qurashites, who all felt they had some claim to the caliphate. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī had claims to the caliphate by virtue of the fact that both his father and brother, al-Ḥasan, had occupied that position. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar had a similar claim through his father, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. In the case of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, his father had been a member of the group nominated by ʿUmar to form the consultative council (shūrā), which was to choose his successor from among themselves.

to give the oath of allegiance. Act so fiercely that they have no chance to do anything before giving the oath of allegiance. Peace be with you." [217]

When the news of Mu'āwiyah's death came to al-Walīd, it shocked and greatly disturbed him. He sent a dispatch to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam,[12] summoning him to come to him. Earlier, when al-Walīd had come to Medina, Marwān had only visited him there reluctantly. When al-Walīd perceived his attitude, he abused him in front of those who attended his gatherings. Marwān learned of this and kept away from him, cutting off all contact with al-Walīd. Marwān had continued to stay away from him until news of the death of Mu'āwiyah came to al-Walīd. Since the death of Mu'āwiyah and the order to take the oath of allegiance from this group weighed heavily on al-Walīd, he sought help for that from Marwān and summoned him. After al-Walīd read Marwān Yazīd's letter, he said, "'We belong to God and to Him we shall return.'[13] May God have mercy on him." Then al-Walīd asked Marwān's advice about the affair, saying, "How do you consider we should act?" Marwān answered, "I consider that you should send immediately to this group and summon them to give the oath of allegiance and enter into obedience. If they do so, you should accept that from them and leave them alone. If they refuse, you should take hold of them and execute them before they learn of the death of Mu'āwiyah. Indeed, if they learned of that, each one of them would rise up from a different direction, proclaim opposition and secession, and summon men to himself. I am afraid things are not that clear. However, in the case of Ibn 'Umar, I do not think that he would consider fighting. For he would only be willing to be entrusted with authority over the people if this matter were given to him spontaneously."

Therefore he sent 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān[14]—he was a young boy then—to the two of them, al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī and

---

12. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was a prominent Umayyad, whose father, al-Ḥakam b. al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah, had been expelled from Medina by the Prophet. Marwān became 'Uthmān's adviser when he was Caliph and he also became Caliph in 64 (684). See EI[1], s.v. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

13. Qur'ān, 2:156 (151).

14. 'Abdallāh b. Amr b. 'Uthmān was a grandson of the Caliph 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, who seems to have had an insignificant role in affairs. See Balādhurī Ansāb, IV/1, 602.

'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān found the two sitting in the mosque. However, he came to them at a time when al-Walīd did not hold assemblies for the people; the two would not go to him at such a time. He said, "Both of you answer the summons of the governor." They replied, "Go now, we will come."

One of them approached the other.[15] 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr asked al-Ḥusayn, "Why do you think he has sent for us at this time when he does not hold assemblies?" The latter answered, "I have been wondering. In my view their despot has perished, and he has sent for us to get the oath of allegiance from us before news spreads among the people. I do not think it can be anything else."
[218] Ibn al-Zubayr asked, "What do you intend to do?" Al-Ḥusayn said, "I will gather my servants immediately and go to him. When I reach the door, I will make them wait there, and I will go in to see him." Ibn al-Zubayr commented, "I fear for you if you go in." He replied, "I would not go to him unless I were able to resist him."

Al-Ḥusayn got up and gathered his mawālī[16] and his household around him. Then he began to walk until he came to the door of al-Walīd's house.[17] He told his followers. "I am going in. If I call you, or you hear his voice raised, all rush together to me. Otherwise, do not leave until I come out to you."

He went in and greeted al-Walīd as governor. Marwān was sitting with him. Ḥusayn said, as if he did not harbor any suspicions about Mu'āwiyah's death, "Fostering relations is better than 15. Balādhurī has given an almost identical account but does not include this dialogue. See Ansāb, IV/1, 300.

---

16. Mawālī (singular mawlā) denotes either patrons or clients. It was by this institution that a freed slave maintained his relationship with a tribe. The same institution was used for all newcomers to Islamic society. Although it could also mean kinsmen, here it means clients and slaves, as kinsmen are mentioned separately. See Crone, Slaves, 49–57, 197–200.

17. Balādhurī has two separate reports. One, which has so far been identical, apart from the dialogue, with Ṭabarī's version from Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, deals with Ibn al-Zubayr and Ibn 'Umar with no mention of al-Ḥusayn's visit to al-Walīd. See Ansāb, IV/1, 299–302. He has a separate report about that visit, which is identical to Ibn al-Kalbī's version given here. See ibid., p. 302–3. Ibn al-Kalbī probably amalgamated the two reports, for the amalgamation had taken place by the time of Dīnawarī, whose version is similar to Ṭabarī. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 240–42.

severing them. May God reconcile you both." They said nothing in reply. He came forward and sat down. Then al-Walīd read him the letter, gave him the news of Mu'āwiyah's death, and demanded the oath of allegiance from him. Al-Ḥusayn said, "'We belong to God and to Him we shall return.'[18] May God have mercy on Mu'āwiyah and increase your reward. As for the oath of allegiance which you have asked me to give, a person like me should not give his oath of allegiance in secret. I do not see that you would be satisfied with less than my public oath made before all the people." Al-Walīd agreed, and al-Ḥusayn suggested, "When you come out before the people and summon them to give the oath of allegiance, you should summon us with the people. Then it will be one affair." Al-Walīd, who preferred the easy way, said to him, "Go then in the name of God and come to us with the people."

Marwān interrupted, swearing, "By God! If he leaves you now without giving the oath of allegiance, you will never have the same opportunity without much bloodshed between you and him. Hold the man; do not let him leave you until he gives the oath of allegiance or you cut off his neck." At that al-Ḥusayn jumped up and said, "O son of a blue-eyed woman![19] Would you or he kill me? By God! You are a liar and a sinner." With that he went out and passed his followers; they followed him until he reached his house.

Marwān told al-Walīd, "You disobeyed me. No, by God! He [219] will never give you the same hold over him again." Al-Walīd replied, O, Marwān, let someone other than you blame me. Indeed, you chose for me something which would have involved the destruction of my religion. By God! I would not want to have all the worldly wealth and dominion which the sun rises and sets over for having killed al-Ḥusayn. Glory be to God! Should I kill al-Ḥusayn because he said, 'I will not give the oath of allegiance?' By God! I think that on the Day of Resurrection a man who is held responsible for the blood of al-Ḥusayn will weigh little in the scales of God." Marwān said, "If this is your opinion, then you have acted correctly." He said this to him without commending him for his view.[20]

18. Qur'ān, 2:156 (151).

19. A reference to Marwān's maternal grandmother, Māriyyah bt. Mawhab of Kindah. Her father had been a slave, probably a Christian from Armenia; and the Armenians were hated by the Arabs. Hence, the grandmother was referred to as "blue-eyed" as an insult; the insult was used against the grandson. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 129.

As for Ibn al-Zubayr, he had said that he would come at that time, but then he went to his own house and hid. Al-Walīd sent for him and discovered that he was gathering his followers as a means of protecting himself. He harassed him with a great number of messengers and men, one after another. Ḥusayn, for his part, replied to them, "Stop this so that you can consider and we can consider and so that you can reflect and we can reflect."[21] On the other hand, Ibn al-Zubayr said to them, "Do not hurry me; I am coming to you. Give me time." They harassed them both all evening and during the early part of the night; however, they were more considerate to Ḥusayn. Al-Walīd sent mawālī of his to Ibn al-Zubayr, who abused him, shouting at him, "Son of Kāhiliyyah,[22] by God! You should come to the governor or he will kill you." All that day and for the early part of the night, Ibn al-Zubayr remained there answering, "I will come now." When they urged him, he replied, "By God! I am being made suspicious by the great number of requests to come and the succession of messengers. Do not hurry me until I send the governor someone who will bring me his views and his orders." He sent his brother, Ja'far b. al-Zubayr,[23] to al-Walīd. He said to him, "May God have mercy on you, leave 'Abdallāh alone. You have terrified him and terrorized him with the great number of your messengers. He will come to you tomorrow, God willing. Order your messengers to leave us." Al-Walīd sent to them, and they went away.

---

20. This last sentence is omitted by Balādhurī. The narrative of Ibn al-Kalbī now returns to the first report of Balādhurī. See Ansāb, IV/1, 300f.

21. As a result of his careless editing of two versions, Ibn al-Kalbī has produced a contradiction in what was meant by him to be a continuous narrative.

22. This is disparaging reference to Ibn al-Zubayr. The mother of his grandfather Khuwaylid was Zuhrah bt. 'Umar b. Ḥanthar of the clan of Kāhil of the tribe of Asad. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 198. This reference is using his non-Qurashī female ancestor as a means of insulting him.

23. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr is Ibn al-Zubayr's brother from a different mother, Zaynab bt. Marthad b. 'Amr. Despite later taking part in his brother's revolution, Ja'far lived to an old age and died in the caliphate of Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik, between 96 (715) and 99 (717). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 136–37.

Under cover of night, Ibn al-Zubayr left. He and his brother, Ja'far, without anyone else, took the road to al-Fur'.[24] He avoided [220] the main road out of fear of pursuit and headed for Mecca. In the morning, al-Walīd sent for him and found that he had left. Marwān declared, "By God! If he has mistaken the road to Mecca.... So send men after him." He sent a horseman from the mawālī of Umayyah with eighty other horsemen.[25] They pursued him, but they were not able to catch up with him and so they returned. For the whole of that day until evening, they were distracted from Ḥusayn by the pursuit of Ibn al-Zubayr. Then in the evening he sent men to Ḥusayn. He answered them, "Come in the morning. Then you will consider and we shall consider."

They left him that night without harassing him. Ḥusayn left under cover of night. It was Sunday night with two days left in the month of Rajab in the year A.H. 60 (May 4, 680).

Ibn al-Zubayr had departed the night before Ḥusayn; Ibn al-Zubayr had gone on Saturday night and he had taken the road through al-Fur'. While Ibn al-Zubayr was traveling with his brother Ja'far, Ja'far recited the words of Ṣabrah al-Ḥanẓalī:[26]

All the sons of one mother will find out one night that only one of their offspring has remained

"Glory be to God!" exclaimed 'Abdallāh. "What did you mean by what I just heard, brother?" Ja'far replied, "By God! Brother, I did not mean anything that you would dislike." 'Abdallāh said, "By God! It is even more hateful to me that this thing should be uttered by you unintentionally."

The narrator commented that it was just as if he were drawing a bad omen from the poem.

As for al-Ḥusayn, he left accompanied by his sons, his brothers, and his brother's sons. These people were most of his household,

---

24. Al-Fur' is a village between Medina and Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 878.

25. "If," in the previous sentence, is added from Balādhurī, who also identified the horseman as Ḥabīb b. Kurrah, and reported that there were only thirty horsemen. See Ansāb, IV/1, 300; also Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 242, where the name is Ḥabīb b. Kadīn.

26. Balādhurī attributes this verse to another poet, Mutammim b. Nuwayrah al-Ḥanẓalī. See Ansāb, IV/1, 300.

except for Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah.[27] The latter had said to him, "My brother, you are the most lovable of people and the dearest to me. I could not give my stored advice to any creature more entitled to it than you. Keep away from Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah [221] with your followers, and avoid the provinces as long as you can. Then send your messengers to the people and summon them to you. If they give you the oath of allegiance, I praise God for that. If the people agree upon someone other than you, God will neither make your religion nor your reason deficient on that account; He will not remove your manliness and outstanding merit either. Yet I am afraid that you will enter one of these provinces and you will come to a group of people. They will differ among themselves: one group will be with you and another against you. They will fight, and you will be a target for the first of their spears. Then the best of all this community in person, in father, and in mother would be the one whose blood was most wastefully squandered and whose family most humiliated." Al-Ḥusayn asked him where he should go, and he answered, "Stay at Mecca. If that place is secure for you, it will serve its purpose. However, if it is unsuitable for you, you can resort to the deserts and the mountain peaks; You can move from place to place until you see what becomes of the affairs of the people and then you will know their views. You will be most correct in judgment and firmest in action as long as you can directly face matters. Affairs will never be more abstruse for you than when you turn your back on them." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "Brother, you have given good advice and shown your concern. I hope that your judgment is correct and appropriate."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq[28]—Abū Sa'īd al-Maqburī:[29] I watched al-Ḥusayn en-

27. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah is a son of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib by a Ḥanifite woman called Khawlah. After the death of al-Ḥusayn, he was described as the imām and mahdī by al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd. He neither declined the title nor accepted it, but he did give the oath of allegiance to 'Abd al-Malik. See EI[1], s.v. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanifiyya.

28. 'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq was a well-known traditionist and an authority of Abū Mikhnaf, who lived during the first half of the second (eighth) century. See Sezgin Abū Miḫnaf, 193–94.

29. Abū Sa'īd al-Maqburī was Kaysān, a mawlā of Kinānah. He died in 100 (718–19) or in the caliphate of al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, 86–96 (705–15). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 61–62.

tering the mosque of Medina. As he walked, he was leaning on two men. First he leaned on one man and then on the other. He was reciting the verses of Ibn Mufarrigh:[30]

May I not terrify the camels when I lead a raid at the morning dawn!
May I not be called Yazīd
If ever I accept humiliation for dignity while death is watching whether I flinch.

I said to myself, "By God, he is only reciting those two verses because of something he is intending to do." It was only two days later when I was told that he had left for Mecca. [222]

Then al-Walīd sent for 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar; he demanded that 'Abdallāh give the oath of allegiance to Yazīd. He answered, "When the people give the oath of allegiance, so will I." A man said, "What stops you from giving the oath of allegiance? You only want the people to argue among themselves, to fight, and destroy each other. Then, when that exhausts them, they will say: 'Have 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar in authority over you, for no one else remains. So give the oath of allegiance to him.'" 'Abdallāh retorted, "I want them neither to fight each other nor to argue among themselves and destroy each other. However, when the people give their oath of allegiance, and no one is left except me, I will give my oath of allegiance." They left him, for they were not afraid of him.

Ibn al-Zubayr set out and came to Mecca while 'Amr b. Sa'īd was governor there. When he entered he said, "I am seeking refuge." However, he did not attend their prayer, nor did he participate in the procession [from 'Arafah] with them.[31] He kept apart with his followers, making procession and praying with them alone.

When al-Ḥusayn set off for Mecca he recited: "Then he left it out of fear while he kept on the lookout. He said: 'My Lord, save me from the unjust people.'"[32] As he entered Mecca, he recited:

---

30. Ibn Mufarrigh's verses are given by Iṣfahānī, Aghanī, XVII, 51 and 68; and Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 303.

31. The procession (ifāḍah) from 'Arafah took place on Dhū al-Ḥijjah as part of the rituals of the pilgrimage (ḥajj). See EI[2], s.v. Ḥadjdj. It obviously refers to something that happened later.

32. Qur'ān, 28:21.

"And when he set out toward Midian, he said: 'Perhaps my Lord will guide me in the right path.'"[33]

In the month of Ramaḍān of this year (60/June, 680) Yazīd dismissed al-Walīd b. 'Utbah from Medina. He appointed 'Amr b. Sa'īd al-Ashdaq to be in charge. 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ came to Medina in Ramaḍān.

Al-Wāqidī[34] claimed that Ibn 'Umar was not in Medina when the news of the death of Mu'āwiyah and the demand that the oath of allegiance be given to Yazīd came to al-Walīd. When Ibn al-Zubayr and al-Ḥusayn were summoned to give the oath of [223] allegiance to Yazīd, they refused; they left for Mecca on the same night. They met Ibn 'Abbās[35] and Ibn 'Umar coming from Mecca. The latter two both asked them what the situation was like in Medina. They answered, "The death of Mu'āwiyah, and the demand for the oath of allegiance is to be made to Yazīd." Ibn 'Umar warned them to be pious toward God and not to divide the unity of the Muslims; he went to Medina and stayed there for some days. He waited until the oath of allegiance came from the provinces. Then he went to al-Walīd b. 'Utbah and gave him his oath of allegiance. Ibn 'Abbās also gave him his oath of allegiance.

In this year, 'Amr b. Sa'īd sent 'Amr b. al-Zubayr[36] to combat his brother 'Abdallāh b. Zubayr.[37]

The Attack of 'Amr b. al-Zubayr

Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī has mentioned that 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ al-Ashdaq came to Medina in Ramaḍān 60 (June, 680). When the people of Medina visited him, they found him to be a dignified and eloquent man.

---

33. Qur'ān, 28:22.

34. Al-Wāqidī was a leading historical and religious authority, who died in 207 (822–23). See EI[1], s.v. al-Wāqidī.

35. Ibn 'Abbās, a son of al-'Abbās and cousin of the Prophet, is the man from whom the 'Abbāsids are descended. He was an important Companion of the Prophet; he was regarded as an expert on the Qur'ān and the traditions. He supported 'Alī during his Caliphate but withdrew toward the end of it. See EI[2], s.v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās.

36. 'Amr b. al-Zubayr's mother was from the Umayyads; he spent most of his time with them. As he had received much money and power from them, he had a hostile attitude toward his own family. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 310.

37. Ṭabarī's dating of this event is highly suspect. See the Introduction.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī—Hisham b. Sa'd[38]—Shaybah b. Niṣāḥ:[39] The messengers went back and forth between Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah and Ibn al-Zubayr about giving the oath of allegiance. Yazīd swore that he would not accept it from him until he was brought in chains.

Al-Ḥārith b. Khālid al-Makhzūmī was in charge of leading the prayer but Ibn al-Zubayr stopped him.[40] When he stopped him, Yazīd wrote to 'Amr b. Sa'īd to send an army against Ibn al-Zubayr. At the time that 'Amr b. Sa'īd had come to Medina, he had put 'Amr b. Zubayr in command of his police[41] because he was aware of the animosity between him and 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. 'Amr b. al-Zubayr had sent for a group of the people of Medina and had them flogged violently.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī—Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn[42]—his father:[43] 'Amr b. al-Zubayr looked for all those who favored Ibn al-Zubayr and had them flogged. Among [224] those who were flogged were al-Mundhir b. al-Zubayr,[44] his son Muḥammad b. al-Mundhir,[45] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad b. 'Abd 38. Hishām b. Sa'd was a well-known traditionist and authority of Wāqidī's. He died in 158 (775) or 160 (776–77). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 39–41.

39. Niṣāḥ has been left without any diacritical marks on the first letter. However, Shaybah b. Niṣāḥ is an authority of Hishām b. Sa'd. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, index. Shaybah was regarded as having Shī'ite inclinations. He died in the caliphate of Marwān b. Muḥammad, 127–32 (744–50). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 377–78.

40. According to Balādhurī, there is an incorrect report that al-Ḥārith b. Khālid al-Makhzūmī was governor of Mecca and 'Amr b. Sa'īd was governor of Medina when Mu'āwiyah died. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 299. However, Wāqidī reports that he was governor of Mecca when Yazīd died. See ibid., p. 354. Al-Ḥārith was probably the deputy for the governor in charge of the prayer, and it was later than the last months of 60 (May–September, 680) that Ibn al-Zubayr would have been able to take such an action.

41. The Arabic for police is shurṭah. Its function seems to be to keep order in the towns. See EI[1], s.v. Shurṭa.

42. Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn was an authority of Wāqidī; he probably lived in the middle of the second (eighth) century. He usually reported from his father. See Ṭabarī, index.

43. Abū 'Awn was only reported from by his son Shurāḥbīl. See Ṭabarī, index.

44. Al-Mundhir was a brother of Ibn al-Zubayr who was killed in the course of supporting his brother. See p. 223, below.

45. The only further information on this nephew, Muḥammad b. al-Mundhir, of Ibn al-Zubayr is that his mother was 'Ātikah bt. Sa'īd b. Zayd. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 135.

Yaghūth,[46] ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām,[47] Khubayb b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr,[48] and Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir.[49] He had them flogged from forty to fifty or sixty lashes. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUthmān[50] and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAmr b. Sahl[51] fled with some other men to Mecca.

ʿAmr b. Saʿīd asked ʿAmr b. al-Zubayr, "What man should we send against your brother?" He answered, "You will never find anyone to send against him who hates him more than I do." He took out a few dozen men on the dīwān,[52] and many of the mawālī of the people of Medina also went out. Unays b. ʿAmr al-Aslamī[53] set out with him with seven hundred men. He sent the latter ahead in his vanguard while he camped at al-Jurf.[54] Marwān b. al-Ḥakam came to ʿAmr b. Saʿīd and warned him, "Do not attack Mecca. Fear God and do not violate the sanctity of the House of God. Leave Ibn al-Zubayr alone. He has grown into an obstinate old man of over sixty years of age. By God! If you do not kill him, he will surely die." ʿAmr b. al-Zubayr interjected, "By God! Let us fight against him, and let us attack him in the heart of Kaʿbah, and let those who hate it, hate it." Marwān replied, "By God! That grieves me."

---

46. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad b. ʿAbd Yaghūth was from Quraysh and had settled in Medina. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 2.

47. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām's father was killed in the Battle of the Camel while he was supporting Ibn al-Zubayr and his father against ʿAlī. See Ṭabarī, II, 3207. He was married to al-Zubayr's sister. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 361.

48. Khubayb b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr was given a pardon after his father's defeat by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. See Ṭabarī, II, 845.

49. It is surprising to find Muḥammad, the son of ʿAlī's great supporter ʿAmmār b. Yāsir, associating with the supporters of Ibn al-Zubayr. On him see Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 181.

50. The only apparent report about ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUthmān concerns this episode.

51. The only apparent report about ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAmr b. Sahl concerns this episode.

52. The dīwān is an institution for registering the names of those who are to take part in campaigns in order that they can be paid. As the fighters normally came from the Arabs, the recruitment of mawālī would seem to be a temporary measure for this campaign. See *EI*², s.v. Dīwān.

53. The only apparent report about Unays b. ʿAmr al-Aslamī concerns this incident.

54. Al-Jurf is a place near Mecca. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 63.

Unays b. 'Amr al-Aslamī advanced as far as Dhū Ṭuwā[55] while 'Amr b. al-Zubayr went on until he stopped at al-Abṭaḥ.[56] He sent to his brother, "Fulfill the oath of the Caliph by putting a chain of silver around your neck, which will not be seen, so that the people will not fight each other. Therefore, be pious toward God, for you are in a sacred town." Ibn al-Zubayr answered, "Your meeting place is the mosque."

Ibn al-Zubayr sent 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī[57] against Unays b. 'Amr in the direction of Dhū Ṭuwā, while some of the people who lived around Mecca joined 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān. They fought against Unays b. 'Amr and inflicted a dreadful defeat on him. The bulk of 'Amr b. al-Zubayr's followers scattered, and he went into the house of Ibn 'Alqamah.[58] 'Ubaydah b. al-Zubayr[59] came to him and gave him protection. He went to 'Abdallāh b. al- [225]
Zubayr and said, "I have given him protection." Ibn al-Zubayr retorted, "Are you giving protection at the expense of the people? This is not appropriate."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, he transmitted this account to Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd b. 'Umayr,[60] and the latter reported that 'Amr b. Dīnār[61] informed him that Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah wrote to 'Amr b. Sa'īd to put 'Amr b. al-Zubayr in command of an army and to send him with Unays b. 'Amr against Ibn al-Zubayr. 'Amr b. al-Zubayr went on until he stopped at his house at al-Ṣafā[62] while Unays b. 'Amr stopped at Dhū Ṭuwā.

---

55. In the valley of Mecca at the gateway into Mecca. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. ṭwy.

56. Al-Abṭaḥ is a stony valley near Mecca and Minā. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 92.

57. 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Jumahī was from Quraysh; he supported Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr against 'Alī. Later he became a loyal supporter of Ibn al-Zubayr. When al-Ḥajjāj defeated him, his head was cut off. See Ṭabarī, I, 1910, and II, 852.

58. Text has been emended to Ibn 'Alqamah, as in Addenda et Emendanda, DCL. Ibn 'Alqamah's house was very close to the Ka'bah in Mecca. See Ṭabarī, I, 1130.

59. 'Ubaydah b. al-Zubayr was a brother of Ibn al-Zubayr. The brothers seemed to be in conflict with one another. At one time, 'Ubaydah was appointed governor of Mecca but then he was dismissed. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 353.

60. Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd b. 'Umayr seems to be mentioned only in connection with this report.

61. 'Amr b. Dīnār was an important traditionist and jurist; he died in 126 (743–44). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 353–54.

62. Al-Ṣafā was a hill in Mecca associated with the pilgrimage rites. The pilgrims ran to and from it and another hill called al-Marwah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 397.

'Amr b. al-Zubayr usually led the prayer for the people; 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr usually prayed behind him. When he left he knotted his fingers together [in frustration]. There did not remain one of the Quraysh who failed to come to 'Amr b. al-Zubayr. However, 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān kept away. 'Amr b. al-Zubayr said, "What disturbs me is that I do not see 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān. By God! If I went against him, he would know that the clan of Jumaḥ and the others who have taken refuge with him are few." His words were reported to 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān; they roused him. He said to 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, "I see that you are acting as if you want to spare your brother." The latter replied, "Abū Ṣafwān (i.e., 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān), do I want to spare him? By God! If I could get even the help of small ants against him, I would use them." 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān said to him, "I will take care of Unays for you, and you take care of your brother for me." Ibn al-Zubayr agreed.

'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān went against Unays b. 'Amr, who was at Dhū Ṭuwā. He met him with a numerous crowd of Meccans and other supporters. Unays b. 'Amr and those with him were defeated. They killed those who fled and the wounded. Muṣ'ab b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[63] advanced against 'Amr while his followers scattered from him. Eventually he escaped to 'Ubaydah b. al-Zubayr.[64] 'Ubaydah b. al-Zubayr told 'Amr that he would give [226] him protection. He went to 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr and told him that, as he had given protection to 'Amr, 'Abdallāh should grant him protection for his sake. However, 'Abdallāh refused to give him protection. He had him flogged for all those who had been flogged by him in Medina; he imprisoned him in the prison at 'Ārim.[65]

Al-Wāqidī reported that they had given many reports to him about the account of 'Amr b. al-Zubayr and that he had recorded

63. Muṣ'ab b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was the son of the famous Companion of the Prophet, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. He was killed in the siege of Mecca. See p. 223, below.

64. The Arabic text says: "He escaped to 'Amr b. al-Zubayr." 'Amr has been emended to 'Ubaydah.

65. 'Ārim means "wicked" or "violent." It was the name given to Zayd, a servant of Muṣ'ab b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. A prison of four square cubits was built for him; he was jailed there until he died. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 315; and p. 16, below.

them all. According to Khālid b. Ilyās[66]—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Jahm:[67] When 'Amr b. Sa'īd came to Medina as governor, he came in the month of Dhū al-Qa'dah in the year 60 (July/August 680). He put 'Amr b. al-Zubayr in command of his police and said, "The Commander of the Faithful has sworn that he will not accept the oath of allegiance from Ibn al-Zubayr unless he is brought in a chain. Let the oath of the Commander of the Faithful be fulfilled. I will make a light chain of silver or gold; he can wear a cloak over it so that it will not be noticed, that is, unless its sound is heard." Then he recited:

Take it. True, it is not a course of action for the strong.
Even a humiliated man would hesitate to accept it.
Yet, 'Āmir, the people have offered you such a course of action.
And no one among the neighbors is going to blame you.[68]

According to Muḥammad (b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī)—Riyāḥ b. Muslim[69]—his father:[70] 'Amr b. Sa'īd raised an army to go against 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. Abū Shurayḥ[71] said, "Do not attack Mecca, for I heard the Messenger of God say: 'God has only permitted fighting in Mecca for one hour of one day. Then the city returned to its inviolable status.'" 'Amr refused to listen to what he said and retorted, "We know more about its inviolable status than you, Shaykh."

'Amr b. Sa'īd sent an army with 'Amr b. al-Zubayr. With the latter went Unays b. 'Amr al-Aslamī and Zayd, the servant of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām.[72] They num-

66. Khālid b. Ilyās was a well-known traditionist who lived in the second (eighth) century. Some critics accuse him of forging tradition. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 80–81.

67. Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh was a well-known traditionist who seems to have been alive at the beginning of the second (eighth) century. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 26.

68. The first line of this poem is quoted by Balādhurī. See Ansāb, IV/1, 305, 311. A fuller version is given by Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 311. Both verses with slight variations are later used by Marwān. See pp. 191–92, below.

69. Apart from two accounts both concerned with Ibn al-Zubayr and both quoted by Wāqidī, Riyāḥ b. Muslim seems to be otherwise unknown.

70. Riyāḥ's father Muslim seems to be unknown.

71. Abū Shurayḥ's name was Khuwaylid b. Ṣakhr. He was converted to Islam before the conquest of Mecca and died in 68 (687–88). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/2, 32.

72. There are no reports of either Zayd or his master in any other context.

bered about two thousand. The people of Mecca fought against them. Unays b. 'Amr and al-Muhājir, the mawlā of al-Qalammas, were killed amid many people.[73] The army of 'Amr b. al-Zubayr [227] was defeated. He went to 'Ubaydah b. al-Zubayr, who told his brother that he was under his protection and that he would give him the guarantee of neighborly protection. He went with him to 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who said, "What is this blood that is on your face, you wicked man?" 'Amr recited:

Our wounds do not bleed on our heels [through retreating], but they drip blood on our feet [through going forward].[74]

Ibn al-Zubayr had him imprisoned; he betrayed 'Ubaydah's protection, asking him, "Did I tell you to give protection to this grave sinner who sought to violate those things made inviolable by God?" Then all those whom 'Amr had flogged took vengeance on him except for al-Mundhir and his son. They both refused to take vengeance on him. 'Amr died under the lashes.

The narrator commented that the prison of 'Ārim was only called this because of a slave called Zayd 'Ārim. The prison was named after him. Ibn al-Zubayr imprisoned his brother 'Amr in this place.

According to al-Wāqidī—'Abdallāh b. Abī Yaḥyā[75]—his father: There were two thousand with Unays b. 'Amr.

In this year (60/680) the people of al-Kūfah sent messengers to Ḥusayn, while he was in Mecca, calling on him to come to them. He sent his cousin Muslim b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib to them.

The Kūfans' Invitation to Ḥusayn and the Mission of Muslim b. 'Aqīl

According to Zakariyyā' b. Yaḥyā al-Ḍarīr[76]—Abū al-Walīd Aḥmad b. Janāb al-Maṣṣīṣī[77]—Khālid b. Yazīd b. Asad b. 'Abdallāh al-

73. There are no reports of either Muhājir or al-Qalammas in any other context.
74. Also quoted by Balādhurī. See Ansāb, IV/1, 314.
75. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Yaḥyā is an occasional authority of Wāqidī; otherwise he and his father Abū Yaḥyā cannot be identified.
76. Yaḥyā al-Ḍarīr is a little known traditionist, who was blind (ḍarīr). See Dhahabī, Mīzān al-I'tidāl, II, 75.
77. Abū Walīd Aḥmad b. Janāb al-Maṣṣīṣī was a well-known and respected traditionist from Baghdad; he died in 220 (835). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 22.

Qasrī[78]—'Ammār al-Duhnī[79] reported that he asked Abū Ja'far[80] to tell him about the killing of al-Ḥusayn so that he might think that he was present at al-Ḥusayn's death. Abū Ja'far reported that Mu'āwiyah had died while al-Walīd b. 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān was [228] governor of Medina. He sent to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī asking for his oath of allegiance. Al-Ḥusayn asked him to grant him a delay and to show favor to him. He granted him a delay, and al-Ḥusayn left for Mecca. The Kūfans and their messengers came to him, saying, "We have kept ourselves exclusively for you. We do not attend the Friday prayer with the governor, so come to us." Al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī was governor of al-Kūfah.

Al-Ḥusayn sent for Muslim b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, his cousin, and told him, "Go to al-Kūfah and investigate what they have written to me. If it is true, we will go to them." Muslim departed to Medina. He took two guides, who went with him into the desert. They were overcome by thirst, and one of the two guides died. Muslim wrote to al-Ḥusayn asking him to relieve him, but al-Ḥusayn wrote back to him telling him to go on to al-Kūfah. He continued his journey until he arrived. He stayed with one of the inhabitants called Ibn 'Awsajah.[81] When news of his arrival was circulated among the Kūfans, they streamed to him to give the oath of allegiance. Twelve thousand of them gave the oath of allegiance to him.

One of the men who favored Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah stood up before al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr and told him, "You are either a weak man or you are acting like a weak man. The town has been corrupted." Al-Nu'mān answered, "I would prefer to be a weak man in obedience to God than a strong man in disobedience of God. I would not tear off a cover that God has spread."

---

78. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Asad b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī was a little-known traditionist who seems to have lived in the second half of the second (eighth) century.

79. 'Ammār al-Duhnī's full name was 'Ammār b. Mu'āwiyah al-Duhnī. He was a traditionist, who was accused of Shī'ite tendencies by Ibn Ḥajar; he was claimed as a Shī'ite by Shī'ite writers. He died in 133 (750–51). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 7–8, and al-Ṭūsī, Fihrist, 235.

80. Abū Ja'far's name is Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. He was the fifth Imām of the Shī'ah. He died in 114 (732). See Mufīd, Irshād (trans. Howard), 393–407.

81. Ibn 'Awsajah was a leading Kūfan Shī'ite, who died with al-Ḥusayn. See pp. 137–38, below. Abū Mikhnaf's account has Muslim staying with al-Mukhtār. See p. 28, below.

The words of al-Nu'mān were reported to Yazīd. He summoned a mawlā of his called Sarjūn,[82] who used to advise him, and gave him the news. Sarjūn asked whether he would accept the advice of Mu'āwiyah if he were alive. When he agreed, Sarjūn said, "Then accept it from me. The only man for al-Kūfah is 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. Give him authority over the city." Yazīd had been very angry with 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād; he had been intending to dismiss him from al-Baṣrah. Yet now he wrote to him expressing satisfaction with him; he gave him authority over al-Kūfah together with al-Baṣrah. He also wrote to him to hunt for Muslim b. 'Aqīl and to kill him if he found him.

[229] 'Ubaydallāh approached with some of the nobles of the people of al-Baṣrah. He entered al-Kūfah veiled; every group of people whom he passed and greeted said, "Greetings, son of the daughter of the Apostle of God," for they thought that he was al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī. When 'Ubaydallāh reached the palace, he summoned a mawlā of his, gave him three thousand dirhams, and told him, "Go and ask about his man to whom the Kūfans are giving their oath of allegiance. Let it be known that you are a man from the people of Ḥimṣ[83] who has come for this purpose and that you give him this money in order to strengthen his position." The mawlā kept on being generous and helpful until he was led to a shaykh among the Kūfans, who was in charge of receiving the oath of allegiance. He met him and told him his story. The shaykh said to him, "Your meeting both pleases and grieves me. What pleases me is the way God has guided you, but what grieves me is the fact that our plans are not yet properly established." The shaykh introduced him to Muslim, who took the money from him and received his oath of allegiance. Then he returned to 'Ubaydallāh and gave him the information.

On 'Ubaydallāh's arrival, Muslim had moved from the house in which he had been staying to the house of Hāni' b. 'Urwah al-Murādī.[84] Muslim b. 'Aqīl had written to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, in-

82. Sarjūn was Mu'āwiyah's secretary and adviser; he was probably a Christian; see Ṭabarī, II, 205.

83. Ḥimṣ is a town in Syria to the north of Damascus; it is located halfway between Damascus and Aleppo. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 334.

84. Hāni' b. 'Urwah al-Murādī was one of the tribal leaders of Madhḥij, a Yemenī tribe.

forming him of the oath of allegiance made by twelve thousand of the Kūfans and advising him to come. Then 'Ubaydallāh asked the Kūfan nobles, "Why is it that Hāni' b. 'Urwah has not come to visit me among the others?" Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath[85] went out to get him with a group of his tribe. Hāni' was at the door of his house. They said to him, "The governor has mentioned you and considers you tardy. So go to him." They remained with him, and he rode with them to 'Ubaydallāh. With the latter was Shurayḥ, the qāḍī.[86] When 'Ubaydallāh saw him, he said to Shurayḥ, "His own legs have brought you one who will be destroyed."[87] After greeting Hāni', he asked him where Muslim was. When he answered that he did not know, 'Ubaydallāh ordered his mawlā, the man with the dirhams, to come out to him. When Hāni' saw him, he was deeply troubled by him and pleaded, "May God benefit the governor. By God! I did not invite [230] him to my house. He came and threw himself on me." 'Ubaydallāh demanded that [Muslim] be brought to him, but he replied, "By God! If he were under my two feet, I would not lift them from him to give him to you." 'Ubaydallāh ordered that Hāni' be brought closer. He was brought nearer, and 'Ubaydallāh struck him on the forehead and cut it open. Hāni' reached toward the sword of one of the police to pull it out, but he was pushed away from it. 'Ubaydallāh declared that God had made it permissible to take his blood and ordered him to be imprisoned in a part of the palace.

A different account from Abū Ja'far's says that the one who brought Hāni' b. 'Urwah to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī.[88]

According to 'Amr b. 'Alī[89]—Abū Qutaybah[90]—Yūnus b. Abī

85. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath was the tribal leader of Kindah, a Yemenī tribe. His father had been rehabilitated after fighting in the war of Riddah. On the tribal groupings and attitudes in Kūfah, see M. Hinds, "Kūfan Political Alignments and Their Background in the Mid-Seventh Century A.D." International Journal of Middle East Studies, 1971.

86. Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith al-Kindī was appointed qāḍī over al-Kūfah by 'Umar in 19 (640) and remained in his post until 80 (699–700).

87. An Arabic proverb. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. ḥyn.

88. 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī was a leader of a clan of the Yemenī tribe of Madhḥij.

89. 'Amr b. 'Ali was a well-known traditionist, who died in 249 (863). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 80–81.

90. Abū Qutaybah was Salm b. Qutaybah; he was a well-known traditionist, Isḥāq[91]—al-'Ayzār b. Ḥurayth[92]—'Umārah b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ:[93] 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah was sitting in the assembly of Ibn Ziyād talking. He said, "Today I have driven out some zebras; I have struck and lamed one of them." 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī retorted, "A zebra that you lamed would be a stupid one." 'Umārah said, "Shall I tell you of something stupider than all this? A man whose father was an unbeliever was brought to the Apostle of God. He ordered him to be executed. The man pleaded, 'Muḥammad, who will there be for the children?' He answered, 'Hell-fire.' You are one of the children and you will be in Hell-fire." Ibn Ziyād laughed.

Continuation of 'Ammār al-Duhnī's Account from Abū Ja'far

While Hāni' was in this position, news of it got out to Madhḥij. There was an uproar at the gate of the palace. 'Ubaydallāh heard it and asked what it was. They told him that it was Madhḥij. He ordered Shurayḥ to go out to them and inform them that he had only detained Hāni' for questioning. However, he sent one of his mawālī as a spy to listen to what Hāni' would say. As he went past Hāni' b. 'Urwah, Hāni' said to him, "Fear God, Shurayḥ, for he will kill me." However, Shurayḥ went out, stood at the gate of the palace, and said, "There is no need for concern about him.
[231] The governor is only detaining him to question him." They told each other that that was true and that there was no need for concern for their colleague; they dispersed.

The news of Hāni' reached Muslim. He had the battle cry called out, and four thousand of the Kūfans gathered to him. He sent forward his vanguard and drew up his right and left wings. He himself advanced with the center toward 'Ubaydallāh. In the who lived in al-Baṣrah and died in either 200 (815–16) or 201 (816–17). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 133.

---

91. Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq was a well-known Kūfan traditionist; he died in either 152 (769) or 159 (775–76). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 433–34.

92. Al-'Ayzār was a Kūfan traditionist; he died while Khālid al-Qasrī was governor of Iraq, 105–20 (723–38). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 203–4.

93. 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ was a member of the Umayyad family who seems to have settled in al-Kūfah.

meantime, 'Ubaydallāh had sent to the nobles of the Kūfans and gathered them with him in the palace. When Muslim reached him and came to the gate of the palace, they were able to look down on their clansmen. They began to speak to them; they tried to make them go away. The followers of Muslim began to slip away, so that by late afternoon he only had five hundred. As darkness spread, even the five hundred had gone.

When Muslim saw that he had been left alone, he began to wander through the streets. He came to a door and stopped. A woman came out to him; he asked her to give him a drink. She gave him a drink and then returned inside her house. She delayed for as long as God decreed and then came back out to find him still at the door. She said, "Servant of God, your staying here is suspicious. Go away." He replied, "I am Muslim b. 'Aqīl. Will you shelter me?" She told him to enter.

Her son was a mawlā of Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath. When the boy recognized him, he went to Muḥammad and told him. Muḥammad went to 'Ubaydallāh and told him. 'Ubaydallāh sent 'Amr b. Ḥurayth,[94] the commander of his police, to get him. With him went 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath.[95] Muslim was not aware of what was happening until the house was surrounded. When he realized, he went out against them with his sword and fought them. 'Abd al-Raḥmān gave him a guarantee of safe-conduct and thus got him into his power. He brought him to 'Ubaydallāh. The latter ordered that he should be taken up to the top of the palace and executed. Then his body was thrown down to the people. He then ordered Hāni' to be dragged to al-Kunāsah,[96] and there he was crucified. Their poet said of that:

If you do not know what death is, then look [232]
at Hāni' and Ibn 'Aqīl in the marketplace.

94. 'Amr b. Ḥurayth was a leading Qurashite living in al-Kūfah; he was given many official posts by the Umayyads. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, trans. Ostle and Walzer, 97, 121. According to Abū Mikhnaf, Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm was in command of 'Ubaydallāh's police in al-Kūfah. See p. 53, below.

95. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was later known as Ibn al-Ash'ath. He led the abortive revolution that was put down by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf; he was killed in 85 (705). See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 110–11; and EI[2], s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath.

96. Al-Kunāsah (rubbish dump) was a camel market in al-Kūfah.

The command of the governor struck them down and they became legends for those who strive along every road.
Is Asmā' riding in peace a mount which moves at walking pace while Madhḥij is seeking vengeance against him?[97]

Abū Mikhnaf's Account

As for Abū Mikhnaf, he gives a fuller and more complete account of the story of Muslim b. 'Aqīl's visit to al-Kūfah and his death than the report of 'Ammār al-Duhnī from Abū Ja'far, which we have just mentioned.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab[98]—'Uqbah b. Sim'ān,[99] mawlā of al-Rabāb bt. Imru' al-Qays of Kalb, the wife of Ḥusayn—al-Rabāb was with Sukaynah[100] bt. Ḥusayn, and 'Uqbah had become a mawlā of her father's; she was a young girl at that time: We set out from Mecca and we stayed on the main road. A member of al-Ḥusayn's household said to him, "If you avoided the high road, like Ibn al-Zubayr, the pursuit would not be able to catch up with you." He replied, "No, by God! I will not leave it until God judges what is pleasing to Him." On the way we met 'Abdallāh b. Muṭī',[101] who asked al-Ḥusayn, "I wish I could offer my life for yours. Where are you going?" He answered. "For the present, I am going to Mecca. After that, I will leave the choice to God." 'Abdallāh b. Muṭī' advised him, "May God choose well for you but, when you reach Mecca, beware of approaching al-Kūfah. It is an unlucky place; there your father was killed and your brother deserted and struck unawares by a blow that almost took his life.

97. In Abū Mikhnaf's account, more verses are given that are attributed to al-Farazdaq. See p. 63, below. Similar verses are also given by Balādhurī who attributes them to 'Abdallāh b. Zabīr al-Asadī. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/1, 83. For Asmā', see p. 37 n. 169, below.

98. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf; he was not used by other historical traditionists. See Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 193.

99. 'Uqbah b. Sim'ān was an important eyewitness. He remained with al-Ḥusayn until he died but managed to save his own life. See pp. 109, 162, below.

100. Sukaynah went on to lead a rather indulgent life. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, trans. M. G. Weir, 161.

101. 'Abdallāh b. Muṭī' was a Qurashite who lived in Medina; he was a loyal supporter of Ibn al-Zubayr. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 106–10.

Stay at the Ḥaram, for you are the lord of the Arabs, and the inhabitants of the Ḥijāz will not treat anyone as your equal. By God! The people will come from every side to support you. Do not leave the Ḥaram, may my uncles on both sides of my family [233] sacrifice their lives for you, for by God, if you die, then we will be enslaved after you."

Al-Ḥusayn went on and stayed in Mecca. Its inhabitants began to visit him frequently, as did those who had come to make the 'umrah[102] and [other] people from far and wide. Ibn al-Zubayr had settled himself there, near the Ka'bah, where he used to stand in prayer and perform the circumambulation of the Ka'bah throughout the day. He would come to visit Ḥusayn with the others who came to visit him. He would come to him for two successive days. Sometimes he would come to him once every two days; he would advise Ḥusayn according to his view. Yet Ḥusayn was the most unwelcome of God's creatures in the eyes of Ibn al-Zubayr because he realized that the people of the Ḥijāz would not give the oath of allegiance to him and follow him as long as Ḥusayn was in the town. In their eyes and hearts, al-Ḥusayn was greater and more capable of commanding the people's obedience than he.

When the Kūfans learnt of the death of Mu'āwiyah, the Iraqīs spread rumors about Yazīd. They said that Ḥusayn and Ibn al-Zubayr had sought a secure place and both of them had gone to Mecca. The Kūfans wrote to Ḥusayn. At that time al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr was their governor.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī[103]—Muḥammad b. Bishr al-Hamdānī:[104] The Shī'ah in al-Kūfah gathered in the house of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzā'ī.[105] There we discussed

---

102. The 'umrah is a lesser pilgrimage made when visiting Mecca. Its rituals are confined to Mecca. It was originally the pre-Islamic pilgrimage to Mecca in the month of Rajab; see EI[1], s.v. 'Umra.

103. Al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf; otherwise he is unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 204.

104. Muḥammad b. Bishr al-Hamdānī was a Shī'ite of al-Kūfah. Apart from his reports, nothing is known of him; see Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 202 and 205.

105. It was claimed that Sulaymān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzā'ī was a Companion of the Prophet. He had been a supporter of 'Alī and his family and had become the leader of the Shī'ah in al-Kūfah. After the failure of al-Ḥusayn, he led the penitents (tawwābūn), who wanted to avenge al-Ḥusayn. They were decisively defeated. See Jafri, Origins and Early Development, 82, 159, 177, 182, 222–32.

the death of Mu'āwiyah, and praised and glorified God for that. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad announced to us, "Mu'āwiyah is dead. Al-Ḥusayn has withheld giving his oath of allegiance to the Umayyads and has gone to Mecca. You are his Shī'ah and the Shī'ah of his father. If you know that you will be his helpers and fighters against his enemy, then write to him and tell him. But if you fear failure and weakness, do not tempt the man to risk his own life."

They declared, "No, indeed we will fight his enemy, and our lives will be given for him." He said, "Then write to him." They wrote to him: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, from Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, al-Musayyab b. Najabah,[106] Rifā'ah b. Shaddād,[107] Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir,[108] and his Shī'ah of the believers and Muslims among the Kūfans. Peace be [234] with you. We commend the praise of God, other than Whom there is no deity, to you. Praise be to God Who has broken your enemy, the obstinate tyrant who had leapt upon his community, stripped it of its authority, plundered its fay',[109] and seized control of it without its consent. Then he killed the choice members of it and preserved the wicked members of this place. He made God's wealth something that circulates only among the community's tyrants and the wealthy. He was destroyed as Thamūd was destroyed.[110] There is no imām over us. Therefore come, so God may unite us in the truth through you. Al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr is in

106. Al-Musayyab b. Najabah was a leading Shī'ite in al-Kūfah, who had been a supporter of 'Alī; he lost his tribal authority when Mu'āwiyah came to power. He took part in the movement of penitents after the death of al-Ḥusayn. See Jafri, Origins and Early Development, 118, 177, 222–23, 232.

107. Rifā'ah b. Shaddād was a long-standing Shī'ite in al-Kūfah, who had taken part in Ḥujr b. 'Adī's revolt against Mu'āwiyah in 51 (671). After al-Ḥusayn's failure, he took part in the movement of penitents, which he survived. He joined al-Mukhtār. See Jafri, Origins and Early Development, 177, 223–24, 232.

108. Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir was a leading Shī'ite in al-Kūfah. Of the four who wrote this letter, he is the only one who managed to get to al-Ḥusayn and die with him. See Jafri, Origins and Early Development, 177, 182, 189, 206.

109. Fay' literally means "booty" but it has implications beyond that. It refers to the conquered lands that had not been divided among the Muslim conquerors and whose income these Kūfans felt should go to them, not to Syria. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 46–51.

110. The Thamūd were a people who rejected the prophet Sālih. They hamstrung a she-camel that was sent as a sign. For their sins, they were destroyed by an earthquake. The theme is frequently repeated in the Qur'ān. For one example, see Qur'ān, 7:73–79 (71–77).

the governor's palace; we do not gather with him for the Friday prayer. Nor do we accompany him out of the mosque for the Festival prayer.[111] If we hear that you will agree to come to us, we will drive him away until we pursue him to Syria, if God wills. The peace and mercy of God be with you."

We despatched the letter with 'Abdallāh b. Sabu' al-Hamdānī[112] and 'Abdallāh b. Wālī.[113] We ordered them to go quickly. The two men hurried off and came to al-Ḥusayn at Mecca on 10 Ramaḍān (June 14, 680). Two days later we sent Qays b. Mushir al-Ṣaydāwī,[114] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Kadan al-Arḥabī[115] and 'Umārah b. 'Ubayd al-Salūlī[116] to him. With them they took about fifty-three letters, each letter being from one man or a group of two or four. We delayed a further two days and then sent Hāni' b. Hāni' al-Sabī'ī[117] and Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī.[118] With them we had written: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, from the believers and Muslims of his Shī'ah. Make haste. The people are waiting for you. They think of no one but you. Therefore, speed, speed! Peace be with you."

Shabath b. Rib'ī,[119] Ḥajjār b. Abjar,[120] Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. [235]

111. On the Festival of Sacrifice ('Īd al-aḍḥā) and the Festival for the End of the Fast ('Īd al-fiṭr), a special prayer was said in the morning outside the mosque. See EI[1], s.v. Muṣallā.

112. Balādhurī gives his name as 'Abdallāh b. Sabī'. See Ansāb, II/2, 158. The latter was mentioned as fighting with al-Mukhtār. See Ṭabarī, II, 653.

113. 'Abdallāh b. Wālī was a supporter of 'Alī, who died fighting for the penitents from al-Kūfah with Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. See Ṭabarī, I, 3422–28, and II, 569.

114. Qays b. Mushir al-Ṣaydāwī was regularly used as a messenger by the Shī'ah in al-Kūfah and al-Ḥusayn; he was captured on one of his journeys and then killed. See p. 84, below.

115. Balādhurī records the name as Kadir and Dhī Kadir instead of Kadan. See Ansāb, II/2, 158, 159. However, he also records Kadan with his correct name as being killed fighting for al-Ḥusayn. See Ansāb, II/2, 196.

116. Balādhurī records the name 'Abd instead of 'Ubayd. See Ansāb, II/2, 158, 159. He was a leading member of the Kūfan Shī'ah.

117. This journey and Hāni' al-Sabī'ī's journey back are the only times he is mentioned.

118. Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī is one of the leaders of the Kūfan Shī'ah.

119. Shabath b. Rib'ī, at first a staunch supporter of 'Alī, then became a Khārijite but quickly returned to 'Alī and fought against them. After writing this letter, he changed sides again. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 119.

120. Ḥajjār b. Abjar was an important tribal leader in al-Kūfah; he changed sides after writing the letter. See pp. 49, 125, below.

Yazīd b. Ruwaym,[121] 'Azrah b. Qays,[122] 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī and Muḥammad b. 'Umayr al-Tamīmī[123] had also written: "The Janāb has grown green; the fruit has ripened; the waters have overflowed. Therefore, if you want to, come to an army that has been gathered for you. Peace be with you."

When all the messengers gathered together with him, he read the letters and asked the messengers about the people's situation. He wrote back with Hāni' b. Hāni' al-Sabī'ī and Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī, who were the last two messengers: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī to the leaders of the believers and the Muslims. Hāni' and Sa'īd have brought me your letters; they are the last two of your messengers who have come to me. I have understood everything that you have described and mentioned. The statement of most of you is: 'There is no imām over us. Come, God may unite us in guidance and truth through you.' I am sending you my brother, Muslim b. 'Aqīl, who is my cousin and the trustworthy representative from my family. I have instructed him to write to me about your circumstances, situation, and views. If he writes to me that the opinion of your leaders and of the men of wisdom and merit among you is united in the same way as the messengers who have come to me have described, and as I have read in your letters, I will come to you speedily, God willing, for, by my life, what is the imām except one who acts according to the Book, one who upholds justice, one who professes the truth, and one who dedicates himself to [the essence of] God? Peace be with you."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī:[124] Some members of the Shī'ah in al-Baṣrah had been meeting for some days in the house of a woman from the tribe of 'Abd al-Qays, who was called Māriyyah bt. Sa'd or Munqidh. She had

121. Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd Ruwaym was a Yemenī leader in al-Kūfah; he changed sides after writing the letter. See p. 125, below.

122. 'Azrah b. Qays was a Yemenī leader in al-Kūfah; he also changed sides after writing the letter. See pp. 105–13, 120–21, 139, 164, below.

123. Muḥammad b. 'Umayr was a leader of Tamīm in al-Kūfah. After writing the letter, he seems to have kept a very low profile.

124. Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf, who was a Kūfan traditionist at the beginning of the second (eighth) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 189.

sympathy toward the Shī'ah, and her house had become a place where they held discussions.[125]

The coming of al-Ḥusayn had been reported to Ibn Ziyād, and he [236] wrote to his administrator ('āmil) in al-Baṣrah to send out scouts and take control of the road. However, Yazīd b. Nubayṭ[126]—he was from the tribe of 'Abd al-Qays—decided to go to support al-Ḥusayn. He had ten sons and he asked them, "Which of you will come with me?" Two of his sons, 'Abdallāh and 'Ubaydallāh, volunteered to go with him. Then he told his companions in the house of that woman (i.e., Māriyyah), "I have decided to go. Now I am leaving." They said to him, "We fear for you because of the followers of Ibn Ziyād." He replied, "By God! If the feet of my she-camel are set on the plain desert, I do not care whoever seeks to overtake me."

Yazīd set out, hurrying along the road, until he reached Ḥusayn. He joined al-Ḥusayn's encampment at al-Abṭaḥ. Al-Ḥusayn received news of Yazīd's arrival and began to look for him. When the man came to al-Ḥusayn's encampment and was told that he had gone to his house, the man went after him. When al-Ḥusayn did not find him, he sat in his encampment waiting for him. The Baṣran came back and found him sitting. Then he recited: "In the favor and mercy of God, in that let them rejoice."[127] He greeted al-Ḥusayn, sat with him, told him about the reason why he had come, and prayed for good with him. Then he set out with him, and fought alongside him. Yazīd and his two sons were killed with him.

Then[128] al-Ḥusayn summoned Muslim b. 'Aqīl and despatched him with Qays b. Mushir al-Ṣaydāwī, 'Umārah b. 'Ubayd al-Salūlī, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Kadan al-Arḥabī. He enjoined him to be pious before God, to be discreet, and to be courteous. Al-Ḥusayn instructed Muslim that, if he saw that the people were united and committed, then he should inform him speedily. Muslim departed and came to Medina. There he prayed 125. Apart from this incident, Māriyyah was not mentioned again.

126. Apart from this account, Yazīd was not mentioned again.
127. Qur'ān, 10:59 (58).
128. The narrative now returns to the account reported to Abū Mikhnaf from al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī.

in the Mosque of the Apostle of God and said farewell to the dearest members of his family. Then he hired two guides from the tribe of Qays. These two set out with him, but they missed the [237] way and went astray. They were struck by severe thirst. The two guides, on the point of dying of thirst, told him, "Follow this path to reach water."

Muslim b. 'Aqīl wrote a letter to Ḥusayn and sent it with Qays b. Mushir—this was at al-Maḍīq in the valley of al-Khubayt:[129] "... I set out from Medina with two guides and they missed the way and got lost. All of us were overcome by thirst; the two guides soon died. But we kept going until we came to a watering-hole. We were only saved at the last moment of our lives. That wateringhole is in a place called al-Maḍīq in the valley of al-Khubayt. I have taken this as a bad omen for my mission. If you consider it so, you could relieve me and send another in my place. Peace be with you."

Al-Ḥusayn wrote back: "... I am afraid that your urging me in the letter to relieve you of the task that I sent you on is only prompted by cowardice. Therefore go on with the task that I gave you. Peace be with you." When Muslim read the letter, he said, "It is not for myself that I am afraid." So he continued until he came to a wateringhole belonging to the tribe of Ṭayyi'. He stopped with them. As he rode off there was a man hunting. He saw him shoot a fawn as it came into his sight, and kill it. Muslim said, "Thus will our enemies be killed, God willing."

Muslim went on until he entered al-Kūfah. There he stayed in the house of al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd,[130] which is called today the house of Muslim b. al-Musayyab.[131] The Shī'ah began to come regularly to him. Whenever a group of them gathered together with him, he would read the letter of al-Ḥusayn, and they would begin to weep.

---

129. Al-Maḍīq is a village between Mecca and Medina. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 560. Al-Khubayt is a valley in that area. See ibid., II, 398.

130. Al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd was a political opportunist of Shī'ite persuasion, who became a revolutionary Shī'ite leader; he won control of al-Kūfah for two years, 65–67 (684–86). See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 125–45; and EI[1], s.v. al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubaid.

131. Muslim b. al-Musayyab was governor of Shīrāz for the Umayyads; he was killed in 129 (746–47) during the Shī'ite revolution of 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah. See Ṭabarī, II, 1977.

'Ābis b. Abī Shabīb al-Shākirī[132] stood up. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "I cannot speak to you for the people because I do not know what is in their hearts, nor would I deceive you about them. By God! I can, however, tell you about what I [238] have decided for myself. By God! I will answer you when you call me. I will fight your enemies alongside you. I will strike with my sword in defense of you until I meet God, seeking nothing but God's reward." Next Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir al-Faq'asī got up and spoke, "May God have mercy on you! You have explained what is in your heart by your concise words." Then he said, "By God other than Whom there is no deity! I am of the same view as he is." Al-Ḥanafī[133] said the same.

According to al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī, he asked Muḥammad b. Bishr whether he had said anything. He answered, "Even though I wanted God to strengthen my colleagues with victory, I did not like killing and I was unwilling to lie."

The Shī'ah began to visit Muslim b. 'Aqīl so frequently that his place of residence became well known, and al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr learnt of the location.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah[134]—Abū al-Waddāk:[135] Al-Nu'mān ascended the pulpit and after praising God said, "Servants of God, fear God and do not rush into rebellion and discord, for in that men will be destroyed, blood will be shed, and property will be plundered." He was a tolerant, pious man who preferred the gentle approach. He went on, "I do not fight anyone who does not fight me. Nor do I come against anyone who does not come against me. Nor do I revile you. I do not oppose you. Nor will I apprehend anyone merely on grounds of suspicion, accusation, or hearsay. However, if you disclose your real intentions, violate your oath of allegiance, and oppose your imām, by God other than Whom there is no deity, I will strike you with my sword as long as its hilt remains in my hand, even though I do 132. 'Ābis b. Abī Shabīb al-Shākirī was a leader of the Kūfan Shī'ah, who managed to get to al-Ḥusayn; he was killed with him. See pp. 147–48, below.

133. Al-Ḥanafī is Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥanafī.

134. Numayr b. Wa'lah was a reporter of historical traditions, who reported from al-Sha'bī, as well as being an authority for Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 215.

135. Abū al-Waddāk is Jabr b. Nawf al-Hamdānī, a well-known traditionist. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 215.

not have any of you to help me. Yet I hope that those among you who know the truth are more numerous than those whom falsehood will destroy."

'Abdallāh b. Muslim b. Sa'īd al-Ḥaḍramī,[136] an ally of the Banū Umayyah, stood before him and said, "O, governor, what you see can only be adequately dealt with by violence. Your view [239] about what should be done between you and your enemy is that of the weak." Al-Nu'mān answered, "I would prefer to be one of the weak while remaining in obedience to God than to be one of the mighty while being in rebellion against God." Then he descended from the pulpit.

'Abdallāh b. Muslim went out and wrote the following letter to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah: "... Muslim b. 'Aqīl has come to al-Kūfah, and the Shī'ah have given the oath of allegiance to him on behalf of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. If you have any need of al-Kūfah, then send a strong man there, who will carry out your orders and act in the same way as you would against your enemy. Al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr is a weak man, or he is acting like a weak man." He was the first to write to him. Then 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah wrote to him in a similar vein, as did 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.[137]

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—'Awānah:[138] When the letters reached Yazīd—and there were only two days between their letters—he summoned Sarjūn, a mawlā of Mu'āwiyah and asked him, "What is your view of the fact that Ḥusayn has directed his attention toward al-Kūfah, and Muslim b. 'Aqīl is in al-Kūfah receiving the oath of allegiance on his behalf? I have also learnt that al-Nu'mān is weak; I have had other bad reports of him." Then he read him their letters [and asked], "Whom do you think that I should appoint as governor of al-Kūfah?" Now Yazīd was angry with 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, so Sarjūn answered him, "Do you think, if Mu'āwiyah were recalled to life for you, that you would take his advice?" He answered, "Yes." Sarjūn produced a letter of appointment for 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād as governor of al-Kūfah and said, "This is the advice of Mu'āwiyah written before he died." So he took his advice, joined the two cities under the authority of 'Ubaydallāh, and sent him his letter of appointment.

136. Apart from this incident, 'Abdallāh b. Muslim Sa'īd al-Ḥaḍramī is not mentioned.

137. 'Umar was the son of the famous Companion of the Prophet Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and later led the Kūfan army against al-Ḥusayn. See pp. 103, 115, below.

138. Ibn al-Kalbī breaks his narrative from Abū Mikhnaf and introduces connecting material from 'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī. The latter is an important historical traditionist. He died in 147 (764) or 153 (770). See *EI*², s.v. 'Awāna b. al-Ḥakam.

After this Yazīd summoned Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī[139]—who was there with him—and he sent him to al-Baṣrah to 'Ubaydallāh with his letter of appointment, and he wrote to him as well: "... My followers among the people of al-Kūfah have written to me to inform me that Ibn 'Aqīl is in al-Kūfah gathering units in order to spread rebellion among the Muslims. Therefore, when [240] you read this letter of mine, go to al-Kūfah and search for Ibn 'Aqīl, as if you were looking for a bead, until you find him. Then bind him in chains, kill him, or expel him. Peace be with you."

Muslim b. 'Amr went to 'Ubaydallāh at al-Baṣrah. 'Ubaydallāh ordered that preparations should begin immediately and that the departure for al-Kūfah would take place on the next day.

Earlier Ḥusayn had written a letter to the Baṣrans.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr[140]—Abū 'Uthmān al-Nahdī:[141] Ḥusayn wrote a letter to the Baṣrans with a mawlā of his [family's] called Sulaymān.[142] It was written in one copy but [addressed to] the heads of the five divisions in al-Baṣrah[143] and to the nobles: it was written to Mālik b. Misma' al-Bakrī,[144] al-Aḥnaf b.

---

139. Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī was from Syria. After being sent to 'Ubaydallāh in al-Baṣrah, he stayed. Then he became a supporter of Ibn al-Zubayr. He died during the revolt of Ibn al-Zubayr. See Crone, Slaves, 136–37.

140. Al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr was a well-known traditionist, who lived during the first half of the second (eighth) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 220.

141. Abu 'Uthmān al-Nahdī was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mill. He was born before Islam and lived until after 75 (694). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 220.

142. Sulaymān is only mentioned in connection with this incident; he was killed.

143. When Ziyād was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah in 44 (664), he divided the people into five divisions for the purpose of administration and distribution of pay. The division was not made entirely on a tribal basis. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 86.

144. It is strange that Mālik b. Misma' al-Bakrī should have been written to by al-Ḥusayn. He was a leader in al-Baṣrah of Bakr b. Wā'il and had fought against 'Alī at the Battle of the Camel. He then joined Mu'āwiyah. He fought against Mukhtār later for Ibn al-Zubayr but then returned to the Umayyads. See Crone, Slaves, 116–17.

Qays,[145] al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd,[146] Mas'ūd b. 'Amr,[147] Qays b. al-Haytham,[148] and 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar.[149] A single copy of it was given to all the [Baṣran] nobles [which was as follows]: "God gave preference to Muḥammad before all His creatures. He graced him with prophethood and chose him for His message. After he had warned His servants and informed them of what he had been sent with, God took him to Himself. We are his family, those who possess his authority (awliyā'), those who have been made his trustees (awṣiyā'), and his inheritors; we are those who have more right to his position among the people than anyone else. Our people selfishly claimed our exclusive right to that. Yet we consented [to what they did] since we hated disunion and desired the well-being [of the community]. However, we know that we have greater claim to that right, which was our entitlement, than those who have seized it. They have done well, set many things right, and sought truth. May God have mercy on them and forgive us and them. I have sent my messenger to you with this letter. I summon you to the Book of God, the Sunnah of His Prophet. Indeed the Sunnah has [almost] been killed while innovation has been given life. If you hear my words and obey my commands, I will guide you along the path of righteousness. Peace and the mercy of God be with you."

[241] Each one of the nobles who read the letter kept it secret, except al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd. He claimed he was afraid that the messenger was a plotter sent by 'Ubaydallāh. He brought the messenger to 'Ubaydallāh on the evening before the morning when he was intending to depart to al-Kūfah. 'Ubaydallāh read the letter and

145. Al-Aḥnaf b. Qays was a very powerful leader of the Banū Sa'd of Tamīm in al-Baṣrah; he had had a good relationship with Mu'āwiyah but was reluctant to accept Yazīd. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 138, 142.

146. Al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd had been a governor for 'Alī but was at this time leaning toward the Umayyads. One of his daughters married 'Ubaydallāh. See Crone, Slaves, 15.

147. Mas'ūd b. 'Amr was the tribal leader of Rabī'ah in al-Baṣrah, who was killed in the feuding that took place in al-Baṣrah after the death of Yazīd. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 209.

148. Qays b. al-Haytham was a leader of the Banū Sulaym in al-Baṣrah; he also played an important role in Khurāsān. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 414–15.

149. 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar was an important leader of Tamīm in al-Baṣrah.

ordered the messenger to be beheaded. Then 'Ubaydallāh ascended the pulpit at al-Baṣrah. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "By God! There is no difficulty that I cannot overcome,[150] Nor does the rattling of the dry skin [of a camel] affect me.[151] Indeed I am a scourge of those who are my enemies and a deadly poison to those who fight against me. Whoever competes with [the tribe of] al-Qārah in shooting arrows does her justice.[152] People of al-Baṣrah, the Commander of the Faithful has appointed me governor of al-Kūfah, and I am going there in the morning. I have appointed over you 'Uthmān b. Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān.[153] Beware of opposition and spreading rumors, for, by Him other than Whom there is no deity, if I hear a word of opposition from any man among you, I will kill him and his 'arīf[154] and his patron (walī). I will hold those who are near responsible for those who are distant so that you all may hear me and there will not be any opponent or rebel among you. I am the son of Ziyād, whom I [most] resemble among [all] who tread on stones. I do not betray any resemblance to an uncle or to a cousin."

He left al-Baṣrah after he had made his brother 'Uthmān his deputy, and he set off for al-Kūfah. He took with him Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī and Sharīk b. al-A'war al-Ḥārithī,[155] together with his entourage and his household. When he reached al-Kūfah, he was wearing a black turban and he was veiled. News of Ḥusayn's departure had reached the people; they were expecting his arrival. When 'Ubaydallāh came, they thought that he was al-Ḥusayn. 'Ubaydallāh could not pass a group of people without their greeting him. They said, "Welcome, son of the Apostle of God,

---

150. An Arabic proverb. Its literal meaning is: "There is no difficult camel which cannot be ridden by me." See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. qrn.

151. An Arabic proverb. When the camel is frightened, it makes a rattling sound by rubbing its dry skin. The proverb means that he will not be deceived or frightened. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. q'q'.

152. An Arabic proverb. Qārah was a tribe famous for its archers. The proverb means: "Don't shoot arrows at people who can shoot better than you." See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. qwr.

153. 'Uthmān b. Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān was a brother of 'Ubaydallāh.

154. An 'irāfah was a small group of tribesmen collected together for the purpose of distribution of revenue. The head of each of these was an 'arīf appointed by the government. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 87–88.

155. Sharīk b. al-A'war al-Ḥārithī was a man of influence in al-Baṣrah; he had supported 'Alī in the battles of the Camel and Ṣiffīn.

your arrival is a happy event." He saw in their joy at seeing al-Ḥusayn something to trouble him. Muslim b. 'Amr said, when they overdid it, "Retire, for this is the governor, 'Ubaydallāh b.
[242] Ziyād." As he came in view, he checked his mount,[156] and he only had some ten men with him. When he entered the palace and the people realized that he was 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, they felt great sorrow and grief. What he had heard from the people made 'Ubaydallāh very angry, and he said, "Will I only see these people as I have seen them?"

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mu'allā b. Kulayb[157]—Abū Waddāk: After he had settled in the palace, the call was made among the people: "The prayer is a general prayer that all should gather for (al-ṣalāt jāmi'atan)."[158] The people gathered and he went out to them. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "The Commander of the Faithful (Yazīd), may God make him prosperous, has appointed me to be in charge of your town and your frontier post. He has ordered me to give justice to the oppressed among you, to be generous to those of you who are deprived, and to treat the obedient among you with kindness, but to be violent against those of you who are suspicious and disobedient. I will follow his instructions concerning you and will carry out his authorization among you. I will be like a kind father to the good and obedient among you, but I will use my whip and sword against those who abandon my commands and oppose my appointment. Let each man save himself. Truthfulness should avert evil from you without threat of punishment (wa'īd)."[159]

Then he went down; he put the *'arīf*s and the people to a severe test and said, "Write to me about the strangers, those among you who are sought by the Commander of the Faithful, those among

156. The Arabic is ẓahr. The term was used for the outskirts of al-Kūfah. In this context, it must mean "his mount."

157. Al-Mu'allā b. Kulayb was an unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 210.

158. Al-ṣalāt al-jāmi'ah was the regular form of call to prayer used whenever the governor wanted to address the people. It has been suggested that it was the first form of the call to prayer. See E. Mittwoch, "Zur Enstehungsgeschichte des islamischen Gebets und Kultus," 25.

159. An Arabic proverb. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. nbw.

you from Ḥarūriyyah,[160] and the troublemakers whose concern is discord and turmoil. Whosoever of you makes these lists for us will be safe from harm. But those of you who do not write anyone will have to guarantee that there is no opponent in his 'irāfah who will oppose us, and no wrongdoer who will try to wrong us. Anyone who does not do so will be denied protection, and his blood and his property will be permitted to us. Any 'arīf in whose 'irāfah is found anyone who is wanted by the Commander of the Faithful, whom he has not reported to us, will be crucified at the door of his house, and I will cancel that 'irāfah from [the dīwān of] payment, or he will be sent to a position in 'Umān [or] al-Zārrah."[161]

As for 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Kināni,[162] according to 'Umar b. Shabbah[163]—Hārūn b. Muslim[164]—'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ[165]—['Īsā b. Yazīd al-Kināni]: When Yazīd's letter to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād came, he chose five hundred of the Baṣrans, among whom were 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal[166] and Sharīk b. al-A'war; the latter was a member of the Shī'ah of 'Alī. Sharīk was the first of the people to fall behind. He is said to have feigned falling behind as a result of overcrowdedness, as did the people with him. Then 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith fell behind, and the people with him. They hoped that 'Ubaydallāh would turn aside to them and that al-Ḥusayn would get to al-Kūfah before him. However, he did not take any notice of those who had fallen behind but went on until he reached al- [243]

160. Ḥarūriyyah refers to the Khārijites by the name of the place where the first group broke away from 'Alī. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 2.

161. "Or" has been inserted because there does not appear to have been any place called "'Umān al-Zārrah." However, there is 'Umān on the Persian gulf. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 716. Nearby on the island of Baḥrayn there was a large village called "al-Zārrah." See ibid., II, 907.

162. 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Kināni was a historical traditionist, who died c.134 (750). See Petersen, 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah, 60.

163. 'Umar b. Shabbah was an important historian, who died in 262 (875–76). He was accused of pro-Shī'ite tendencies. See Petersen, Alī and Mu'āwiyah, 150–51.

164. Hārūn b. Muslim was a little-known traditionist; he was an authority of 'Umar b. Shabbah.

165. 'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ was a little-known traditionist.

166. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal was a Hāshimite, who later, in 65 (684), was nominated by the Baṣrans to the caliphate but he gave way to Ibn al-Zubayr's governor. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 404–10.

Qādisiyyah. [There] his mawlā, Mihrān,[167] fell behind. ʿUbaydallāh said to him, "Mihrān, are you in this predicament too? If you keep going until you see the palace, you will have a hundred thousand [dirhams]." However, Mihrān's answer was, "No, by God! I cannot."

ʿUbaydallāh stopped and took out clothes made of Yemenī cloth and put on a Yemenī band. He mounted his mule and traveled on by himself. As he passed the guard post, the guards, whenever they saw him, had no doubt that he was al-Ḥusayn. "Welcome, son of the Apostle of God," they said. But he did not speak to them. The people began to come out to him from their houses. Al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr heard them and locked the door on him and his entourage. ʿUbaydallāh came toward him, and al-Nuʿmān did not doubt that he was al-Ḥusayn, for around him was a crowd of people making a great noise. He called out, "I ask you in the name of God withdraw from me..., for I will not hand over my office (amānah) to you, and I have no wish to kill you." ʿUbaydallāh did not answer him but he went closer while the other man was hanging over the balcony. Then he began to say to him, "Open; you may not be able to, for you have been slumbering for [244] a long time." A man behind him heard this and withdrew to the people. He said, "O people, it is Ibn Marjānah,[168] by Him other than Whom there is no deity." They replied, "Shame on you! It is none other than al-Ḥusayn." Then al-Nuʿmān opened the door for him, and he entered. They slammed the door in the face of the people, who dispersed.

In the morning, ʿUbaydallāh sat on the pulpit. He said, "People, I am aware that the men who marched with me and showed obedience to me are enemies of al-Ḥusayn, even though they thought that al-Ḥusayn had come into the land and gained ascendancy in the town. But, by God, I did not recognize any of you." Then he came down from the pulpit.

ʿUbaydallāh learnt that Muslim b. ʿAqīl had arrived the night before him and was staying within al-Kūfah. He summoned a mawlā of the Banū Tamīm and gave him some money. He told 167. Mihrān seems to have been the personal servant of ʿUbaydallāh.

168. Marjānah was ʿUbaydallāh's mother. It was a disparaging way to refer to ʿUbaydallāh.

him, "Pretend to be believing in this matter and help them with the money. Go to Hāni' and Muslim, and stay with him." The mawlā went to Hāni' and told him that he was a member of the Shī'ah, and that he had some money to give.

In the meantime Sharīk b. al-A'war had become ill. He told Hāni', "Tell Muslim to come to me, for 'Ubaydallāh will pay me a sick visit." Sharīk said to Muslim, "Do you think that, if I gave you the opportunity, you would strike the head of 'Ubaydallāh with your sword?" Muslim replied, "Yes, by God!" 'Ubaydallāh did come to pay Sharīk a sick visit in the house of Hāni'. Sharīk had told Muslim, "When you hear me say, 'Give me a drink of water,' come out and strike him." 'Ubaydallāh sat beside Sharīk's bed and Mihrān stood behind him. When Sharīk called out, "Give me a drink of water," a servant girl came out with a cup. However, she saw Muslim and disappeared. Sharīk called out again, "Give me a drink of water." Then he called out a third time, "Shame on you! Do you prevent me from having water? Bring me a drink of water, even though my life is taken away by it." Mihrān realized the situation and winked at 'Ubaydallāh; he jumped up. Sharīk said, "Governor, I want to make my will to you." He replied, "I will come to visit you again," Mihrān began to hurry him away. Mihrān told him, "By God! He wanted you to be killed." He replied, "How is that possible with my kindness to Sharīk, and in the house of Hāni' whom my own father treated with great favor?"

When he got back he sent for Asmā' b. Khārijah[169] and Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath.

He told them, "Bring me Hāni'." They answered, "He will not [245] come without a guarantee of safe-conduct." He said, "What does he want with a guarantee of safe-conduct? Has he done anything wrong? Go to him and, if he won't come without a guarantee of safe-conduct, give it to him." They went and asked him to come. He replied, "If 'Ubaydallāh gets hold of me, he will kill me." But they kept urging him and finally brought him while 'Ubaydallāh was delivering the Friday sermon and sat in the mosque. Hāni' combed his two plaits of hair [while he waited]. When 'Ubaydallāh had performed the prayer, he called out to Hāni'. The latter 169. Asmā' b. Khārijah was a tribal leader of Fazārah of Qays. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 117.

followed him, entered, and greeted him. 'Ubaydallāh said "Didn't you know, Hāni', when my father came to this land, he did not spare the life of anyone of this Shī'ah except for your father and Ḥujr?[170] You know what happened to Ḥujr. Then he continued to treat you as well as a good companion. He wrote to the governor of al-Kūfah, 'All that I want from you is to take good care of Hāni'.'" Hāni' agreed. 'Ubaydallāh demanded, "Is my reward, then, that you hide a man in your house so that he may kill me?" Hāni' said, "I have not done such a thing." However, 'Ubaydallāh brought out the man from the tribe of Tamīm, who had been a spy on them. When Hāni' saw him, he realized that 'Ubaydallāh had been told [everything]. So he said, "Governor, what you have been told is true, but I will never ignore your favor to me. You and your family are guaranteed safe-conduct. Go wherever you wish." 'Ubaydallāh smoldered [with anger] at that. Mihrān was standing at his side with a cane in his hand, and he said to 'Ubaydallāh, "What a humiliation! This slave of a weaver guarantees your safe-conduct in [the province under] your authority!" 'Ubaydallāh said, "Seize him." He threw down the cane, took hold of the two plaits of Hāni"s hair, and pulled them across Hāni"s face. 'Ubaydallāh struck Hāni' on the face with the cane. The iron head of the cane came off and stuck into the wall. Then 'Ubaydallāh struck his face again; he broke Hāni"s nose and brow.

The people heard the uproar. The news reached the tribe of Madhḥij. They came and began to surround the building. 'Ubaydallāh ordered Hāni' to be thrown into a room while Madhḥij were shouting. 'Ubaydallāh ordered Mihrān to take Shurayḥ to Hāni'.
[246] Mihrān went out and took Shurayḥ to Hāni', and the police came in with him. Hāni' appealed to him, "Shurayḥ, do you see what has been done to me?" Shurayḥ answered, "I see that you are alive." He retorted, "Am I alive despite what you can see? Tell my tribe that, if they go away, he will kill me." Shurayḥ went back to 'Ubaydallāh and said, "I saw that he was alive, but I saw marks of cruel [treatment]." He replied, "Do you deny the governor the right to punish his subjects? Go out to those men and tell them." Shurayḥ went out, but 'Ubaydallāh ordered a man to accompany him. Shurayḥ called to them, "What is this wicked behavior? The man is alive. His governor has reprimanded him with a few blows without taking his life. Go away and do not give grounds for bringing punishment on yourselves and your colleague." So they went away.

170. Ḥujr b. 'Adī was a Shī'ite whom 'Ubaydallāh's father, Ziyād, had first tried to reconcile. Then when he emerged in the revolution, Ziyād put the revolution down with force and sent him to Mu'āwiyah, who executed him. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 95–101.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mu'allā b. Kulayb—Abū al-Waddāk: Sharīk b. al-A'war stayed with Hāni' b. 'Urwah al-Murādī. Sharīk was a member of the Shī'ah and had been present at the Battle of Ṣiffīn with 'Ammār.[171]

When Muslim b. 'Aqīl heard of the coming of 'Ubaydallāh to al-Kūfah, of what he had said and his treatment of the *'arīf*s and the people, he left the house of al-Mukhtār, where he was well known, and went to the house of Hāni' b. 'Urwah al-Murādī. He came inside his door and sent in for Hāni' to come out. Hāni' did not want him to be there when he saw him, but Muslim said to him, "I have come to you that you should give me neighborly protection and make me your guest." Hāni' replied, "May God have mercy on you, you have put a great burden on me. If it were not for the fact of your entry into the house and your trust, I would have preferred to ask you to leave me. Yet a guarantee of protection is required of me. It is not possible for a person like me to refuse a person like you out of ignorance. Come in." The Shī'ah began to visit him in the house of Hāni' b. 'Urwah.

Ibn Ziyād summoned a mawlā of his called Ma'qil. He told him, "Take three thousand dirhams, and look for Muslim b. 'Aqīl and look for his followers. Give them these three thousand dirhams. Tell them to use it to help in the war against their enemy. Let them know that you are one of them, for if you give them the dirhams they will be sure of you, have confidence in you, and they will not keep any of their information hidden from [247] you. Then keep visiting them." Ma'qil did that. He traveled until he came near Muslim b. 'Awsajah al-Asadī of the Banū Sa'd b. Tha'labah in the Great Mosque. The latter was praying, and Ma'qil heard some people saying that this man had pledged allegiance to al-Ḥusayn. He sat and waited until Muslim b. 'Awsajah had finished praying. Ma'qil said, "O servant of God, I am a Syrian, a mawlā of Dhū al-Kalā',[172] whom God has blessed with love for this House (bayt) and love for those who love them. Here are three thousand dirhams that I want to give to one of them whom I have learnt has come to al-Kūfah in order to receive oaths of allegiance on behalf of the son of the daughter of the Apostle of God. I have been wanting to meet him, but I have neither found anyone who will direct me to him nor anyone who knows the place. I was sitting [here] earlier and I heard a group of Muslims saying that there was a man who knew about this. Therefore I have come to you so that you may take this money and introduce me to your leader. If you wish, you may receive my oath of allegiance to him before my meeting him." Muslim b. 'Awsajah replied, "I thank God for your meeting me, and it gives me joy that you will get what you desire; God should help the House of His Prophet through you. Yet your knowledge of my involvement in this affair before it has developed troubles me; I fear this tyrant and his severity." Before he left, he took his oath of allegiance and testaments, strongly supported by oaths that he would be sincere and keep the matter concealed. Ma'qil gave him whatever assurances would satisfy him. Muslim b. 'Awsajah told him, "Come to me at my house regularly for some days, for I will seek permission for you [to visit] your master." He began to go to visit Muslim b. 'Awsajah frequently with the people, and the latter sought permission for him.

171. 'Ammār b. Yāsir was a famous Companion of the Prophet and supporter of 'Alī; he died in the Battle of Ṣiffīn. See *EI*², s.v. 'Ammār b. Yāsir.

Hāni' b. 'Urwah fell ill, and 'Ubaydallāh came on a sick visit to him. 'Umārah b. 'Ubayd al-Salūlī told Hāni', "[The purpose of] our group and our planning is to kill this despot. Now God [248] has given you power over him, so kill him." Hāni' replied, "I would not like him to be killed in my house." So 'Ubaydallāh left [unharmed].

Only a week later, Sharīk b. A'war fell sick. He was held in great regard by Ibn Ziyād and other governors; yet he was a steadfast Shī'ite. 'Ubaydallāh sent to him that he should come to him in the evening. Sharīk said to Muslim, "This reprobate is going to pay me a sick visit in the evening. When he is sitting down, come out against him and kill him. Then go and take his place in the palace, for no one will prevent you. If I recover from the pain during the next few days, I will go to al-Baṣrah and I will be able to take control of it on your behalf."

172. Dhū al-Kalā' was an important Yemenī family of Ḥimṣ. See Crone, Slaves, 95.

In the evening, 'Ubaydallāh set off to pay Sharīk a sick visit. Muslim b. 'Aqīl had taken up a strategic position in order that he could enter. Sharīk had said, "Don't let him escape you when he sits down." Hāni' b. 'Urwah rose and told Muslim b. 'Aqīl, "I don't want him to be killed in my house," as if he loathed that idea. Ibn Ziyād arrived and came in and sat down. He asked Sharīk about his illness, "What is it that you seem [to have] and when did you feel ill?" After Sharīk had spent a long time in answering him and he still saw that Muslim had not come out, he became afraid that Ibn Ziyād would escape and he began to recite: "What are you waiting for to greet Salmā? Quench my thirst [with a sip of water], even though my life is in that." He repeated that twice or three times. 'Ubaydallāh remarked, without discovering his real situation, "Have you noticed that he is talking deliriously?" Hāni' replied, "Yes, may God make you prosperous. This behavior has been going on from early this morning, when it was still dark, until now."

Ibn Ziyād rose and departed. Then Muslim came out. Sharīk [249] demanded, "What stopped you from killing him?" He replied, "Two things. One of them was Hāni"s dislike for him to be killed in his house. The other was a tradition that the people tell on the authority of the Prophet. 'Faith controls killing and a believer should not commit murder.'" Hāni' said, "By God! If you had killed him, you would have killed a grave sinner (fāsiq), a profligate [fājir], and an unbeliever (kāfir). Yet I disliked the idea of his being killed in my house."

Sharīk only lingered on for three nights after that, and then he died. Ibn Ziyād came out and led the prayer for him. Later, after he had killed Muslim and Hāni', Ibn Ziyād was told, "The words that you heard Sharīk speak during his illness were only to urge Muslim and tell him to come out to kill you." Ibn Ziyād retorted, "By God! I will never pray at the funeral of an Iraqī again. By God! If Ziyād were not buried among them, I would take Sharīk out of his grave."

Maʿqil, the mawlā of Ibn Ziyād, whom the latter had insinuated into [the circles of] Ibn ʿAqīl and his followers by money, had regularly visited Muslim b. ʿAwsajah for some days, so that Muslim b. ʿAwsajah would introduce him to Ibn ʿAqīl. After the death of Sharīk b. al-Aʿwar, Muslim b. ʿAwsajah brought Maʿqil to introduce him to Ibn ʿAqīl. Then Maʿqil got to know all the information about Ibn ʿAqīl. Muslim b. ʿAqīl received his oath of allegiance and told Abū Thumāmah al-Ṣāʾidī[173] to take the money that he had brought. The latter was the one who collected money from them in order to help each other; he used to buy their arms. He was an expert in weapons, one of the horsemen (fāris) of the Arabs and one of the notables of the Shīʿah. Maʿqil began to visit them regularly. He was the first to enter and the last to leave in order to hear all their news and to learn their secrets. Then he reported the secrets in the ear of Ibn Ziyād.

Hāniʾ b. ʿUrwah was in the habit of going every morning and evening to ʿUbaydallāh. When Muslim came to stay with him, he stopped going and pretended to be sick. He began not to go out. Ibn Ziyād asked those who did attend, "Why is it I don't see [250] Hāniʾ?" They replied, "He is sick." Ibn Ziyād said, "If I had been informed of his illness, I would have paid him a sick visit."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Saʿīd:[174] ʿUbaydallāh summoned Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath and Asmāʾ b. Khārijah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥasan b. ʿUqbah al-Murādī:[175] ʿUbaydallāh sent ʿAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī with them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Waʿlah—Abū al-Waddāk: Rawʿah, sister of ʿAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj, was married to Hāniʾ b. ʿUrwah; she was the mother of Yaḥyā b. Hāniʾ.[176]

ʿUbaydallāh asked them, "What prevents Hāniʾ b. ʿUrwah from coming to visit us?" They answered, "We don't know, may

---

173. Abū Thumāmah al-Ṣāʾidī helped run the Shīʿah organization in al-Kūfah. He was able to join al-Ḥusayn; he died with him. See pp. 142–44, below.

174. Al-Mujālid b. Saʿīd was a well-known historical authority in al-Kūfah, who died in 144 [762]. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 210–11.

175. His name may be al-Ḥusayn b. ʿUqbah, for that name is also given as an authority of Abū Mikhnaf. He is unknown under either name. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 207.

176. Yaḥyā b. Hāniʾ also reported some accounts used by Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 224.

God make the governor prosperous, but it seems that he is sick." Ibn Ziyād replied, "I have heard that he has recovered and that he sits at the door of his house. Go and tell him that he should not abandon his duty toward us, for I do not like one of the Arab nobles like him to behave rudely to me." When he was sitting at his door, they went to him in the evening and stood in front of his house. They asked him, "What is preventing you from seeing the governor? He has mentioned you and said that, if he had been told you were ill, he would have paid you a sick visit." He answered, "An illness has prevented me." They said, "He has been informed that you sit at the door of your house every evening. He finds you tardy. Tardiness and churlish behavior are things that the authorities will not tolerate. We adjure you to ride with us."

He called for his clothes and got dressed. Then he called for a mule and rode with them. When he got near the palace, he began to feel some apprehension. He said to Ḥassān b. Asmā' b. Khārijah,[177] "Nephew, by God, I fear this man. What do you think?" Ḥassān replied, "By God! Uncle, I do not fear anything for you. Why do you make a pretext against yourself when you are innocent?"

They claimed that Asmā' did not know why 'Ubaydallāh had [251] sent for Hāni' while Muḥammad did know.

The group went into 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, and [Hāni'] went in with them. When 'Ubaydallāh looked up, he said, "His own legs have brought you one who will be destroyed."[178]

'Ubaydallāh had just married Umm Nāfi' bt. 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah. When Hāni' had drawn near Ibn Ziyād, Shurayḥ, the qāḍī, was sitting with him. Ibn Ziyād turned toward Hāni' and recited:

I wish him all the good and yet he seeks my life.
Who would side with you against your friend from the tribe of Murād?[179]

177. This appears to be the only time Ḥassān b. Asmā' is mentioned.
178. Arabic proverb. See note 87, above.
179. A verse recited by 'Alī when his future murderer, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muljam al-Murādī, gives the oath of allegiance to him. See Mufīd, Irshād, 7. The verse itself is well known and is attributed to 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib.

He was referring to his earlier kindness and gentleness to Hāni'. Hāni' asked "What is that, governor?" Ibn Ziyād replied, "Yes, Hāni' b. 'Urwah, what are these matters that have been hatching in your houses against the Commander of the Faithful and the general community of the Muslims? You have brought Muslim b. 'Aqīl and taken him into your house. You have gathered arms and men for him in houses around you. You thought that was hidden from me." Hāni' said, "I have not done that, and Muslim is not with me." Ibn Ziyād declared, "O yes, you have!" Hāni' repeated his denial, and Ibn Ziyād [again] said, "Yes, you have!" After the argument between them had gone on for some time, and Hāni' persisted in contradicting and denying [the accusations], Ibn Ziyād summoned that spy, Maʿqil. He came and stood before him. Ibn Ziyād asked him whether he knew Hāni', and he said that he did. At that Hāni' realized that he had been a spy against them and had brought information about them. For a moment he was bewildered, then his spirit returned to him. He said, "Listen to me and believe what I say. I swear by God that I do not lie. By God, other than Whom there is no deity! I did not summon him to my house. I did not know anything about his business until I saw him sitting at my door. He asked to stay with me. I was too ashamed to refuse him. As a result of that, the duty of giving him protection fell upon me. Therefore, I took him into my house and gave him lodging and refuge. Then his affair [developed] as you have been [252] informed. If you wish, I will give you strongly sworn testaments and whatever you can trust that I will not do you any harm. If you wish, I will give you a guarantee that I will put in your hand to ensure that I return to you. Then I will go to him and order him to leave my house for wherever in the land he wants to go. Then I will be rid of his right of protection." Ibn Ziyād said "No, by God! You will never leave me unless you bring him." Hāni' refused, saying, "No, by God! I will not bring him to you. How could I bring you my guest so that you can kill him!" Ibn Ziyād [again] insisted, "By God! Bring him to me." Hāni' repeated, "By God! I will not bring him."

After the argument between them had gone on for some time, Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī rose. There was no other Syrian or Baṣran in al-Kūfah except him. He said, "May God make the governor prosperous! Leave me with him so that I can speak to him." He had seen Hāni"s obstinacy and refusal to comply with Ibn Ziyād's order. He told Hāni' to come over to him so that he could speak to him; he arose and took him aside from Ibn Ziyād. They were where Ibn Ziyād could see them. When they raised their voices, he could hear what they were saying. Muslim said to him, "I adjure you before God, Hāni', not to kill yourself and bring tribulation on your tribe and your clan. By God! I hold you too precious to be killed." Hāni' thought his clan would move to rescue him, but Muslim continued, "Ibn 'Aqīl is the cousin of the Umayyads, so they will neither kill him, nor harm him. Therefore deliver him to Ibn Ziyād. There will be no shame and blemish on you in doing that, for you would only be handing him over to the authorities." Hāni' replied, "By God! Indeed, there would be shame and disgrace for me if I were to hand over one who has come under my protection and is my guest, while I am still alive and sound. I can hear; I see well; I have a strong arm and many helpers. By God! If I were the only one without any helper, I would not hand him over until I had died on his behalf." He pressed further, but Hāni' went on saying, "By God! I will never hand him over to you."

Ibn Ziyād heard that and ordered him to be brought to him. They brought him, and Ibn Ziyād said to him, "By God! Bring Muslim b. 'Aqīl to me or I will have your head cut off." Hāni' replied, "Then there will be much flashing [of swords] around your house." Ibn Ziyād retorted, "That is your error. Do you frighten me with the flashing [of swords]?"

Hāni' thought his clan would defend him. Ibn Ziyād ordered [253 that he should be brought closer to him. He was brought nearer, and Ibn Ziyād struck his face with his cane; he went on beating at his nose, forehead and cheeks so that Hāni"s nose was broken and the blood flowed from it onto his clothes, and the flesh of his cheeks and forehead was splattered over his beard. Eventually the cane broke. Hāni' stretched out his hand toward the hilt of the sword of one of the police but the man pulled it away from him and prevented him. Ibn Ziyād yelled at him, "Have you become one of the Ḥarūrī today? So you have legally brought punishment on yourself. Therefore, killing you is permitted to us. Take him away and throw him into one of the rooms in the building. Lock the doors on him and put guards on him." That was done. However, Asmā' b. Khārijah arose and said, "Are we messengers of treachery from now on? You told us to bring the man to you. Yet, when we brought him to you, you smashed his nose and face; you made his blood flow on his beard. Then you claimed that you would kill him." 'Ubaydallāh said, "Are you still here?" And he ordered him to be struck and shaken. Then he was left in prison. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath said that the tribal leaders were satisfied with the governor's attitude, whether for them or against them; and that the governor was only giving due punishment. However, when it was reported to 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj that Hāni' had been killed, he advanced with Madhḥij and surrounded the palace. He had a great crowd with him. He called out, "I am 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj, and these are the horsemen and leading men of Madhḥij, who have neither broken away from obedience nor separated from the community. But it has been reported to them that their colleague has been killed; they regard that as a great crime."

'Ubaydallāh was told that Madhḥij were at the gate. He told the qāḍī, Shurayḥ, to go in to their colleague, look at him and then go out and inform them that he was still alive and had not been killed, for he had seen him. Shurayḥ went in and looked at him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ[180] heard Shurayh telling Ismā'īl b.
[254] Ṭalḥah:[181] I went in to Hāni'. When Hāni' saw me, he said, with blood flowing down his beard, "Oh, God! Oh, Muslim! Has my clan perished? Where are the people of religion? Where are the people of the town? Have they vanished, abandoning me to their enemy and the son of their enemy?" When he heard the tumult at the door of the palace, and I was about to go out, he followed me and said, "I think those are the voices of Madhḥij and my group of the Muslims. If ten of them got in, they would be able to rescue me." I went out to them accompanied by Ḥumayd b. Bukayr al-Aḥmarī,[182] whom Ibn Ziyād had sent with me—he was a member 180. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ later became one of the supporters of al-Mukhtār in his revolution. See Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 220.

181. Ismā'īl was the son of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, who opposed 'Alī at the Battle of the Camel.

182. Bakr in text has been emended to Bukayr as in Addenda et Emendanda, DLII. Ḥumayd b. Bukayr al-Aḥmarī was a member of the police, who was also present at the battle against al-Ḥusayn. See p. 164, below.

of his police who used to stand beside him. I swear by God that, if he had not been with me, I would have told Hāni"s colleagues what Hāni' had asked me. But when I went out to them, I said, "When the governor learnt about your attitude and your statements concerning your colleague, he ordered me to go and see him. I went and I saw him. Then he ordered me to inform you that he is still alive; the report that he had been killed was false." 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj and his colleagues praised God that he had not been killed. Then they went away.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alī—Muḥammad b. Bishr al-Hamdānī: When 'Ubaydallāh struck Hāni' and imprisoned him, he was afraid that because of it the people would create a disturbance. He went out and ascended the pulpit. With him were the nobles, his police and his entourage. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "O people, hold fast to obedience to God and to your imāms. Do not cause division and discord, for you will be destroyed, humiliated, killed, harshly treated or deprived. He who speaks the truth to you is your brother.[183] He who warns you is excused."[184] He was on the point of descending the pulpit, when the lookouts at the date sellers' gate of the mosque rushed in yelling, "Muslim b. 'Aqīl has come!" 'Ubaydallāh quickly went into the palace and locked the gates. [255]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd[185]—'Abdallāh b. Khāzim:[186] By God! I was Ibn 'Aqīl's messenger to the palace to see what became of Hāni'. When he was beaten and imprisoned, I mounted my horse and was the first to enter the house to bring information of him to Muslim b. 'Aqīl. There some women of Murād had gathered and they were crying out, "O calamity! O bereavement!" I went in to see Muslim with the news. He ordered me to summon his supporters. The houses around him were full of them. Of the eighteen thousand who had given him the oath of allegiance, there were four thousand men there. He 183. An Arabic proverb. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. akhw.

184. An Arabic proverb meaning that the one who warns cannot be blamed for the punishment of those who ignore the warning. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. ndhr.

185. Yūsuf b. Yazīd was a frequent authority of Abū Mikhnaf; otherwise he is unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 226.

186. The only apparent report about 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim seems to concern this episode.

told me to yell with his battle cry "yā manṣūr amit" ("ye who have been promised victory, kill!").[187] So I cried out, "yā manṣūr amit." Then the Kūfans gathered around him.

Muslim gave the command of the quarter Kindah and Rabī'ah to 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uzayz al-Kindī.[188] He told him to go in front of him with the cavalry. He put Muslim b. 'Awsajah al-Asadī in charge of the Madhḥij and Asad quarter, and since he was in command of them he ordered Muslim to dismount with the foot soldiers. Over the quarter of Tamīm and Hamdān, he appointed Abū Thumāmah al-Ṣā'idī. He gave command of the quarter [of the people] from Medina to 'Abbās b. Ja'dah al-Jadalī.[189] Then he advanced toward the palace. When 'Ubaydallāh was informed of his coming, he barricaded himself in the palace and locked the gates.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—'Abbās al-Jadalī: Four thousand of us went out with Ibn 'Aqīl. When we reached the palace, we were only three hundred. Muslim began to move forward with the people from Murād until he had surrounded the palace. The people answered the call and gathered; it was only a short time before the mosque and the marketplace were full of people. They continued to gather until the afternoon (masā'). 'Ubaydallāh's situation was grim. All his energy was concentrated on holding the door of the palace, for he only had [256] thirty members of his police, twenty nobles, and his family and mawālī with him in the palace. The nobles began to come to him through the door that adjoined the building of the Byzantines. Then those who were with Ibn Ziyād began to look down on the people. They looked down at them; they had to guard against the stones that the people threw at them as they cursed them. Nor were they remiss in cursing 'Ubaydallāh and his father. Ibn Ziyād summoned Kathīr b. Shihāb b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥārithī[190] and ordered

187. This was the battle cry used at Badr by the Muslims. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 8.

188. The only apparent report about 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uzayz al-Kindī seems to concern this episode.

189. The only apparent report about 'Abbās b. Ja'dah al-Jadalī seems to concern this episode.

190. Kathīr b. Shihāb b. al-Ḥusayn al-Ḥārithī was a powerful Yemenī tribal leader, whose influence was only reported on this occasion, for he took the leading role in sending away Madhḥij. In this attempted revolt, the other important Madhḥij leader, 'Amr b. al-Zubaydī, seems to have played no part on either side.

him to go out among those of Madhḥij who obeyed him, to go round al-Kūfah and to make the people desert Ibn 'Aqīl; he should make them afraid of war and threaten them with the authorities' punishment. Then he ordered Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath to go out among those of Kindah and Ḥaḍramawt who obeyed him; he should raise a standard that would guarantee safe-conduct to those people who came to him. He gave similar instructions to al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī,[191] Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Tamīmī, Ḥajjār b. Abjar al-'Ijlī' and Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan al-'Āmirī.[192] He kept the rest of the nobles of the people with him, not wishing to be without them because of the small number of people who were with him. Kathīr b. Shihāb went out and encouraged the people to desert Muslim.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī:[193] Kathīr met a man from Kalb called 'Abd al-A'lā b. Yazīd.[194] He was carrying arms with the intention of joining Ibn 'Aqīl with his fellow youths. He seized him and took him to Ibn Ziyād. Kathīr told Ibn Ziyād about the man, but the man told Ibn Ziyād that he had been intending to come to him. Ibn Ziyād retorted, "Sure! Sure! I remember that you promised me that!" Ibn Ziyād ordered the man to be imprisoned.

Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath went out until he reached the houses of the Banū 'Umārah. 'Umārah b. Ṣalkhab al-Azdī[195] came to him; he was on his way to Ibn 'Aqīl and was carrying arms. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath seized him and sent him to Ibn Ziyād, who imprisoned him. Ibn 'Aqīl sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ [257] al-Shibāmī against Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath from the mosque. When Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath saw the great number of those who had come against him, he deviated and held back. Al-Qa'qā'

191. Al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī was one of the tribal leaders in al-Kūfah.

192. Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan al-'Āmirī was a Yemeni tribal leader in al-Kūfah; he fought for 'Alī at Ṣiffīn but later switched sides. He was killed by al-Mukhtār in vengeance for the part he played against al-Ḥusayn. See Ṭabarī, I, 3305; II, 661–63.

193. Abū Janāb al-Kalbī's name was Yaḥyā b. Abī Ḥayyah. He was a well-known traditionist and an authority of Abū Mikhnaf; he died in 147 (764). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 223–24.

194. 'Abd al-A'lā b. Yazīd was only mentioned with regard to this incident and his execution for his part in it. See p. 62, below.

195. 'Umārah b. Ṣalkhab al-Azdī was only mentioned with regard to this incident and his execution for his part in it. See p. 62, below.

b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī then sent to Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, "I have gone around Ibn 'Aqīl from al-'Arār.[196] Stay away from his position." He went back to Ibn Ziyād through the building of the Byzantines.

When Kathīr b. Shihāb, Muḥammad and al-Qa'qā', together with those of their tribesmen who obeyed them, had gathered with Ibn Ziyād, Kathīr spoke to him while they were giving sincere advice to Ibn Ziyād. Kathīr b. Shihāb said, "May God make the governor prosperous. You have many of the nobles of the people with you, [as well as] your police, family, and servants. Let us go out against them." 'Ubaydallāh refused, but he gave Shabath b. Ribʿī a standard and sent him out.

The people with Ibn 'Aqīl continued to increase and gather until the afternoon. Their situation was strong. 'Ubaydallāh sent for the nobles and assembled them. Then he said to them, "Look down on the people; promise additional [money] and kind treatment to those who obey. Intimidate the disobedient with [threats of] dispossession and punishment and tell them that the army from Syria is on the march toward them."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid[197]—'Abdallāh b. Khāzim al-Kuthayrī of the clan of Kuthayr in the tribe of Azd: The nobles looked down on us. Kathīr b. Shihāb, the foremost of the people, spoke until the sun was about to set. He said, "O people, go back to your families. Do not hurry into evil actions. Do not expose yourselves to death. These are the soldiers of the Commander of the Faithful, Yazīd, who are approaching. The governor has given God a promise that, if you persist in fighting him and do not go away by nightfall, he will deprive your children of their [right to a] state allotment of money ('aṭā'). Also [258] he will scatter your soldiers in Syrian campaigns without rations (ṭama'), holding the healthy responsible for the sick and those present for those who are absent until none of the rebellious people remain who have not tasted the evil consequences of what their hands have earned." The other nobles spoke in a similar vein.

196. Al-'Arār seems to have been the name of a place in al-Kūfah.

197. Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid was a frequent authority of Abū Mikhnaf; however, he does not seem to have been used by other historians. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 217.

After the people had heard what they had to say, they began to disperse and go away.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd: Women began to come to their sons and brothers, urging them to go away as the people would be enough without them. Every man went to his son or his brother telling him, "Tomorrow, the Syrians will come against you. What have you to do with war and this evil doing? Go away." Thus, each took someone away. They continued to disperse so that by the time evening came Muslim b. 'Aqīl only had thirty men with him in the mosque. At the evening prayer Muslim b. 'Aqīl prayed with only thirty men. When he saw that it was evening, and he only had a small group with him, he left the mosque and headed for the gates of Kindah. He reached the gates with only ten of his men with him. When he left the gate, there was no one with him. He looked around but could see no one to guide him along the road, no one to show him to a house or to give him personal support if an enemy appeared before him.

He wandered amid the lanes of al-Kūfah, turning to right and left without knowing where he was going until he came to the houses of the Banū Jabalah of Kindah. He walked on until he came to a door where there was a woman called Ṭaw'ah. She had been a slave wife[198] of al-Ash'ath b. Qays; he had freed her. She had then married Asīd al-Ḥaḍramī[199] and she had borne him [a son called] Bilāl. Bilāl had gone out with the people, and his mother was standing at the door waiting for him. Ibn 'Aqīl greeted her and she returned the greeting. He said, "Servant of God, give me water to drink." She entered her house and brought him a drink; he sat down. She took the vessel inside and then came out again asking, "Servant of God, haven't you had your drink?" He [259] replied, "Yes." She told him to go to his people but he was silent.

198. The Arabic is umm walad. This is a term used to denote a concubine who has given birth to a child whom the master has recognized as his own; therefore, the child becomes free. There was a tendency for these women to be given their freedom, at least on the death of their masters. While the translation "slave wife" is not a complete description, it seems closest to the concubine's situation. See J. Schacht, Origins, 264–65. Neither she nor her son Bilāl was mentioned after this event.

199. Asīd b. Mālik al-Ḥaḍramī was present at the battle against al-Ḥusayn and was said to have killed 'Abdallāh b. Muslim b. 'Aqīl there. See p. 181, below.

She repeated it but he was still silent. A third time she said, "Fear God in [your treatment of] me! Glory be to God! Servant of God, go to your people. May God give you health. It is not right for you to sit at my door; I will not permit you to do it any longer." He got up and said, "Servant of God, I have neither house nor clan in this town. Would you show me some generosity and kindness? Perhaps I will be able to repay you later on." She asked him who he was, and he told her that he was Muslim b. 'Aqīl, and that the Kūfans had lied to him and incited him. She repeated, "Are you really Muslim?" He said, "Yes." She told him to enter her home. She took him into a room in her house but not the room that she used. She spread out a carpet for him and offered him supper, but he could not eat.

Soon her son returned. He saw her going to and fro between the rooms and exclaimed, "By God! The number of times that you have gone into and come out of that room this evening makes me suspect that you are occupied in something important." She answered, "My little son, forget about this." However, he insisted, "By God! Tell me." She told him to get on with his own business and not to ask her about anything. But he persisted until she said, "My little son, don't tell any of the people anything about what I am going to tell you." She made him take an oath. After he had sworn, she told him. Then he went to bed without saying anything. Some claim that he was a mere fugitive, while others say that he was drinking with his friends that night.

A long time passed for Ibn Ziyād. He did not hear the supporters of Ibn 'Aqīl as he had heard them before. He told his followers to look down at the people and see whether they could see any of them. They looked down and did not see anyone. Then he told them to see whether the people were in the shadows, lying in ambush for them. Ibn Ziyād's followers ascended the central parts [of the walls] of the mosque; they lowered the torches of fire in their hands, so that they could see whether there was anyone in the shadows. Sometimes the torches gave enough light and sometimes they did not give as much light as the followers would [260] have wished. They let down the torches and sticks of cane tied with ropes that were set on fire. They were lowered until they reached the ground. They did this in [places of] the deepest darkness, as well as those parts that were closer and those that were in between. They also did that in the darkness around the pulpit. When they saw that there was nothing in the shadows, they informed Ibn Ziyād. Then he opened the doorway into the mosque. He came out and ascended the pulpit. His followers also came out with him. He told them to sit around him for a little while before the night prayer. He ordered 'Amr b. Nāfi'[200] to call out that there would only be a guarantee of safe-conduct for any man of the police, the 'arīfs, the supporters, and the fighters who prayed the night prayer in the mosque. Not an hour passed before the mosque was full of people. After ordering his caller [to call for prayer], he began the prayer. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm[201] said to him, "Either you pray with the people or someone else should pray with them while you go into the palace and pray there. This is up to you. I am afraid you will not be secure here against any of your enemies' trying to assassinate you." 'Ubaydallāh told him, "Order my guard to stand behind me just as they used to do and go round among them. I am not going inside."

After praying with the people, he stood up. He praised and glorified God, saying, "... Ibn 'Aqīl, stupid and ignorant man as he is, has attempted the opposition and rebellion that you have seen. There will be no security from God for a man in whose house we find him. Whoever brings him will have the reward for his blood. Fear God, you servants of God, and keep to obedience and your oath of allegiance. Do not do anything against yourselves. Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm, may your mother lose you if any of the gates of the lanes of al-Kūfah are open, or this man gets away, and you do not bring him to me. I give you authority over the houses of the inhabitants of al-Kūfah. Send lookouts to the entrances of the lanes. Tomorrow morning clear the people from the houses. Search their houses thoroughly so that you can bring me this man."

Al-Ḥuṣayn was in charge of the police and was of the Banū Tamīm. After this, Ibn Ziyād went back into the palace. He gave [261]
'Amr b. Ḥurayth his standard and put him in charge of the people. In the morning, he held an assembly and gave permission for people to come to him. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath approached. Ibn Ziyād said to him, "Welcome to one of those whose loyalty is above suspicion." Ibn Ziyād sat Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath by his side.

200. 'Amr b. Nāfi' was the secretary of 'Ubaydallāh. See p. 63, below.

201. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm was in charge of 'Ubaydallāh's police in al-Kūfah; he played an active part in the defeat of al-Ḥusayn.

That same morning the son of that old woman—he was Bilāl b. Asīd; it was his mother who had given refuge to Ibn 'Aqīl—went to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath and told him about Muslim b. 'Aqīl being with his mother. 'Abd al-Raḥmān went to his father, who was with Ibn Ziyād and whispered the secret to him. Ibn Ziyād asked what he had said, and Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath answered that he had told him that Ibn 'Aqīl was in one of their houses. Ibn Ziyād poked a cane into his side and told him, "Get up and bring him to me immediately."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Qudāmah b. Sa'īd b. Zā'idah b. Qudāmah al-Thaqafī:[202] When Ibn al-Ash'ath arose to bring Ibn 'Aqīl to Ibn Ziyād, the latter sent to 'Amr b. Ḥurayth, who was his deputy in leading the people in the mosque, that he should send sixty or seventy men, all from the tribal grouping of Qays, with Ibn al-Ash'ath. He was unwilling to send Ibn al-Ash'ath's own tribal grouping (qawm) because he was aware that every tribe [of the group] would be unwilling that a man like Ibn 'Aqīl should be found and arrested among them. 'Amr b. Ḥurayth sent 'Amr b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās al-Sulamī[203] and with him sixty or seventy men from Qays. They went to the house where Muslim b. 'Aqīl was staying. When the latter heard the beating of horses' hooves and the voices of men, he knew that they had come for him. He was about to strike out against them with his sword drawn, but they rushed blindly at him into the house. He fell upon them and struck them with his sword; he drove them out of the house. They repeated the attack, and Muslim counterattacked in the same way. Bukayr b. Ḥumrān al-Aḥmarī[204] exchanged blows with him. Bukayr struck him in the mouth, cutting his top lip and slicing down to the lower lip; he knocked out two of 202. Qudāmah b. Sa'īd was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf but only for this incident. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 216.

203. 'Amr b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās al-Sulamī was mentioned in connection with this incident.

204. Bukayr b. Ḥumrān al-Aḥmarī was an assistant of the officials in al-Kūfah, who helped Ziyād against Ḥujr b. 'Adī. See Ṭabarī, II, 129–30.

Muslim's teeth. Muslim struck him a terrible blow on the head and repeated it, cutting a nerve along his shoulder. The blow [262] almost reached Bukayr's stomach. When the people saw this, they [went up and] looked down on Muslim from the upper part of the house and began to hurl stones at him. They also lit sticks of cane with fire and threw them at him from the top of the house. When he saw that, he went out against them into the lane with his sword drawn and fought them. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath came toward him, saying, "Young man, you can have my guarantee of safe-conduct. Don't kill yourself." However, he continued to fight against the people, saying:

I swear I will only be killed as a free man,
Even though I see death as something horrible.
Every man one day will meet an evil.
Then the cold will be blended with a bitter heat
And the ray of the sun will be deflected and the sun will [forever] set.
I fear that I will be cheated and deluded.[205]

Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath assured Muslim that he would not be cheated, deluded or deceived. He told him that the Umayyads were his cousins; they would not kill or strike him. Muslim had been oppressed by the stones and weakened by the fighting. He was out of breath, so he propped his back up against the wall of the house. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath came closer and said, "You can have a guarantee of safe-conduct." When Muslim asked whether he was really granted safe-conduct, Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath said, "Yes." The people also said, "You are given a [263] guarantee of safe-conduct," except 'Amr b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās al-Sulamī. He said as he turned aside, "I will have no part in this."[206] Muslim declared, "Had you not granted me safe-conduct, I would not have put my hand in yours."

A mule was brought, and he mounted, but then they gathered around him and pulled his sword out of his grasp. At that he was in despair for his life, and his eyes filled with tears. He cried out,

---

205. These verses with slight variations are quoted by Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī. See Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, V, 93.

206. Literally, "I will have no she-camel or male camel in this."

"This is the beginning of betrayal." Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath said, "I hope no harm will come to you." Muslim asked, "Is it only hope? Where then is your guarantee of safe-conduct? Indeed we belong to God and to Him we shall return."[207] And he started weeping. ʿAmr b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās goaded him saying, "One who has sought for the like of what you have sought for should not weep when there befalls him what has befallen you." Muslim replied, "I do not weep for myself, nor do I grieve for my own death, even though I have not the slightest desire for destruction. But I am weeping for my family who are coming to me. I am weeping for Ḥusayn and the family of Ḥusayn."

Then he went closer to Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath and said, "O servant of God, by God, I see that you are unable to grant me a guarantee of safe-conduct. Yet do you have the goodness to send one of your men with my message so that it will get to Ḥusayn? For I have no doubt that he has now set out toward you, or will be setting out soon with his family. That was the reason for my outburst of grief. The message will say: 'Ibn ʿAqīl has sent me to you. He is a prisoner in the hands of the people, and he does not think that you should come to be killed. He says that you should return with your family and not let the Kūfans tempt you, for they were the followers of your father, yet he desired to leave them, even through death or murder. The Kūfans have lied to you and lied to me. A liar has no judgment.'" Ibn al-Ashʿath said, "By God! I will do that, and I will inform Ibn Ziyād that I have given you a guarantee of safe-conduct."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Jaʿfar b. Ḥudhayfah al-Ṭāʾī[208]— [264] Saʿīd b. Shaybān[209] also knew the report: Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath summoned Iyās b. al-ʿAthl al-Ṭāʾī, of the Banū Mālik b. ʿAmr b. Thumāmah, who was a poet[210] and frequently visited Muḥammad. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath told him, "Meet Ḥusayn and give him this letter." In the letter was written what Ibn ʿAqīl had told him. Then he said to him, "Here are your provisions, 207. Qurʾān, 2:156 [151].

208. Jaʿfar b. Ḥudhayfah al-Ṭāʾī was a traditionist and an authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 203.

209. Saʿīd b. Shaybān is an unknown authority who only seems to report this account.

210. Neither Iyās b. al-ʿAthl nor his poetry seems to be known.

equipment and goods for your family." Iyās asked, "Where will I get a mount, for I have exhausted my own animal?" Ibn al-Ash'ath said, "Here is a mount. Ride it for this journey."

Iyās departed and met al-Ḥusayn at Zubālah[211] four nights later. He gave him the news and handed him the message. Ḥusayn said, "Everything that has been decreed will come to pass. We find satisfaction and recompense for ourselves and our corrupted community with God."

When Muslim b. 'Aqīl had moved to Hāni' b. 'Urwah's house and eighteen thousand had given the oath of allegiance to him, he had sent a letter to Ḥusayn with 'Ābis b. Abī Shabīb al-Shākirī: "The trusted early messenger does not lie to his own people. Eighteen thousand of the Kūfans have given the oath of allegiance to you. Hurry and come when my letter reaches you. All the people are with you. None of them has any regard or desire for the clan of Mu'āwiyah. Peace be with you."

Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath went with Ibn 'Aqīl to the door of the palace. He asked permission to enter. Permission was given him. He gave a report to 'Ubaydallāh about Ibn 'Aqīl and Bukayr's blow against him. 'Ubaydallāh said, "May God destroy him." Then Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath told him about what he had done and about his own guarantee of safe-conduct to him. 'Ubaydallāh said, "What have you to do with a guarantee of safe-conduct? As if we sent you to guarantee him safe-conduct when we only sent you to bring him!" Ibn al-Ash'ath fell silent.

Ibn 'Aqīl came to the door of the palace and he was thirsty. At the palace door there were people sitting waiting for permission to enter. Among them were 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ, 'Amr b. Ḥurayth, Muslim b. 'Amr and Kathīr b. Shihāb.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Qudāmah b. Sa'īd:[212] When [265]
Muslim b. 'Aqīl came to the palace door there was a jug of cold water that had been placed at the doorway. He asked, "Give me a drink of that water." Muslim b. 'Amr said, "See how cold it is. By God! You will never taste a drop of it until you taste the heat

211. Zubālah was a well-known halt on the road from Mecca to al-Kūfah. When a traveler approached from Mecca, it was before the low ground leading toward al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 912.

212. Sa'd has been emended to Sa'īd as in the isnād on p. 54, above.

of Hell-fire." Ibn 'Aqīl cried out, "Shame on you. Who are you?" Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī retorted, "I am the one who recognized the truth when you denied it, the one who was sincere to his imām when you deceived him, and the one who was attentive and obedient to him when you rebelled against him and opposed him. I am Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī." Ibn 'Aqīl said, "May your mother be bereft of a son! How coarse you are, how rough, how hard your heart is, how rude you are! Man of Bāhilah, you are more appropriate for the heat of Hell-fire and to remain there forever than I am." He sat down, propping himself against a wall.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Qudāmah b. Sa'īd:[213] 'Amr b. Ḥurayth sent a boy called Sulaymān to bring him water in the jug in order to give him a drink.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sa'īd b. Mudrik b. 'Umārah:[214] 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah sent a boy of his called Qays to bring him a jug with a napkin and a cup. He poured water into the cup and gave Muslim a drink. But, whenever he went to drink, he filled the cup with blood. When he filled the cup for the third time, he went to drink but his two teeth fell into the cup. He said, "Praise be to God! If it had been a provision granted me, I could have drunk it."

Muslim was taken into Ibn Ziyād; however, he did not greet him as governor. The guard demanded, "Don't you greet the governor?" He replied, "If he wants my death, what is the point of my greeting him with words of peace? If he did not want my death, my greetings of peace to him would be profuse." Ibn Ziyād said, "By my life! You will be killed." Muslim said, "Is it so?" He replied that, indeed, it was. Then Muslim asked if he could make his will to one of his fellow tribesmen. Ibn Ziyād agreed.

Muslim looked at those sitting with 'Ubaydallāh. Among them was 'Umar b. Sa'd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ). He said to him, "'Umar, there is kinship between you and me and I have a need that you could carry out successfully. But it is secret." 'Umar refused to let him say anything. However, 'Ubaydallāh told him not to [266] refuse to consider the need of his cousin. So 'Umar got up with him and sat where Ibn Ziyād could watch him. Muslim said, "I have a debt in al-Kūfah. I borrowed seven hundred dirhams when I came to al-Kūfah. Pay it for me. Take care of my corpse. Ask Ibn Ziyād to give it to you and then bury my body. Send someone to Ḥusayn to tell him to return, for I have written to him telling him that the people are with him and now I can only think that he is coming."

213. Sa'd has been emended to Sa'īd as on p. 54, above.

214. This appears to have been the only report from Sa'īd b. Mudrik b. 'Umārah; he is otherwise unknown.

'Umar said to Ibn Ziyād, "Do you know what he said to me, governor? He mentioned these things." Ibn Ziyād replied, "The faithful would not betray you, but the traitor might be confided in. As for your money, it is yours. We will not prevent you from doing with it what you like. As for Ḥusayn, if he does not intend harm to us, we will not intend harm to him. As for his body, we will never accept your intercession with regard to it. He is not worthy of being granted that. He fought against us and opposed us; he strove for our destruction." They also claim that he said, "As for the body when we have killed it, we do not care what is done with the corpse."

Then Ibn Ziyād said, "Ibn 'Aqīl, you came to the people while they were all united and [spoke] with one voice; you scattered them and divided their opinions so that they attacked each other." Ibn 'Aqīl replied, "I did not come for that, but the people of the town claimed that your father had killed their best men, shed their blood and appointed governors among them like the governors of Chosroe and Caesar. We came to enjoin justice and to urge rule by the Book." Ibn Ziyād exclaimed. "What have you to do with that, you great sinner? Have we not done that among them when you were drinking wine in Medina?" Muslim cried out, "I, drink wine! By God! God knows you are not speaking the truth and have spoken without any knowledge, for I am not like you have said. It is more appropriate to be described as a wine drinker then a man who laps the blood of Muslims, who takes the life that God has forbidden, who takes life when no other life [has been taken], who sheds inviolable blood, and who kills out of usurpation, enmity and evil opinion, while he enjoys himself and plays as if he had done nothing." Ibn Ziyād shouted, "You great sinner! Your own soul made you desire what God denied you, for God did not regard you as worthy of it." Muslim replied, "Who is then worthy of it, Ibn Ziyād?" Ibn Ziyād answered, "The [267]

Commander of the Faithful, Yazīd." Muslim declared, "Praise be to God! We will accept God's judgment between you and us in every circumstance." Ibn Ziyād remarked, "You speak as if you think that you have some right in the matter." Muslim answered, "By God! It is not opinion but certainty." At this Ibn Ziyād declared, "May God kill me, if I do not kill you in such a way as no one in Islam has been killed before." Muslim retorted, "You are the person with the most right to commit crimes of innovation in Islam. You will never abandon evil murder, wicked punishment, shameful practice, and avaricious domination. None of the people is more worthy of these things than you." Ibn Sumayyah[215] began to curse him, and to curse Ḥusayn, ʿAlī, and ʿAqīl, while Muslim did not speak to him.

The authorities [ahl al-ʿilm] claim that ʿUbaydallāh ordered him to be given water in a common earthenware vessel. Then he said, "Only our unwillingness that you should become protected by drinking from it prevented us from giving you a drink from it [earlier] and then killing you. It is for that reason that we have given you a drink in this way." Then he ordered, "Take him up to the top of the palace, cut off his head and throw his body after his head." Muslim said, "Ibn al-Ashʿath, if you had not given me a guarantee of safe-conduct, I would not have surrendered. Therefore, arise with your sword on my behalf and let your pledge be fulfilled." Then he said, "Ibn Ziyād, by God, if there were any kinship between you and me, you would not kill me." Ibn Ziyād asked where the man was whose head and shoulder Ibn ʿAqīl had struck with his sword. He was summoned, and Ibn Ziyād told him to climb up and be the one who cut his head off. He ascended with him. Muslim said, "God is greater." He sought forgiveness from God and prayed for blessings to be with His angels and His Apostle, saying: "O God, judge between us and a people who have enticed us, lied against us and humiliated us." They took him to a part that overlooked where the butchers are today. His head was cut off, and his body was thrown after his head.

215. Ibn Sumayyah is a reference to the prostitute mother of ʿUbaydallāh's father, Ziyād. Ziyād has been persuaded to join Muʿāwiyah by the latter, declaring that Muʿāwiyah's own father Abū Sufyān had fathered Ziyād when he had visited Sumayyah in al-Ṭāʾif. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 86. It should be noted that this appellation is not given to ʿUbaydallāh as part of the dialogue but by the narrator himself, who is clearly indicating where his sympathies lay.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—'Awn b. Abī Juḥayfah:[216] The Aḥmarī, Bukayr b. Ḥumrān, who killed Muslim came down, and Ibn Ziyād asked him if he had killed him? He answered that he had, and Ibn Ziyād asked him what [268] Muslim had been saying while he was climbing to the top of the palace with him? He told him, "He was saying, 'God is greater.' He glorified God and sought His forgiveness. When I approached him to kill him, he said, 'O God, judge between us and a people who lied to us, deceived us, betrayed us and killed us!' I said to him, 'Come near me, praise be to God Who has given me vengeance over you.' Then I struck him a blow that was not sufficient for anything. He said, 'Slave, don't you see that a scratch that you can make on me is a suitable payment for your own blood?'" Ibn Ziyād remarked, "Proud, even in the face of death." Bukayr continued, "Then I struck him a second time and killed him."

Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath then approached 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād and spoke to him of Hāni' b. 'Urwah. He said, "You know of the position of Hāni' b. 'Urwah in the town and the position of his house in the clan. His tribe knows that I and my colleague brought him to you. I adjure you before God, hand him over to me, for I would not like to face the enmity of his tribe. They are the most powerful people in the town and the most numerous among the Yemenīs." Ibn Ziyād promised to do what he could but, since the affair of Muslim b. 'Aqīl had gone the way it had gone, he had changed his mind about Hāni'. He refused to do what he had promised. After Muslim b. 'Aqīl had been killed, he ordered Hāni' b. 'Urwah to be taken to the market and his head to be cut off.

Hāni' was taken in bonds until he was brought to a place where sheep were sold. He began to shout, "O Madhḥij! There is no Madhḥij for me today. O Madhḥij! And how to get to Madhḥij?" When he realized that no one was going to help him, he pulled his

---

216. Erroneously given as 'Awf in the text; see Addenda et Emendanda, DCLII. 'Awn b. Abī Juḥayfah is a traditionist who may have been present at these events; however, he would have been very young, for he died in 116 (734). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 190.

hand and wrenched it free of the bond, crying, "Is there no stick, knife, stone or bone with which a man can defend his life?" They jumped upon him and tied the bonds tightly. He was told to stretch out his neck, but he answered, "I am not one who generously gives away my life. I will not help you to take my life." A Turkish mawlā of ʿUbaydallāh called Rashīd[217] struck him with a sword, but it did not do anything. Hānīʾ called out, "To God is [269] the return. O God! To Your mercy and Your paradise." Then Rashīd struck him with another blow and killed him.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Murādī[218] saw Rashīd later at Khāzir while the letter was with ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. The people said that he was the killer of Hānīʾ b. ʿUrwah. Ibn al-Ḥuṣayn declared, "May God kill me if I do not kill him, or may I be killed instead of him." He attacked him with a spear that he thrust into him. He killed him.

After Muslim b. ʿAqīl and Hānīʾ b. ʿUrwah had been killed, ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād summoned ʿAbd al-Aʿlā al-Kalbī whom Kathīr b. Shihāb had apprehended with the Banū Fityān. He was brought, and ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād asked him to tell him about what happened to him. He said, "May God make you prosperous, I went out to see what the people were doing, and Kathīr b. Shihāb apprehended me." ʿUbaydallāh said, "You must give solemnly sworn oaths that you only went out for the reasons that you claim." He refused to swear. So ʿUbaydallāh ordered him to be taken to the cemetery of al-Sabīʿ and that his head be cut off there. He was taken and executed. He [also] had ʿUmārah b. Ṣalkhab al-Azdī brought—he was one of those who had intended to help Muslim b. ʿAqīl—and ʿUbaydallāh asked him from which tribe he was. ʿUmārah b. Ṣalkhab answered that he was from Azd. ʿUbaydallāh ordered that he should be taken to his people and his head cut off.

Concerning the killing of Muslim b. ʿAqīl and Hānīʾ b. ʿUrwah, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zabīr al-Asadī said—it is also claimed that al-Farazdaq said [these words]:[219]

---

217. Rashīd does not seem to have been mentioned in any other context.

218. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Murādī does not seem to have been mentioned in any other context.

219. Some of these verses were quoted earlier. See pp. 21–22, above.

If you do not know what death is, then look at Hāni' and Ibn 'Aqīl in the marketplace.
Look at a hero whose face the sword has covered with wounds and another who fell dead from a high place.
The command of the governor struck them down, [270]
and they became legends for those who travel on every road.
You see a corpse whose color death has changed and a spattering of blood that has flowed abundantly,
A young man who was even more bashful than a shy young woman yet was more decisive than the polished blade of a two-edged sword.
Is Asmā' riding in peace a mount that moves at walking pace while Madhḥij seeks vengeance against him?
All Murād throng around him. Each one of them, whether a questioner or a questioned, is apprehensively watchful.
If you do not avenge your two brothers, then be harlots, satisfied with little.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb Yaḥyā b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Kalbī: When Muslim and Hāni' were killed, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād sent their heads with Hāni' b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Wādi'ī[220] and al-Zubayr b. al-Arwaḥ al-Tamīmī[221] to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. He ordered his secretary (kātib), 'Amr b. Nāfi', to write to Yazīd about what had happened to Muslim and Hāni'. The secretary wrote. He was very elaborate. He was the first to be elaborate in writing letters. When 'Ubaydallāh saw the letter, he disliked it. He said "What is this prolixity and this excess? Write: 'Praise be to God, Who has exacted the dues of the Commander of the [271] Faithful and given him sufficient provisions against his enemy. I inform the Commander of the Faithful, may God be generous to him, that Muslim b. 'Aqīl took refuge in the house of Hāni' b. 'Urwah al-Murādī. I set spies on them and concealed men against them. I tricked them until I brought them out. God gave me

220. Hāni' b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Wādi'ī was from the tribe of Hamdān and was anti-Shī'ite in his attitude. He bore witness against Ḥujr b. 'Adī earlier and tried to incriminate al-Mukhtār later. See Ṭabarī, II, 134 and 521.

221. Al-Zubayr b. al-Arwaḥ al-Tamīmī seems to have had a pro-Umayyad attitude. Later he fought for al-Ḥajjāj against the Khārijites. See Ṭabarī, II, 890.

power over them. Thus, I brought them forward and had them executed. I have sent their heads to you with Hānī' b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Hamdānī and al-Zubayr b. Arwaḥ al-Tamīmī. They are both people who are attentive and in obedience to you, and they are sincere. Let the Commander of the Faithful ask them whatever he wants to know about the affair, for they have knowledge and truth, understanding and self-restraint. Farewell. Peace be with you."

Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah wrote back: "You have not gone beyond how I wanted you to be. You have acted with decision. You have launched into the attack with the violence of a man who has control of his emotions. You have satisfied me, been sufficient for the task, corroborated my view of you and my opinion of you. I have summoned your two messengers, questioned them, and talked to them. I found them in their views and their merit as you had mentioned. Receive them both with kindness on my recommendation. I have been informed that al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī has set out for Iraq. Therefore set lookouts and watches, and be vigilant against suspicious characters. Arrest anyone on suspicion but only kill those who fight against you. Write to me about all the news that occurs. Peace and the mercy of God be with you."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣa'qab b. Zuhayr—'Awn b. Abī Juḥayfah: Muslim b. 'Aqīl's rising in al-Kūfah was on Tuesday, 8 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, A.H. 60 (September 9, 680).[222] It is [also] said that it was on Wednesday, 7 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, A.H. 60 (September 8, 680). The Day of 'Arafah was the day after al-Ḥusayn's departure from Mecca on his way to al-Kūfah. Al-Ḥusayn had left Medina for Mecca on Sunday, with two days remaining in Rajab in the Year A.H. 60 (May 4, 680). He had entered Mecca on Friday, 3 Sha'ban [272] (May 9). He stayed in Mecca for Sha'bah and for the months of Ramaḍān, Shawwāl and Dhū al-Qa'dah (May, June, July, and August). Then he set out from there on Tuesday, 8 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, [that is,] the Day of Tarwiyah,[223] the day on which Muslim b. 'Aqīl had made his rising.

222. It was actually a Sunday.

223. The Day of Tarwiyah was a day on which the pilgrims received provisions of water before going to Minā. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj.

According to Hārūn b. Muslim[224]—'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ—'Īsā b. Yazīd: Al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal came out in rebellion with Muslim. Al-Mukhtār carried a green standard, and 'Abdallāh carried a red standard. The latter was also wearing red clothes. Al-Mukhtār brought his standard and fixed it at 'Amr b. Ḥurayth's door. He declared, "I only came out to strengthen 'Amr."

Ibn al-Ash'ath, al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr and Shabath b. Rib'ī had fought a fierce battle against Muslim and his followers on the evening when Muslim had come against Ibn Ziyād's palace. Shabath b. Rib'ī had said, "Wait until night falls for them. Then they will disperse." Al-Qa'qā' had replied, "You have blocked the way of the people. Let room be made for them to escape."

'Ubaydallāh ordered al-Mukhtār and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith to be searched for. He assigned a reward for their arrest, brought them to him and had them imprisoned.

In this year al-Ḥusayn set out from Mecca to go to al-Kūfah.

Al-Ḥusayn's Departure from Mecca for al-Kūfah

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī:[225] When the letters of the Iraqīs reached al-Ḥusayn and he had made preparations to go to Iraq, I went and visited him while he was in Mecca. After I had praised and glorified God, I told him, "Cousin, I have come to you because of something important that I want to tell you as advice, that is, if you would consider receiving advice from me. If not, then you should refrain from listening to what I want to say." He said, "Speak. By God! I do not think that you have bad judgment, nor are you fond of evil in any matter or action." I said to him, "I have learnt that you are intending to go to Iraq. I am anxious about your going. You would be arriving in a country where there are Yazīd's tax [273]

224. 'Umar b. Shabbah has been omitted. He was Ṭabarī's authority for a report with this isnād previously. See p. 35, above.

225. Apart from reporting some of these events at which he was present, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī was from Quraysh and a close adviser of Ibn al-Zubayr; he later acted on his behalf in matters related to al-Mukhtār. See Ṭabarī, II, 687.

collectors and leaders. They have control of the treasuries. The population are slaves to the dirham and the dīnār. I could not be sure that those who have promised you their help would not fight against you, and that those who have greater love for you [than him] would be among those who will fight against you on his behalf." He replied, "May God give you a good reward, cousin. By God! I know that you have brought good advice and you have spoken reasonably. Whatever is destined will happen whether I take your advice or ignore it. In my view, you are a most praiseworthy counselor and a sincere adviser."

I left him and went to al-Ḥārith b. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām.[226] He asked me if I had met al-Ḥusayn. I told him that I had. He questioned me about what he had said to me, and what I had said to him. I told him that I had said such-and-such to him, and he had said such-and-such to me. He said, "By the Lord of gray and white stone of al-Marwah![227] You have given him good advice. By the Lord of the Sacred House! The sound view is what you have put forward, [whether he accepts] it or leaves it." Then he recited:

Many a person from whom advice is sought lies and causes destruction.
Many a person who is suspected turns out to be a good adviser.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b al-Wālibī[228]—'Uqbah b. Sim'ān: When Ḥusayn decided to go to al-Kūfah 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās came to him and said, "Cousin, people are spreading reports that you are going to Iraq. Expain to me what you are doing." He replied, "I have decided to set out on one of the next two days, God, the Exalted, willing." Ibn 'Abbās said, "I ask God to protect you from that. Tell me, may God have mercy on

226. Although not mentioned again, al-Ḥārith b. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām appears to have been an influential person. His father had been a governor for Mu'āwiyah over Mecca. See Ṭabarī, II, 67.

227. Al-Marwah is a hill in Mecca that with another hill, al-Ṣafā, is associated with the rites of the pilgimage. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 513.

228. Al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b al-Wālibī is an unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 206. For 'Uqbah the text erroneously gives 'Utbah; see Addenda et Emendanda, DCLIII.

you. Are you going to a people who have killed their governor, [274] taken control of their land, and driven out their enemy? If they have done that, then go to them. But if they have only asked you to come to them while their governor is in control of them, and his tax collectors are still taxing their land, then they are only asking you to come to war and fighting. I cannot be sure that they are not tempting you and that they will not oppose and desert you. Indeed, they may gather to make war on you. They may become the most violent of people against you." Ḥusayn answered, "I will leave the choice to God and see what happens." Ibn 'Abbas left him.

Then Ibn al-Zubayr came and talked to him for a time. He said, "I don't know why we have left things to these people and stood idly by. We are the sons of the Muhājirūn (emigrants) and should be the ones in control of this government rather than they. Tell me what you are intending to do." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "By God! I have reflected about going to al-Kūfah. My Shī'ah there and the nobles of these people have written to me. I am leaving the choice to God." Ibn al-Zubayr said, "If I had the same sort of followers as you there, I would not seek any alternative other than them." Then he feared that al-Ḥusayn might suspect his motive so he added, "However, if you remain in the Ḥijāz, you could pursue this matter here without meeting any opposition, God willing." He rose and left him, and al-Ḥusayn said, "Nothing in the world would please him more than my leaving the Ḥijāz for Iraq. He realizes that he has no share in this matter while I am present, for the people will never consider him equal to me. Therefore, he would love me to go away from here so that he can have a free hand."

That evening—or the next day—al-Ḥusayn went to Ibn 'Abbās, and the latter said, "Cousin, I invoke patience, but I do not have it. I fear your destruction and extirpation in this enterprise. The Iraqīs are a treacherous people. So don't go near them. Remain in this land, for you are the leader of the people of the Ḥijāz. If the Iraqīs want you as they claim, write to them that they should drive out their enemies, and then you will come to them. If you [275] insist on leaving, then go to Yemen. There, there are fortresses and gorges. It is a vast distant land. Your father had a Shī'ah there, and you would be remote from the people. Then you could write to the people, send messengers to infiltrate, and urge the people to support you. I hope that in that way what you want would come to you easily." Al-Ḥusayn answered, "Cousin, I know that you are an adviser who is anxious for me. Howéver, I have reached my decision and I am determined to set out." Ibn 'Abbās pleaded, "Then if you are going, do not go with your womenfolk and your children. For I fear that you will be killed just as 'Uthmān was killed, while his womenfolk and children were watching." Then Ibn 'Abbās went on to say, "You would thrill Ibn al-Zubayr by your leaving him alone in the Ḥijāz, and by your departure from it. For now no one pays attention to him, as you are here. But by God other than Whom there is no deity! I would catch hold of your hair and your forelock until the people had gathered around you and me if I thought it would make you obey me."

Ibn 'Abbās left him and he passed 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr; he said to him, "May you be happy, Ibn al-Zubayr." Then he recited:

O what [a fortunate] lark in a flourishing country!
Now the sky is free for you, so lay eggs and hatch them,
And tap with your beak as you like.[229]

[And he explained:] "This Ḥusayn is going to Iraq, so you can take care of the Ḥijāz."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb Yaḥyā b. Abī Ḥayyah—'Adī b. Ḥarmalah al-Asadī,[230]—'Abdallāh b. Sulaym[231] and al-Madhrī b. al-Mushma'ill, both of the tribe of Asad: We went from al-Kūfah as pilgrims until we came to Mecca. We entered it on the Day of Tarwiyah. We were standing near al-Ḥusayn and 'Abd-[276] allāh b. al-Zubayr in the middle of the morning somewhere between the Ḥijr[232] and the door of the Sacred House. As we

229. For this verse see Ahlwardt, The Divans, 185. It is also given by Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 163.

230. Apart from his reports recorded by Abū Mikhnaf of this event, 'Adī b. Ḥarmalah al-Asadī was otherwise unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 223.

231. 'Abdallāh b. Sulaym and his colleague from the tribe of Asad were important eyewitnesses and participants in the following narrative. Both accompanied al-Ḥusayn until very near the end. Then they made separate escapes.

232. The Ḥijr was the burial spot of Ishmael and Hagar by the Ka'bah. See *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba.

approached them, we heard Ibn al-Zubayr saying to al-Ḥusayn, "If you wish to stay, you could stay and take control of this affair. We will assist, aid you and give advice. We will give the oath of allegiance to you." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "My father told me, 'There will be in Mecca a ram (i.e., a leader) who will cause its sanctity to be violated,' and I do not want to be that kind of ram." Ibn al-Zubayr said, "Then stay here if you wish, and give me authority in this affair. You would be obeyed and not disobeyed." Al-Ḥusayn said, "I do not want to do that either." Then they lowered their conversation so that we could not hear, but they still continued to talk together.

Then we heard the call of the people who were going to Minā at midday. After that al-Ḥusayn performed the circumambulation of the Sacred House, and ran between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah.[233] He had his hair trimmed[234] and left the state of consecration for the 'umrah. He set off for al-Kūfah, but we went toward the people at Minā.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Sa'īd 'Aqīṣā[235]—one of his colleagues: I heard al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, while he was standing with 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr in Mecca. Ibn al-Zubayr said to him, "Listen to me, son of Fāṭimah." I tried to listen, but he whispered to him. But then al-Ḥusayn turned to us and asked, "Do you know what Ibn al-Zubayr was saying to me?" We answered, "We do not know. May God sacrifice us for you." He said, "He told me, 'Stand up in this mosque, and I shall gather the people around you.' By God! I would prefer to be killed a few inches (shibr) outside the sanctuary of Mecca than to be killed a few inches within it. I swear by God, even if I were in a deep snake's hole, they would pull me out in order to carry out their will. By God! They would violate me just as the Jews violated the Sabbath."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b al-Wālibī—'Uqbah b. Sim'ān: When al-Ḥusayn left Mecca, the messengers [277]

233. The ritual running (sa'y) between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah was part of the rites of the lesser pilgrimage ('umrah). See EI[1], s.v. 'Umra.

234. The cutting of hair took place when the pilgrim wanted to leave the state of consecration. While in the state of consecration, he was forbidden to cut his hair or nails. See EI[2], s.v. Iḥrām.

235. Abū Sa'īd 'Aqīṣā's name was Dīnār. He was a traditionist and a Kūfan Shī'ite. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 200.

of 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ met him. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd[236] was in charge of them. They ordered him to come back from where he was going. But he refused them and continued his journey. The two groups came to blows and hit one another with whips. However, al-Ḥusayn and his followers resisted fiercely. Al-Ḥusayn continued with his journey. They called to him, "Ḥusayn, do you not fear God, lest you leave this unified people (jamā'ah) and split this community (ummah)?" In answer al-Ḥusayn recited: "My deeds are mine, and your deeds are yours. You are not accountable for my actions, nor am I accountable for yours."[237]

Al-Ḥusayn continued until he had passed al-Tan'īm.[238] There he met a camel train that had come from Yemen. Baḥīr b. Raysān al-Ḥimyarī[239]—who was Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah's governor of Yemen—had sent it to Yazīd. The camel train was carrying turmeric and cloth to Yazīd. Al-Ḥusayn took possession of the goods and carried them off. He said to the camel owners, "I will not force you, but whoever wants to come with us to Iraq, we will pay his hire and enjoy his company. Whoever wants to leave us at any place that we are in, we will pay his hire for the distance he has traveled." Those of them who left had their accounts settled and were paid their due. However, al-Ḥusayn paid the hire of those of them who went with him and gave them clothes.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb—'Adī b. Ḥarmalah—'Abdallāh b. Sulaym and al-Madhrī: When we came to al-Ṣifāḥ[240] we met al-Farazdaq b. Ghālib,[241] the poet. He was standing in front of al-Ḥusayn and saying to him, "May God grant you your request and fulfill your hope in what you want." Al-Ḥusayn asked him, "Tell us the news of the people you have left behind you."

---

236. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd was a brother of 'Amr b. Sa'īd, who later became involved in his brother's attempt to gain power; he was pardoned by 'Abd al-Malik. See Ṭabarī II, 789–804, 814.

237. Qur'ān, 10:41 (42).

238. Al-Tan'īm was the station outside Mecca where the Meccans went in order to enter into a state of consecration for the 'umrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 879.

239. There seems to be no further information on Baḥīr b. Raysān al-Ḥimyarī.

240. Al-Ṣifaḥ was a place to the northeast of Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 398.

241. Al-Farazdaq b. Ghālib was the famous Arab poet whose name was Hammām b. Ghālib; he died in 110 (728) or 112 (730). See *EI*², s.v. al-Farazdaḳ.

Al-Farazdaq answered, "You have asked one who knows. The hearts of the people are with you, but their swords are with the Banū Umayyah. The decision will come from heaven, and God will do what He wishes." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "True. The decision is God's, and God will do what He wishes. 'Every day our Lord [278] exercises power in [every] matter.'[242] If fate sends down what we like, we praise God for His blessings. He is the One from Whom help should be sought in order to give thanks to Him. However, although fate may frustrate their hopes, those whose intention is the truth and whose hearts are pious are not aggressors." Then al-Ḥusayn moved his mount off, saying farewell. And so the two parted.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam—Labaṭah b. al-Farazdaq b. Ghālib[243]—his father: I made the pilgrimage with my mother. I was driving her camel when I entered the sanctuary during the days of the pilgrimage. That was in the year 60 (680). I met al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī leaving Mecca [accompanied by his men] with swords and shields. I asked whose caravan it was, and I was told that it was al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī's. So I went up to him and said, "May my mother and father be your sacrifice! Son of the Apostle of God, what is making you hurry away from the pilgrimage?" He replied, "If I did not hurry away, I would be apprehended." Then he asked me who I was. I told him that I was a man from Iraq. By God! He did not question me any further about that but was satisfied with that answer. He said, "Tell me about the people you have left behind you?" I answered, "Their hearts are with you, but their swords are with the Banū Umayyah. The decision is in the hand of God." He replied that that was true. Then I asked him about matters concerning vows and pilgrimage rites. He told me about them. His voice was thick with the pleurisy that he had contracted in Iraq.[244]

I went on, and there was a large well-equipped tent pitched in the sanctuary. I went to it, and there was 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b.

242. Almost identical to Qur'ān, 55:29.

243. Labaṭah b. al-Farazdaq b. Ghālib was the son of the poet. The evidence for the validity of the first report rather than this one was the verses by al-Farazdaq concerning their meeting at al-Ṣifāḥ, which are cited by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 398.

244. This observation must refer to al-Farazdaq.

al-ʿĀṣ.[245] He questioned me and I told him about meeting al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī. He said to me, "Woe on you! Why don't you follow him? By God! He will be victorious, and no weapon will affect him or his followers." By God! Then I was anxious to follow him, and his words went deep into my heart. But I remembered the prophets and how they were killed. That stopped me from [279] following them. So I went to my people at ʿUsfān.[246] By God! I was with them when a camel train that had brought provisions from al-Kūfah approached. When I heard them, I went out after them until, after shouting at them and being unable to overtake them, I shouted to them, "What happened to al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī?" They said that he had been killed. Then I went back cursing ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ. The people at that time had all been like him, mentioning that "thing" and waiting for its fulfillment both day and night. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr had been saying, "Neither tree nor palm nor child will grow before it is announced" [i.e., the victory of al-Ḥusayn]. I said to him, "What stops you from selling the Waḥṭ?" He replied, "God curse so-and-so—meaning Muʿāwiyah—and you." I answered, "No, rather God curse you." He increased his cursing of me, and none of his coterie were around him, so I was spared their evil. I left without his recognizing me. The Waḥṭ was a grove belonging to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr in al-Ṭāʾif. Muʿāwiyah had negotiated a deal with ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr for it and had given him a lot of money for the grove. But then ʿAbdallāh had refused to sell it for anything.

[Earlier] al-Ḥusayn had pressed on swiftly and directly until he stopped at Dhāt ʿIrq.[247]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb al-Wālibī—ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib:[248] When we left Mecca, ʿAbd-

245. ʿAbdallāh was the son of ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, the conqueror of Egypt and the ally of Muʿāwiyah. He had a reputation for learning and knowing the future; he had acquired this knowledge in Egypt. See text below, p. ooo.

246. ʿUsfān was a village with palm groves and arable land about thirty-six miles from Mecca. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 673.

247. Dhāt ʿIrq is the road from Mecca to Iraq in a pass through the mountain of ʿIrq; it overlooks the northeast valley of Baṭn al-Rummah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 651.

248. Alī b. al-Ḥusayn is the younger of the two sons of al-Ḥusayn with this name. He survived the Battle of Karbalāʾ because he was too ill to fight. He is regarded as the fourth Imām of the Shīʿah. See al-Mufīd, Irshād [trans.], 380–92 and EI[1], s.v. Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn.

allāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib[249] sent a letter to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī with his two sons, 'Awn and Muḥammad:[250] "I ask you by God to return when you read my letter, for I am very concerned that the direction in which you are heading will have within it your destruction and the extirpation of your house. If you are destroyed today, the light of the earth will be extinguished, for you are the standard of those who are rightly guided and the hope of the believers. Do not hurry on your journey, as I am following this letter. Peace be with you."

'Abdallāh b. Ja'far went to 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and spoke to [280] him, saying, "Write a letter to al-Ḥusayn in which you offer him a guarantee of safe-conduct. Promise to favor him with kindness and generosity. Show trust to him in your letter. Ask him to return, and perhaps he will be reassured by that."

'Amr b. Sa'īd told him to write what he wished and then to bring it to him so that he could put the seal on it. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far wrote the letter and took it to 'Amr b. Sa'īd. He said to him, "Seal it and send it with your brother, Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd. It is more likely that al-Ḥusayn's mind will be reassured by him and that he will realize that it is a serious endeavor on your part." He did that. 'Amr b. Sa'īd was Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah's governor of Mecca.

Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd and 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far went after al-Ḥusayn. They both left him after Yaḥyā had read him the letter. Later they reported that they had read him the letter and that they strove to persuade him. One of the excuses that he made to them was that he had seen a vision in which he had seen the Apostle of God, who confirmed that he had been ordered to do what he was doing, whether it went against him or in his favor. They asked him what that vision was. He answered that he had not told anyone of it and he would not tell anyone of it until he met his Lord.

The letter of 'Amr b. Sa'īd to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was [as follows]: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from 'Amr b. Sa'īd to 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī...I ask God to make you turn aside from what will cause your death and to lead you to what will bring you guidance. I learnt that your destination is Iraq. I seek refuge for you in God from dissension, for I fear that your destruction is imminent. I have sent 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far and Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd to you. Come to me with them. You will have a guarantee of safe-conduct from me, kindness, generosity and good-neighborly protection. God is my witness, guarantor, supervisor and trusted authority of that. Peace be with you."

249. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib was a cousin of al-Ḥusayn and son of 'Alī's brother Ja'far.

250. Both 'Awn and Muḥammad went on to die with al-Ḥusayn. See p. 152, below.

[281] Al-Ḥusayn wrote to him: "...One who calls [men] to God, the Mighty and Exalted, and to righteous actions and confesses that he is one of the Muslims does not rebel against God and His Apostle. You have invited me [to accept] a guarantee of safe-conduct, kindness and generosity. The best guarantee of safe-conduct is God's. God will never give safe-conduct on the Day of Resurrection to those who did not fear Him in this world. We ask God fearfully while in this world that His guarantee of safe-conduct be given to us on the Day of Resurrection. If you intend kindness and generosity toward me by your letter, then may you be well rewarded in this world and the next. Peace be with you."

Continuation of 'Ammār al-Duhnī's Account from Abū Ja'far

According to Zakariyyā' b. Yaḥyā al-Ḍarīr—Aḥmad b. Janāb al-Maṣṣīṣī—Khālid b. Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī: 'Ammār al-Duhnī reported that he asked Abū Ja'far to tell him about the killing of al-Ḥusayn so that he might think that he was present at it. Abū Ja'far reported: Ḥusayn b. 'Alī set out because of Muslim b. 'Aqīl's letter that had been sent to him. When he was three miles from al-Qādisiyyah,[251] al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī[252] met him. He asked him where he was going, and al-Ḥusayn said that he was going to that town. He told him to go back, for he had not left behind him anyone who desired good for him. Al-Ḥusayn had intended to return, but the brothers of Muslim b. 'Aqīl were with 251. Al-Qādisiyyah was a town nineteen miles away from al-Kūfah. This was where the Muslims defeated the Persians in 16 (637). See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳādisīya.

252. Al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī was a leading tribesman in the tribe of Tamīm in al-Kūfah; he was in no way involved with the attempts to send for al-Ḥusayn. Later he joined al-Ḥusayn and died with him. See pp. 140–45, below.

him and they declared, "By God! We will not return until we take our vengeance or are killed." He replied, "There would be no good in life without you."

Al-Ḥusayn continued, and the vanguard of 'Ubaydallāh's cavalry met him. When he saw them, he turned aside toward Karbalā'.[253] He positioned himself with his rear against the reeds and grass so that he would only have to fight from one direction. Then he stopped and put up his tents. His followers were forty-five horsemen and a hundred foot soldiers.

In the meantime 'Ubaydallāh had appointed 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ as governor of al-Rayy[254] and he had given him his authority of appointment. He demanded that he give him satisfaction against al-Ḥusayn. 'Umar begged to be excused from that position, but 'Ubaydallāh refused to excuse him. So 'Umar asked him to let him consider it during the night. He granted him the delay, and 'Umar considered his position. By the morning, he was willing to carry out what he had been ordered to do. 'Umar b. Sa'd had set out toward al-Ḥusayn. When he reached al-Ḥusayn, the latter said to him, "Choose one of three possibilities: Let me go back to where I came from; let me go to Yazīd; or let me go and join one of the frontier posts." 'Umar accepted that, but 'Ubaydallāh wrote to him: "No, there will be no kindness until he has submitted to me personally." Al-Ḥusayn said, "No, by God! That will never be." [282]

Then 'Umar fought against him. All al-Ḥusayn's followers were killed, among whom were more than ten young men from his family. An arrow came and struck his [baby] son while he had him in his lap. He began to wipe the blood from him, saying, "O God! Judge between us and a people who asked us [to come] so that they might help us and then killed us." He called for a striped cloak (ḥibarah), tore it and then put it on. He took out his sword and fought until he was killed. A man of the tribe of Madhḥij killed him and cut off his head. He took it to 'Ubaydallāh and said:

---

253. Karbalā' is on the south bank of the Euphrates due north of al-Kūfah. This is where the battle against al-Ḥusayn took place. It is still a shrine for the Shī'ah. See EI[2], Karbalā'.

254. Al-Rayy was a city in northern Iran; it was located five miles southeast of modern Tehran. See EI[1], s.v. al-Rayy.

Fill my saddlebag with silver and gold,
For I have killed the well-guarded king.
I have killed the man of noblest parents,
And when people trace descent his is the best.[255]

He sent him to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah and with him he sent the head. He put his head in front of him. With him was Abū Barzah al-Aslamī.[256] Yazīd began to poke the mouth with a cane, as he recited:

[Swords] split the skulls of men who are dear to us, but they were more disobedient and oppressive.[257]

[283] Abū Barzah cried out to him. "Take your cane away. By God! How often have I seen the Apostle of God kiss that mouth!"

'Umar b. Sa'd had sent al-Ḥusayn's womenfolk and family to 'Ubaydallāh. The only male member of the family (ahl al-bayt) of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī who had survived was a young lad who had been sick and had rested with the women. 'Ubaydallāh ordered him to be killed, but Zaynab threw herself on him and said, "By God! He will not be killed until you kill me." 'Ubaydallāh had pity on her and refrained from killing the young lad. He equipped them for a journey and had them taken to Yazīd.

When they came to Yazīd, he gathered together the Syrians who used to attend on him. When the Syrians came to him and congratulated him on the victory, one of them, who was blue-eyed with a fair complexion (aḥmar), said, as he looked at one of their young women, "Commander of the Faithful, give that one to me." Zaynab said, "No, by God! There is no such honor possible for you or for him unless he leaves the religion of God." The blue-eyed man repeated his request but Yazīd said to him, "Desist from this."

---

255. These verses are also given in Abū Mikhnaf's account. See p. 162, below. Balādhurī also quotes them. See Ansāb, II/2, 205. In both cases the verses are recited outside 'Umar's tent.

256. Although there are alternatives given, Abū Barzah al-Aslamī's name appears to be 'Abdallāh b. Naḍlah al-Aslamī. He was a Companion of the Prophet. After the Prophet's death, he took part in the wars of expansion. He moved to al-Baṣrah and died in Khurāsān. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/2, 100.

257. The verse is also cited by Abū Mikhnaf and Balādhurī. See pp. 170, 174, 176, below; and Ansāb, II/2, 213.

Then he took them into his own family. He equipped them for a journey and had them taken to Medina. When they arrived there a woman from the Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib came out to meet them untying her hair and putting her cap on her head. She was weeping and reciting:

What would you say if the Prophet asked you:
What have you, the last of the religious communities,
Done with my offspring and my family after my departure?
Among them are prisoners and among them are those who have been stained with blood.
What reward is this for me after I have given you good advice, that you should repay me with evil to my blood relations?[258]

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr[259]—Abū Rabī'ah[260]—Abū 'Awānah[261]—Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān:[262] We were informed [284] that al-Ḥusayn....

Also according to Muḥammad b. 'Ammār al-Rāzī[263]—Sa'īd b. Sulaymān[264]—'Abbād b. al-'Awwām[265]—Ḥuṣayn (b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān):[266] The Kūfans wrote to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī: "A hundred thousand are with you." He sent Muslim b. 'Aqīl to them. He came to al-Kūfah and stayed in the house of Hāni' b. 'Urwah. The people visited him, and Ibn Ziyād learnt of that.

Al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr has [this additional information] in his account: Ibn Ziyād sent for Hāni', and the latter went to him. Ibn

---

258. The verses are also cited by Abū Mikhnaf and Balādhurī. See p. 178, below; and Ansāb, II/2, 221.

259. Al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr was an authority used by Ṭabarī on rare occasions. He may be the son of the Shī'ite historian Naṣr b. Muzāhim, who died in 212 (827–28).

260. The only time Abū Rabī'ah's name seems to have occurred as a historical authority.

261. Abū 'Awānah was al-Waḍḍāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Yashkurī, a prolific traditionist with a special interest in historical tradition. He died in 175 (791–92) or 176 (792–93). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 116–20.

262. Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was a well-known Kūfan traditionist; he died in 136 (753–54). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 381–83.

263. Muḥammad b. 'Ammār al-Rāzī was a little-known traditionist.

264. Sa'īd b. Sulaymān was a well-known traditionist, who lived in Baghdād; he died in 225 (840). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 43–44.

265. 'Abbād b. al-'Awwām was a well-known traditionist; he died between 183–87 (799–803). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 99–100.

266. Balādhurī quoted the same account with the same isnād from Sa'īd b. Sulaymān with almost identical words. See Ansāb, II/2, 224–27.

Ziyād asked him, "Haven't I honored you? Haven't I favored you? Haven't I done [things] for you?" He agreed, and then Ibn Ziyād asked him, "What is the reward for that?" He replied, "The reward for it is that I give you protection." Ibn Ziyād exclaimed, "You give me protection!" He took a cane that was by him and struck Hāniʾ with it. Then he ordered Hāniʾ to be put in chains and executed.

Muslim b. ʿAqīl learnt of that and he came out with many people. When Ibn Ziyād was informed, he ordered the palace door to be locked, and a herald to call out, "Cavalry of God, ride." But no one answered him so that he suspected that Muslim was among a huge crowd of people.

According to Ḥuṣayn [b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān]—Hilāl b. Yasāf:[267] I met them that night on the road by the mosque of the Anṣār. They had not gone far along any road to the right or to the left without a group of thirty or forty and the like leaving them. When the marketplace was reached—and it was then in the dark of night—they entered the mosque. Ibn Ziyād was told, "We cannot see many. We cannot hear the voices of many." He ordered the awning over the mosque to be removed. Then he ordered the reeds used for the roof to be set on fire. They began to look around and there were nearly fifty. Ibn Ziyād came in and ascended the pulpit. He told the people to separate themselves quarter by quarter. Every tribe went to the head of their quarter. A group [285] of people attacked Muslim's followers. Muslim was severely wounded, and some of his followers were killed. Muslim, himself, got away and reached one of the houses of the tribe of Kindah. Then a man [from Kindah] went to Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, while he was sitting with Ibn Ziyād. He whispered to Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath that Muslim was in the house of so-and-so. Ibn Ziyād asked what the man had said to him, and Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath told him that the man had said that Muslim was in the house of so-and-so. Ibn Ziyād told two men to go and bring the man to him. The two men came in upon Muslim while he was with a woman who had kindled a fire for him. He was washing the blood from himself. They told him to come, as the governor had summoned him. He asked them to give him an undertaking for his safe-conduct; however, they said that they did not have the right to do that. He went with them until they came to Ibn Ziyād, who ordered him to be put in chains. Then he exclaimed, "Be gone, be gone, son of a spinster."

267. Hilāl b. Yasāf was a Kūfan traditionist who lived during the latter half of the first (seventh) century. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 86–87.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr's account, Ibn Ziyād said, "O son of a so-and-so, did you come to take my authority away from me?" Then he ordered him to be executed.

According to al-Ḥuṣayn (b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān)—Hilāl b. Yasāf: Ibn Ziyād ordered that the area between Wāqiṣah[268] toward the road to Syria and toward the road to al-Baṣrah should be occupied, and that they should allow no one to enter and no one to leave.

Al-Ḥusayn had set out without being aware of any of this until he met some of the Bedouin. He asked them about the situation, and they said, "No, by God! We don't know anything except that we cannot get in and get out of al-Kūfah."

Then al-Ḥusayn began to move toward the road to Syria, toward Yazīd. The cavalry intercepted him at Karbalā'. There he stopped and began to appeal to them before God and Islam. 'Umar b. Sa'd, Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan and Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm had been sent against him. Al-Ḥusayn appealed to them before God and Islam to let him go to the Commander of the Faithful. Then he would put his hand in his hand. They said, "No, there is nothing else for you to do but submit to the authority of Ibn Ziyād." Among those who had been sent against him was al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd al-Ḥanẓalī, of the clan of Nahshal, in command of some cavalry. When he heard what al-Ḥusayn was saying, he said to them, "Will you not accept what these men are offering you? By God if a Turk or a Daylamite[269] asked this of you, it would not be lawful for you to refuse it." However, they still refused everything except submission to the authority of Ibn Ziyād. Al-Ḥurr turned the direction [286] of his horse and went over to al-Ḥusayn and his followers. They thought that he was only coming to fight them, but when he came closer, he reversed his shield and greeted them. Later he 268. Wāqiṣah was on the road to Mecca, two stages from Zubālah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 892.

269. Daylam is the highlands of Gīlān in northwest Iran. See *EI*², s.v. Daylam.

attacked the followers of Ibn Ziyād and killed two of them. Then he was killed, may God have mercy on him.

It was mentioned that Zuhayr b. al-Qayn al-Bajalī[270] met al-Ḥusayn after he had been on the pilgrimage. He went forward with him. [In the battle] Ibn Abī Baḥriyyah al-Murādī[271] came out against Zuhayr and two other men, who were 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj and Ma'n al-Sulamī.[272]

According to Ḥuṣayn (b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān), he had seen them both.

According to Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Sa'd b. 'Ubaydah:[273] Old men of the Kūfans were standing on the hill [overlooking the battlefield] weeping and calling out, "O God! Send down Your aid." I said to them, "Enemies of God! Won't you go down and help him?" Then al-Ḥusayn began to speak to those whom Ibn Ziyād had sent against him. I looked toward him. He was wearing a cloak (jubbah) of streaky cloth (burūd). When he had spoken to them, he turned away. One of the Banū Tamīm called 'Umar al-Ṭuhawī[274] shot an arrow at him. I saw the arrow sticking between his shoulders into his cloak. When they had refused him, he went back to his ranks. I looked at them. They were about a hundred men. Among them were five sons of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and sixteen members of Banū Hāshim, a man from Banū Sulaym, who was their ally, another from Banū Kinānah, who was also their ally, and Ibn 'Umar b. Ziyād.[275]

According to Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Sa'd b. 'Ubaydah: We were dipping ourselves in water with 'Umar b. Sa'd, when a man came to him and whispered, "Ibn Ziyād has sent Juwayriyah

---

270. Zuhayr b. al-Qayn al-Bajalī was a supporter of the group who opposed the Hāshimites known as 'Uthmāniyyah; he joined al-Ḥusayn en route and was killed with him. See pp. 144–45, below.

271. Ibn Abī Baḥriyyah al-Murādī seems to be unknown and his name does not occur in Abū Mikhnaf's account. According to Balādhurī, his name was Ibn Abī Ḥurayrah. See Ansāb, II/2, 225.

272. Ma'n al-Sulamī fought for Mu'āwiyah against 'Alī. See Ṭabarī, I, 3277, 3353.

273. Sa'd b. 'Ubaydah was a well-known traditionist, who died between 101 (720) and 105 (724). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 208.

274. 'Umar al-Ṭuhawī is not mentioned in Abū Mikhnaf's account; otherwise he seems to be unknown.

275. Ibn 'Umar b. Ziyād is not mentioned in Abū Mikhnaf's account; otherwise he seems to be unknown.

b. Badr al-Tamīmī[276] to you. He has instructed him to execute you if you do not fight the people." He jumped on his horse and rode back to the camp. There he called for his arms and put them on. On his horse he ordered the people to attack them, and they fought them. [After the battle] the head of al-Ḥusayn was taken to Ibn Ziyād. He put it in front of him and began to poke at it with his cane as he said, "Abū 'Abdallāh's (i.e., al-Ḥusayn's) hair has grown gray."

Al-Ḥusayn's women, daughters and family were brought. The best thing that Ibn Ziyād did was to order them to be put in a house in an isolated place, to grant them a subsistence allowance [287] (rizq) and to order them to be given expenses and clothes.

Two of their servants belonging to 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—or belonging to the son of Ibn Ja'far—escaped. They came to a man from the tribe of Ṭayyi' and sought refuge with him. However, he cut their heads off, took them and put them before Ibn Ziyād. He was about to have him executed, but instead he ordered his house to be destroyed.

According to Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—a mawlā of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān: When the head of al-Ḥusayn was brought to Yazīd and put before him, I saw him weep and he said, "If there had been any kinship between Ibn Ziyād and al-Ḥusayn, he would not have done this."

According to Ḥuṣayn [b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān]: After al-Ḥusayn was killed, it seemed as if the walls for two or three months were smeared with blood from the time of sunrise until the sun rose higher.

According to [Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān]—al-'Alā b. Abī 'Āthah[277]—Ra's al-Jālūt[278]—his father: My father told me that he never passed Karbalā' without making his mount gallop until he had left the place behind. I asked him the reason, and he said, "We used to talk of the son of a prophet who would be killed in 276. Juwayriyah b. Badr al-Tamīmī is not mentioned in Abū Mikhnaf's account; otherwise he seems to be unknown.

---

277. Al-'Alā b. Abī 'Āthah does not seem to occur as a traditionist anywhere else.

278. Literally, Ra's al-Jālūt means "the head of Goliath." Jālūt is of Hebrew origin. See EI[2], s.v. Djālūt. Perhaps this story was associated with some Jewish sect.

that place, and I was afraid that I would be that man. However, after al-Ḥusayn was killed there, we said that he was the one of whom we talked. After that, when I passed that place, I would go without galloping."

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad][279]—Ibn Sa'd[280]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī][281]—Ja'far b. Sulaymān al-Ḍabu'ī:[282] Al-Ḥusayn said, "They will not leave me until they have taken out this heart from within me. When they do that, God will dominate and humiliate them so that they will be more humiliated than a rag used by a slave girl for her menstrual blood." Then he went to Iraq and was killed at Nīnawā[283] on the Day of 'Āshūrā'[284] 61 [October 10, 680].

[288] According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]: Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was killed in the month of Ṣafar in the year A.H. 61 [November, 680]. At that time he was fifty-five.

According to [al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad]—Aflaḥ b. Sa'īd[285]—Ibn Ka'b al-Quraẓī.[286]

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Abū Ma'shar:[287] Al-Ḥusayn was killed on 10 al-Muḥarram [October 10, 680].

Al-Wāqidī said this was the best confirmed report.

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥam-

---

279. Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad was the author of a musnad and a noted scholar; he died in 282 [895–96]. See al-Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 442–43.

280. Ibn Sa'd was the celebrated author of Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt al-kabīr; he died in 230 [845]. See EI[2], s.v. Ibn Sa'd.

281. 'Alī b. Muḥammad was a famous and prolific historian; he died in 231 [845–46]. See EI[2], s.v. al-Madā'inī.

282. Ja'far b. Sulaymān al-Ḍabu'ī was a famous traditionist, who held Shī'ite inclinations; he died in 178 [794]. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 95–98.

283. Nīnawā was a small village near Karbalā'. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 870.

284. The Day of 'Āshūrā' was 10 Muḥarram, a day of fasting in imitation of the Jewish Day of Atonement. See EI[2], s.v. 'Āshūrā'.

285. Aflaḥ b. Sa'īd was a traditionist; he died in 156 [773]. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 327–28.

286. Ibn Ka'b al-Quraẓī was Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī, a respected traditionist; he died between 117–20 [735–38]. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 420–22.

287. Abū Ma'shar was Nājiḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sindī, a traditionist and author of a work on the campaigns of the Prophet (maghāzī), who died in 170 [787]. See EI[2], s.v. Abū Ma'shar.

mad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Aṭā' b. Muslim[288]—the man who informed him—'Āṣim b. Abī al-Najūd[289]—Zirr b. Ḥubaysh:[290] The first head to be raised on wood was the head of al-Ḥusayn. May God be pleased with him and may God bless his soul.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. al-Walīd[291]—an eyewitness: Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī set out from Mecca with his family while Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah was in Medina. News of al-Ḥusayn's departure reached Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah while he was performing his ritual ablution [with water] in a bowl. He wept so that I could hear his tears dropping into the bowl.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī: When 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād had learnt of the journey of al-Ḥusayn from Mecca to al-Kūfah, he sent al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm, the commander of the police to station himself at al-Qādisiyyah, to set the cavalry between the area of al-Qādisiyyah to Khaffān[292] and the area of al-Qādisiyyah to al-Quṭquṭānah[293] and to La'la'.[294] People said, "Al-Ḥusayn is heading for Iraq."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Qays:[295] Al-Ḥusayn went on. When he reached al-Ḥājir[296] from Baṭn al-Rummah,[297] he sent Qays b. Mushir al-Ṣaydāwī to the Kūfans. He sent a letter

---

288. 'Aṭā' b. Muslim was a Kūfan traditionist, who moved to Aleppo and died in 190 (805–6). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 211–12.

289. 'Āṣim b. Abī al-Najūd was a Kūfan traditionist; he died in 127 (744–45) or 128 (745–46). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 38–40.

290. Zirr b. Ḥubaysh was an early traditionist, who heard traditions from a number of leading Companions of the Prophet and died between 81 (700) and 83 (702). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 321–22.

291. Hishām b. al-Walīd was only cited by Abū Mikhnaf for this one report. Otherwise he seems to have had an interest in the lives of the caliphs, for he appears to be an authority for what seems to be a book on the subject by Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī. See Ṭabarī, II, 199, and p. 225, below.

292. Erroneously given as Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr in the text; see Addenda et Emendenda, DLLIV. Khaffān was the high ground above al-Qādisiyyah near al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 356.

293. Al-Quṭquṭānah was near al-Kūfah on the edge of the desert. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 137.

294. La'la' was a halting place between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah.

295. Muḥammad b. Qays was a traditionist, who only seems to have been used by Abū Mikhnaf for two reports about al-Ḥusayn. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 212.

296. Al-Ḥājir was the name of any hollow in a valley; it gathers water. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 182.

297. Baṭn al-Rummah was a valley overlooked by the high grounds of Rummah in the Najd. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 66.

with him: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī to his brothers among the believers and Muslims. Peace be with you. I praise God before you, other than [289] Whom there is no deity...Muslim b. 'Aqīl's letter came to me, informing me of your good attitude, the agreement of your leaders to support us and to seek our rights. I have asked God to make your actions good and reward you with the greatest reward. I set out to you from Mecca on Tuesday, 8 Dhū al-Hijjah, the Day of Tarwiyah (September 9, 680).[298] When my messenger reaches you, be urgent and purposeful in your affairs, for I am coming to you in a few days, God willing. Peace be with you and the mercy and blessings of God."

Muslim had written to al-Ḥusayn seventeen days before he was killed: "...The trusted early messenger does not lie about his own people. The majority (jam') of the Kūfans are with you. Come when you read my letter. Peace be with you." Al-Ḥusayn had set out with the children and women with him without turning aside for anything.

Qays b. Mushir went toward al-Kūfah with the letter. However, when the letter reached al-Qādisiyyah, al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm apprehended Qays b. Mushir and sent him to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād ordered him, "Go up on the palace and curse the liar, the son of a liar." Qays went up and said: "People, this man, al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, the best of God's creatures, the son of Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Apostle, [is nearby]. I am his messenger to you. I left him at al-Ḥājir. Answer him!" Then he cursed 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād and his father, and prayed for forgiveness for 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. 'Ubaydallāh ordered him to be thrown from the top of the palace. They threw him; he was smashed to pieces and killed.

Al-Ḥusayn continued his journey to al-Kūfah until he came to one of the watering places of the Arabs.

'Abdallāh b. Muṭī' al-'Adawī was staying there. When he saw [290] al-Ḥusayn he rose and said to him, "May my father and mother be sacrificed for you! Son of the Apostle of God, what has brought you here?" Then he helped him to dismount. Al-Ḥusayn said, "It is a result of the death of Mu'āwiyah as you would know. The 298. Actually a Sunday.

Iraqis have written to me urging me to come to them." 'Abdallāh b. Muṭī' said, "Son of the Apostle of God, I remind you of God and the sacredness of Islam, lest it be violated. I adjure you before God to be concerned about the veneration of the Apostle of God. I adjure you before God to be concerned about the esteem of the Arabs. By God! If you seek that which is in the hands of Banū Umayyah, they will kill you. If they kill you, they will never fear anyone after you. Then it will be the sacredness of Islam that is violated, and the veneration of Quraysh and the esteem of the Arabs. Don't do it! Don't go to al-Kūfah! do not expose yourself to the Banū Umayyah!" However, he insisted on continuing and went on until he came to the watering place above Zarūd.[299]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Suddī[300]—a man from Banū Fazārah: [al-Suddī] reported: During the time of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf,[301] we were in the house of al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabī'ah, [302] that was in the date sellers' district. This place had been given as a fief to the Banū 'Amr b. Yashkur of Bajīlah after the death of Zuhayr b. al-Qayn. The Syrians did not dare to enter this district. We were hiding there. I said to the man of Fazārah: "Tell me on your own authority. When did you go with al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī?" He reported: We were with Zuhayr b. al-Qayn al-Bajalī when we came from Mecca. We were traveling alongside al-Ḥusayn. However, there was nothing more hateful to us than that we accompanied him at every halting place. When al-Ḥusayn traveled, Zuhayr stayed behind. When al-Ḥusayn halted, Zuhayr would go ahead. One day we halted in a place in which we could not avoid stopping with him. Al-Ḥusayn halted at one side of the road, and we halted at the other side of the road. While we were sitting, eating our food, a messenger of al-Ḥusayn approached, greeted us and entered our camp. He said, "Zuhayr b. al-Qayn, Abū 'Abdallāh al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī has sent me to you to ask you to come to him." [291]

299. Zarūd was a place with very sandy ground on the way from Mecca to al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 927.

300. Al-Suddī's name was Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. He was a traditionist, who died in 128 (745–46). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 313–14.

301. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf was the distinguished governor of Iraq for the Umayyads from 75 (694) to 95 (714). See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj b. Yūsuf.

302. Al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabī'ah was a supporter of Ibn al-Zubayr; he was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah by him and later governor of al-Kūfah. See Ṭabarī, II, 578, 777.

Each man of us threw away what was in his hands in surprise, [and silence prevailed] as if birds had alighted on our heads.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Dalham bt. 'Amr, the wife of Zuhayr b. al-Qayn:[303] I said to him, "Does the son of the Messenger of God send for you, and yet you aren't going to him? Glory be to God! Won't you go to him to hear what he has to say? Then you could leave him."

Zuhayr b. al-Qayn went to him. It was not long before he returned with a cheerful shining face. He ordered his tent to be struck and called for his luggage and equipment. His tent was pulled down and taken to al-Ḥusayn. Then he said to his wife, "You are divorced, go back to your family, for I do not want anything except good to befall you because of me." Then he said to his companions, "Whoever wants to follow me may do so. Otherwise, it is the end of our association. I shall tell you a story [of something that happened to me]: We were raiding Balanjar.[304] God granted us victory, and we won [a lot of] booty. Salmān al-Bāhilī[305] said to us, 'Are you happy with the victory God has granted you and the booty you have gained?' We said, 'Yes.' Then he said, 'Therefore when you meet the young men of the family of Muḥammad be happier to fight for them than you are with the booty that you have obtained today.' Therefore, as for me, I bid you farewell."

Zuhayr remained in the first row of the people with al-Ḥusayn until he was killed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—'Adī b. Ḥarmalah al-Asadī—the two Asadīs, 'Abdallāh b. Sulaym and al-Madhrī b. al-Mushma'ill: When we had finished the pilgrimage, there was no concern more important to us than to join al-Ḥusayn on the road in order that we might see what would happen to him. We went along with our two camels trotting speedily until we joined him at Zarūd. As we approached, there was a man from al-Kūfah who had changed his route when he saw al-Ḥusayn. Al-Ḥusayn had stopped as if he wanted to speak to him, but then he 303. Dalham bt. 'Amr only seems to have reported this incident.

304. Balanjar is a Khazar town in the eastern extremity of the Caucasus. See *EI*², s.v. Balandjar.

305. Salmān al-Bāhilī's name was Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī. He seems to have been an influential tribesman in al-Kūfah.

ignored him and traveled on. We journeyed toward the man. One of us said to the other that we should go to ask this man if he had [292] news of al-Kūfah that we could tell al-Ḥusayn. We came up to him and greeted him. He returned our greeting and asked for God's mercy on us. We asked him from what tribe he came; he answered that he was an Asadī. We said that we were also Asadīs, and then we asked him who he was. He said that he was Bukayr b. al-Math'abah;[306] then we told him our lineage. We also asked him to tell us of the people that he had left behind. He replied that he had only left al-Kūfah after Muslim b. 'Aqīl and Hānī' b. 'Urwah had been killed; he had seen them being dragged by their legs into the marketplace.

We went on to join al-Ḥusayn and we were traveling close behind him until he stopped at al-Tha'labiyyah[307] in the evening. We caught up with him when he stopped; we greeted him. He returned our greeting. We said, "May God have mercy on you, we have news. If you wish, we will tell it to you publicly, or if you wish, secretly." He looked at his followers and said, "Nothing is kept secret from these men." We asked him if he had seen the rider who was coming toward him yesterday evening? He said that he had and that he had wanted to question him. We said, "We have spared you the trouble of getting his news; we have done the asking instead of you. He was a man from our tribe, of sound judgment, honest, with merit and intelligence. He told us that he had only left al-Kūfah after Muslim b. 'Aqīl and Hānī' b. 'Urwah had been killed; he had seen them being dragged by their legs into the marketplace. Al-Ḥusayn said, "'We belong to God and to Him we shall return.'[308] May God have mercy on them both." He repeated that phrase several times. We said, "We adjure you before God, for your own life and for your family (ahl al-bayt) that you do not go from this place, for you have no one to support you in al-Kūfah and no Shī'ah. Indeed, we fear that they will be against you." At that the sons of 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib[309] jumped up.

306. Bukayr b. al-Math'abah does not seem to occur in any other context.

307. Al-Tha'labiyyah was one of the halting places on the way from Mecca to al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 924.

308. Qur'ān, 2:156 (151).

309. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, 'Alī's brother, and the others were close relations of Muslim b. 'Aqīl.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Umar b. Khālid[310]—Zayd b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn[311] and Dāwūd b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: [312] The [293] sons of 'Aqīl declared, "By God! We will not go back until we have taken our vengeance or have tasted the death that our brother tasted."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—'Abdallāh b. Sulaym and al-Madhrī b. al-Mushma'ill, both of Asad: Al-Ḥusayn looked at us and said, "There is no good in life without these men." Then we knew that his decision had been taken to continue the journey. We said, "May God be good to you." He replied, "May God have mercy on you both." Then some of his followers said to him, "By God! You are not the same as Muslim b. 'Aqīl. If you go to al-Kūfah, the people will hasten to support you."

The two men of Asad reported that he waited until daybreak. Then he ordered his attendants and servants to get a lot of water, to give the people to drink and more for the journey. They set out and went on to Zubālah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū 'Alī al-Anṣārī[313]—Bakr b. Muṣ'ab al-Muzanī:[314] Al-Ḥusayn had not encountered people at any watering place without their following him. When he reached Zubālah, news of the death of his brother-in-nurture, the death of 'Abdallāh b. Yuqṭur,[315] came to him. He had despatched him to Muslim b. 'Aqīl along the road without being aware that Muslim had already been struck down. The cavalry of al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm met him at al-Qādisiyyah and sent him to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. 'Ubaydallāh ordered him to go up on the roof of the palace and curse the lying son of a liar. He ascended but, when he looked down on the people, he said, "People, I am the mes-

310. This seems to be the only report from 'Umar b. Khālid; otherwise, he seems to be unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 222.

311. Zayd b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn was a son of 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn; he led a revolt against the Umayyads in which he was killed in 122 (740). See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 161–67.

312. Dāwūd b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh was a grandson of Ibn 'Abbās who died in 133 (750–51). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 222.

313. Apart from this report, Abū 'Alī al-Anṣārī seems to be otherwise unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 189.

314. Apart from this report, Bakr b. Muṣ'ab al-Muzanī seems to be otherwise unknown.

315. 'Abdallāh b. Yuqṭur is only mentioned with regard to this incident.

senger of al-Ḥusayn, son of Fāṭimah, son of the daughter of the Apostle of God. You can help and support him against the son of Marjānah, the [grand]son of Sumayyah, a man who claims a false [grand]father." 'Ubaydallāh ordered him to be thrown from the roof of the palace to the ground. His bones were broken but he still had a spark of life. A man called 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr al-Lakhmī[316] went to him and cut his throat. When he was blamed for that, he said, "I only wanted to relieve his [suffering]."

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh[317]—a man who informed him declared, "By God! It was not 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr who went to him and cut his throat. But the man who went to him was curly-headed and tall like 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr." [294]

That news came to Ḥusayn while he was at Zubālah. He took out a written statement to the people and read it to them: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, dreadful news of the murder of Muslim b. 'Aqīl, Hāni' b. 'Urwah and 'Abdallāh b. Yuqṭur has reached us. Our Shī'ah has deserted us. Those of you who would prefer to leave us may leave freely without guilt." The people began to disperse from him to the right and left. The only followers left with him were those who had come with him from Medina. Al-Ḥusayn had done that because he realized that the Bedouin had only followed him because they thought that he was going to a land where the inhabitants' obedience to him had already been established. He did not want them to accompany him without being aware of what they were undertaking. He knew that when he had explained to them the possibilities, only those would accompany him who wanted to share his fate and die with him. At dawn, he ordered his attendants to provide themselves with water and some extra. Then he set out until he passed Baṭn al-'Aqabah.[318] He stopped there.

316. 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr al-Lakhmī was a well-known traditionist, who was born in 32 (652–53) and lived until 133 (750–51). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 411–13.

317. Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh was a well-known traditionist, who died in 193 (808). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 34–37.

318. Baṭn al-'Aqabah was a halting place on the way from Mecca to al-Kūfah beneath the high mountain of 'Aqabah before coming to Wāqiṣah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 692.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Lawdhān,[319] one of the Banū ʿIkrimah: One of his male relatives asked al-Ḥusayn, "Where are you heading?" He told him; then the man exhorted him, "I implore you before God not to go there. By God! You won't come to anything there except the points of spears and the edges of swords. If those who sent for you were enough to support you in battle and had prepared the ground for you, and you came to them, that would be a wise decision. However, in the light of the situation as it has been described, I do not think that you should go there." He replied, "Servant of God, wise decisions are not hidden from me. Yet the commands of God cannot be resisted." Then he departed from there.

[295] In this year (60/680) Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah dismissed al-Walīd b. ʿUtbah as governor of Mecca and appointed ʿAmr b. Saʿīd. That was in the month of Ramaḍān (June, 680). ʿAmr b. Saʿīd led the people in the pilgrimage. That is according to Aḥmad b. Thābit[320]—someone who mentioned it to him—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā[321]—Abū Maʿshar.

In this year (60/680) ʿAmr b. Saʿīd was Yazīd's governor in both Mecca and Medina after al-Walīd b. ʿUtbah was dismissed. ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād was governor over al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah and their districts (aʿmāl). The qāḍī of al-Kūfah was Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith and the qāḍī of al-Baṣrah was Hishām b. Hubayrah.[322]

---

319. This seems to be the only report from Lawdhān; he seems to be otherwise unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 209.

320. Aḥmād b. Thābit was a traditionist, who was alive in 255 (869). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 21.

321. Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā was a traditionist, who died between 214 (829) and 216 (831). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 245.

322. Hishām b. Hubayrah became qāḍī of al-Baṣrah in 58 (677–78) and remained qāḍī until 75 (694–95). See Ṭabarī, II, 188, 863.

The Events of the Year 61

(October 1, 680–September 19, 681)

Among these events was the murder (maqtal) of al-Ḥusayn. He was killed on 10 al-Muḥarram (October 10) according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone who transmitted reports—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. This is also reported by al-Wāqidī and Hishām b. [Muḥammad] al-Kalbī. We have already mentioned the beginning of the affair of al-Ḥusayn during his journey toward Iraq and the part that took place in 60 (680). We will now give an account of what happened to him in 61 (680) and how his murder took place.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Jānāb—ʿAdī b. Ḥarmalah—ʿAbdallāh b. Sulaym and al-Madhrī b. al-Mushmaʿill, both of Asad: Al-Ḥusayn went on from Baṭn al-ʿAqabah until he stopped at Sharāf.[323] At dawn he ordered his attendants to get water and some extra. They continued going on at a quick pace during the first part of the day until midday when one of his followers exclaimed, "God is greater (Allāhu akbar)." Al-Ḥusayn repeated, "God is greater." Then he asked, "Why did you say God is greater?" The man answered that he had [296] seen palm trees. However, the two men of Asad asserted that that was a place where they had never seen a palm tree before. Al-Ḥusayn asked them what they thought that it was; they answered that they thought it was the necks of the cavalry vanguard. Al-Ḥusayn declared, "By God! I think so too. Isn't there a place where we could take refuge by putting it at our rear in order that we can face these people from one direction?" They replied, "Yes, there is Dhū Ḥusum[324] over on your left. If you reach it before them, it will be just what you want."

323. Sharāf was a watering place in the Najd. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 270.

So he veered left toward Dhū Ḥusum; we went in that direction with him. No sooner had we done this than the necks of the cavalry vanguard appeared in front of us and we could see them clearly. We turned aside. When they saw that we had moved off the road, they moved to the side toward us. Their spears looked like palm branches stripped of their leaves; their standards were like birds' wings. We both made hastily for Dhū Ḥusum; we got there before them. Al-Ḥusayn ordered his tents to be pitched; they were erected. The people came up; there were about one thousand mounted men under the command of al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī al-Yarbū'ī. He and his cavalry stood facing al-Ḥusayn in the heat of midday. Al-Ḥusayn and his followers were all wearing their turbans and swords. He ordered his attendants to provide the people with water, to let them quench their thirst and to give their mounts water to drink little by little. The attendants stood and gave the mounts a little water at a time. But [first] the attendants stood and gave the people water to drink until they had [297] quenched their thirst. Then, they began filling their bowls, basins and cups; they took them to their mounts. When a mount had drunk three, four or five draughts, the water was taken away and given to another mount until they had all been watered.

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—Laqīṭ[325]—'Alī b. al-Ṭa"ān al-Muḥāribī:[326] I was with al-Ḥurr on that day. I was among the last of his followers to arrive. When al-Ḥusayn saw 324. Dhū Ḥusum was a naturally well-fortified place near Karbalā'. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 367.

---

325. This seems to be the only report from Laqīṭ; otherwise he seems to be unknown.

326. 'Alī b. al-Ṭa"ān al-Muḥāribī is only recorded as being present in this place; otherwise, he seems to be unknown.

how thirsty both my horse and I were, he said, "Make your beast (rāwiyah) kneel." To me "rāwiyah" meant waterskin so he said, "Cousin, make your camel (jamal) kneel." I did so. Then he said, "Drink." I did so, but when I drank, water flowed from my waterskin. He told me, "Bend your waterskin," using the word "ikhnith" that means "i'tif" (bend). I did not know how to do that. He came up and bent it. Then I drank and gave my mount to drink.

Al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd had come from al-Qādisiyyah. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād had sent al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm al-Tamīmī,[327] who was in charge of his police, and ordered him to take up position at al-Qādisiyyah, to place lookouts and to control [the area] from al-Qādisiyyah to Khaffān. Al-Ḥurr had been sent in advance from al-Qādisiyyah with one thousand mounted men to meet Ḥusayn.

Al-Ḥurr remained positioned opposite Ḥusayn until the time for the midday prayer drew near. Al-Ḥusayn ordered al-Ḥajjāj b. Masrūq al-Ju'fī[328] to give the call to prayer. When the second call to prayer that begins the prayer (iqāmah)[329] was about to be made, al-Ḥusayn came out dressed in a waistcloth (izār), cloak (ridā')[330] and wearing a pair of sandals. He praised and glorified God. Then he said, "People, it is a true argument (ma'dhirah) both to God, the Mighty and Exalted, and to you that I did not come to you until your letters were brought to me, and your messengers came to me saying, 'Come to us, for we have no imām. God may unite us in the truth through you.' Since this was your view, I have [298] come to you. Therefore, if you give me what you guaranteed in your covenants and sworn testimonies, I will come to your town. If you will not and are averse to my coming, I will leave you for the place from which I came to you."

They were silent before him. Then they said to the muezzin, "Recite the iqāmah." He recited the iqāmah, and al-Ḥusayn asked 327. Erroneously given as Numayr in the text; see Addenda et Emendanda, DCLIV.

328. This seems to be the only time al-Ḥajjāj b. Masrūq al-Ju'fī is mentioned.

329. The iqāmah repeats the same formula as in the call to prayer (adhān), but is regarded as an integral part of the ṣalāt. See Howard, "The Development of the Adhān and the Iqāma in the Ṣalāt in Early Islam," Journal of Semitic Studies, 1981.

330. The izār and the ridā' are traditional clothes for Islamic and pre-Islamic worship by the Arabs. See *EI*², s.v. Iḥrām.

al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd whether he wanted to lead his followers in the prayer. He replied, "No, but you pray and we will pray with you leading the prayer." After al-Ḥusayn had prayed before them, he entered his tent, and his followers gathered around him. Al-Ḥurr went back to his position and entered a tent that had been put up for him. A group of his followers gathered around him while the rest of his followers now returned to their previous positions, each of them holding the reins of his mount and sitting in the shade.

At the time for the afternoon ('aṣr) prayer, al-Ḥusayn ordered his followers to prepare for departure. Then he ordered the call for prayer to be made; the call for the afternoon prayer was made, and the iqāmah was recited. Al-Ḥusayn came forward, stood and prayed. When he had said the final greeting of peace [in the prayer], he turned his face toward al-Ḥurr's men. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "People, if you fear God and recognize the rights of those who have them, God will be more satisfied with you. We are the family (ahl al-bayt) of Muḥammad and as such are more entitled to the authority (wilāyah) of this government (amr) over you than these pretenders who claim what does not belong to them. They have brought tyranny and aggression among you. If you dislike us, or do not know our rights, and if your view has now changed from what came to us in your letters and what your messengers brought, then I will leave you."

Al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd declared, "By God! We know nothing of these letters and messengers that you mention." Al-Ḥusayn told one of his followers, "'Uqbah b. Sim'ān, bring out the two saddlebags [299] in which their letters to me are kept." He brought out two saddlebags that were full of documents; he scattered them in front of them. Al-Ḥurr said, "We are not among those who wrote these letters to you, and we have been ordered that when we meet you we should not leave you until we have brought you to al-Kūfah and to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād." Al-Ḥusayn told him, "Death will come to you before that." He ordered his followers to rise and mount. After they had mounted and waited for their women to be mounted, he ordered his followers to depart.

When they set out to leave, al-Ḥurr's men got in between them and the direction they were traveling. Al-Ḥusayn cried out to al-Ḥurr, "May God deprive your mother of you. What do you want?"

Al-Ḥurr answered, "By God! If any of the Arabs other than you were to say that to me, while he was in the same situation as you, I would not leave him without mentioning his mother's being deprived of him. I would say it whoever he might be. But, by God, there is no way for me to mention your mother except by saying the best things possible." Al-Ḥusayn again asked him what he wanted. He replied that he wanted to go with him to the governor, 'Ubaydallāh. Al-Ḥusayn said, "By God! I will not follow you!" Al-Ḥurr replied, "By God! I will not let you go anywhere else!" These statements were repeated three times. When their conversation was getting more intense, al-Ḥurr said, "I have not been ordered to fight you. I have only been ordered not to leave you until I bring you to al-Kūfah. If you refuse to do that, then take any road that will neither bring you into al-Kūfah nor take you back to Medina, and let that be a compromise between us; I shall write to Ibn Ziyād. You write to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah if you wish to write to him, or to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād if you wish. Perhaps God will cause something to happen that will relieve me [300] from being troubled in any way by your affair. Therefore, take this road here and bear to the left of the road to al-'Udhayb[331] and al-Qādisiyyah." There were thirty-eight miles between al-Qādisiyyah and al-'Udhayb. Al-Ḥusayn set off with his followers and al-Ḥurr marched by him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Uqbah b. Abī al-'Ayzār:[332] Al-Ḥusayn preached to his followers and the followers of al-Ḥurr at al-Bīḍah.[333] After praising and glorifying God, He said: "People, the Apostle of God said: 'When anyone sees the authorities make permissible what God had forbidden, violating God's covenant, and opposing the Sunnah of the Apostle of God by acting against the servants of God sinfully and with hostility, when anyone sees all these incidents and does not upbraid them by deed or by word, it is God's decree to make that person subject to fortune.' Indeed, these authorities have cleaved to obedience to Satan and have abandoned obedience to the Merciful; they have made corruption 331. Al-'Udhayb is a watering place and one of the halting places on the way from Mecca to al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 626.

332. 'Uqbah b. Abī al-'Ayzār was a traditionist, who died during the first half of the first (eighth) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 222.

333. Al-Bīḍah was a watering place between al-'Udhayb and Wāqiṣah.

visible; they have neglected the punishment (ḥudūd) laid down by God; they have appropriated the fay' exclusively to themselves; they have permitted what God has forbidden, and they have forbidden what He has permitted. I have the right to change more than anyone else. Your letters were brought to me, and your messengers came to me with your oath of allegiance that you would not hand me over or desert me. If you fulfill your pledge, you will arrive at true guidance, for I am al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, the son of Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of God. My life is with your lives, my family is with your families. In me you have an ideal model (uswah). However, if you will not act, but you break your covenant and renounce your responsibility for the oath of allegiance that you have given, then, by my life, it is not a thing that is unknown of you. You have done that to my father, my brother and my cousin, Muslim. Anyone who was deceived by you would be gullible. Thus have you mistaken your fortune and lost your destiny. For whoever violates his word only violates his own soul. God will enable me to do without you. Peace be with you and the mercy and blessings of God."

'Uqbah b. Abī al-'Ayzār reported that Ḥusayn stood up to preach at Dhū Ḥusum. After praising and glorifying God, he said, [301] "You see what this matter has come to. Indeed, the world has changed, and it has changed for the worse. Its goodness has retreated, and it regards good as bitter. Or, there remain only the dregs like the dregs in a jar, sordid nourishment like unhealthy fodder. Can you not see that truth is no longer something that men practice and falsehood is no longer desisted from, so that the believer rightly desires to meet God. I can only regard death as martyrdom (shahādah) and life with these oppressors as a tribulation."

Zuhayr b. al-Qayn al-Bajalī stood up amid his comrades and asked whether they would speak or should he. They told him to speak. After praising and glorifying God, he said, "We have heard God guide your words, son of the Apostle of God. By God! If our world can be eternal and we can be immortal within it and, if by helping and supporting you, we must abandon it, then we would still prefer going with you rather than staying in the world." Al-Ḥusayn prayed for him and spoke well of him.

Al-Ḥurr started to travel alongside him, while saying to him, "Ḥusayn, I remind you of God with regard to your life, for I testify that if you fight, you will be fought, and if you are fought, you will be killed." He replied, "Do you think that you can frighten me with death? Could a worse disaster happen to you than killing me? I do not know what to say to you. I can only address you as the brother of al-Aws addressed his cousin when he met the latter as he was going to help the Apostle of God. His cousin said to him: 'Where are you going, for you will be killed?' He replied:

I will depart, for there is no shame in death for a young man whenever he intends right and strives as a Muslim,
And has supported righteous men through [the sacrifice of] his life, [302] abandoned the cursed and made alliance with the consecrated.[334]

When al-Ḥurr heard that, he drew away from him. He and his followers traveled on one side while Ḥusayn traveled on the other, until they reached 'Udhayb al-Hijānāt.[335] There, the dromedaries of al-Nu'mān[336] used to graze. It was there, too, that a group of four[337] approached from al-Kūfah on their camels, driving along a horse of Nāfi' b. Hilāl, called al-Kāmil. They had with them their guide, al-Ṭirimmāḥ b. 'Adī,[338] on his horse. He was reciting:

Camels, do not be frightened by my urging but go forward quickly before the dawn rises,

---

334. These verses are also quoted by Balādhurī. See Ansāb II/2, 171. I have corrected the last hemistich of the second verse, which read yaghushshu wa-yurghimā to wa-ḥālafa muḥrimā, as in Balādhurī.

335. There were two other watering places within the area of al-'Udhayb. One of them to the east of al-'Udhayb was called "'Udhayb al-Hijānāt." The area was particularly good for grazing animals, especially horses and camels. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 626.

336. Balādhurī gives the full name, al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir. See Ansāb, II/2, 171. He was a famous king of the Lakhmids from A.D. 580 to 602. See P. Hittī, History of the Arabs, 84.

337. The other three beside Nāfi' are given by Balādhurī: 'Amr b. Khālid al-Ṣaydāwī, his mawlā Sa'd, and Mujammi' b. 'Abdallāh al-'Ā'idhī of Madhḥij. See Ansāb, II/2, 172. None of them, including Nāfi', has been mentioned before, but they are members of the Shī'ah who managed to get to al-Ḥusayn. They eventually died fighting for him. See pp. 145, 150, below.

338. Al-Ṭirimmāḥ b. 'Adī was a famous Arab poet whose poetry was said to be affected by his having been a townsman. See R. A. Nicholson, Literary History of the Arabs, 138.

With the best riders and the best group so that you may kneel down at the house of a man of high ancestry, A praiseworthy man, a free man, a generous man whom God has sent for the best mission to fulfill.
Then may God cause him to remain for the rest of time.

When they reached al-Ḥusayn, they recited these verses to him. He replied, "By God! I hope that what waits for us will be good whether we die or be victorious."

[303] Al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd approached and said, "These men from al-Kūfah are not among the party that came with you. I will either detain them or send them back." Al-Ḥusayn answered, "I will defend them in the same way as I would defend my own life. They are only my supporters and helpers. You gave me your word that you would not do anything against me until you received a letter from Ibn Ziyād." Al-Ḥurr insisted that they did not come with him, but al-Ḥusayn declared, "They are my followers and they are just like those who came with me. Therefore if you carry out the agreement made between us, [you will let them stay]. Otherwise, I will have to do battle with you." At that al-Ḥurr desisted.

Then al-Ḥusayn said to them, "Tell me the news of the people you have left behind you." Mujammi' b. 'Abdallāh al-'Ā'idhī,[339] who was one of the group of four, said, "There has been much bribery among the nobles, and their coffers have been filled so that their support has been won over and their loyal support [for Ibn Ziyād] has been ensured. Now they are all united against you. As for the rest of the people, their hearts are inclined toward you, but soon their swords will be drawn against you." Al-Ḥusayn asked what they knew of his messenger to them. They asked who he was; he told them that it was Qays b. Mushir al-Ṣaydāwī. They said that al-Ḥusayn b. Tamīm[340] had captured him and sent him to Ibn Ziyād. Ibn Ziyād had ordered him to curse al-Ḥusayn and his father, but he had called for God's blessings on him and his father and cursed Ibn Ziyād and his father. Then he had urged the people to support al-Ḥusayn and told them of his coming. Ibn 339. See footnote 337.

340. Text erroneously gives al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr; see Addenda et Emendanda, DCLV.

Ziyād ordered him to be thrown from the wall of the palace. The eyes of al-Ḥusayn glistened with moisture, and he could not hold back the tears. He said, "'Some [of the faithful] have reached their death and some are waiting and have not changed.'[341] O God! Make paradise an abode for us [who are waiting] and for those who have reached their death. Gather us and them in a dwelling place of Your mercy and of the desirable reward that You have in store." [304]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Jamīl b. Marthad[342] from the Banū Ma'an—al-Ṭirimmāḥ b. 'Adī: Al-Ṭirimmāḥ approached al-Ḥusayn and said, "I have been looking and I haven't seen anyone with you. If it was only these men whom I see traveling alongside you (i.e., al-Ḥurr's men) who would fight you, there would be enough of them to defeat you. But, before coming to you from al-Kūfah yesterday, I saw the outskirts (ẓahr) of al-Kūfah, and there were [more] people gathered together in one place than my eyes have ever seen. I asked about them; I was told that they had gathered to be inspected and that they would march against al-Ḥusayn. I adjure you before God that, if you can desist from moving only a hand's breadth (shibr) against them, you should not move. If you wish to settle in a land where God will protect you so that you can consider your position, and your activities become clear to you, then come so that I can settle you in our impregnable mountains called Aja'.[343] By God! There we were protected from the Banū Ghassān, from Ḥimyar, from al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir and from all types of people. By God! No humiliation has ever come to us. So I will go with you to settle you in al-Qurayyah. There we will send to the men of Tayyi' in Aja' and Salmā.[344] By God! It will not be ten days before the tribe of Ṭayyi' brings you foot soldiers and horsemen. Stay with us for as long as it appears good to you. If anything disturbs you, I can guarantee

341. Qur'ān, 33:23.

342. Jamīl b. Marthad was an unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf's whose only reports are the two presented here concerning al-Ṭirimmāḥ.

343. Aja' was one of the two mountains of the tribe of Ṭayyi', the other being Salmā. There was a two-day journey between the two mountains. Aja' is the western one of the two. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 122.

344. See n. 343, above. Al-Qurayyah is a place between Aja' and Salmā. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 85.

for you twenty thousand Ṭāʾīs who would use their swords on your behalf. By God! No one will ever reach you while an eye still twinkles among them." Al-Ḥusayn said, "May God reward you and your people. But there is an agreement between these people and us as a result of which we cannot leave, and we do not know the final outcome of affairs between these people and us."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Jamīl b. Marthad—al-Ṭirimmāḥ
[305] b. ʿAdī: I bade him farewell and said, "May God protect you from the evil of jinn and men. I have supplies from al-Kūfah for my family and money for them. I will take them and deliver them. Then I will come back to you, God willing. If I arrive in time, by God, I will be one of your supporters." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "If you do, be quick! May God have mercy on you." I knew then, when he asked me to hurry, that he was short of men. When I reached my family, I delivered to them the things that would be useful to them. Then I gave my last instructions. My family began to say, "You are doing something that you have never done before today." I told them what I intended; I set out along the road through the territory of the Banū Thuʿal. When I was near ʿUdhayb al-Hijānāt, I met Samāʿah b. Badn,[345] and he gave me news of al-Ḥusayn's death. So I returned.

According to [Abū Mikhnaf]: Al-Ḥusayn went on to Qaṣr Banī Muqātil.[346] He stopped there, and a large tent had been erected.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Saʿīd—ʿĀmir al-Shaʿbī:[347] Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī asked, "Whose tent is this?" He was told that it belonged to ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr al-Juʿfī.[348] He asked them to ask ʿUbaydallāh to come to him. Someone was sent to him. The messenger went to him and said, "This is al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī; he asks you to come to him." ʿUbaydallāh said, "'We belong to God and to Him we shall return.'[349] By God! I

345. Samāʿah b. Badn is only mentioned at this point in the narrative.

346. Qaṣr Banī Muqātil was a palace of a Christian tribe in pre-Islamic times; it was close to al-Quṭquṭānah; See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 121–22.

347. ʿĀmir b. Shurāḥil al-Shaʿbī, an influential jurist and traditionist, died in 105 (723–24) at the age of 73. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 171–78.

348. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr al-Juʿfī was a noble Arab and poet. Although he did not give al-Ḥusayn any help, he regretted his death. He bitterly opposed al-Mukhtār's revolution, and was also hostile to Ibn al-Zubayr; he attempted to support ʿAbd al-Malik but he was killed. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 290–97.

349. Qurʾān, 2:156 [151].

only left al-Kūfah out of dread that al-Ḥusayn would enter al-Kūfah while I was there. By God! I do not want to see him or him to see me." The messenger returned to al-Ḥusayn. Al-Ḥusayn took his sandals, put them on and went over to 'Ubaydallāh. He greeted him and sat down. Then he asked him to go with him. Ibn al-Ḥurr repeated what he had said before. Al-Ḥusayn replied, "If you are not going to help us, fear God lest you be one of those who fight against us. By God! No one will hear our cry and not help us without being destroyed." He said, "As for that, it will never [306] happen, if God, the Exalted, wishes." Then al-Ḥusayn left him and continued his journey.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—'Uqbah b. Sim'ān: Toward the end of the night, he ordered his attendants to get provisions of water. Then he ordered us to depart. We did. When we had left Qaṣr Banī Muqātil and had gone on for a time, his head began to nod with drowsiness. He woke up, saying "'We belong to God and to Him we shall return.'[350] Praise be to God, Lord of the universe!" He did that twice or three times; then his son, 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn approached him and said to him, "'We belong to God and to Him we shall return.'[351] Praise be to God, Lord of the world. Father! May I be a sacrifice for you. Why are you praising God and repeating the verse of returning to Him?" He replied, "My son, I nodded off, and a horseman appeared to me, riding a horse, and he said: 'Men are traveling and the fates travel toward them.' Then I knew it was our death being announced to us." 'Alī said, "Father, may God not show you any evil. Are we not in the right?" He said, "Indeed, by Him to Whom all servants must return!" 'Alī said, "Then, father, we need have no concern, if we are going to die righteously." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "May God give you the best reward a son can receive from his father."

In the morning, he stopped and prayed the morning prayer. Then he hurried to remount; he began veering to the left with his followers, for his intention was to separate from al-Ḥurr's men. However, al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd came toward him to stop him and his followers. When he began to turn them toward al-Kūfah, they

350. Qur'ān 2:156 [151].
351. Qur'ān 2:156 [151].

strongly resisted him. So al-Ḥurr's men stopped that, but they still accompanied them in the same way until they reached Nīnawā, the place where al-Ḥusayn stopped. Suddenly, there appeared a rider on a fast mount coming from al-Kūfah. He was [307] bearing weapons and carrying a bow on his shoulder. They all stopped and watched him. When he reached them, he greeted al-Ḥurr and his followers but he did not greet al-Ḥusayn and his followers. He handed al-Ḥurr a letter from ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. It said the following: "...When this letter reaches you and my messenger comes to you, make al-Ḥusayn come to a halt. Let him stop in an open place without protection and water. I have ordered my messenger to stay with you and not to leave you until he brings me news of your carrying out my instructions. Peace be with you."

When al-Ḥurr had read the letter, he told Ḥusayn's followers, "This is a letter from the governor, ʿUbaydallāh. He has ordered me to bring you to a halt at an open place. This is his messenger; he has ordered him not to leave me until I carry out his decision and his order."

Yazīd b. Ziyād b. al-Muhāṣir Abū al-Shaʿthā' al-Kindī al-Bahdalī,[352] who was with al-Ḥusayn, looked at the messenger of Ibn Ziyād and recognized him. He asked him, "Are you Mālik b. Nusayr al-Baddī?"[353] The other replied, "Yes." He was a member of the tribe of Kindah. Yazīd b. Ziyād exclamed, "May your mother be deprived of you! What is this business you have brought?" The other man retorted, "What is this that I have brought? I have obeyed my imām and remained faithful to my oath of allegiance." Abū al-Shaʿthā' responded, "You have been disobedient to your Lord and have obeyed your imām in bringing about the destruction of your soul. You have acquired shame and the punishment of Hell-fire. Indeed, God has said: 'We have made them imāms, who summon people to Hell-fire, and on the Day of Resurrection they will not be helped.'[354] Your imām is one of those."

---

352. Yazīd b. Ziyād is not mentioned before this event in any other context; he died fighting for al-Ḥusayn. See pp. 149–50, below.

353. Mālik b. Nusayr al-Baddī was not mentioned before, but he went on to take part in the battle against al-Ḥusayn; he attacked and struck al-Ḥusayn and took his cloak. For his part in the battle, al-Mukhtār ordered his arms and legs to be cut off, and he was left to bleed to death. See pp. 153–54, below; and Ṭabarī, II, 668.

354. Qurʾān, 28:41.

Al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd began to make the people stop in a place that was without water and where there was no village. They said, "Let us stop at this village," meaning Nīnawā, "or that one," meaning al-Ghāḍiriyyah,[355] "or that other one," meaning Shaffayyah.[356] Al-Ḥurr said, "No, by God! I cannot do that, for this man has been sent to me as a spy." Zuhayr b. al-Qayn said, "Son of the Apostle of God, fighting these people now will be easier for us than fighting those who will come against us after them. By [308] my life! After these whom you see now, a number will come against us, and we will not have the power to fight against them." Al-Ḥusayn answered, "I will not begin to fight against them." Zuhayr b. al-Qayn said, "Go with us to that village so that you could stop there. It is well fortified and it is on the bank of the Euphrates. If they try to stop us, we can fight them. Fighting them will be easier than fighting those who will come after them." Al-Ḥusayn asked what village it was; he was told that it was called al-'Aqr[357] (literally "wound"). He said, "O God! I seek refuge with you from al-'Aqr." He stopped at al-'Aqr.

That was Thursday, 2 al-Muḥarram in 61 (October 2, 680).[358] On the next day, 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ came against them from al-Kūfah with four thousand men. The reason for Ibn Sa'd's coming out against al-Ḥusayn was that 'Ubaydallāh had commissioned him with four thousand Kūfans to go with them to Dastabā.[359] The people of al-Daylam had come against Dastabā and overrun this place. So Ibn Ziyād had written 'Umar b. Sa'd a letter of appointment over al-Rayy and ordered him to set out. He had gone out to an encampment with the men at Ḥammām A'yan.[360] When the affair of al-Ḥusayn developed, and the latter had set out for al-Kūfah, Ibn Ziyād recalled 'Umar b. Sa'd. He told him, "Go against al-Ḥusayn and when you have finished our business with him, you can go to your governorate." 'Umar b. Sa'd pleaded, "If you would consider, may God have mercy on

355. Al-Ghāḍiriyyah was a small village to the northeast of Karbalā'.
356. Shaffayyah was a village near Karbalā'.
357. Al-'Aqr was a village near Karbalā'. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 695.
358. Actually a Tuesday.
359. Dastabā was a large district between al-Rayy and Hamadhān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 573.
360. Ḥammām A'yan was close to al-Kūfah; it seems to have been used as a military camp for campaigns to the east. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 329.

you, relieving me, do so." 'Ubaydallāh said, "Yes, if you give us back our letter of appointment." 'Umar b. Sa'd asked him to give him a day's respite to think. When he had said that to him, 'Umar went away; he consulted men who would give him sincere advice. He did not find one who did not advise him to refuse. Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah,[361] who was his sister's son, came to him and said, "Uncle, I adjure you before God not to go against al-Ḥusayn, for you would be committing a crime before your Lord and breaking the bonds of your kinship with him. By God! It is better that you should abandon all your world, the [309] wealth and the earthly authority that you have than that you should meet God with the blood of al-Ḥusayn on your hands." 'Umar b. Sa'd replied, "God willing, I will do that."

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam—'Ammār b. 'Abdallāh b. Yasār al-Juhanī[362]—his father:[363] I went to 'Umar b. Sa'd when he had been ordered to go against al-Ḥusayn. He said to me, "The governor has ordered me to go against al-Ḥusayn and I have refused to do that for him." I said to him, "May God keep you in the right and guide you. Withdraw and do not do it; do not go against al-Ḥusayn." Then I left him. Someone came to me and told me, "This 'Umar b. Sa'd is urging the people against al-Ḥusayn." I went to him, and he was sitting down. When he saw me, he turned his face away. I knew, then, that he had decided to go against al-Ḥusayn. 'Umar b. Sa'd had gone to Ibn Ziyād and said, "May God make the governor prosperous; you appointed me to the governorship. You wrote me a letter of appointment, and the people have heard about it. If you thought it right to send me to this governorship, then act accordingly and send some of the Kūfan nobles with this army, for I am not more suitable to fight for you against him than...." Then he named some people to him. Ibn Ziyād retorted, "Don't teach me about the Kūfan nobles. I am not asking you to tell me about whom I want to send. If you will go with your troops, [well

361. Ḥamzah's father, Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, had been governor of al-Kūfah; he had an influential position.

362. 'Ammār b. 'Abdallāh was only quoted on this one occasion; otherwise he seems to be unknown.

363. 'Abdallāh b. Yasār al-Juhanī, a Kūfan traditionist, was contemporary with the events. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 84–85.

and good]. If not, then return me your letter of appointment." 'Umar b. Sa'd said that he would go when he saw that Ibn Ziyād was insisting. He went with four thousand men and reached al-Ḥusayn the day after al-Ḥusayn had stopped at Nīnawā.

'Umar b. Sa'd wanted to send 'Azrah b. Qays al-Aḥmasī to al-Ḥusayn. He said, "Go to al-Ḥusayn and ask him what brought him; ask him what he wants." 'Azrah was one of those who had written to al-Ḥusayn; he was ashamed to go to him. The same was the case with all the leaders who had written to him; all of them refused and were unwilling. Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sha'bī[364] stood up—he was a brave horseman who was never daunted by anything and said, "I will go to him. By God! If you wish, I will finish him." 'Umar said, "I don't want you to finish him, but go to him and ask him what has brought him here." As Kathīr was approaching him, Abū Thumāmah al-Ṣā'idī saw him and said to al-Ḥusayn, "May God make you prosperous, Abū 'Abdallāh, the wickedest man on earth, the one who has shed the most blood and the boldest of them all in attack is coming toward you." Then Abū Thumāmah stood facing him and said, "Put down your sword." He replied, "No, by God! There is no reason for that, for I am only a messenger. If you will listen to me, I will tell you what I have been sent to ask you. If you refuse, I will go away." Abū Thumāmah said, "I will hold the hilt of your sword, and you can say what you need to." He retorted, "No, by God! You will not touch it." Abū Thumāmah said, "Then tell me what you have brought, and I will inform al-Ḥusayn for you. But I will not let you go near him, for you are a charlatan." They both cursed each other. Kathīr went back to 'Umar b. Sa'd and gave him a report about what occurred. [310]

'Umar summoned Qurrah b. Qays al-Ḥanẓalī[365] and said to him, "Shame upon you Qurrah! Go and meet al-Ḥusayn and ask him what brought him and what he wants." Qurrah began to approach him. When al-Ḥusayn saw him approaching, he asked, "Do you know that man?" Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir replied, "Yes, he is

364. Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sha'bī only seems to have been mentioned at the Battle of Karbalā'.

365. Qurrah b. Qays al-Ḥanẓalī only seems to have been mentioned at the Battle of Karbalā'.

from the Ḥanẓalah clan of Tamīm. He is the son of our sister. I used to know him as a man of sound judgment. I would not have thought that he would be present at this scene." He came and greeted al-Ḥusayn. Then he informed him of 'Umar b. Sa'd's message. Al-Ḥusayn said, "The people of this town of yours wrote to me that I should come. However, if they have now come to dislike me, then I will leave them." Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir said "Shame upon you Qurrah b. Qays! How could you return to those unjust men. Support this man through whose fathers God granted you [311] and us favor." Qurrah replied, "I will return to my leader with the answer to his message and then I will reflect what to do." He went back to 'Umar b. Sa'd and gave him his report. 'Umar said, "I hope that God will spare me from making war on him and fighting against him."

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥabīb b. Zuhayr al-'Absī[366]—Ḥassān b. Fā'id b. Bakr al-'Absī:[367] I testify that the letter of 'Umar came to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād while I was with him. It was as follows: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.... From where I positioned myself near al-Ḥusayn, I sent my messenger to him and asked him what brought him and what he wanted. He answered: 'The people of this land wrote to me and their messengers came to me asking me to come; I have done so. However, since they have come to dislike me and had new ideas other than what their messengers brought to me, I will go away from them.'"

When the letter was read to Ibn Ziyād, he recited:

Now when our claws cling to him, he hopes for escape but now is not the time for escape.[368]

He wrote to 'Umar b. Sa'd: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate...your letter has reached me and I have understood what you have mentioned. Offer al-Ḥusayn the opportunity for him and all his followers to give the oath of al-

366. Al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥabīb b. Zuhayr al-'Absī was an otherwise unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 214.

367. Ḥassān b. Fā'id b. Bakr al-'Absī was a traditionist who reported traditions from 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. He must have lived until the end of the first (seventh) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 215.

368. A similar verse is quoted by Balādhurī. See Ansāb, II/2, 177.

legiance to Yazīd. If he does that, we will then see what our judgment will be." When the answer reached 'Umar b. Sa'd, he said "I was afraid that 'Ubaydallāh would not go easy."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī:[369] There came [another] letter from Ibn Ziyād: "...Prevent al-Ḥusayn and his followers from getting water. Do [312] not let them taste a drop of it just as was done with the pious, chaste and wronged caliph 'Uthmān b. 'Affān." 'Umar b. Sa'd sent 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj with five hundred horsemen to take position along the river and to prevent al-Ḥusayn and his followers from getting a drop of water. That was three days before the battle against al-Ḥusayn.

'Abdallāh b. Ḥuṣayn al-Azdī,[370] who was numbered among Bajīlah, called out to him, "Ḥusayn, don't you see that the water is as hard to get as the middle of heaven! By God! You will not taste a drop of it until you die of thirst." Al-Ḥusayn cried out, "O God! Make him die of thirst and never forgive him."

Ḥumayd b. Muslim reported: By God! Later I visited him when he was ill. By God, other than Whom there is no deity! I saw him drinking water without being able to quench his thirst, and then he vomited. Again he drank water without being able to quench his thirst. This went on until his breath, that is his life, came to an end.

When the thirst of al-Ḥusayn and his followers became severe, al-Ḥusayn summoned his brother al-'Abbās b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib[371] and sent him together with thirty horsemen and twenty foot soldiers. He sent them with twenty waterskins. They went forward to approach the watering place by night. At their head with the standard was Nāfi' b. Hilāl al-Jamalī. 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al- [313] Zubaydī cried out, "Who goes there? What have you come for?" Nāfi'[372] replied, "We have come to drink from this water that you

369. Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī was an eyewitness of the events; he later supported those who demanded vengeance for al-Ḥusayn. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 124.

370. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥuṣayn al-Azdī was not mentioned elsewhere but for this battle and his own death.

371. Al-'Abbās b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was the half-brother of al-Ḥusayn; his mother was Umm al-Banīn. See p. 111, below.

372. Balādhurī supplies Nāfi''s name. See Ansāb, II/2, 181.

are trying to keep from us." He said, "Drink to your health." Nāfi' said, "No, by God! I will not drink a drop of it while Ḥusayn is thirsty and those of his followers whom you can see." Then the rest reached him. 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj said, "There is no way for these men to get water. We have only been stationed in this place to prevent them from getting water." When the rest of his followers reached Nāfi', he ordered the foot soldiers, "Fill your waterskins." The foot soldiers hurried and filled their waterskins. 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj and his followers rose against them. Al-'Abbās b. 'Alī and Nāfi' b. Hilāl attacked them and kept them back. They went to the foot soldiers and told them to go while they remained behind to protect them. 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj and his followers turned toward them, and they charged at each other for a short time. A man from the tribe of Sudda', who was a follower of 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj, was stabbed by Nāfi' b. Ḥilāl. He thought it was nothing, but later complications developed; he died of his wound. The followers of Ḥusayn returned with the waterskins and took them to him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb—Hāni' b. Thubayt al-Ḥaḍramī,[373] who was an eyewitness of the killing of al-Ḥusayn: Al-Ḥusayn sent 'Amr b. Qarazah b. Ka'b al-Anṣārī[374] to 'Umar b. Sa'd [to say] that he wanted to meet him at night between the two camps. 'Umar b. Sa'd came out with about twenty horsemen as did Ḥusayn. When they met, Ḥusayn ordered his followers to go aside and so did 'Umar b. Sa'd. We stayed away from them insofar as we could not hear their voices and their conversation. They talked together for a long time until a [great] part of the night had gone. Then each of them went back to his own camp with his followers. The people made guesses about what had occurred between them. The suggestion that they put forward [314] was that Ḥusayn had said to 'Umar b. Sa'd, "Come with me to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and let us leave the two armies." 'Umar replied, "Then my house will be destroyed." Al-Ḥusayn said, "I will rebuild it for you." 'Umar answered, "Then my estates will be seized." Al-Ḥusayn said, "I will give you better property than that in Ḥijāz." However, 'Umar was still unwilling to go with Ḥusayn. The people talked about this event; it spread among the people without their ever having heard the conversation or knowing anything about what actually was discussed.

373. Hāni' b. Thubayt al-Ḥaḍramī was a participant in the Battle of Karbalā' against al-Ḥusayn but his name does not occur anywhere else.

374. 'Amr b. Qarazah b. Ka'b al-Anṣārī fought and died with al-Ḥusayn, but he is not mentioned elsewhere. See p. 135, below.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd, al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr al-Azdī and others—which is what the majority (jamā'ah) of the transmitters hold: Al-Ḥusayn said, "Choose one of three courses for me: First, that I should return to the place from which I came; second, that I should put my hand in the hand of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and he should make his own judgment about what is between him and me; or, third, that you should send me to any one of the Muslims' border stations you wish, where I can be one of its inhabitants with the same rights and responsibilities."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—'Uqbah b. Sim'ān: I accompanied Ḥusayn [all the time]. I left Medina for Mecca with him, and Mecca for Iraq. I did not leave him until he died. There was no one who addressed a word to him, either in Medina, in Mecca, on the road, in Iraq, or in the camp, until the day of his death, without my hearing the conversation. By God! He neither gave the promise, which the people claim to recall when they allege that he would put his hand in the hand of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah or that they should send him to any one of the Muslims' border stations. Rather he said, "Leave me, and I will travel this broad land so that we may see how the people's affair develops."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd al-Hamdānī and al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr: The two men—Ḥusayn and 'Umar b. Sa'd—met three or four times. Then 'Umar b. Sa'd wrote to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād: "...God has extinguished hatred, brought about unity of opinion, and set right the affairs of the community. This man, al-Ḥusayn, has given me a promise that he will return to his former place; either we can send him to one of the border outposts—he will become like any of the Muslims with the same rights and duties as they—or he will go to Yazīd, the Commander of the Faithful, offer him his hand, and see his view with regard to the differences between them. This will satisfy you, and benefit the community." [315]

When 'Ubaydallāh read the letter, he said, "This is the letter of a sincere man to his governor, one who is anxious for his people. Yes, I accept." However, Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan jumped up and said, "Are you going to accept this from him when he has encamped nearby on your land? By God! If he left your land, without putting his hand in yours, he would be in a position of power and strength and you would be in a position of weakness and impotence. Do not give this concession, for it would be a mark of weakness. Rather let him and his followers submit to your authority. Then if you punish them, you are the one who administers the punishment. You have the right, however, to forgive them. By God! I have been told that Ḥusayn and ʿUmar b. Saʿd have been sitting between the camps talking all the night." Ibn Ziyād said, "What you have suggested is good. Your view is correct."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād summoned Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan and said, "Take this message to ʿUmar b. Saʿd and let him offer al-Ḥusayn and his followers the option of submitting to [316] my authority. If they agree, let him send them to me in peace. If they refuse, he should fight them. If ʿUmar b. Saʿd acts according to my instructions, then heed him and obey him. However, if he refuses to fight them, then you are the commander of the people; attack Ḥusayn, cut his head off and send it to me."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbi: Then ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād wrote to ʿUmar b. Saʿd: "...I did not send you to Ḥusayn to hold off from fighting him, to give him time, to promise him peace and preservation, or to be an intercessor on his behalf with me. Therefore, see that, if Ḥusayn and his followers submit to my authority and surrender, you can send them to me in peace. If they refuse, then march against them to kill and disfigure them, for they deserve that. If Ḥusayn is killed, make the horses trample on his chest and back, for he is a disobedient rebel, an evil man who splits the community. Not that I think he would feel any harm once he is dead, but I have vowed to do this to him if I killed him. If you carry out our order concerning him, we will give you the reward due to one who heeds and obeys. If you refuse, then withdraw from our command and our army. Leave the army to Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan. We have given him our authority. Peace be with you."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah[375]—'Abdallāh b. Sharīk al-'Āmirī:[376] When Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan took hold of the letter, he rose to go with 'Abdallāh b. Abī Muḥill. The latter's paternal aunt was Umm al-Banīn bt. Ḥizām,[377] who had been married to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and who had borne him al-'Abbās, Ja'far and 'Uthmān. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Muḥill b. Ḥizām b. Khālid b. Rabī'ah b. al-Waḥīd b. Ka'b b. 'Āmir b. Kilāb had said to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, "May God make the governor prosperous. The sons of our sister are with al-Ḥusayn. If you would consider it good, write that they be given a guarantee of safe- [317] conduct. Please, do so." He said that he would be happy to do so. He ordered his secretary to write a guarantee of safe-conduct for them. It was sent by 'Abdallāh b. Abī Muḥill with his mawlā, who was called Kuzmān.[378] When the latter approached them, he called to them and said, "Here is a guarantee of safe-conduct that your maternal uncle has sent." The young men replied, "Give our greetings to our uncle and tell him that we have no need of your guarantee of safe-conduct, for God's guarantee of safe-conduct is better than the guarantee of safe-conduct of Ibn Sumayyah."

Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan brought 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād's letter to 'Umar b. Sa'd. After he had brought it and read it, 'Umar said to him, "Shame upon you! What is this to you? May your home never be close! May God make abominable what you have brought to me! By God! I think that you must have personally stopped him from accepting what I had written to him and ruined for us a matter that we had hoped to set right. By God! Ḥusayn will not surrender, for there is a proud spirit in his body." Shamir demanded, "Tell me what you are going to do. Are you going to carry out the governor's command and kill his enemy? Other-

375. Al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah was a traditionist from al-Kūfah. He is said to be a follower of the sixth Imām Ja'far al-Ṣādiq; he died in 148 (765). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 205.

376. 'Abdallāh b. Sharīk al-'Āmirī was Shī'ite traditionist, who became a follower of al-Mukhtār; he died in the first half of the second (eighth) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 205.

377. Umm al-Banīn was a wife of 'Alī. Her three sons went with al-Ḥusayn and were killed at Karbalā'. Her nephew 'Abdallāh b. Abī Muḥill fought for 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād.

378. Kuzmān is not mentioned elsewhere.

wise, leave the command of the army to me." He answered, "No, there will be no advantage to you. I will carry that out instead of you." Shamir told him, "Go ahead, you lead the men."

ʿUmar b. Saʿd prepared to do battle with al-Ḥusayn on the evening of Thursday, 9 al-Muḥarram (October 9).[379] Shamir went out and stood in front of the followers of al-Ḥusayn calling out, "Where are our sister's sons?" Al-ʿAbbās, Jaʿfar and ʿUthmān, sons of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, came forward and demanded, "What is your business? What do you want?" Shamir said, "Sons of my sister, you are given a guarantee of safe-conduct." The young men replied, "God curse you and curse the guarantee of safe-conduct! If you are our uncle, how could you offer us a guarantee of safe-conduct while the son of the Apostle of God has no guarantee of safe-conduct?" ʿUmar b. Saʿd called out, "Cavalry of God, mount [318] with good hope." He rode among the people and he approached [the supporters of al-Ḥusayn] after the afternoon (ʿaṣr) prayer.

Meanwhile, Ḥusayn was sitting in front of his tent leaning on his sword when he nodded off with his head on his knees. His sister Zaynab heard the clamor. She came up to him and said, "My brother, don't you hear the sounds that are getting nearer?" As he raised his head, he said, "I have just seen the Apostle of God in my sleep. He said to me: 'You are coming to us.'" His sister struck at her face and cried out, "O Woe to me!" He told her, "Woe is not for you, sister. Be quiet, may God have mercy on you."

Al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī called out, "Brother, the people have advanced against you." Al-Ḥusayn rose and said, "Al-ʿAbbās, you, brother, [I would give] my soul for you. Ride out yourself to meet them. Talk to them about what their views are and what has changed them.[380] Ask them about what has brought them against us." Al-ʿAbbās went toward them with about twenty horsemen, among whom was Zuhayr b. al-Qayn and Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir. Al-ʿAbbās asked them, "What has changed your view? What are you intending?" They answered, "The command of the governor has arrived that we should offer you the option of submitting to his authority, or we should attack you." Al-'Abbās said, "Do not hurry to do anything until I have gone back to Abū 'Abdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn) and told him what you have said." They stopped where they were and told him, "Go to him and inform him! Bring back what he says."

379. Actually a Tuesday.

380. The Arabic mā badā lakum lit. means "what [different thing] has seemed good to them." The term is used by Shīʿite theologians for God's changing his mind. See EI[2], s.v. Badā'.

Al-'Abbās went galloping back to al-Ḥusayn to give him the information, while his companions stood speaking to the people. Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir said to Zuhayr b. al-Qayn, "If you wish, you speak to the people, or if you wish, I will speak to them." Zuhayr told him, "You began this. So you be the one to speak to them." Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir, then, addressed them, "How wretched will it be in the eyes of God for people who come to Him after having killed the offspring of His Prophet, his progeny, his family (ahl baytihi), and the devoted worshipers among the people of this town, who strive in prayer until the close of night and who men- [319] tion God frequently." 'Azrah b. Qays retorted, "You ascribe as much purity to your soul as you can." Zuhayr called to him, "'Azrah, God is the one Who purified and guided that soul. Fear God, 'Azrah, I am one of those who give you sincere advice. 'Azrah, I adjure you before God not to be one of those who give help to those who have gone astray or kill pure souls." He replied, "Zuhayr, according to us you were not from the Shī'ah of this family (bayt). You used to be a supporter of the party of 'Uthmān." Zuhayr said, "Aren't you presuming from my position that I am one of them? By God! I did not ever write to him; I did not ever send messengers to him; I did not ever promise him my help. However, the road brought us together. When I saw him, I was reminded by him of the Apostle of God and of his position with regard to the Apostle of God. I knew his enemies and your party whom he was going toward. Then, I saw that it was right that I should help him, be in his party, and put my life forward to protect his because of the truth of God and the truth of His Apostle, which you have abandoned."

Al-'Abbās b. 'Alī came galloping back to them. He said, "Fellows, Abū 'Abdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn) asks you to go back this evening so that he can consider the matter. For this is a matter in which no discussion between you and him has taken place. In the morning, we shall meet, God willing. Either we will be satisfied and then we will accept this demand which you are asking for and offering, or we will be unwilling and will reject it." Al-Ḥusayn only intended by this explanation to keep them off him for that evening in order that he might give orders concerning his affairs and advise his family.

When al-'Abbās b. 'Alī had brought them that reply, 'Umar b. Sa'd asked, "What do you think, Shamir?" He replied, "What do you think yourself? You are the general, and the decision is yours." 'Umar said, "I wish that I wasn't." Then he went to the [320] people and asked, "What do you think?" 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj b. Salamah al-Zubaydī exclaimed, "Glory be to God! If they were from al-Daylam and they asked you for this postponement, you would have to grant it to them." Qays b. al-Ash'ath urged, "Yes, give them what they demand. Then, by my life, let morning be the time for you to fight." 'Umar b. Sa'd said, "By God! Even if I knew that they would do that, I would not have postponed the fight tonight."

When al-'Abbās had brought back to Ḥusayn the proposal of 'Umar b. Sa'd, al-Ḥusayn had said, "Go back to them. If you can, delay them until the morning and keep them away from us during this evening. Then, perhaps, we may be able to pray to our Lord during the night, to call upon Him and seek his forgiveness. He knows that I have always loved His prayer, the recitation of His book, making many invocations to Him, and seeking His forgiveness."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah—'Abdallāh b. Sharīk al-'Amirī—'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn: A messenger from 'Umar b. Sa'd came to us. He stood where his voice could be heard and he said, "We will grant you a delay until tomorrow. Then, if you surrender, we will send you to our governor 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād but if you refuse we will not leave you."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim al-Fā'ishī[381]—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī,[382] (Mishraq) being a clan of 381. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim al-Fā'ishī was an unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf's, who cites him several more times in his account of the martyrdom of al-Ḥusayn. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 192.

382. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī was an eyewitness of the events at Karbalā'; he only left al-Ḥusayn at the end. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 192, 200–1; and pp. 148–49, below.

Hamdān, reported: Al-Ḥusayn gathered his followers around him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah—'Abdallāh b. Sharīk al-'Āmirī—'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn and al-Ḍaḥḥak b. 'Abdallāh: Al-Ḥusayn gathered his followers after 'Umar b. Sa'd had withdrawn, which was toward evening.

According to 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn: I went near to hear what he would say to them even though at that time I was sick. I heard my father say to his followers, "I glorify God, the Blessed and Exalted, with the most perfect glorification and I praise Him in happiness [321] and misfortune. O God, I praise You for blessing us with prophethood, teaching us the Qur'ān and making us understand the religion. You have given us ears, eyes, and hearts. You have not made us be among the polytheists. I know of no followers more fitting and more virtuous than my followers, nor of any family (ahl al-bayt) more pious and more caring about family relationships than my family. May God reward you well on my behalf. Indeed, I think that our final day will come tomorrow through these enemies. I have thought about you. All, go away with the absolution from your oath, for there will be no obligation on you from me. This is a night that will give cover to you with its darkness. Use it as a camel to ride away through it."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim al-Fā'ishī, Fā'ish is a clan of Hamdān—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī: Mālik b. al-Naḍr al-Arḥabī[383] and I went up to al-Ḥusayn. We greeted him and then we sat down with him. He returned our greetings and welcomed us. He asked us why we had come to him. We answered, "We have come to you to greet you, to ask God's safety for you, to establish a relationship with you, and to give you news of the people. We tell you that they have determined to fight you, so reconsider your situation." He replied, "God is sufficient for me. How excellent a guardian He is!" So we kept his pledge; we greeted him and we prayed to God for him. But then he asked, "What is stopping you from helping me?" Mālik b. al-Naḍr said, "I have debts and a family." I said, "I also have debts and a family, but if you would give me your permission to go when I do not see any other fighter, I will fight for you as long as it is of benefit to you and protects you." He answered, "You have my permission." And so I stayed with him.

383. Mālik b. al-Nadr al-Arḥabī is not mentioned elsewhere.

At night al-Ḥusayn said, "This night will give cover to you with its darkness. Use it as a camel to ride away through it. Every one of you take the hand of a man from my family. Then scatter in your lands of the Sawād[384] and your towns until God relieves [322] you. The people only want me. If they find me, they will cease searching for anyone else."

His brothers and sons, the sons of his brother and the two sons of 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far said, "Why should we do that? Is it in order to remain alive after you? May God never see us do that." Al-'Abbās b. 'Alī was the first of them to make this declaration. Then they declared this or something like it. Al-Ḥusayn said, "Sons of 'Aqīl, by losing Muslim enough of your family has been killed. So go away as I have permitted you." They replied, "What would the people say? They would say that we deserted our shaykh, our leader, our cousins and the best of uncles; that we had not shot any arrows alongside them; that we had not thrust any spears alongside them; that we had not struck any swords alongside them; and that we do not know what they did. No, by God! We will not do that. Rather we will offer for your safety our lives, property, and families. We will fight with you until we reach your destination. How abominable is life after you!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim [al-Fā'ishī]—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī: Then Muslim b. 'Awsajah al-Asadī arose and spoke, "Could we leave you alone? How should we excuse ourselves before God concerning doing our duty to you? By God! Not before I thrust with my spear until I break it in their chests. Not before I strike them with my sword as long as its hilt is in my hand. I will not leave you. If I have no weapon to fight them with, I will throw stones at them to defend you until I die with you."

Then Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh Ḥanafī[385] said, "By God! We will never leave you until God knows that we have upheld the honor of the

384. The Sawād stretched from the head of the Persian Gulf to Mosul in the north and from the border of the Syrian-Iraqī desert to Ḥulwān in the east. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 46.

385. Text erroneously gives Sa'd b. 'Abdallāh; see Addenda et Emendanda, DCLV.

absent Apostle of God in you. By God! If I knew that I would die, and then be revived, and then burnt alive, and then scattered, and that that would be done to me seventy times, I would never leave you until I met my death in defense of you. So how could I not do it when there can only be one death, which is a great blessing [323] that can never be rejected?"

Zuhayr b. al-Qayn spoke, "By God! I would prefer to be killed and then recalled to life, and then be killed a thousand times in this manner, and that through this death I should protect your life and the lives of these young men of your family."

All his followers spoke in similar vein, one after the other. They said, "By God! We will not leave you. Rather our lives will be sacrificed for you; we will protect you with our necks, our heads and our hands. If we are killed, we will have fulfilled and accomplished what we promised."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b and Abū al-Ḍaḥḥāk[386]—'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī: I was sitting on that evening before the morning in which my father was killed; with me was my aunt, Zaynab, who was nursing me, when my father retired with his followers into his tent. With him was Ḥuwayy,[387] the mawlā of Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī,[388] who was preparing his sword and putting it right. My father recited:

Time, shame on you as a friend!
    At the day's dawning and the sun's setting,
How many a companion or seeker will be a corpse!
    Time will not be satisfied with my substitute.
The matter will rest with the Mighty One, and every living creature will have to journey along the path.[389]

386. Abū al-Ḍaḥḥāk was a traditionist who reported from Abū Hurayrah. He died in 110 (729). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 188.

387. Ḥuwayy was not mentioned elsewhere.

388. Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī was an early Companion of the Prophet, who came to be regarded as an ascetic. The Shī'ah have a very high regard for him. He was exiled to al-Rabadhah by 'Uthmān where he died in 32 (652–53). See *EI*², s.v. Abū Dharr.

389. These verses are also found in Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 185, and al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 230.

He repeated it twice or three times so that I understood it and realized what he meant. Tears choked me, and I pushed them back. I kept silent and knew that tribulation had come upon us. As for my aunt, she heard what I heard, but she is a woman, and weakness and grief are the [qualities] of women; she could not control herself. She jumped up, tearing at her clothes. Unveiled she went to him. She said to him, "I will lose a brother. Would that death had deprived me of life today! My mother Fāṭimah is dead, and my father 'Alī, and my brother al-Ḥasan. O! You are the successor (khalīfah) of those who have passed away and the [324] guardian of those who remain!" Al-Ḥusayn said to her as he looked at her, "O sister! Don't let Satan take away your forbearance." She replied, "By my father and mother, O Abū 'Abdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn)! You have exposed yourself to death. May God accept my life for yours!" Choking back his grief and with his eyes full of tears, he said, "If the sand grouse are left at night, they will sleep."[390] She lamented, "O my grief! Your life will be violently wrenched from you, and that is more wounding to my heart and harsher to my soul." She struck at her face and bent down to her dress and tore it. Then she fell down in a faint. Al-Ḥusayn got up and bathed her face with water. Then he said to her, "Sister, fear God and take comfort in the consolation of God. Know that the people of the earth will die and the inhabitants of heaven will not continue to exist forever, '...for everything will be destroyed except the face of God,'[391] Who created earth by His power, Who sends forth creatures and causes them to return, Who is unique and alone. My father was better than I, my mother was better than I, and my brother was better than I. I and every Muslim have an ideal model in the Apostle of God." By this and the like he tried to console her and he said, "Sister, I swear to you—so keep my oath—that you must not tear your clothes, nor scratch your face, nor cry out with grief and loss when I am destroyed." Then he brought her and made her sit with me. He went out to his followers and ordered them to bring their tents closer together

390. An Arabic proverb meaning that when one is aroused to action, then one must allow this arousal to take effect. The sand grouse got all its water and food for its young at night. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. qṭw.

391. Qur'ān, 28:88.

so that the tent pegs came within the area of each other's tents, and so that if they remained among their tents, the enemy could only approach them from one side.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim [al-Fā'ishī]—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī: When evening came, Ḥusayn and his followers spent the whole night in performing the prayer, in calling on God's forgiveness and in making invocations and humble entreaties. Some of their cavalry kept passing us to keep watch on us. Ḥusayn, himself, recited, "Let not those who disbelieve think that our giving them a delay is better for their souls. [325] We give them a delay only that they might increase their wickedness. They shall have disgraceful torture. God does not leave the believers in the situation you are in until he has made the evil distinct from the good."[392] One of those horsemen, who was keeping watch over us, heard Ḥusayn. He cried out, "By the Lord of the Ka'bah! We are the good, we have been distinguished from you." I recognized him and I asked Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr[393] whether he knew that man. He said that he did not. I told him, "That is Abū Ḥarb al-Sabī'ī 'Abdallāh b. Shahr.[394] He is given to amusement and laughter. Yet he was honest, brave, and ruthless. Sa'īd b. Qays[395] had occasionally imprisoned him for criminal acts." Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr cried out, "O terrible sinner! Would God make you one of the good?" He shouted back, "Who are you?" Burayr said, "I am Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr." He replied, "We belong to God. It grieves me that you are coming to a bad end, Burayr." Burayr retorted, "Are you ready to repent to God for your terrible sins, Abū Ḥarb? By God! We are the good and you are the evil." Burayr added, "I am a witness of that." I [i.e., al-Mishraqī] called out to him, "Woe upon you! Doesn't knowledge help you?" He retorted, "May I offer my soul for you who used to be the drinking com-

392. Qur'ān, 3:178–79 [172–73].

393. This is the first time Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr has been mentioned. From his position among the followers of al-Ḥusayn, he seems to have been a leading member of the Kūfan Shī'ah. He died fighting for al-Ḥusayn. See pp. 132–33 below.

394. 'Abdallāh b. Shahr is not mentioned elsewhere.

395. Sa'īd b. Qays was a leader of Hamdān; formerly he was governor of al-Rayy for 'Uthmān, fought for 'Alī at Ṣiffīn and was one of the witnesses of the arbitration document between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah. See Ṭabarī, I, 2927 and 3337.

panion of Yazīd b. 'Udhrah al-'Anzī[396] of the clan 'Anz b. Wā'il?" He said, "Here he is with me." The other answered, "May God show his disapproval of your views in every circumstance! You are stupid!" Then he withdrew from us. One of those who was in the cavalry guarding us was 'Azrah b. Qays al-Aḥmasī, who was in charge of the cavalry.

After 'Umar b. Sa'd had performed the morning prayer on Saturday—it is also reported that it was Friday[397]—the Day of 'Āshūrā', he came out with the people who were with him.

Al-Ḥusayn mobilized his followers after he had prayed the morning prayer with them. He had with him thirty-two horse-[326] men and forty foot soldiers. He put Zuhayr b. al-Qayn in charge of his right wing and Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir in charge of his left wing; he gave his standard to his brother, al-'Abbās b. 'Alī. They positioned themselves with their tents at their rear. He ordered the firewood and cane that was behind the tents to be set on fire, fearing that his enemies would attack from the rear. Al-Ḥusayn had brought cane and firewood to lower ground behind them, which was like the bed of a stream. For some time during the night, they had dug it and made it like a ditch. Then they threw into the ditch the firewood and cane. They had said, "When they come against us to fight us, we will set fire to it so that we will not be attacked from behind; we can fight the people from one side." They did that and it was of some advantage to them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī[398]—Muḥammad b. Bishr—'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī:[399] When 'Umar b. Sa'd came out with the people, on that day 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr b. Sulaym al-Azdī[400] was in charge of the quarter of the people of Medina; 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sabrah al-Ju'fī[401] was in charge of the quarter of Asad and Madhḥij; Qays b. al-Ash'ath b. Qays was in charge of the quarter of Rabī'ah and Kindah; and al-Ḥurr 396. Yazīd b. 'Udhrah al-'Anzī is not mentioned elsewhere.

397. Actually a Wednesday.

398. Fuḍayl b. Khadīj was a traditionist as well as being an authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 201–2.

399. 'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī is not mentioned elsewhere.

400. 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr b. Sulaym al-Azdī is one of the leaders of Azd; he killed on the frontiers. See Ṭabarī, II, 1429.

401. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sabrah al-Ju'fī is not mentioned elsewhere; however, he is obviously an influential tribal leader.

b. Yazīd al-Riyāḥī was in charge of the quarter of Tamīm and Hamdān. All these men were present at the killing of al-Ḥusayn. However, al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd went over to al-Ḥusayn and was killed with him. 'Umar put 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī in command of his right wing and Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan b. Shuraḥbīl b. al-A'war b. 'Umar b. Mu'āwiyah—he was al-Ḍibāb b. Kilāb—in command of his left wing. He put 'Azrah b. Qays al-Aḥmasī in command of the cavalry and Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Yarbū'ī in command of the foot soldiers. He gave the standard to Dhuwayd, his mawlā.[402]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Amr b. Murrah al-Jamalī[403]—Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥanafī,[404]—servant[405] of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd Rabbih al-Anṣārī:[406] I was with my patron (mawlā) when the people were ready and began to move against al-Ḥusayn. Al-Ḥusayn ordered a tent to be erected and he ordered musk to be dissolved in a big bowl or dish. Then he went into that tent and was anointed with perfume.[407] My patron (mawlā), 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd Rabbih, and Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr al-Hamdānī were shoulder to shoulder at the door of the tent; they both struggled to be the first to use the perfume after him. Burayr began to tease 'Abd al-Raḥmān. He told him to leave him alone as this was not a time for empty words. Burayr replied, "By God! My people know that I have never loved empty words whether as a youth or as a mature man. Yet, by God, I feel happy for what we shall soon meet, for, by God, if all there is between us and the maidens of Paradise (al-ḥūr al-'ayn) is that these people should come against us with their swords, then I want them to come against us with their swords." [327]

When al-Ḥusayn had finished, we went in and anointed ourselves. Al-Ḥusayn mounted his animal and called for a copy of the Qur'ān, which he put in front of him. His followers fought 402. Dhuwayd is not mentioned elsewhere.

403. 'Amr b. Murrah al-Jamalī is not mentioned elsewhere.
404. Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥanafī is not mentioned elsewhere.
405. This servant is not identified.
406. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd Rabbih al-Anṣārī is not mentioned elsewhere.
407. Anointing with perfume is an indication that al-Ḥusayn was preparing for death. Corpses being prepared for burial are often anointed in this manner. See A. S. Tritton "Muslim Funeral Customs," Bulletin of the School of Oriental Studies, 1937–39, 653–61.

fiercely in front of him, and when I saw that the people (i.e., al-Ḥusayn's followers) were being killed, I slipped away and left them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—one of his colleagues—Abū Khālid al-Kāhilī:[408] When the cavalry began to approach al-Ḥusayn, he raised his hands and said, "O God! It is You in Whom I trust amid all grief. You are my hope amid all distress. You are my trust and provision in everything that happens to me, no matter how much the heart may seem to weaken, ingenuity to fail, the friend to desert and the enemy to rejoice. I have received it through You and I complain to You out of my desire for You, You alone. May You dispel it for me and relieve me of it. You are the Master of all grace, the Possessor of all goodness and the Ultimate Resort of all desire."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim (al-Fā'ishī)—
[328] al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Mishraqī: When they began to move toward us and saw the fire burning the firewood and cane, which we had lit so that they could not attack us from behind, one of them came galloping toward us on a horse, which was completely covered with armor. He did not address us until he had gone past our tents. Then he looked toward our tents, but he could not see anything except the fire blazing in the firewood. He began to ride back and he called out at the top of his voice, "Al-Ḥusayn, are you hurrying toward Hell-fire in this world before the Day of Resurrection?" Al-Ḥusayn asked, "Who is that? It is like Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan." They answered, "Yes, may God make you prosperous." He shouted at him, "Son of a goat herdess! You are more worthy to be burnt by that." Muslim b. 'Awsajah said, "May I offer my soul for you, son of the Apostle of God, let me shoot at him. Now it is possible, for an arrow would not miss. He is a sinner and one of the great tyrants." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "Do not shoot at him, for I am unwilling to begin the fighting against them."

Al-Ḥusayn had a horse called Lāḥiq that his son 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn was riding. When the people began to come nearer to him, he called for his mount and mounted. Then he called out at the top of his voice. So loud was the tone of his voice that most of the people heard, "People, listen to my words and do not hurry me so that I may remind you of the duties you have toward me and so that I may give you the reasons for my coming to you. If you accept my reasons, believe my words and give me justice, you will become happier through that, and you will not have any cause against me. If you do not accept my reasons and give me justice of your own accord as individuals, 'Then agree upon your affair and call your associates. Let not your affair be in darkness to you. Then carry it out against me and do not delay any further.'[409] 'Indeed my guardian is God, Who sent down the Book. He takes care of the righteous.'"[410]

408. Abū Khālid al-Kāhilī is not mentioned elsewhere.

When his sisters heard these words of his, they shrieked and wept, and his daughters cried and raised their voices. He sent his [329] brother, al-'Abbās b. 'Alī, and his son, 'Alī, back to them. He told them both, "Quiet them, for, by my life, their weeping will be excessive." When the two had gone back to quiet them, al-Ḥusayn said, "May Ibn 'Abbās not perish." We think he only said that when their weeping was heard because Ibn 'Abbās had told him not to take them with him. When the women were silent, he praised and glorified God and mentioned what God is entitled to. He called for blessings on Muḥammad, on His angels and on the prophets. In that context, he mentioned what God knows and other matters that would be too numerous to mention here. By God! I have never heard a speaker, before or after him, more eloquent in his speech than he was. He said: "...Trace back my lineage and consider who I am. Then, look back at yourselves and remonstrate with yourselves. Consider whether it is right for you to kill me and desecrate my inviolability. Am I not the son of the daughter of your Prophet, the son of the executor of his will [waṣī][411] and his cousin, the first of the believers in God and the man who [first] believed in what His Apostle brought from his Lord? Was not Ḥamzah, the lord of the martyrs,[412] my uncle? Was

409. Qur'ān, 10:71 (72).

410. Qur'ān, 7:196 (195).

411. The use of the term waṣī has specific implications for 'Alī's status as successor of the Prophet among the Shī'ah.

412. Ḥamzah was an uncle of the Prophet and hero of the early battles of the Prophet against the Meccans. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥamza b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

not Ja'far, who flies with two wings in heaven,[413] my uncle? Have you not heard the words that circulate among you that the Prophet of God said concerning myself and my brother: 'These are the two lords of the youths of the inhabitants of heaven'?[414] If you believe what I am saying—and it is the truth, for, by God, I have never told a lie since I learned that God hated people who told them and that those who opposed Him grieved Him.... If you still regard me as a liar, then there are among you those who, if you asked them, would tell you. Ask Jābir b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī,[415] Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī,[416] Sahl b. Sa'd al-Sā'idī,[417] Zayd b. Arqam[418] and Anas b. Mālik[419] to tell you that they heard these words from the Apostle of God concerning myself and my brother.
[330] Is this not sufficient to prevent your shedding my blood?"

Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan interrupted saying, "Consider me as one who worships God very shakily on the edge, if I understand what you say."[420] Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir said, "I think that you worship God [very shakily] on seventy edges, for I testify that you are truthful by saying that. You do not understand what he is saying, for God has sealed your heart."

Al-Ḥusayn told them, "If you are in any doubt about this, do you have the slightest doubt that I am the son of the daughter of your Prophet? By God! There is no son of a prophet other than me among you and among the other peoples from east to west. Indeed, I am the son of your Prophet. Tell me, are you seeking retribution from me for one of your dead whom I have killed, or for property of yours that I have expropriated, or for a wound that

---

413. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib, brother of 'Alī, was the person whom the Prophet dreamt of as flying to heaven on two bloody wings amid a band of angels. See *EI*², s.v. Dja'far b. Abī Ṭālib.

414. See A. J. Wensinck, Handbook of Early Muhammadan Traditions, 94.

415. Jābir b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī was a Companion of the Prophet; he died between 73 (692) and 78 (698). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 42–43.

416. Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī was a Companion of the Prophet, who died between 63 (682) and 74 (694). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 479–80.

417. Sahl b. Sa'd al-Sā'dī was a Companion of the Prophet, who died between 88 (707) and 91 (710). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 252–53.

418. Zayd b. Arqam was a Companion of the Prophet, who died in 68 (687–89). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 10.

419. Anas b. Mālik was a Companion of the Prophet, who died in 93 (711–12). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/1, 10–16.

420. See Qur'ān, 22:11.

I have inflicted?" They did not say anything to him. Then he called, "Shabath b. Rib'ī, Ḥajjār b. Abjar, Qays b. al-Ash'ath,[421] Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith, didn't you write: 'The fruit has ripened; the Janāb has grown green; the waters have overflowed; you will come to an army which has been gathered for you, come'?" They said that they had not, and he declared, "Glory be to God! By God! Indeed, you did. People, since you dislike me, let me leave you for a place in the land where I may be safe." Qays b. al-Ash'ath asked, "Won't you submit to the authority of your kinsmen? They will always treat you as you would like. Nothing hateful will ever come to you from them." Al-Ḥusayn replied, "You are your brother's brother. Do you want the Banū Hāshim to seek vengeance from you for more than the blood of Muslim b. 'Aqīl? No, by God! I will neither give them my hand like a man who has been humiliated, nor will I flee like a slave.[422] Servants of God, 'I take refuge in my Lord and your Lord, from your stoning.'[423] 'I take refuge in my Lord and your Lord, from every haughty man who does not believe in the Day of Reckoning.'"[424] He made his [331] mount kneel and ordered 'Uqbah b. Sim'ān to tie its reins. The Kūfans began to advance toward him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Alī b. Ḥanẓalah b. As'ad al-Shāmī[425]—a man of his tribe who witnessed the killing of al-Ḥusayn at the time he was killed, whose name was Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sha'bī: When we advanced toward al-Ḥusayn, Zuhayr b. al-Qayn came out toward us on his horse with a fine tail, carrying arms. He said, "People of al-Kūfah, here is a warning to you of God's punishment, a warning insofar as it is the duty of a Muslim to advise his brother Muslim—and we are still brothers in one religion and one faith as long as the sword does not strike between you and us. Therefore you are still appropriate persons to receive advice from us. When the sword strikes, the protection 421. Qays b. al-Ash'ath was not among those who wrote that letter to al-Ḥusayn. See pp. 24–26, above.

422. Emending uqirru iqrār al-'abīd to afirru ifrār al-'abīd as in Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 188.

423. Qur'ān, 44:20 [19].

424. Qur'ān, 40:26 [27].

425. 'Alī b. Ḥanẓalah b. As'ad al-Shāmī was only used as an authority by Abū Mikhnaf for this one account. He seems to be otherwise unknown.

will be cut asunder. We will be a community, and you will be a community. God has tested us and you through the offspring of Muḥammad so that God may see what you and we are doing. We summon you to help them and to desert the tyrant, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. You will never attain anything from Yazīd and 'Ubaydallāh except evil through their rule; they will both poke out your eyes with hot irons, cut off your hands and legs, mutilate you and hang you on the trunks of palm trees; they will kill the ideal men among you and your Qur'ānic reciters (qurrā'), men like Ḥujr b. 'Adī[426] and his followers, Hāni' b. 'Urwah and others like him."

Then they cursed him and praised and prayed for 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. They called out to Zuhayr, "By God! Soon we will kill your leader and those with him or we will send him and them peacefully to the governor, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād." Zuhayr said to them, "Servants of God, the offspring of Fāṭimah, may God's happiness be hers, are more entitled to love and help than the son of Sumayyah. If you will not help them, then I seek refuge with God for you that you do not kill them. Do not prevent this man from going to his cousin, Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. By my life! Yazīd [332] will be satisfied with your obedience without killing al-Ḥusayn." Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan yelled out as he shot an arrow at him, "Shut up! May God silence you by death, you have wearied us with your lengthy speech." Zuhayr retorted, "O son of one who urinates at both ends! I am not addressing you. You are merely an animal. By God! I doubt whether you understand two verses of the Book of God. Therefore I give you tidings of retribution on the Day of Resurrection and of dread torture." Shamir replied, "God will be the one who kills you and your master soon." Zuhayr answered, "Are you trying to terrify me with death? By God! What death has is preferable to me than living forever with you." Then he advanced toward the people, raising his voice and saying, "Servants of God, do not let this rude devil and his like seduce you from your religion. By God! The intercession of Muḥammad will not be given to a people who shed the blood of his offspring and his family (ahl al-bayt) and who kill those who aid them and protect their womenfolk." A man called out to him, "Abū 'Abdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn) says: 'Come back. By my life! If the believer of the people of Pharaoh gave advice to his people and was eloquent in pleading, so have you given advice and spoken to these people, if there is any advantage in advice and information.'"

426. Ḥujr b. 'Adī was a member of the Shī'ah, who led a revolt against Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in al-Kūfah in 51 (671); after this incident, he was executed. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 95–101.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī—'Adī b. Ḥarmalah: When 'Umar b. Sa'd began to march forward, al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd said to him, "May God make you prosperous, are you going to fight this man?" He replied, "Yes, by God! It will be a battle, the least part of which will be heads falling and severed hands flying." Al-Ḥurr said, "Aren't you satisfied with one of the three proposals that he offered you?" 'Umar b. Sa'd answered, "If the matter rested with me, I would accept, but your governor has refused." Al-Ḥurr went and stood apart from the people. With [333] him was a man from his tribe called Qurrah b. Qays. He said, "Qurrah, have you watered your horse today?" Qurrah said, "No." He said, "Don't you want to water it?"

Qurrah reported later: I thought that al-Ḥurr was going to leave the battle and did not want to be present at it, but was unwilling that I should see him when he did that, for he was afraid that I might find fault with him for that. So I said, "I have not watered it and I am going to water it." Then I left him where he was. By God! If he had told me what he was intending to do, I would have gone with him to al-Ḥusayn.

He began to approach al-Ḥusayn little by little. One of his tribe called al-Muhājir b. Aws[427] asked him, "What do you want, Ibn Yazīd? Do you want to attack?" He was silent but a great shudder came over him. Al-Muhājir said, "By God! Ibn Yazīd, your behavior is suspicious. By God! I have never seen you act like this before. If I was asked who was the bravest of the Kūfans, I would not ignore you. What is this I see in you?" Al-Ḥurr answered, "By God! I am giving my soul the choice between heaven and the fire of hell. By God! I will not choose anything before heaven, even though I am cut to pieces and burnt."

He whipped his horse and joined Ḥusayn. He said, "May God accept my soul for you, son of the Apostle of God. I was your companion who stopped you from returning. I accompanied you along the road and made you stop in this place. By Him other than Whom there is no deity! I did not think that the people would refuse to respond to what you have offered them and that they would ever come to this position with regard to you. I had said to myself: I do not care if I obey these people in some of their authority (amr) while they do not consider that I have discarded totally their obedience, for in the long run they will accept these proposals that Ḥusayn offers them. By God! If I had thought that they would not accept them from you, I would not have joined [334] them against you. I have come repenting to my Lord for what I have done, and offering you my life as consolation so that I may die before you. Will you accept that as repentance from me?" Al-Ḥusayn replied, "Yes. God will accept your repentance and forgive you. What is your name?" He said, "I am al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd." Al-Ḥusayn said, "You are the free man (al-ḥurr) as your mother named you. You are a free man (al-ḥurr) in this world and the next, God willing. So dismount." He replied, "I would be better for you as a horseman than I would as a foot soldier. I will fight them on my horse for a while. Dismounting will be my ultimate end." Al-Ḥusayn said, "Do whatever you deem wise. May God grant you mercy."

427. Al-Muhājir b. Aws was only mentioned with regard to the Battle of Karbalā'.

He advanced in front of his followers and called out, "People, aren't you going to accept one of the three proposals that Ḥusayn proposed to you so that god may grant you release from making war against him and fighting him?" They answered, "The general here is 'Umar b. Sa'd. Speak to him." He spoke to him in the same way as he had spoken to him before and in the same way as he had spoken to his followers. 'Umar answered, "I am anxious. If I could find a way to do that, I would do it." Then al-Ḥurr said, "People of al-Kūfah, may your mothers be deprived of their sons and may tears come to their eyes. You summoned him. Then, when he had come to you, you handed him over. You claimed that you would fight with your own lives for him, and then you have begun to attack him in order to kill him. You have laid hold of his life; you have seized his throat; you have encircled him on every side in order to prevent his returning to God's broad land, where he may be secure and where his family (ahl baytihi) may be secure. He has come into your hands like a prisoner who no longer can attract benefit to himself and cannot secure himself against harm. You have prevented him, his womenfolk, his children, and his followers from the water of the flowing Euphrates, which Jews, Magians, and Christians may drink, and which the pigs and dogs of Sawād wallow in. Now they are likely to die of thirst. How wickedly you have treated the offspring of Muḥammad! May God not give you water to drink on the Day of Thirst, if you do not repent and do not desist from what you are set upon this day and this hour." Some of the foot soldiers attacked him by shooting arrows at him. He went and stood in front of al-Ḥusayn. [335]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣa'qab b. Zuhayr and Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: 'Umar b. Sa'd advanced toward them. Then he called out, "Dhuwayd, bring forward your standard." He brought it forward. 'Umar put an arrow in his bow and let fly. He said, "Be witnesses that I was the first to shoot."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janab al-Kalbī: One of our men called 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr[428] of the Banū 'Ulaym[429] had settled in al-Kūfah and had taken a house beside the well of the clan of al-Ja'd of Hamdān. With him was his wife who was from the clan of al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ[430] called Umm Wahb bt. 'Abd.[431] He saw the people at al-Nukhaylah[432] being drawn up to be sent against al-Ḥusayn. He asked about them and was told, "They are being sent against Ḥusayn, son of Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Apostle of God." He said, "By God! I was anxious to make holy war (jihād) against the polytheists. I hope that making holy war against these people, who are attacking the son of the daughter of their Prophet, will be no less rewarded with God than His reward would be to me for making holy war against the polytheists." He went to his wife and told her about what he had heard, and he informed her of what he was intending to do. She said, "You are right. May God make you achieve the most wise of your affairs. Do it but take me with you." He went with her by night until he came to Ḥusayn and stayed with him.

---

428. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr was only mentioned with regard to the Battle of Karbalā'.

429. The Banū 'Ulaym were a clan of the tribe of Kalb. See Ṭabarī, II, 478.

430. Al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ was a clan of the tribe of Tamīm. See Ṭabarī, I, 3315.

431. Umm Wahb bt. 'Abd is only mentioned with regard to the Battle of Karbalā'.

432. Al-Nukhaylah was close to al-Kūfah on the road to Syria. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 771.

When ʿUmar b. Saʿd came toward al-Ḥusayn and shot the arrow, the people began to shoot at each other. While they were shooting at each other, Yasār,[433] a mawlā of Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān, and Sālim,[434] a mawlā of ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, came forward. They called out, "Which of you will come forward to fight against us?" Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir and Burayr jumped up but Ḥusayn said to [336] them, "Sit down." Then ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr al-Kalbī arose. He said, "Abū ʿAbdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn), may God have mercy on you, permit me to go out against them." Ḥusayn saw a tall dark man, strong in arm and with broad shoulders. He said, "I think he will be deadly enough for those opponents. Go forward if you wish." He went forward to meet them. They asked him who he was, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr al-Kalbī gave them his lineage. They answered, "We do not know you. Let Zuhayr b. al-Qayn, Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir or Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr come out against us." Yasār got ready in front of Sālim, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr al-Kalbī retorted, "Son of an adulteress! You wanted to do single combat with one of the people. So one of the people has come forward against you. In any case he is better than you." With that ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr struck Yasār with his sword until he had silenced him. While he was occupied with striking against him with his sword, Sālim attacked. They cried out in warning, "The other servant is closing in on you." ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr did not notice Sālim until the latter was upon him. With his left hand, he warded off Sālim's blow but the fingers of his hand were cut off. Then he turned on Sālim, struck him and killed him. After he had killed them both, he came forward and recited:

If you do not know me, I am a son from the tribe of Kalb.
    Sufficient for me is my status (bayt) among ʿUlaym; it is sufficient for me.
I am a man of strength and muscles.
    I am not a weakling in the face of disaster.
I promise you, Umm Wahb, that I will go forward stabbing and striking among them,
Just as does a servant who believes in the Lord.

433. Yasār was only mentioned at the Battle of Karbalā'.
434. Sālim was only mentioned at the Battle of Karbalā'.

Umm Wahb seized a tent pole and went toward her husband, saying to him, "I give up my father and mother for you and fight [337] to protect the good, the offspring of Muḥammad." He began to send her back to the women. She held on to his clothes and she said, "I will never leave you unless I die with you." Ḥusayn called out to her, "May you as a good family be well rewarded. May God have mercy on you, go back to the women and sit with them. It is not for women to fight." So she went back to them.

'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj, who was on the right wing, launched an attack against al-Ḥusayn's right wing. When they drew near Ḥusayn, the followers of al-Ḥusayn knelt down and pointed their spears at them. Their horses would not come forward against the spears; they swung round to retreat. The followers of al-Ḥusayn began to shoot arrows at them, killing some of them and wounding others.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥusayn Abū Ja'far:[435] One of the Banū Tamīm called 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawzah[436] came and stood, opposite al-Ḥusayn. He called out, "Ḥusayn, Ḥusayn!" He answered, "What do you want?" 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawzah said, "Do you expect Hell-fire!" Al-Ḥusayn declared, "No, I am advancing to a merciful Lord and an intercessor who is listened to." He asked his followers, "Who is that?" They told him that it was Ibn Ḥawzah. Al-Ḥusayn prayed, "O my Lord! Drive him into the fire." Then his horse upset him in its stride and made him fall. His leg was stuck in the stirrups, and his head fell to the ground. The horse bolted and dragged him along, making his head strike every stone and clod of earth until he died.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Suwayd b. Ḥayyah:[437] When 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawzah's horse fell, his left leg stuck in the stirrups and his right leg went flying up. His horse galloped off with him with his head striking every stone and tree trunk until he died.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib[438]—'Abd al-Jabbār

435. Ḥusayn Abū Ja'far was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf who seems to be otherwise unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 207.

436. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawzah is only mentioned in connection with this incident.

437. Suwayd b. Ḥayyah was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf who seems to be otherwise unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 218–19.

438. 'Aṭā' b. al-Sa'ib was a traditionist, who died in 137 (153). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 200–1.

b. Wā'il al-Ḥaḍramī,[439]—his brother, Masrūq b. Wā'il:[440] I was [338] among the first horsemen who came against al-Ḥusayn. I had told myself, "I will be one of the first of them; perhaps I may strike the head of al-Ḥusayn and by that attain a position of rank with 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād." As we came toward Ḥusayn, one of the people called Ibn Ḥawzah went forward. He called out, "Is Ḥusayn among you?" Ḥusayn was silent. He called again, and still he was silent. When there was the third call, al-Ḥusayn said to them, "Yes, here is Ḥusayn. What do you want?" Ibn Ḥawzah said, "Ḥusayn, do you expect Hell-fire!" Al-Ḥusayn replied, "You lie, rather I am advancing to a forgiving Lord and an intercessor who is listened to. Who are you?" He answered, "Ibn Ḥawzah." Ḥusayn raised his arms so that we could see the white of his armpits above his clothes and he prayed, "O God! Drive him into the fire." Ibn Ḥawzah became angry and he spurred his horse toward al-Ḥusayn. Between the two there was the bed of a stream, and while one foot was stuck in the stirrup, the horse dragged him along until he fell from the horse. One foot, leg, and thigh were pulled off while the other remained hanging in the stirrup.

Masrūq added that the cavalry left him behind.

'Abd al-Jabbār reported that he questioned Masrūq, and the latter said, "I have seen [of the wonders] of the Prophet's family (ahl al-bayt) enough to deter me from ever fighting them."

Then the battle flared up.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—'Afīf b. Zuhayr b. Abī al-Akhnas,[441] who witnessed the killing of al-Ḥusayn: Yazīd b. Ma'qil[442] of the Banū 'Amīrah b. Rabī'ah, an ally of the Banū Salīmah of 'Abd al-Qays, came forward and called out, "Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr, how do you think God has treated you?" Burayr replied, "By God! God has treated me well and treated you badly." He answered, "You are a liar. Even before today you were always a 439. 'Abd al-Jabbār b. Wā'il al-Ḥaḍramī was a traditionist, who died in 112 (731). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 201.

440. Masrūq b. Wā'il was an elder brother of the traditionist 'Abd al-Jabbār b. Wā'il, who was present at the Battle of Karbalā'; he does not seem to have been mentioned elsewhere.

441. 'Afīf b. Zuhayr b. Abī al-Akhnas was an eyewitness at the Battle of Karbalā'; he seems to be otherwise unknown.

442. Yazīd b. Ma'qil is only mentioned with regard to the Battle of Karbalā'.

liar. Do you remember when I used to go with you among the Banū Lawdhān? Then you used to say that 'Uthmān b. 'Affān was a man who indulged himself excessively, that Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān was one who was in error and who caused people to go astray, and that the imām of guidance and truth was 'Alī b. Abī [339] Ṭālib." Burayr retorted, "I testify that this is my opinion and belief." Yazīd b. Ma'qil replied, "And I testify that you are one of those who are in error." Burayr called out, "Then I challenge you to a contest of curses. Let us call on God that the liar be cursed and the spreader of falsehoods be killed. Then come out for combat." They both advanced and raised their hands to God, calling upon Him to curse the liar and that the one who was truthful should kill the one who was false. Each of them came forward against the other. They exchanged blows. Yazīd b. Ma'qil struck Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr a light blow that did not do him any harm. Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr struck Yazīd b. Ma'qil a blow that cut through his helmet and penetrated his brain. He fell prostrate just as if he had been hurled from a mountain, and the sword of Ibn Ḥuḍayr was stuck in his head. As I looked at Burayr, he was pulling it out of Yazīd's head when Raḍī b. Munqidh al-'Abdī[443] attacked him and grappled with him. They fought together for a time. Then Burayr sat on his chest. Raḍī called out, "Where are the people to fight and to defend?" At this Ka'b b. Jābir b. 'Amr al-Azdī[444] went to attack Burayr. I said to him, "This man, Burayr b. Ḥuḍayr, is the reciter of the Qur'ān (qāri'). He often recited the Qur'ān to us in the mosque." But Ka'b attacked with his spear and struck him in the back. When Burayr felt the contact of the spear, he grappled with him and bit into his face, cutting off the edge of his nose. Then Ka'b b. Jābir stabbed him until he had flung Burayr down from him. The point of Ka'b's spear was hidden in Burayr's back. Then Ka'b came at him, striking him with his sword until he killed him.

'Afīf reported: It is as if I see Raḍī b. Munqidh al-'Abdī, who had been lying prostrate, rising, shaking the dust from his clothes, 443. Raḍī b. Munqidh al-'Abdī is only mentioned with regard to this incident in the Battle of Karbalā' and his view concerning the event.

444. Ka'b b. Jābir b. 'Amr al-Azdī is only mentioned with regard to this incident in the Battle of Karbalā' and the consequences concerning the event.

and saying to Kaʿb b. Jābir al-Azdī, "Thank you brother of al-Azd, I will never forget that."

Yūsuf b. Yazīd reported that he asked ʿAfīf whether he saw that, and he replied that he had seen it with his own eyes and heard it with his own ears. He added: When Kaʿb b. Jābir returned, [340] his wife or his sister, al-Nawār bt. Jābir,[445] said to him, "You have given help against the son of Fāṭimah and you have killed the leader of the reciters of the Qur'ān. You have brought great disgrace. By God! I will never speak a word to you." Kaʿb b. Jābir recited:

Ask that you be told about me—and you are blameworthy—at the battle against Ḥusayn, while the spears were pointed.
Have I not gone to the farthest point of your dislike? Was not what I did on the day of terror appropriate to me?
I had with me a spear from Yazan,[446] whose joints had not betrayed it, and a white sword which was sharpened, and both edges of it were cutting.
I singled him out amid a group whose religion was not my religion, for I am satisfied with Ibn Ḥarb (i.e., Yazīd).
My eyes did not see their like in their time, nor anyone among the people before them since I was a young man.
For there were none fiercer in striking with the sword in battle.
Indeed everyone who protects his honor comes to fight.
They have endured without protection, stabbing and striking.
They would have attacked had all this been of any advantage.
Tell ʿUbaydallāh, if you meet him, that I am obedient and attentive to the Caliph.
I killed Burayr. I brought help to Abū Munqidh[447] when he called, "Who will fight?"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab: During the governorship of Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr,[448] I heard Kaʿb b. Jābir

445. Whether Nawār bt. Jābir is Kaʿb's wife or sister cannot be ascertained, as she is not mentioned elsewhere.
446. Yazan were a clan of Ḥimyar. See al-Bustānī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. yzn.
447. He means Rāfi b. Munqidh.
448. Between the years 67 (687) and 72 (691–92).

saying, "O Lord! We have been loyal. O Lord! Do not treat us like those who have been treacherous." My father said to him, "True! God is true to His word and generous, but you have earned evil for yourself." He retorted, "No. I have not earned evil for myself; rather I have earned good."

They claimed that later Raḍī b. Munqidh al-'Abdī gave a reply to the words of Ka'b b. Jābir. He said:

If my Lord had wished, I would not have been present at their battle,
and Ibn Jābir would not have done me any favors.
That day was shameful and disgraceful, for which the sons who come after these people will denounce them.
I wish that I had been dead before his death and, at the battle against Ḥusayn, I had been in the grave.

'Amr b. Qaraẓah al-Anṣārī[449] came forward to fight in the defense of Ḥusayn. He was reciting: [341]

May the battalion of helpers know that I will defend the nature of honor,
With the blow of a boy who is no broken arrow, who sells his soul for paradise.
In protection of Ḥusayn, I offer my life and my house.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Thābit b. Hubayrah:[450] 'Amr b. Qaraẓah b. Ka'b was killed. He had been with al-Ḥusayn, while his brother 'Alī[451] was with 'Umar b. Sa'd. 'Alī b. Qaraẓah called out, "Ḥusayn, you lying son of a liar, you have led my brother astray and tempted him so that he has been killed." Al-Ḥusayn retorted, "God did not lead your brother astray. Rather He guided your brother and led you astray." 'Alī b. Qaraẓah declared, "May God kill me if I do not kill you, or I will die before I get to you."

449. 'Amr b. Qaraẓah al-Anṣārī is mentioned here for the first time as a follower of al-Ḥusayn; he is not mentioned elsewhere. His father was a supporter and official of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. See Ṭabarī, I, 3173, 3423.

450. Thābit b. Hubayrah was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf who seems to be otherwise unknown. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 222.

451. 'Alī is not mentioned elsewhere. His attitude is obviously opposed to his brother and father. Balādhurī gives him the name al-Zubayr. See Ansāb, II/2, 192.

He launched an attack against Ḥusayn. But Nāfi' b. Hilāl al-Murādī intercepted him, stabbed him and brought him down. 'Alī b. Qaraẓah's comrades rescued 'Alī. Later he was treated until he recovered.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ Abū Zuhayr al-'Absī: When al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd joined Ḥusayn, a man from Banū Tamīm, of the clan of Banū Shaqirah, who are the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Tamīm—he was called Yazīd b. Sufyān[452]—called out, "By God, if I had seen al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd, I would have followed him with my spear to stab him."

Meanwhile the people were driving against each other and fighting, and al-Ḥurr was advancing to attack the people, reciting the words of 'Antarah.[453]

I kept hurling my horse against them, neck and breast, until it was clothed with blood.

His horse was struck on its ears and nose, and blood was flowing from it. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm was in command of the police of 'Ubaydallāh and was sent by him to al-Ḥusayn. He was with 'Umar b. Sa'd, and 'Umar had put him in charge of the armored police. Al-Ḥuṣayn now said to Yazīd b. Sufyān, "This is al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd, the man you wanted." He admitted that and went out [342] toward him saying, "Ḥurr b. Yazīd, are you ready to fight in single combat?" Al-Ḥurr replied, "Yes, if you wish." He came forward toward him.

I (the narrator, al-Naḍr) have heard al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm say, "By God! As Yazīd went out to fight, it was as if his soul were in al-Ḥurr's hand. No sooner had he gone out against him than al-Ḥurr killed him."

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Hāni' b. 'Urwah: Nāfi' b. Hilāl was fighting on that day, reciting:

I am al-Jamalī. I believe in the religion of 'Alī.

---

452. Yazīd b. Sufyān is not mentioned except in the Battle of Karbalā'; he was killed in the battle.

453. 'Antarah was a warrior poet of the sixth century. See *EI*², s.v. 'Antarah. For the verse of 'Antarah, see Ahlwardt, The Divans, 48.

A man called Muzāhim b. Ḥurayth[454] came against him, crying, "I follow the religion of 'Uthmān." Nāfi' replied, "Rather you follow the religion of Satan." Then he attacked and killed him.

'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj cried out to his men, "You stupid fellows, don't you realize whom you are fighting? These horsemen of the town are people who are seeking death. Don't let any of you go forward to fight them in single combat. They are only few, and their time is running out. By God! If you only threw stones at them, you would kill them." 'Umar b. Sa'd said to him, "True, you have come to the right conclusion." Then he sent to the commanders that none of their own men should fight one of their men in single combat.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥusayn b. 'Uqbah al-Murādī[455] —a Zubaydī tribesman: He heard 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj, when he approached the followers of al-Ḥusayn, saying, "People of al-Kūfah, stay steadfast in your obedience and unity (jamā'ah). Do not have any doubts about fighting against those who have strayed from the true religion and have opposed the imām." Al-Ḥusayn retorted, "'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj, are you urging the people against me? Are we the ones who have strayed from the true religion, and you the ones who have remained firm in it? By God! If our souls were taken, and you died with your actions, you would know which of us has strayed from the true religion and who was more worthy to be roasted by Hell-fire."

'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj with the right wing of 'Umar b. Sa'd launched [343] an attack against al-Ḥusayn from the direction of the Euphrates. They fought together fiercely for a time. Muslim b. 'Awsajah al-Asadī was struck down, but 'Amr and his men withdrew and the dust lifted. There was Muslim, stretched out dying. Al-Ḥusayn walked toward him while Muslim was on the point of death. He said, "Muslim b. 'Awsajah, may your Lord have mercy on you. 'Of them [the believers] is he who has accomplished his vow [by death in battle], and of them is he who waits: they have not changed at all.'"[456] Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir approached and said, 454. Muzāhim b. Ḥurayth is only mentioned at the Battle of Karbalā'.

455. Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Uqbah al-Murādī is an unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 207.

456. Qur'ān, 33:23.

"Muslim, your death is hard for me to bear but rejoice that Heaven is your abode." He replied in a weak voice, "May God bring you the same luck." Ḥabīb said, "I know that I am following you at this very moment. Otherwise I would have liked you to entrust me to carry out everything that concerns you, so that I might preserve for you what you are worthy of through kinship and religion." He answered, "Indeed, I do entrust to you. May God have mercy on you to do this." And pointing toward al-Ḥusayn, he added, "To die with this man." He said, "I do this, by the Lord of the Ka'bah."

No sooner had he died in their midst than a maidservant of his cried out, "O Ibn 'Awsajah! O master!" The followers of 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj called to each other, "We have killed Muslim b. 'Awsajah." Shabath (b. Rib'ī) said to some of his followers around him, "May your mothers be bereft of you. You have only killed yourselves with your own hands, and you have humiliated yourselves for someone else. Do you rejoice at killing a man like Muslim b. 'Awsajah? Indeed, it was due to him that I embraced Islam. Many a noble stand have I seen him make among the Muslims! I saw him at the battle of the plain of Ādharbayjān[457] kill six polytheists before the horsemen of the Muslims all arrived. Could you be happy while a man among you like him is killed?"

[344] Those who killed Muslim b. 'Awsajah were Muslim b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḍibābī[458] and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Khushkārah al-Bajalī.[459]

With his left wing Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan attacked the people of al-Ḥusayn's left wing. But the latter stood firm and forced Shamir and his followers away with their spears. Al-Ḥusayn and his followers were attacked on every side. ['Abdallāh b. 'Umayr] al-Kalbī was killed. He had killed another two men after the first two. He had fought fiercely, but Hāni' b. Thubayt al-Ḥaḍramī and 457. The Arab conquest of Ādharbayjān took place between 18 (639) and 22 (643). See *EI*², s.v. Ādharbaydjān.

458. Muslim b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḍibābī was present at the Battle of Ṣiffīn fighting for 'Alī with his tribal leader Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan. He was with Shamir when the latter was killed by al-Mukhtār but he escaped. See Ṭabarī, I, 3305, II, 661–62.

459. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Khushkārah al-Bajalī was killed by al-Mukhtār. See Ṭabarī, II, 669.

Bukayr b. Ḥayy al-Taymī of Taym Allāh b. Tha'labah[460] attacked him and killed him. He was the second of the followers of al-Ḥusayn to be killed.

The followers of al-Ḥusayn fought fiercely. Then their cavalry began to attack, and even though they were only thirty-two horsemen, they did not attack any side of the Kūfan cavalry without putting it to flight. When 'Azrah b. Qays, who was in command of the Kūfan cavalry, saw that his cavalry was being put to flight on every side, he sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥiṣn[461] to 'Umar b. Sa'd to tell him, "Don't you see what my cavalry is receiving today from this small number? Send the foot soldiers and archers against them." 'Umar asked Shabath b. Rib'ī, "Will you not go against them?" He replied, "Glory be to God! Are you turning to the shaykh of Muḍar and of the people of this town generally to send him with the archers because you cannot find anyone who will volunteer for this? Surely someone else other than me will be sufficient for you?" They could see Shabath's reluctance to fight against Ḥusayn.

According to Abū Zuhayr al-'Absī (al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ): During the governorship of Muṣ'ab (b. al-Zubayr),[462] I heard Shabath saying: "God will neither give the people of this town any good nor will He direct them toward true guidance. Are you not amazed that we should fight for 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and his son after him against the clan of Abū Sufyān for five years, and then make war on his other son and fight for the clan of Mu'āwiyah and the son of Sumayyah, the harlot, against the best man on earth? Error! O what error!" [345]

'Umar b. Sa'd summoned al-Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm and sent the armored police with him and five hundred of the archers. They advanced until they came near al-Ḥusayn and his followers. They shot arrows at al-Ḥusayn's followers until soon they had wounded their horses; they all were on foot.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah—Ayyūb b. Mishraḥ al-Khaywānī:[463] By God! I wounded the horse of al-Ḥurr 460. Bukayr b. Ḥayy al-Taymī is not mentioned elsewhere.

461. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥiṣn is not mentioned elsewhere.
462. Muṣ'ab was governor between the years 67 (687) and 72 (691–92).
463. Ayyūb b. Mishraḥ al-Khaywānī is not mentioned elsewhere except for his later justification.

b. Yazīd. I shot an arrow in its belly. At once the horse shook, turned over, and fell prostrate. Al-Ḥurr jumped from his horse like a lion; with his sword in his hand he recited:

If you wound my horse, then I am son of a free man, braver than any lion with mane.

I have never seen anyone accomplish what he accomplished.

The shaykhs of the tribe told Ayyūb b. Mishraḥ, "You killed him." He replied, "No, I did not kill him. Someone else killed him. I do not want it to be thought that I killed him." Abū Waddāk asked him, "Why?" He said, "They claim that he was one of the righteous. Even though what I had done was a sin, I would rather that I met God with the sin of wounding rather than that I should meet him with the sin of killing." Abū Waddāk replied, "I can only see that you will meet God with the sin of killing them all. Surely, you can see that if you shot at this man, wounded this man, fired at this man, took up a position, attacked him and urged on your comrades—while you increased the number of your comrades—and when there was an attack against you, you were reluctant to flee, and the others of your comrades did as you, and others, and others, it can be considered that such a man and his comrades killed al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd and his horse? You are partners [346] in their blood, all of you." He said, "O Abū Waddāk, you would drive us to despair of the mercy of God, if you were the custodian of our account on the Day of Resurrection. May God not forgive you, if you do forgive us." He answered, "It is the way that I am telling you."

They fought against them in the fiercest battle God created, until midday. They could only come against them from one direction because of the way they had gathered their tents close to each other. When 'Umar b. Sa'd saw that, he sent men to pull them down from the right and the left; they wanted to surround them. Three or four of al-Ḥusayn's followers went back through the tents in order to attack any man who was pulling down the tents and plundering them, and so that they could not only fight and shoot at him from close range but also wound him. At that, 'Umar b. Sa'd ordered his men to set fire to the tents. He said, "Set fire to them. Don't go into a tent or plunder it." Then they set the tents on fire. Ḥusayn said, "Leave them. Let them burn them. If they set them on fire, they will not be able to come through them against you." That was how it was. They could still only attack them from one direction.

The wife of [ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr] al-Kalbī went out to her husband. She sat by his head rubbing it with earth, saying, "May you enjoy heaven." Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan said to a servant called Rustam, "Beat her head with a tent pole." He struck her head and smashed it. She died where she was.

Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan came up to al-Ḥusayn's tent. He struck against it and called out, "Bring me fire so that I can burn this tent and the people inside it." The women screamed and rushed out of the tent. Al-Ḥusayn called out to him, "Ibn Dhī al-Jawshan are you calling for fire to burn down my tent and my family? May God burn you in Hell-fire!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: I said to Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan, "Glory be to God! [347] This is not appropriate for you. Do you want to impose on yourself two evil qualities for which you will be punished by God? You are killing women and children. By God! It is by your killing of men that you will satisfy your commander." He asked me, "Who are you?" I replied, "I will not tell you who I am." For, by God, I was afraid that if he knew me, he would harm my position with the authorities. Then a man called Shabath b. Ribʿī came to him; he was more obedient to him than I was. He told him, "I have neither heard any words more evil than yours nor seen any behavior more disgraceful than yours. Have you become a man who terrorizes women?" At that I testify that Shamir became ashamed and began to withdraw.

Zuhayr b. al-Qayn launched an attack against him with ten of his comrades. So fierce was his attack on Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan and his followers that he drove them from the tents so that they all withdrew from them. They brought down Abū ʿAzzah al-Ḍibābī and killed him. He was one of the followers of Shamir.[464] The people clustered round Zuhayr and his comrades; they outnumbered them considerably. Each man of the followers of al-Ḥusayn continued to fight until he was killed. However, when a man or two among them was killed, it was apparent, 464. Abū ʿAzzah al-Ḍibābī is not mentioned elsewhere.

while, since the others were numerous, it was not apparent how many were killed. When Abū Thumāmah 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Ṣā'idī saw the violence, he said to al-Ḥusayn, "O Abū 'Abdallāh! To you I sacrifice my soul. I see that these men are getting closer to you. No, by God! You will get killed unless I am killed defending you, if God is willing. I would love to meet my Lord when I have already prayed the prayer; the time for performance has now drawn near." Al-Ḥusayn raised his head and said, "You mentioned the prayer. May God make you always one of those who pray and mention His name. Yes, it is now the first time for that prayer." Then he said, "Ask them to desist from us so that [348] we may pray." Al-Ḥusayn b. Tamīm told them that the prayer would not be acceptable. Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir said to him, "You have claimed that it is not acceptable. Is the prayer of the family of the Apostle of God not acceptable, while your prayer is acceptable, you donkey?" Ḥusayn b. Tamīm launched an attack against them, and Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir came out against him. Ḥabīb struck his horse's face with his sword. The horse pranced, and Ḥusayn fell from it. His followers carried him away and rescued him. Ḥabīb began to recite:

I swear if we had the numbers you have or even half of you, you would turn your backs.
You the worst people of lineage and of deeds.

On that day he began to recite:

I am Ḥabīb, my father is Muẓāhir, a horseman of battle and war that is kindled.
You are more numerous than we,
but we are more loyal and steadfast than you.
Ours is stronger logic and clearer right. We are of greater piety and freer from blame than you.

Ḥabīb fought fiercely. A man from the Banū Tamīm attacked him, but Ḥabīb struck him on the head with his sword and killed him. The man was called Badīl b. Ṣuraym of the Banū 'Uqfān.[465] Another from the Banū Tamīm attacked him and stabbed him. Ḥabīb fell. He started to rise, and al-Ḥusayn b. Tamīm struck him on the head with his sword. He fell, and the Tamīmī stooped down and cut off his head. Al-Ḥusayn told him, "I am your partner in killing him." The other declared, "By God! No one except me killed him." Al-Ḥusayn ordered, "Give his head to me. I will hang it on the neck of my horse so that the people may see and know that I participated in killing him. Then you will take it and go with it to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, for I have no need of what you will be given for killing him." The man refused him, but then his [349] people persuaded him to settle their dispute in that way. So he handed al-Ḥusayn the head of Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir, and al-Ḥusayn went around the army with it hung on the neck of his horse. After that, he handed it back to the Tamīmī.

465. Badīl b. Ṣuraym is not mentioned elsewhere.

When they returned to al-Kūfah, the other man took the head of Ḥabīb and hung it on the withers of his mare. Then he took it to Ibn Ziyād in the palace. Ḥabīb's son, al-Qāsim b. Ḥabīb, caught sight of the head. At that time he was still an adolescent. He followed that horsemen wherever he went; he never left him. Whenever he went into the palace, al-Qāsim went in with him. When he left, al-Qāsim left with him. The latter became suspicious and asked, "My son, what is wrong with you that you follow me?" Al-Qāsim answered, "Nothing." He said, "Yes, there is, my son. Tell me." Al-Qāsim told him, "This head that you have is the head of my father. Will you give it to me so that I may bury it?" He answered, "My son, the governor would not be pleased if it were buried, and I want the governor to give me a good reward for killing him." The boy cried out, "But God will only give you an evil reward. My God! You have killed one who is better than you." Then he burst into tears. The boy waited until the time when he was grown up. Then his only concern was to track down his father's killer, to find him unprepared, and to kill him for his father. In the time of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr while Muṣ'ab was attacking Bājumayrā,[466] al-Qāsim b. Ḥabīb went into Muṣ'ab's camp; there he found his father's murderer in his tent. He began to come frequently in order to look for him; he sought for a moment when he was unprepared. He visited him while he was taking his midday siesta. He struck him with his sword until he was dead.

466. This campaign at Bājumayrā, which is near Takrīt in the region of Mosul in Iraq (See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 454–55), probably went on for three seasons; the eventual battle between Muṣ'ab and 'Abd al-Malik book place in either 71 (690–91) or 72 (691–92). See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 188–95.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Qays: When Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir was killed, it overwhelmed Ḥusayn and at that he said, "I will dedicate my life and my brave companions to God."

Al-Ḥurr began to recite:

I swear that I will not be killed until I have killed.
Today I will only be struck advancing [350] While I strike them with a biting blow from my sword.
I will not be cowardly before them, nor will I run away.

He also recited:

I will strike my sword against their men of good repute on behalf of the best man who settled at Minā and al-Khayf.

He and Zuhayr b. al-Qayn fought fiercely against them. When one of them attacked, if he became surrounded by fighters, the other attacked until he freed him. They both did that for some time. Then foot soldiers attacked al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd and killed him. Abū Thumāmah al-Ṣā'idī was also killed. His cousin was his opponent.

Then they prayed the midday prayer. Al-Ḥusayn prayed the prayer of fear with them.[467] They fought again after midday. Their battle was very fierce and it reached al-Ḥusayn. However, [Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh][468] al-Ḥanafī came forward in front of him. He was exposed to them while they shot arrows to his right and left. He stood in front of al-Ḥusayn while he continued to be shot at until he fell.

Zuhayr b. al-Qayn fought fiercely while reciting:

I am Zuhayr. I am the son of al-Qayn.
I will drive them away from Ḥusayn with my sword.

He began to tap Ḥusayn on the shoulder while he said:

---

467. This form of prayer was said to have been introduced by the Prophet at al-Ḥudaybiyyah. The people divide into two groups. One group performs the prayer while the other group acts as guard; then the two groups change roles. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, II, 573.

468. Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh was added from Balādhurī. See Ansāb, II/2, 195.

Forward, you have been guided as one who guides, who is rightly guided (mahdī).
Today, you will meet your grandfather, the Prophet,
And al-Ḥasan, and him whom God is pleased with, ʿAlī, and the iron-clad young man with two wings[469]
And the lion of God, the martyr who still lives.[470]

Kathīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Shaʿbī and Muḥājir b. Aws attacked him and killed him.

Nāfiʿ b. Hilāl al-Jamalī had written his name on the tips of his arrows. He began to shoot them when they were marked while declaring:

I am al-Jamalī. I believe in the religion of ʿAlī.

Nāfiʿ b. Hilāl al-Jamalī killed twelve of the followers of ʿUmar b. Saʿd beside those he wounded. He struck out until both his upper arms were broken and he was taken prisoner. Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan apprehended him. He had with him some of his followers, who drove Nāfiʿ along until he was brought before ʿUmar b. Saʿd. ʿUmar b. Saʿd said to him, "Woe upon you Nāfiʿ! What made you do what you have done to yourself?" He answered, "My Lord has taught me what I should want." Blood was flowing onto his beard as he continued, "By God! I have killed twelve of you beside those I have wounded. I do not blame myself for the effort. If there remained to me an upper arm and a forearm, you would not have captured me." Shamir, said to ʿUmar, "Kill him, may God make you prosperous." ʿUmar replied, "You brought him. You kill him if you want to." Shamir drew his sword. Nāfiʿ said to him, "By God! If you were one of the Muslims, how terrible you would feel to meet God with our blood on your hands. Praise be to God, Who has ordained that our fate should come through the wicked ones of His creatures." Then Shamir killed him. [351]

Shamir began to launch an attack against them while he recited:

Escape, enemies of God, escape from Shamir, who will strike you with his sword and does not flee.
He is a bitter pill, a poison and bitter herb for you.

469. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib. See *EI*², s.v. Djaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.
470. Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥamza b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib.

When the followers of al-Ḥusayn realized that the enemy had become numerous and that they would no longer be able to defend Ḥusayn, or themselves, they vied with each other to be killed in front of him. 'Abdallāh and 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the two sons of 'Azrah,[471] both of Ghifār, declared, "Abū 'Abdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn), the enemy have driven us back to you. We want to be killed in front of you while we protect and defend you." He replied, "Welcome to you both. Come closer to me." They went close to him. Then they began to fight close beside him while one of them recited:

Banū Ghifār, Banū Nizār, and Khindif after them know truly [352] That we will strike against dissolute men with every sharp-edged cutting sword.
People, defend the sons of free men with swords and brandished spears.

Two young men of Jābir, Sayf b. al-Ḥārith b. Suray' and Mālik b. 'Abd b. Suray', paternal cousins and half-brothers through their mother,[472] came and drew near Ḥusayn; they were weeping. Al-Ḥusayn said, "Cousins, what is making you cry? By God! I hope that in a short time you will both be joyful." They replied, "May God accept our lives for yours; it is not for ourselves that we weep, but we weep for you, for we see you surrounded and we cannot defend you." He said, "May God reward you with the best reward of the pious for your grief for that and for your giving up your own lives for me."

Ḥanẓalah b. As'ad al-Shibāmī[473] advanced in front of Ḥusayn and began to call out, "'O my people! I fear for you the same as happened on the Day of the Allies, the same as happened to the people of Noah, and 'Ād and Thamūd, and those who came after them, but God does not want injustice for His servants. O my people! I fear for you on the Day of Summoning, a day when you will turn back retreating; there will be no protector for you from

471. 'Abdallāh and 'Abd al-Raḥmān are mentioned for the first time.
472. Sayf b. al-Ḥārith b. Suray' and Mālik are mentioned for the first time.
473. Ḥanẓalah b. As'ad al-Shibāmī is mentioned for the first time.

God. Whoever God causes to err, has no guide.'[474] People, do not kill Ḥusayn, '...for God will destroy you with punishment. He who forges a lie will be disappointed.'"[475] Ḥusayn said to him, "May God have mercy on you, Ibn As'ad. Indeed, they have brought punishment on themselves when they refused the right that you summoned them to. They have come against you to destroy you and your companions. Therefore, how is it to be for them now when they have killed your righteous brothers?" He said, "You have spoken truly, may I sacrifice my life for you. You are more knowledgeable than I and more correct. Shall we not go [353] to the next world and join our brothers?" Al-Ḥusayn replied, "You will go to a better place than this world and what it comprises, to a kingdom that will never be worn out." Ḥanẓalah said, "Peace be with you, Abū 'Abdallāh, and may God bless you and your family. May He make us know you in His Heaven." Al-Ḥusayn answered, "Amen, amen." Then Ḥanẓalah advanced and fought until he was killed.

The two young sons of Jābir came forward looking toward Ḥusayn and saying, "Peace be with you, son of the Apostle of God." He replied, "Peace be with you both and the mercy of God." They fought until they were killed.

Next 'Ābis b. Abī Shabīb al-Shākirī came forward. With him was Shawdhab,[476] mawlā of Shākir. 'Ābis had said to him, "What do you intend to do?" He said, "What I will do is fight alongside you on behalf of the son of the daughter of the Apostle of God until I am killed." 'Ābis told him, "That is what I thought about you. But no. Go forward in front of Abū 'Abdallāh (i.e., al-Ḥusayn) so that he may dedicate you to God as he has done with his other followers and so that I, too, may dedicate you to God. If anyone had been with me for a time, for whom I had such responsibility as I have for you, it would please me that he should come in front of me so that I should dedicate him to God. On this day, it is appropriate for us to seek the reward with all our power, for there will be no works to earn God's favor after today, only the Day of Reckoning." Shawdhab went forward, greeted al-Ḥusayn. He went on and fought until he was killed. Then 'Ābis b. Abī Shabīb said, "Abū 'Abdallāh, there has not been on the face of the earth anyone, either close or distant relative, who is dearer to me and more loved by me than you. If I were able to defend you from oppression and murder with something more precious to me than my own life and blood, I would do it. Peace be with you, Abū 'Abdallāh. I bear witness to God that I have ever been subject to your guidance and the guidance of your father." Then he walked toward them, [354] unsheathing his sword, and tapped his forehead with it.

474. Qur'ān, 40:30–33 (31–34).
475. Qur'ān, 20:64 (65).
476. Shawdhab is mentioned for the first time.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah—a man of Banu 'Abd of Hamdān called Rabī' b. Tamīm,[477] who witnessed that battle: When I saw 'Ābis advancing, I recognized him, for I had seen him in the campaigns. He was the bravest of men. I said, "People, this is the lion of lions. This is Ibn Shabīb. Let none of you go out against him." 'Ābis began to call out, "Will no man fight me man to man?" 'Umar b. Sa'd ordered stones to be thrown at him. Stones began to be thrown at him from all sides. When he saw that, he threw off his breastplate and his helmet; he charged against the people. By God, I saw him driving away more than two hundred men. Then they surrounded him on every side; he was killed. I saw his head in the hands of several men. One would claim, "I killed him." Then another would say, "I killed him." They went to 'Umar b. Sa'd who said, "Don't dispute about this. No one spear killed him." He separated them through these words.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Āṣim—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī: I saw that the followers of al-Ḥusayn had been struck down and [now the battle] had reached him and his family (ahl baytihi). The only others who were left with him were Suwayd b. 'Amr b. Abī al-Muṭā' al-Khath'amī,[478] and Bushayr b. 'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī.[479] I said to al-Ḥusayn, "Son of the Apostle of God, you know the agreement between you and me. I told you that I would fight for you as long as I saw another fighter. Since I do not see any fighter alongside you, I am free to go. You agree." He replied, "You have spoken truly, but how will it be possible for you to escape? Yet, if you can do that, you are free to go." I went to my horse. When I had seen the horses of our comrades wounded, I brought my horse and took it inside one of [355] the large tents among the tents of our comrades; I began to fight on foot. On that day, I killed two men in front of al-Ḥusayn and cut off the hand of another. On that day, al-Ḥusayn said to me several times, "May God never wither or cut off your hand. May God reward you well on behalf of the family of your Prophet." After he had given me permission to go, I brought out my horse from the tent. I settled myself on its back. I struck it so that, as it reared up on the front of its hooves, I galloped on toward the people. They moved out of my way. Fifteen of them chased after me until I reached Shufayyah, a village on the bank of the Euphrates. When they got close to me, I turned against them. Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sha'bī, Ayyūb b. Mishraḥ al-Khaywānī and Qays b. 'Abdallāh al-Ṣā'idī[480] recognized me. They said, "This is al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī. He is our cousin, we adjure you before God to leave him." Three members of Banū Tamīm who were with them agreed saying, "By God! Let us agree to our brothers; the people are entitled to ask us to refrain from their colleague when they want us to." When the members of Banū Tamīm agreed with my colleagues, the rest left me. Thus, God saved me.

477. Rabī' b. Tamīm is mentioned for the first time; this is his only report.

478. Suwayd b. 'Amr b. Abī al-Muṭā' al-Khath'amī is mentioned for the first time with regard to his role in the battle.

479. Bushayr b. 'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī is mentioned for the first time.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl Khadīj al-Kindī: Yazīd b. Ziyād—that is Abū al-Sha'thā' al-Kindī of Banū Bahdalah—went down on both knees in front of al-Ḥusayn and shot a hundred arrows and hardly five missed. As he was shooting, he would say, "I am a son of Bahdalah, the horsemen of al-'Arjulah." Al-Ḥusayn would say, "O God! Make his aim be straight when he shoots and make his reward heaven." After he had shot them, he stood up and said, "Only five of the arrows have missed and it is clear to me that I have killed five men." He was among the first who were [356] killed. On that day he recited:

I am Yazīd. My father is Muhāṣir.
I am braver than a lion lurking in its covert.

480. Qays b. 'Abdallāh al-Ṣā'idī is mentioned for the first time.

O Lord, I am a supporter of al-Ḥusayn, and one who has abandoned and left Ibn Sa'd.

Yazīd b. Ziyād b. al-Muhāṣir had been one of those who had come with 'Umar b. Sa'd against al-Ḥusayn. When they had rejected the conditions made by al-Ḥusayn, he had gone across to him and fought alongside him until he had been killed.

In the case of 'Amr[481] b. Khālid al-Ṣaydāwī, Jābir b. al-Ḥārith al-Salmānī, Sa'd, the mawlā of 'Amr b. Khālid, and Mujammi' b. 'Abdallāh al-'Ā'idhī,[482] they had fought at the beginning of the battle and had been at the forefront of the attack with their swords against the people. However, when they had penetrated too deeply, the people turned on them, began to gain the advantage over them and cut them off from their colleagues, who were not far away. Al-'Abbās b. 'Alī attacked the people and rescued them. They returned but they had been wounded. When their opponents got near them, they attacked them with their swords. They had fought at the very beginning of the battle until they were killed at the same place.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Zuhayr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zuhayr al-Khath'amī: The last of his followers left with al-Ḥusayn was Suwayd b. 'Amr b. Abī al-Mutā' al-Khath'amī.

On that day, the first of Banū Abī Ṭālib to be killed was 'Alī al-Akbar b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī. His mother was Laylā bt. Abī Murrah b. 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī.[483] He attacked the people, while declaring:

I am 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī.
By the House of God! We are those with better claim to the Prophet.
By God! The son of an illegitimate son will not judge us!

---

481. Following the Constantinople ms. and reading 'Amr as in Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 172.

482. 'Amr, his mawlā Sa'd and Mujammi' were three of the group of four who came to al-Ḥusayn with al-Ṭirimmāḥ. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 172. Jābir's name occurs for the first time; he is otherwise unknown.

483. Laylā was a wife of al-Ḥusayn. 'Alī al-Akbar was the only child she bore al-Ḥusayn. See Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 379. Her father, Abū Murrah, is otherwise unknown.

He declared these words several times, and the Kūfans were afraid to kill him. Then Murrah b. Munqidh b. al-Nu'mān al-'Abdī[484] saw him. He said, "If I do not deprive his father of him, may the felonies of the Arabs come on me if he passes me doing the same as he has been doing." 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn continued to attack the people, but then Murrah b. Munqidh came against him and stabbed him. He was struck down and the people fell upon him, cutting him with their swords. [357]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī: On that day I heard al-Ḥusayn saying, "May God kill the people who killed you, my son. How courageous they are against the Merciful God and in violating the inviolable kin of the Apostle of God! After you the world means nothing for me." Then I saw a woman like the rising sun come out, hurrying. She was crying, "My brother, my nephew!" I asked who she was and was told that it was Zaynab, daughter of Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of God. She came and threw herself on him. Al-Ḥusayn went, took her by the hand and then led her back to the tent. Then he went to his son, and his young men went to him. He said, "Carry your brother back." They carried him and put him before the tent that they had been fighting in front of.

'Amr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Ṣaddā'ī[485] shot an arrow at 'Abdallāh b. Muslim b. 'Aqīl.[486] As 'Abdallāh put up his hand to guard his brow, [the arrow struck his hand and penetrated through to his brow, and fixed his hand to his forehead]. He was not able to move his hand.[487] Then another arrow was directed at him that split his heart in two.

The people began to drive against them from every side. 'Abd-

484. Murrah b. Munqidh b. al-Nu'mān al-'Abdī fought at the Battle of the Camel for 'Alī. See Ṭabarī, I, 3202. The supporters of al-Mukhtār tried to kill him in vengeance for his part in this battle but, although he was wounded, he escaped and joined their enemies. See Ṭabarī, II, 667.

485. It is also claimed that Zayd b. Ruqād shot the arrow. See Ṭabarī, II, 667. Anyway for his part in the battle, 'Amr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Ṣaddā'ī was stabbed to death by al-Mukhtār's followers in vengeance for the death of al-Ḥusayn. See Ṭabarī, II, 678.

486. 'Abdallāh is one of the sons of Muslim b. 'Aqīl. His mother was Ruqayyah, who was a slave wife of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 62.

487. The text is clearly defective. I have added the sentence in brackets from Mufīd, Irshād, 223, and emended kaffayhi to read kaffahu.

allāh b. Quṭbah al-Ṭā'ī al-Nabhānī[488] attacked 'Awn b. 'Abdallāh [358] b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib and killed him. 'Āmir b. Nahshal al-Taymī[489] attacked Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib and killed him. 'Uthmān b. Khālid b. Usayr al-Juhanī and Bishr b. Sawṭ al-Hamdānī al-Qābiḍī[490] launched themselves against 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib,[491] and killed him. 'Abdallāh b. 'Urwah al-Khath'amī[492] shot at Ja'far b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib[493] and killed him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: A young lad came out against us. His face was young like the first splinter of the moon, and there was a sword in his hand. He was wearing a shirt and a waistcloth, and a pair of sandals, one of whose straps was broken—as I remember, it was the left. 'Amr b. Sa'd b. Nufayl al-Azdī said to me, "By God! Let me attack him." I said, "Praise be to God! What do you want to do that for? Is it not enough for you that these people who, you see, have surrounded them should do the killing?" But he insisted, "By God! Let me attack him." So he rushed against him and did not turn back until he had struck his head with his sword. The young lad fell face downward as he called out, "O uncle!" Al-Ḥusayn showed himself just like the hawk shows itself. He launched into attack like a raging lion and struck 'Amr [b. Sa'd b. Nufayl] with his sword. That man tried to fend off the blow with his arm, but his arm was cut off from the elbow; he gave a great shriek. As al-Ḥusayn turned away from him, the cavalry of the Kūfans attacked in order to save 'Amr [b. Sa'd b. Nufayl] from 488. 'Abdallāh b. Quṭbah al-Ṭā'ī al-Nabhānī is not mentioned elsewhere.

489. 'Āmir b. Nashhal al-Taymī is not mentioned elsewhere.

490. Both 'Uthman and Bishr were killed by the supporters of al-Mukhtār; then their bodies were burned in vengeance for their part in this battle. See Ṭabarī, II, 669–70.

491. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was a son of 'Aqīl, who was 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib's brother. His mother was a slave wife. See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 61.

492. Following the Constantinople ms. and reading 'Urwah for 'Azrah as in Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 200. See also Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 61; and Ṭabarī, II, 678. 'Abdallāh b. 'Urwah al-Khath'amī claimed that, although he shot arrows at them, he missed. Nevertheless, he escaped the followers of al-Mukhtār and joined their enemies. His house was destroyed by them. See Ṭabarī, II, 678.

493. Ja'far was a son of 'Aqīl; his mother was Umm al-Thaghr. See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 61.

Ḥusayn. Their horses collided against 'Amr with their chests, their hooves kicked out and they galloped with their riders over him so that they trampled him to death. The dust fell; there[494] was al-Ḥusayn standing by the head of the young lad; the lad had his feet stretched out on the ground. Ḥusayn was saying, "May [359] the people who killed you perish, for the one who will oppose them on the Day of Resurrection on your behalf will be your grandfather. By God! It is hard on your uncle that you called him and he did not answer you, or rather he answered but your cry did not help you, for, by God, those who kill his relatives are many but those who help him are few." Then he carried him.

It is just as if I can see the two feet of the boy leaving tracks in the ground while Ḥusayn held his breast close to his own. I asked myself what he would do with him. He brought him and put him with his son 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn and the other members of his family who had been slain. I asked about the boy and was told that he was al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[495]

Al-Ḥusayn remained there for a long time during that day. Whenever one of the people came against him, he would turn aside from him and was unwilling to be responsible for his death and such a dreadful sin. A man from the Banū Baddā' of Kindah called Mālik b. al-Nusayr came against him and struck him on the head with his sword. Al-Ḥusayn was wearing a hooded cloak. The sword cut through [the hood of] the cloak and wounded his head. The cloak became covered with blood. Al-Ḥusayn declared. "Because of that may you never eat and drink with your hand. May God gather you on the [Day of Judgment] with those people who are wrongdoers." He threw down the cloak and called for a cap. He put on the cap and wound a turban around it. He was tired and had become less active.

The man from Kindah had managed to take the cloak, which was made of silk. Later, when he brought it to his wife, Umm 'Abdallāh bt. al-Ḥurr—she was the sister of Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥurr 494. Anā has been omitted as in Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 58.

495. Al-Qāsim was a nephew of al-Ḥusayn; his mother was either Umm al-Salīl or a slave wife. See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 58; Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 290; and p. 180, below.

al-Baddī[496]—he began to wash the blood from the cloak. His wife said to him, "Have you brought plunder from the son of the daughter of the Apostle of God into my house? Take it away from me." His colleagues mentioned that he remained poor as a result of the wicked action until he died.[497]

[360] When al-Ḥusayn sat down, he was brought his young child. He sat the babe on his knee. They claim that the child was 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥusayn.[498]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Uqbah b. Bashīr al-Asadī[499] said: Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn told me that the blood of his family was on the hands of us from Banū Asad. I said to him, "Is it my fault? May God have mercy on you." Then I asked him what our guilt was. He answered, "Al-Ḥusayn was brought his young child; he was on his knee. Then one of you, Banū Asad, shot an arrow that slaughtered the child. Al-Ḥusayn caught the blood [in his hand]. When the palm of his hand was full, he poured the blood onto the ground and said, "O Lord, if it be that You have kept the help of heaven from us, then let it be because Your purpose is better than [immediate] help. Take vengeance for us on these oppressors."

'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī[500] shot an arrow at Abū Bakr b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī[501] and killed him. The poet, Ibn Abī 'Aqib [al-Laythī], said [of it]:

---

496. Neither Umm 'Abdallāh bt. al-Ḥurr or the man of Kindah is mentioned elsewhere.

497. According to Ṭabarī, II, 668, the followers of al-Mukhtār cut his legs off and beat him to death in vengeance for his part in the battle.

498. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥusayn's mother was al-Rabāb daughter of Imru' al-Qays. See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 59.

499. 'Uqbah b. Bashīr al-Asadī is an otherwise unknown reporter of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 223.

500. In his youth, 'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī had been a Khārijite rebel with Mustawrid. See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 29ff. Later he escaped from the followers of al-Mukhtār, who destroyed his house for his part in this battle. See Ṭabarī, II, 678. He was killed in Ibn al-Ash'ath's rebellion at the Battle of Dayr Jamājim in 82 (701). See Ṭabarī, II, 59, and Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 195.

501. Abū Bakr b. al-Ḥusayn has been corrected to Abū Bakr b. al-Ḥasan, as later in Ṭabarī, II, 387. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 201; and Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 224. Abū Bakr's name was 'Umar; see Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 295, where 'Umar is named as one of the three sons of al-Ḥasan who was killed. According to Ṭabarī, II, 387, his mother was a slave wife.

With the tribe of Ghanī is a drop of our blood, and another is with the tribe of Asad. It will be counted and remembered.[502]

They claim that al-'Abbās b. 'Alī said to his brothers on his mother's side, 'Abdallāh, Ja'far and 'Uthmān, "My brothers through my mother, go forward so that I may be your heir. For you have no children." They did and they were killed. Hāni' b. Thubayt al-Ḥaḍramī attacked 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and killed him. Then he attacked Ja'far b. 'Alī and killed him. He brought back his head. Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Aṣbaḥī[503] shot an arrow at 'Uthmān b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. Then a man from Banū Abān b. Dārim attacked him and killed him. Another man from Banū Abān b. Dārim shot at Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib[504] and killed him. He took away his head.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū al-Hudhayl,[505] one of the clan of Sakūn: I saw Hāni' b. Thubayt al-Ḥaḍramī sitting among a group of Ḥaḍramīs in the time of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh.[506] He was then a very old man. I heard him claim [361] that he was among those who had witnessed the killing of al-Ḥusayn and he reported: By God! I was one of ten, all of whom were on horseback. The horses were circling around and prancing in fear, as a young man from the family of al-Ḥusayn came out clutching a stick from the tents and wearing a waistcloth (izār) and a shirt. He was very frightened and looked to the right and left. I saw two pearls in his ears swinging whenever he turned. A man approached. Riding until he was close to him, he leaned 502. This verse is cited in Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 201; Ṭabarī, II, 678; and Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 57.

503. For his part in this battle, Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Aṣaḥī was killed and his body burned in vengeance for his having helped to kill al-Ḥusayn. See Ṭabarī, II, 671.

504. There is some confusion over the identity of this son of 'Alī. Mufīd made his kunyah Abū Bakr and said he was a son of Laylā bt. Mas'ūd. See Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 168. Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī maintained that he was the son of Asmā', daughter of Umays al-Khath'ami. See Ṭabarī, I, 3471. The greater evidence is that he was the son of a slave wife. See Ṭabarī, I, 3471, and Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 56.

505. Perhaps Abū al-Hudhayl was Ghālib b. Hudhayl al-Kūfī, a traditionist, who died between 140 (757) and 150 (767). See Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 44.

506. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh became governor of Iraq in 105 (724) and remained in the post until 120 (738). See *EI*², s.v. Khālid b. 'Abd Allāh al-Ḳasrī.

down from his horse. Then he overcame the boy and cut him down with his sword.[507]

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—the Sakūnī said: Hānī' b. Thubayt was the man who had killed the youth. When he was blamed for it, he attributed it to someone other than himself.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Amr b. Shamir[508]—Jābir (b. Yazīd) al-Ju'fī:[509] Al-Ḥusayn's thirst became so great that he approached in order to drink water. Ḥuṣayn b. Tamīm shot an arrow at him, and it landed in his mouth. The blood spurted from his mouth, and he brushed it away into the air. Then he praised and glorified God. He brought his hands together and said, "O God! Count their number, destroy their power and do not let one of them remain on the earth."

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—his father, Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib[510]—al-Qāsim b. al-Aṣbagh b. Nubātah[511]—one of those who was a witness in the camp of al-Ḥusayn: When Ḥusayn's camp was overrun, he rode toward the dam, trying to reach the Euphrates. One of the Banū Abān b. Dārim shouted, "Woe upon you! Prevent him from getting to the water. Don't let his Shī'ah get to him." He whipped his horse, and the people followed him so that they prevented al-Ḥusayn from getting to [362] the Euphrates. Then al-Ḥusayn cried out, "O God! Make him thirsty!" The Abānī took out an arrow and lodged it in al-Ḥusayn's throat. Al-Ḥusayn pulled out the arrow and held out the palms of his hands. Both were filled with blood. Then al-Ḥusayn

507. The youth is not identified in the text. It may have been either 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī or Ja'far b. 'Alī, whom Hānī' has just been reported to have killed.

508. 'Amr b. Shamir was a follower of the sixth Shī'ite Imām Ja'far al-Ṣādiq who died in 148 (765). He was regarded by the Shī'ah as an unreliable transmitter; he chiefly reported from Jābir b. Yazīd al-Ju'fī. See Najāshī, Rijāl, 220.

509. Jābir (b. Yazīd) al-Ju'fī was a follower of both the fifth Shī'ite Imām, Muḥammad al-Bāqir, and the sixth Imām, Ja'far al-Ṣādiq. He was regarded by the Shī'ah as having mixed with extremists. Although he wrote many books, they regard them as suspect. He wrote an account of the death of al-Ḥusayn; he died in 128 (745–46). See Najāshī, Rijāl, 99–100.

510. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib was an authority on genealogy and the Qur'ān; he died in al-Kūfah in 146 (763). See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, ed. and trans. Bayard Dodge, I, 205–6.

511. Al-Qāsim's father, al-Aṣbagh b. Nubātah, was a well-known Shī'ite and supporter of 'Alī. Al-Aṣbagh wrote a book on the death of al-Ḥusayn. Perhaps this report is from his father's book. See al-Ṭūsī, Fihrist, 63.

said, "O God! I complain to you about what is being done to the son of the daughter of your Prophet."

By God! The man from Banū Abān b. Dārim only waited a short time before God cast down on him a thirst that he could never quench.

According to al-Qāsim b. al-Aṣbagh: You could have seen me among those who used to visit that man. There would be cold water with date wine in it, glasses with milk in them, and earthenware bottles with water, and yet he would say, "Woe upon you! Give me a drink, for the thirst is killing me." Then he would be given the earthenware bottle or the glass, which would have quenched the thirst of a whole family. He would drink it. When he took it away from his mouth, he would rest for a moment. Then he would say, "Woe upon you! Give me a drink, for the thirst is killing me." By God! It was not long before his belly was split open as if it were a camel's belly.

According to Abū Mikhnaf's account: Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan advanced with a group of about ten Kūfan foot soldiers opposite the place where al-Ḥusayn had put his baggage and his family. Al-Ḥusayn moved toward it but they cut him off from his baggage. Al-Ḥusayn cried out, "Shame on you! If you have no religion and do not fear the Day of Return, then [at least] in matters of your world be freeborn men, who have some qualities of nobility, and prevent the mean and ignorant among you from getting to my baggage and my family." Ibn Dhī al-Jawshan retorted, "That is your task, son of Fāṭimah." He advanced against him with the foot soldiers. Among them were: Abū al-Janūb—his name was 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ju'fī, al-Qash'am b. 'Amr b. Yazīd al-Ju'fī,[512] Ṣāliḥ b. Wahb al-Yazanī,[513] Sinān b. Anas al-Nakha'ī,[514] and Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Aṣbaḥī.[515] Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan began to urge them on. He went past Abū al-Janūb, 512. Balādhurī gave his name as al-Qash'am b. 'Amr b. Nadhīr and added that he was among those who held back from supporting 'Alī. See Ansāb, II/2, 202. He is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

513. Ṣāliḥ b. Wahb al-Yazanī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

514. It is reported that in the days of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, Sinān b. Anas al-Nakha'ī's tongue used to stick in his throat; he became mad and, whenever he ate, he had to defecate, because of the part he played in killing al-Ḥusayn. See Ṭabarī, III, 2333.

515. Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Aṣbaḥī also took al-Ḥusayn's head. See text p. 161, below; and Balādhurī, Ansāb, II/2, 202.

[363] who was fully armed and told him, "Advance against him." Abū al-Janūb retorted, "What is stopping you from advancing against him?" Shamir said, "Are you saying that to me?" Abū Janūb demanded, "Are you saying it to me?" They cursed each other and Abū al-Janūb—he was a brave man—said, "By God! I am tempted to dash the point of my spear into your eye." Shamir went away from him, declaring, "By God! If I have the power to harm you, I will harm you."

Then Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan advanced with the foot soldiers toward al-Ḥusayn. Al-Ḥusayn began to attack them and they drew back from him. They surrounded him completely. A boy from his family came toward al-Ḥusayn. His aunt, Zaynab, daughter of 'Alī, caught hold of him to stop him. Al-Ḥusayn told her to keep him with her but the boy refused. He rushed forward to al-Ḥusayn and stood at his side.[516] Baḥr b. Ka'b b. 'Ubaydallāh of the Banū Taym Allāh b. Tha'labah b. 'Ukābah[517] rushed toward al-Ḥusayn with a sword. The young lad said to him, "Son of an impure woman, are you trying to kill my uncle?" Baḥr struck at him with his sword. The boy tried to fend off the blow with his arm. The sword cut through it to the skin; there was the arm hanging. The boy cried out, "O my mother!" Al-Ḥusayn took hold of him and embraced him. He said to him, "My nephew, try to bear what has come to you and consider the good in it, for God will unite you with your righteous ancestors, with the Apostle of God, with 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, Ḥamzah, Ja'far and al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: On that day I heard al-Ḥusayn say, "O God! Keep the drops of rain from the sky from them. Deny them the blessings of the earth. Even as You have made [life] pleasant for them for a [364] time, divide them into factions, and make them follow the ways of factions and let their rulers never be pleased with them. They summoned us so that they might support us and then they became hostile to us and killed us." He struck out against the foot soldiers until they drew back from him.

---

516. It is unclear who the boy was; Baḥr was not listed as having killed any of al-Ḥusayn's nephews.

517. Baḥr b. Ka'b b. 'Ubaydallāh is unknown apart from his part in this battle and the consequence for him of it. See pp. 159, 161, below.

When al-Ḥusayn was left with only a group of three or four, he called for a pair of well-woven trousers (sarāwīl) in which the edge, which was of well-woven Yemenī cloth, glittered. He tore them and split them open so that he should not have them plundered. One of his followers said to him, "You should wear underbreeches (tubbān)[518] under them." He answered, "Those are lowly clothes, and it is not appropriate for me to wear them." When he was killed, Baḥr b. Ka'b plundered him of [the trousers] and left him naked.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Amr b. Shu'ayb[519]—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān:[520] The hands of Baḥr b. Ka'b were so wet in winter that they used to sprinkle water and they were so dry in summer that they were like sticks.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥajjāj [b. 'Alī]—'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār b. 'Abd Yāguth al-Bāriqī:[521] Afterwards, 'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār was blamed for being present at the killing of al-Ḥusayn but 'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār maintained, "I have done a favor to the Banū Hāshim." We asked, "What favor have you done them?" He answered, "I attacked Ḥusayn with my spear. I came toward him. By God! I could have stabbed him if I had wanted to. Then I turned aside from him but not too far away, for I said to myself, 'What will I achieve by taking his killing on myself? Let someone else kill him.'"

Then 'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār reported: The foot soldiers attacked him from right and left. He launched himself against those to his right until they dispersed. Then he launched himself against those to his left until they dispersed. He was wearing one of his shirts of silk and a turban. By God! I have never seen such persistence. His sons, his family and his followers had been killed, Yet he was stronger in heart. Neither was anyone sharper in spirit than he, nor bolder in advancing. By God! I have not seen his like before or [365]

518. Tubbān are described as small trousers; they cover the private parts, and they are worn by sailors. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. tbn.

519. 'Amr b. Shu'ayb was a well-known traditionist, who died in 118 (736). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 48–55.

520. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

521. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ammār was at one time a follower of 'Alī; however, he had a considerable change of heart. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 204.

since. If the foot soldiers were there, they would retreat from his right and his left as the goats retreat when the wolf comes upon them. By God! He was just like that when Zaynab, daughter of Fāṭimah, came out. I could see her earrings bobbing between her ears and her shoulders. She was saying, "I wish that the sky would come down on the earth." 'Umar b. Sa'd had come closer to Ḥusayn and she called out, "'Umar b. Sa'd, is Abū 'Abdallāh being killed while you watch?" I could see 'Umar's tears flowing down his cheeks and beard as he turned his face away from her.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: Al-Ḥusayn was wearing a shirt (jubbah) of silk and a turban that had been dyed with woad. I heard him say before he was killed, while he was fighting on foot like a brave horseman, avoiding blows, taking advantage of gaps [in the ranks] and attacking the cavalry, "Are you urging one another to kill me? By God! After me you will not kill another servant of God, for God will be more displeased with you for killing than He will be with me. By God! I hope that God will favor me by making you lowly. Then may He grant me vengeance on you without your perceiving it. By God! If you kill me, God will send misfortune among you and cause the shedding of your blood. Nor will God be satisfied until He has multiplied the dread torture for you."

There was a long delay through the day. If the people had wanted to kill him, they could have done so but each of them was averting the action; each hoped the other would kill al-Ḥusayn. Each of them preferred that the others should do the deed. Then Shamir shouted among the people, "Shame on you! Why are you waiting for the man? Kill him, may your mothers be deprived of you!" So an attack was launched against him on every side. A blow was struck against his left hand by Zur'ah b. Sharīk al-Tamīmī.[522] It [366] hit him on his shoulder. They withdrew while he was falling and stumbling. As he was in that plight, Sinān b. Anas b. 'Amr al-Nakha'ī attacked him and stabbed him with his spear. He fell. Sinān told Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Asbaḥī to cut off his head. The latter wanted to do so but he was weak; he trembled. Sinān b. Anas said to him, "May God crush your arms and take away your hands." He bent down, killed him and cut his head off. It was, then, handed to Khawalī b. Yazīd.

522. Zur'ah b. Sharīk al-Tamīmī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

Before that al-Ḥusayn had been struck by [many] swords.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī:[523] When al-Ḥusayn was killed, there were thirty-three stab wounds and thirty-four blows.

[Ḥumayd] continued: Sinān b. Anas did not let anyone go near al-Ḥusayn without attacking him, out of fear that he might be deprived of al-Ḥusayn's head. Then he took al-Ḥusayn's head and handed it to Khawalī. The body of al-Ḥusayn was plundered as it was. Baḥr b. Ka'b took his trousers. Qays b. al-Ash'ath took his cloak. It was silken, and he was afterward called Qays of the cloak. One of Banū Awd called al-Aswad took his sandals, and one of the Banū Nahshal b. Dārim took his sword. Later it came into the possession of the family of Ḥabīb b. Budayl.[524]

The people turned to the turmeric, the garments and the camels [in al-Ḥusayn's camp]; they plundered them. The people turned to the womenfolk of al-Ḥusayn, his baggage, and equipment. The women had their clothes ripped off their backs, they were forcibly deprived of them and they were taken away from them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Zuhayr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Khath'amī: Suwayd b. 'Amr b. Abī al-Muṭā' had been brought [367] down and was covered with wounds. He had fallen wounded amid those killed. As he recovered consciousness, he heard them saying that al-Ḥusayn had been killed. He had a knife but his sword had been taken. So he fought against them with the knife for a time, but then he was killed. 'Urwah b. Biṭār al-Taghlibī[525] and Zayd b. Ruqād al-Janbī[526] killed him. He was the last to be killed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rashīd—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: I came to 'Alī al-Aṣghar b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī. He was 523. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī was a great-grandson of al-Ḥusayn and the sixth Imām of the Shī'ah, who died in 148/765. See *EI*², s.v. Dja'far al-Ṣādiḳ.

524. Ḥabīb b. Budayl became governor of al-Rayy in 131 (748). See Ṭabarī, III, 2–3.

525. Balādhurī gave 'Urwah's name as 'Azrah b. Biṭān. See Ansāb II/2, 204. Under either name he is otherwise unknown.

526. Zayd b. Ruqād al-Janbī is also claimed to have been responsible for the killing of 'Abdallāh b. Muslim b. 'Aqīl. He was burned to death by the supporters of al-Mukhtār in vengeance for his part in the battle. See Ṭabarī, II, 667–68.

stretched out on his bed and he was ill. There was Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan with some foot soldiers who were asking him, "Shall we not kill this one?" I said, "Praise be to God! Will boys be killed, for this is only a boy?" I went on arguing like that so that I kept all who came away from him until 'Umar b. Sa'd arrived. He ordered, "No one should enter the tent of these women nor disturb this sick boy. Whoever has taken any of their belongings should return them." By God! No one returned anything. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn said to me, "May you be a well-rewarded man, for by God, God kept evil away from me through your words."

People said to Sinān b. Anas, "You have killed Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, the son of Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of God. You have killed the greatest of the Arabs in nobility, who came to these people with the intention of taking them away from the despotism over them. So go to your leaders and ask them for your reward. If they give you their treasure houses for killing al-Ḥusayn, it would be little." Sinān went forward on his horse. He was a poet and there was an insanity (lūthah) in him. He went and stood at the entrance of 'Umar b. Sa'd's tent and called out at the top of his voice:

[368] Fill my saddlebag with silver and gold.
I have killed the well-guarded king.
I have killed the man of noblest parents
and when people trace descent his is the best.[527]

'Umar b. Sa'd declared, "I testify that you are mad. You could never be sane. Bring him in to me." When Sinān was brought in, 'Umar struck him with a cane and said, "Madman, are you uttering these words? By God! If Ibn Ziyād heard you, he would have your head cut off."

'Umar b. Sa'd apprehended 'Uqbah b. Sim'ān. He was the mawlā of al-Rabāb bt. Imru' al-Qays of Kalb, who was the mother of Sukaynah, daughter of al-Ḥusayn. He asked him who he was. He answered, "I am a slave who is possessed [by another]." So he let him go.

No one else among them escaped except for al-Muraqqa' b.

527. These verses came earlier. See p. 76, above.

Thumāmah al-Asadī.[528] He had been shooting arrows as he knelt on his knees and fought. A group of his own tribe had come to him and said, "You are guaranteed safe-conduct. Come out to us." He had gone out to them. When 'Umar b. Sa'd had gone with them to Ibn Ziyād and told him about al-Muraqqa', Ibn Ziyād sent him to al-Zārrah.

Then 'Umar b. Sa'd called out among his followers, "Who will volunteer [to go] to al-Ḥusayn and make his horse trample on al-Ḥusayn's body?" Ten volunteered. Among them was Isḥāq b. Ḥaywah al-Ḥaḍramī,[529] who was the one who stole al-Ḥusayn's shirt and later got leprosy, and Aḥbash b. Marthad b. 'Alqamah b. Salāmah al-Ḥaḍramī.[530] They trampled on the body of al-Ḥusayn with their horses until they had crushed his back and his chest. I learned that some time later an arrow from an unknown direction hit Aḥbash b. Marthad as he was standing in a battle. It split his heart, and he died.

Seventy-two men of the followers of al-Ḥusayn were killed. Some of the Banū Asad, who dwelt at al-Ghādiriyyah, buried al-Ḥusayn and his followers a day after they had been killed. Eighty- [369] eight men of the followers of 'Umar b. Sa'd were killed apart from those who were wounded. 'Umar b. Sa'd prayed over them and buried them.

No sooner had al-Ḥusayn been killed than on the very same day his head was despatched with Khawalī b. Yazīd and Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. Khawalī traveled with the head. When he arrived at the palace, he found the door locked. He went to his own house and put the head under a washing tub in his house. He lived with two women, one from the Banū Asad tribe and the other from the Ḥaḍramīs. The latter was called al-Nawār bt. Mālik b. 'Aqrab.[531] That night was his night with the Ḥaḍramī woman.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—his father [Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib]—al-Nawār bt. Mālik: Khawalī came with the 528. Al-Muraqqa' b. Thumāmah al-Asadī was a supporter of al-Ḥusayn, he was not previously mentioned.

529. Isḥāq b. Ḥaywah al-Ḥaḍramī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

530. Aḥbash is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

531. Al-Nawār is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

head of al-Ḥusayn and put it under a washing tub in his house. He came into the room and went to bed. I asked him, "What is the news? What has happened to you?" He answered, "I have brought you the wealth of ages. There is the head of al-Ḥusayn with you in the house." I cried out, "Shame on you! People bring gold and silver, and you bring the head of the son of the Apostle of God. No, by God! You and I will never be together again in any room." I jumped from my bed and went out into the house. He called the Asadī woman and made her sleep with him. I sat on watch. By God! I began to see a light that spread like a pillar from the sky toward the washing tub and I saw white birds futtering round it. In the morning, Khawalī took the head to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād.

'Umar b. Sa'd remained for the rest of that day and the next. Then he ordered Ḥumayd b. Bukayr al-Aḥmarī to announce the departure to al-Kūfah among the people. He took with him the daughters and sisters of al-Ḥusayn, the children who had been with him, and 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, who was sick.

[370] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zuhayr al-'Absī—Qurrah b. Qays al-Tamīmī: I looked at those women. As they passed Ḥusayn and the members of his family and his sons, they shrieked and tore at their faces. I turned my horse toward them. I had never seen a sight of women more beautiful than the sight I saw of those women. By God! They were more beautiful than wild cows at Yabrīn. Among the things that I will never forget: I will never forget the words of Zaynab, the daughter of Fāṭimah, as she passed the prostrate body of her brother, al-Ḥusayn. She was saying, "O Muḥammad! O Muḥammad! May the angels of heaven bless you. Here is Ḥusayn in the open, stained with blood and with limbs torn off. O Muḥammad! Your daughters are prisoners, your progeny are killed, and the east wind blows dust over them." By God! She made every enemy and friend weep.

The heads of the rest were cut off and [these] seventy-two heads were sent with Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan, Qays b. al-Ash'ath, 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj, and 'Azrah b. Qays. They journeyed until they brought them to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: 'Umar b. Sa'd summoned me and sent me to his family to tell them the good news of his health, for God had given him victory. I journeyed until I came to his family. I informed them of his news. Then I went on to visit 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. I found Ibn Ziyād holding an assembly for the people. I found that the delegation had already come to him. He had allowed them to enter and had given permission for the people to enter. So I went in with those who entered. There was the head of al-Ḥusayn placed in front of him. There he was, poking between its teeth with a cane. When Zayd b. Arqam saw that he continued to poke the head with his cane, he said, "Raise that cane from those teeth, for by God other than Whom there is no god, I have seen the lips of the Apostle of God kiss those lips." Then the old man began to [371] weep. Ibn Ziyād said, "May God make your eyes weep, for, by God, if it were not for the fact that you are an old man, who has become silly and your mind has left you, I would cut off your head." Zayd b. Arqam stood up and left. When he had gone, I heard the people saying, "By God! Zayd b. Arqam said such words which, if Ibn Ziyād had heard, he would have killed him." I asked, "What did he say?" They replied, "As he passed us, he was saying: 'A slave has given power to a slave and he has made the people his inheritance. You, Arabs, are the slaves after today. You killed the son of Fāṭimah when Ibn Marjānah ordered you. He will kill the best among you and enslave the evil among you. You have accepted humiliation. Let destruction come to those who accept humiliation.'"

When the head of Ḥusayn was brought in with his children, sisters, and womenfolk to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, Zaynab, daughter of Fāṭimah, had dressed in her dirtiest clothes, disguising herself with her maids surrounding her. She came in and sat down. Ibn Ziyād demanded, "Who is that woman who is sitting down?" She did not answer him. He repeated the question three times, but no one answered him. Then one of her maidservants said to him, "This is Zaynab, daughter of Fāṭimah." 'Ubaydallāh said to her, "Praise be to God, Who has disgraced you, killed you and revealed the false nature of your claims." Zaynab replied, "Praise be to God, Who has favored us with Muḥammad and has purified us completely from sin.[532] It is not as you say, for He only disgraces the great sinner and reveals the false nature of the profligate." He asked, "How do you consider God has treated your family?" She replied, "God decreed death for them, and they went forward to their resting places. God will gather you and us together. You will plead your excuses to Him and we will be your adversaries before Him." Ibn Ziyād became enraged and burnt with anger. 'Amr b. Ḥurayth intervened, "May God make the governor prosperous, [372] she is only a woman. Are women responsible for anything that they say? Do not hold her responsible for her words, or blame her for foolish talk." Ibn Ziyād said to her, "God has healed my soul from your tyrant and the rebellious, disobedient members of your family." Zaynab wept and then said: "By my life! You have killed the mature of my family; you have ruined my family; you have cut down my young branches; you have pulled out my root. If this satisfies you, then you have your fill."

532. A reference to Qur'ān, 33:33.

'Ubaydallāh declared, "By my life! This is real bravery. Your father was a brave poet." She answered, "What has a woman to do with bravery? Indeed, I have things to distract me from bravery, but what I say is just a spontaneous expression."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd: When 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād noticed 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, he said to one of the police, "See whether this one has attained the status of a man." After he had pulled his waistcloth from him, he said that he had. Ibn Ziyād ordered, "Take him away and cut his head off." 'Alī said, "There is a kinship between you and these women. So send a man with them to look after them." Ibn Ziyād told him to go and sent him with them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: I was standing by Ibn Ziyād when 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn was presented to him. He asked him, "What is your name?" He replied, "I am 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn." Ibn Ziyād said, "Did not God kill 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn?" he was silent so Ibn Ziyād asked him, "What is wrong with you that you do not speak?" He answered, "I had a brother who was also called 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, and the people killed him." Ibn Ziyād retorted, "God killed him." 'Alī was silent. Ibn Ziyād demanded, "What is wrong with you that you do not speak?" He answered, "'God receives the souls at the [373] time of their death.'[533] 'It is not possible for a soul to die without

533. Qur'ān, 39:42 (43).

God's permission.'"[534] Ibn Ziyād shouted, "By God! You are one of them. See whether he has matured. By God! I think he is a man."

Murrī b. Mu'ādh al-Aḥmarī[535] uncovered him and said, "Yes, he has matured." Ibn Ziyād ordered him to be killed. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn asked him, "Who will you make responsible for these women?" Zaynab, his aunt, clung to him and pleaded, "O Ibn Ziyād haven't you had enough of us? Have you not sated yourself with our blood? Will you let any of us survive?" She embraced 'Alī and continued, "I plead to you by God if you are a believer, that if you kill him, you kill me with him." 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn called to him, "Ibn Ziyād, if there is any kinship between you and the family of 'Alī send a righteous man to accompany them in a proper Islamic way." Ibn Ziyād looked at Zaynab for a time and then he looked at the people and said, "How wonderful is kinship! By God! I think that she really wants me to kill her with him, if I kill him. Leave the boy.... Go with your women."

Ḥumayd b. Muslim reported: When 'Ubaydallāh had entered the palace, and the people had entered, the call—"the prayer is general"—was made and the people gathered in the great mosque. Ibn Ziyād ascended the pulpit. He said, "Praise be to God, Who has revealed the truth and the followers of truth. He has given victory to the Commander of the Faithful, Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and his party. He has killed the liar who is the son of a liar, al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, and his Shī'ah."

Ibn Ziyād had not finished his speech when up before him jumped 'Abdallāh b. 'Afīf al-Azdī al-Ghāmidī,[536] one of the Banū Wālibah. He had been one of the Shī'ah of 'Alī, and his left eye had been lost in the Battle of the Camel alongside 'Alī. At the Battle of Ṣiffīn, he had been struck on the head and had another blow on the eyebrow; as a result his other eye had been lost. He hardly ever left the great mosque, where he used to pray until night and then go. When he heard Ibn Ziyād's speech, he shouted, [374] "Son of Marjānah, the ones who are liars and sons of liars are you

534. Qur'ān, 3:145 (139).

535. Murrī b. Mu'ādh al-Aḥmarī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

536. Apart from the information given in the text, 'Abdallāh b. 'Afīf al-Azdī al-Ghāmidī is otherwise unknown.

and your father and the man who appointed you and his father. Ibn Marjānah, are you killing the sons of prophets and trying to speak the language of true men?" Ibn Ziyād ordered, "Get him for me." The soldiers jumped toward him and seized him but he gave the battle cry of al-Azd, "O Mabrūr" ("O blessed one"). 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf al-Azdī,[537] who was sitting there, declared, "You have brought trouble for others. You have destroyed yourself and you have destroyed your tribe." At that time there were seven hundred fighters of al-Azd present in al-Kūfah. Some of the young men of al-Azd moved quickly to 'Abdallāh b. 'Afīf and took him away. They brought him to his family. Then Ibn Ziyād sent to him some of those who would bring him back; they killed him. He had him crucified in the wasteland (al-sabakhah).[538]

According to Abū Mikhnaf: 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād had the head of al-Ḥusayn set up in al-Kūfah; he took it around al-Kūfah. Then he summoned Zaḥr b. Qays[539] and despatched him with the head of al-Ḥusayn and the heads of his followers to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. With Zaḥr were Abū Burdah b. 'Awf al-Azdī[540] and Ṭāriq b. Abī Ẓubyān al-Azdī.[541] They departed and took all the heads to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah in Syria.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī[542]—his father[543]—al-Ghāz b. Rabī'ah al-Jurashī of Ḥimyar:[544]

---

537. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf al-Azdī was a tribal leader of Azd and the great-uncle of Abū Mikhnaf; he died in 75 (695). See Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 219.

538. Yāqūt records an area of salty marshy land called al-sabakhah in al-Baṣrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 30. There seems to have been an area called by the same name in al-Kūfah.

539. Zaḥr b. Qays was a Kūfan tribal leader; earlier he gave testimony against Ḥujr b. 'Adī. Later he joined the supporters of Ibn al-Zubayr but then deserted them for 'Abd al-Malik. See Ṭabarī, II, 134, 614, 804.

540. Abū Burdah b. 'Awf al-Azdī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

541. Ṭāriq b. Abī Ẓubyān al-Azdī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

542. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī is only found here as an authority of Ibn al-Kalbī.

543. He is Yazīd b. Rawḥ. He is not mentioned with regard to any other incident but his grandfather was Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī of Kalb, from Syria, who was appointed governor of Medina by Muslim b. 'Uqbah; he played a role in supporting Marwān for the caliphate. See p. 221, below; and Ṭabarī, II, 479.

544. Al-Ghāz b. Rabī'ah al-Jurashī is not mentioned with regard to any other incident.

By God! I was with Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah in Damascus when Zaḥr b. Qays came to see Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. Yazīd declared, "Woe upon you! What [have you left] behind you? What have you got?" He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I bring good news of God's victory and support. Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī came against us with eighteen men of his House and sixty of his Shī'ah. We went out to meet them and we asked them to surrender and [375] submit to the authority of the governor, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, or to fight. They chose to fight rather than to surrender. We attacked them as the sun rose and surrounded them on every side. Eventually our swords took their toll of the heads of the people; they began to flee without having any refuge; they sought refuge from us on the hills and in the hollows like the doves seek refuge from a hawk. By God! Commander of the Faithful, it was only a time for the slaughtering of animals, or for a man to take his siesta before we had come upon the last of them. There were their naked bodies, their bloodstained clothes, their faces thrown in the dust. The sun burst down on them; the wind scattered [dust] over them; their visitors in this deserted and desolate place were eagles and vultures." Yazīd's eyes filled with tears, and he said, "I would have been satisfied with your obedience without killing al-Ḥusayn. May God curse Ibn Sumayyah. By God! If it had been I who had accompanied him, I would have let him off. May God have mercy on al-Ḥusayn." Yazīd gave the messenger nothing.

'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād ordered the women and children of al-Ḥusayn to be made ready for traveling. He ordered 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn to be chained with a chain around his neck. Then he despatched them, to follow the heads, with Muḥaffiz b. Tha'labah al-'Ā'idhī,[545] the clan of 'Ā'idhah of Quraysh, and Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan. They set out with them until they came to Yazīd. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn did not speak a word to either of them on that journey until they arrived. When they reached the door of Yazīd, Muḥaffiz b. Tha'labah raised his voice and shouted, "Here is [376] Muḥaffiz b. Tha'labah, who has brought the Commander of the Faithful these vile profligates." Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah answered him, "What the mother of Muḥaffiz gave birth to is more evil and grievous."

545. Muḥaffiz b. Tha'labah al-'Ā'idhī took part in the conquest of Persia; he was one of those who gave testimony against Ḥujr b. 'Adī. See Ṭabarī, I, 2460, and II, 133.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān,[546] a mawlā of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah: When the heads were put in front of Yazīd—the head of al-Ḥusayn and those of his family and his followers—Yazīd recited:

[Swords] split the skulls of men who are dear to us, but they were more disobedient and oppressive.[547]

[Then he added,] "Yet, by God, Ḥusayn, if I had been to fight you, I would not have killed you."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Ja'far al-'Absī[548]—Abū 'Umārah al-'Absī:[549] Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam, the brother of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, recited:

The heads on the plain (ṭaff) were closer in kinship than Ibn Ziyād, the slave with the false lineage.
The offspring of Umayyah have become as numerous as stones while the daughter of the Apostle of God has lost her offspring.[550]

Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah struck his hand against the chest of Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam and shouted, "Be quiet!"

When Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah held an assembly, he summoned the Syrian nobles and sat them around him. Then he summoned 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn and the children and womenfolk of al-Ḥusayn. They were brought in to him while the people looked on. Yazīd said to 'Alī, "'Alī, your father cut the bond of kinship with me, showed ignorance of my rights, and tried to deprive me of my position of authority. God has treated him in the way you have [377] seen." 'Alī replied, "'No misfortune strikes the earth or yourselves unless it has been written in a book before We bring it into

546. Al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān also reported about the Battle of Ṣiffīn, giving reports about the Syrians. See Ṭabarī, I, 3248, 3406.

547. The verse has been quoted earlier. See p. 76, above.

548. Abū Ja'far al-'Absī only reported this account to Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 188.

549. The only report Abū 'Umārah al-'Absī has given. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 188.

550. Quoted by Balādhurī. See Ansāb, II/2, 222.

existence.'"[551] Yazīd urged his son, Khālid,[552] to answer him. However, Khālid did not know what to say in reply. So Yazīd answered, "Say: 'Whatever misfortune has struck you is because of what your hands have earned, and he excuses much.'"[553] At this he was silent.

Yazīd summoned the women and the children and they were made to sit in front of him. He saw a dreadful sight. He said, "May God detest Ibn Marjānah. If there had been any kinship between him and you, he would not have done this to you; he would not have sent you thus."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b—Fāṭimah, daughter of 'Alī:[554] When we were made to sit before Yazīd, he showed pity to us, ordered things for us and was kind to us. Then a Syrian with a red face stood up before Yazīd and said, "Commander of the Faithful, give me this one." He meant me. I was a pretty young girl. I shuddered and moved away, for I thought that that would be allowed them. I caught hold of the skirt of my sister Zaynab. My sister Zaynab was older and cleverer than I. She said that that would not happen. She said to the Syrian, "By God! You are a liar! By God! You are too lowly born! Such a thing is not for you, nor for him!" Yazīd cried out angrily, "By God! You are a liar! That is for me. If I wish to do it, I can do it." She retorted, "No, by God! God would only let you do that if you left our faith and professed belief in another religion." Yazīd screamed, distraught with anger, "Dare you face me in this way! It is your father who has left the religion, and your brother." Zaynab replied, [378] "You, your father and your grandfather have been guided by the religion of God, the religion of my father, the religion of my brother and my grandfather." He shouted, "Enemy of God, you lie!" She answered, "You, a commander who has authority, are vilifying unjustly and oppress with your authority." By God! It was as if he were ashamed; he became silent. The Syrian repeated,

551. Qur'ān, 57:22.

552. Khālid later studied alchemy and astronomy; he also became governor of Ḥimṣ for a time. He died during the caliphate of 'Abd al-Malik. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 359–68.

553. Qur'ān, 42:30 (29).

554. According to Mufīd, Fāṭimah should be al-Ḥusayn's daughter, not 'Alī's. See Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 231.

"Commander of the Faithful, give me that girl." Yazīd said to him, "Go away! May God strike you dead!"

Then Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah said, "Al-Nuʿman b. Bashīr, equip them with what will be useful for them and send a good, faithful Syrian with them. Send horsemen and helpers with him and let him go to Medina with them." Next he ordered the women to be lodged in an isolated house. With them [he sent] what would be useful for them. Their brother, ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn, was with them in the house. They left and went to Yazīd's house. There was not one of the women of the family of Muʿāwiyah who did not meet them with tears and weeping for al-Ḥusayn. They continued the lamentation for him for three days.

Yazīd never ate lunch or dinner without inviting ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn to join him. One day he invited him and he invited ʿAmr b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī, who was still a young boy.[555] He said to ʿAmr, "Will you fight this boy?" meaning his son, Khālid. ʿAmr replied, "No, but give me a knife and give him a knife; then I will fight him." Yazīd rose, caught hold of him and embraced him. Then he said, "That is behavior that I recognize from the father.[556] Does the snake bring forth anything but a snake?" When they were about to leave, he summoned ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn and said, "God curse Ibn Marjānah, if I had been with your father, he would never have asked a favor from me without my granting it to him; I [379] would have protected him from death with all my power, even through the destruction of some of my own children. But God has decreed what you have seen. Write to me from Medina and report everything that you need." He presented clothes to them, and entrusted them to the messenger. The latter went with them. He traveled with them at night so that they were in front of him but not out of his sight. When they stopped, he would go aside from them. He and his colleagues would spread out around them like a group of guards; he would stay in such a position so that when anyone wanted to wash or carry out a [natural] need, he would not be ashamed. He never stopped asking them what they needed; he treated them gently until they arrived at Medina.

555. ʿAmr b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī survived Karbalāʾ but Mufīd does not mention a son of al-Ḥasan as ʿAmr. See Mufīd, Irshād [trans.], 176. Perhaps it is ʿUmar; there is some confusion about this son of al-Ḥasan.

556. An Arabic proverb. Literally: "This is a piece of flesh which I recognize from Akhzam." "Akhzam" can mean a snake but it is also the name of a man. The story is that Akhzam struck his father but died before his father. Akhzam's son attacked the grandfather and he said the words that became proverbial. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, and al-Bustānī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. khzm.

According to al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b—Fāṭimah, daughter of 'Alī: I said to my sister, Zaynab, "Sister, this Syrian has treated us well! Do you think we should give him a present?" She replied, "By God! We do not have anything that we can give him except our jewelry." I said, "Let us give him our jewelry." So I took my bracelet and armband, and she took her bracelet and armband, and we offered those to him. We apologized to him and said, "This is your reward for the good way in which you have accompanied us." He said, "If what I have done was only for worldly wealth, there would be satisfaction and more in your ornaments. However, by God, I have only done this for God and for your relationship to the Apostle of God."

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī: When al-Ḥusayn had been killed, and they had brought the baggage and prisoners to al-Kūfah to 'Ubaydallāh, [he imprisoned them]. While the people were imprisoned, a stone was thrown into the prison with a letter tied to it. In the letter, it [380] said: "On such-and-such a day the courier was sent to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah for his instructions with regard to you. He will take so many days to go, and he will return on such-and-such a day. If you hear the pronouncement 'God is greater,' they have determined to kill you. If you do not hear the pronouncement 'God is greater,' it means security for you, God willing." Two or three days before the arrival of the courier, another stone was thrown into the prison with a message tied to it and a blade. In the message it said, "Make your last testimonies and wills; the courier is expected on such and such a day." The courier came and the pronouncement "God is greater" was not heard, for a letter had come saying, "Send the prisoners to me."

'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād summoned Muḥaffiz b. Tha'labah and Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan and said, "Take the baggage and the head to the Commander of the Faithful, Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah." They went until they came to Yazīd. Muḥaffiz b. Tha'labah stood [at the door] and called out at the top of his voice, "We have come with the head of the stupidest and lowliest of men." Yazīd de-cleared, "What the mother of Muḥaffiz gave birth to is stupider and lowlier, but he was a disloyal relative and a wrongdoer." When Yazīd looked at the head of al-Ḥusayn, he recited:

[Swords] split the skulls of men who are dear
to us; but they were more disobedient and oppressive.[557]

Then he said, "Do you know in what way this man was mistaken? He used to say, 'My father 'Alī is better than his father; my mother Fāṭimah is better than his mother; my grandfather the Apostle of God is better than his grandfather, and I am better than he and have more right for this affair than he has.' As for his statement that his father is better than my father, my father disputed with his father, and the people know which of them the judgment was in favor of. As for his statement that his mother is better than my mother, by my life, Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of God, is better than my mother. As for his statement that his grandfather is better than my grandfather, by my life, no [381] one who believes in God and the Last Day would regard any one among us as an equal or a rival to the Apostle of God. However, he has been mistaken through his lack of understanding, for he did not read: 'Say: O God, Master of the kingdom, You give the kingdom to whomsoever You wish and You take away the kingdom from whomsoever you wish. You strengthen those whom You wish and You make lowly whomsoever You wish. In Your hand is the decision. Indeed, You have power over everything.'"[558] Then the womenfolk of al-Ḥusayn were brought in to Yazīd. The womenfolk of Yazīd's family, the daughters of Mu'āwiyah and his family, shrieked with grief and lamentation. Fāṭimah, daughter of al-Ḥusayn—she was older than Sukaynah—asked, "Are the daughters of the Apostle of God prisoners, Yazīd?" Yazīd replied, "Cousin, I was unwilling for this to happen." She said, "By God! Not even an earring has been left to us" He answered, "Cousin, what will be given to you will be greater than what has been taken from you." Then they were taken out and taken to the house of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. There was not a woman of Yazīd's family who did not begin to lament and grieve. Yazīd sent to each of the women, "What has been taken from you?" No woman claimed anything, however expensive, without his giving double its value. Sukaynah used to say, "I never saw a man who did not believe in God who was better than Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah."

557. A verse already cited. See pp. 76, 170, above.
558. Qur'ān, 3:26 [25].

The prisoners were brought to Yazīd. Among them was 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. Yazīd asked him, "What is this, 'Alī?" 'Alī replied, "No misfortune strikes the earth or yourselves unless it has been written in a book before We bring it into existence; that is easy for God, so that you may not grieve for what He has caused to miss you or be proud at what He has given you. God does not love any arrogant boaster."[559] Yazīd replied, "Whatever misfortune has struck you is because of what your hands have earned and He forgives much."[560] Then he equipped him, gave him money and sent him to Medina. [382]

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Ḥamzah al-Thumālī[561]—'Abdallāh al-Thumālī[562]—al-Qāsim b. Bukhayt:[563] When the delegation from al-Kūfah brought the head of al-Ḥusayn, they went into the mosque at Damascus. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam asked them, "How did you do it?" They told him, "Eighty men of them came against us. By God! We wiped them out to the very last of them. There are the heads and the women prisoners." Marwān jumped up and left. His brother Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam came to them and said, "What have you done?" They repeated the words to him. He said, "A curtain has been drawn between you and Muḥammad on Doomsday. I will never agree with any action of yours." He arose and left. They went in to Yazīd, put the head before him and told him the story. Hind bt. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz,[564] who was married to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, heard the story circulating. She put on her cloak and went out. She said, "Commander of the Faithful, is that the head

559. Qur'ān, 57:22–23.

560. Qur'ān, 42:30 (29).

561. Abū Ḥamzah al-Thumālī was Thābit b. Abī Ṣafiyyah, a traditionist and Qur'ān commentator of Shī'ite leanings; he died in 150 (767). See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 222.

562. This is the only report from 'Abdallāh al-Thumālī used by Abū Mikhnaf.

563. This is the only report from al-Qāsim b. Bukhayt.

564. Hind's father, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz of 'Abd Shams, had been governor of al-Baṣrah for 'Uthmān and had fought vigorously against 'Alī when the latter became Caliph. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir.

of al-Ḥusayn, son of Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of God?" Yazīd replied, "Yes. Lament for him and put on mourning garments for the son of the daughter of the Apostle of God, the son of the pure woman of Quraysh. Ibn Ziyād hurried against him and killed him. May God kill him." Then the people were summoned and they came in. The head was in front of him. In Yazīd's hand there was a cane and he was poking it into al-Ḥusayn's mouth. He said, "This man and our family were like al-Ḥuṣayn b. al-Ḥumām al-Murrī. Then he said:

[Swords] split the skulls of men who are dear
to us; but they were more disobedient and oppressive."[565]

[383] One of the Companions of the Apostle of God called Abū Barzah al-Aslamī, cried out, "Are you poking the mouth of al-Ḥusayn with your cane? Take your cane away from his mouth. How often have I seen the Apostle of God kiss it! As for you, Yazīd, you will come forward on the Day of Resurrection, and Ibn Ziyād will be your advocate. But this man will come forward on the Day of Resurrection, and Muḥammad will be his advocate." Then he got up and turned away.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam: When 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād had al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī killed and his head was brought to him, he summoned 'Abd al-Malik b. Abī al-Ḥārith al-Sulamī[566] and told him, "Go to Medina to 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and give him the good news of the killing of al-Ḥusayn." 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ was the governor of Medina at that time.

'Abd al-Malik went to plead excuses but 'Ubaydallāh chided him. 'Ubaydallāh was a person whose fiery spirit was unapproachable. He told him, "Go to Medina and do not let the news get there before you." He gave him money and then added, "Do not make excuses. If your mount stops under you, buy another mount."

'Abd al-Malik reported: I went toward Medina. One of Quraysh met me. He asked, "What is the news?" I answered, "The news is at the governor's." He said, "'We belong to God and to Him we 565. Verse already cited. See pp. 76, 170, 174, above.

566. 'Abd al-Malik b. Abī al-Ḥārith is not mentioned elsewhere.

will return."[567] Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī has been killed." When I went to 'Amr b. Sa'īd, he asked, "What do you convey?" I answered, "What will please the governor. Al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī has been killed." He told me to announce his death. I announced his death. By God! I have never heard such wailing as the wailing for al-Ḥusayn by the women of Banū Hāshim in their houses. 'Amr b. Sa'īd said, as he laughed:

The women of Banū Ziyād raised a great lament [384] like the lamentation of our women mourning after the battle of al-Arnab.

Al-Arnab was a battle in which the Banū Zubayd defeated the Banū Ziyād of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b of the group of 'Abd al-Madān. This verse is by 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib.[568]

'Amr b. Sa'īd exclaimed, "This lamentation is in return for the lamentation for 'Uthmān b. 'Affān." Then he ascended the pulpit and informed the people about his death.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd Abū Kanūd:[569] When 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib learned of the death of his two sons, one of his mawālī entered while the people were consoling him. I think that the mawlā was none other than Abū al-Lislās.[570] The latter said, "This is what we have met and what has come upon us through al-Ḥusayn." 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far struck him with his sandal, saying, "Son of a stinking woman! Are you saying this of al-Ḥusayn? By God! If I had been present with him, I would have preferred not to leave him in order that I would be killed with him. By God! It makes my soul more generous with their two lives and makes their fate easier for me that they were struck down with my brother and cousin, consoling him and enduring with him." He went forward to those who were sitting with him and said, "Praise be to God, Who has made life

567. Qur'ān, 2:156 (151).

568. Quoted in Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 232. The poet, 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib, is a famous heathen poet and warrior who became a Muslim. See *EI*², s.v. 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib.

569. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd Abū Kanūd was a Kūfan traditionist, who lived during the first (seventh) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 218.

570. Abū al-Lislās is not mentioned elsewhere.

hard for me through the death of al-Ḥusayn. Even though I did not console al-Ḥusayn with my own hands, my two sons consoled him."

When news of the death of al-Ḥusayn came to the people of Medina, the daughter of 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib came out. With her were her womenfolk. She was sighing with grief and twisting her clothes, as she recited:

What would you say if the Prophet asked you:
What have you, the last of the religious communities,
[385] Done with my offspring and my family after my departure?
Among them are prisoners and among them are those who have been stained with blood.[571]

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam: 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād said to 'Umar b. Sa'd after he had killed al-Ḥusayn, "'Umar, where is the letter in which I wrote to you concerning killing al-Ḥusayn?" 'Umar answered, "I have carried out your order, and the letter has been lost." Ibn Ziyād ordered, "Bring it." 'Umar repeated, "It is lost." Ibn Ziyād demanded, "By God! Bring it." 'Umar said, "By God! It has been left behind so that it may be read to the old women of Quraysh, as my excuse to them in Medina. By God! I gave you good advice concerning Ḥusayn, which if I had given to my father, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, I would have done my duty to him." 'Uthmān b. Ziyād, the brother of 'Ubaydallāh said, "True. By God! I would prefer that every one of the sons of Ziyād had a nose ring until the Day of Resurrection and that Ḥusayn had not been killed." By God! 'Ubaydallāh did not disown him for that.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—one of his colleagues—'Amr b. Abī al-Miqdām[572]—'Amr b. 'Ikrimah:[573] We spent the morning of the day on which Ḥusayn was killed in Medina. One of our mawālī told us, "Yesterday I heard a voice calling out:

O men who have rashly killed Ḥusayn, do expect torture and chastisement.

571. These verses were quoted earlier. See p. 77, above.
572. 'Amr b. Abī al-Miqdām is a little-known traditionist.
573. 'Amr b. 'Ikrimah is not mentioned elsewhere.

All the people of heaven, prophets, angels, and tribes prosecute you.
You have been cursed by the tongue of the son of David, and of Moses, and of the bringer of the Gospels."[574]

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Umar b. Ḥayzūm al-Kalbī[575] said that his father had heard that voice.

The Names of the Banū Hāshim Killed with al-Ḥusayn and the Number of Those Killed from Every Tribe Which Fought against Him[576]

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf: [386]
When al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was killed, the heads of the members of his House and his Shī'ah and supporters, who were killed with him, were taken to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. Kindah brought thirteen heads, and their leader was Qays b. al-Ash'ath. Hawāzin brought twenty heads, and their leader was Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan. Tamīm brought seventeen heads. Banū Asad brought six heads. Madhḥij brought seven heads. The rest of the army brought seven heads. That amounted to seventy heads.[577]

Al-Ḥusayn was killed. His mother was Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of God. Sinān b. Anas al-Nakha'ī al-Aṣbaḥī killed him, and Khawalī b. Yazīd took his head.

Al-'Abbās b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was Umm al-Banīn bt. Ḥizām b. Khālid b. Rabī'ah b. al-Waḥīd. Zayd b. Ruqād al-Janbī and Ḥakīm b. al-Ṭufayl al-Sinbisī killed him.

Ja'far b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was also Umm al-Banīn.

'Abdallāh b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was also Umm al-Banīn.

'Uthmān b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was also Umm al-Banīn. Khawalī b. Yazīd shot him with an arrow and killed him.

---

574. These verses are also quoted in Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 233.

575. 'Umar b. Ḥayzūm al-Kalbī is not mentioned elsewhere.

576. Despite the title, the section only deals with the members of Banū Hāshim and their family servants.

577. For the implications of those tribes designated to carry the heads, see W. M. Watt, "Shī'ism under the Umayyads."

Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was a slave wife. One of Banū Abān b. Dārim killed him.

Abū Bakr b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was Laylā bt. Mas'ūd b. Khālid b. Mālik b. Rib'ī b. Sulmā b. Jandal b. Nahshal b. Dārim. There is doubt about his death.[578]

[387] 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was killed. His mother was Laylā bt. Abī Murrah b. 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib al-Thaqafī, and her mother was Maymūnah bt. Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb. Murrah b. Munqidh b. al-Nu'mān al-'Abdī killed him.

'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was killed. His mother was al-Rabāb bt. Imru' al-Qays b. 'Adī b. Aws b. Jābir b. Ka'b b. 'Ulaym of Kalb. Hāni' b. Thubayt al-Ḥaḍramī killed him.

'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn was regarded as too young; he was not killed.

Abū Bakr b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was a slave wife. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Ghanawī killed him.

'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was a slave wife. Ḥarmalah b. al-Kāhil[579] killed him by shooting him with an arrow.

Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī was killed. His mother was a slave wife. Sa'd b. 'Amr b. Nufayl al-Azdī killed him.

'Awn b. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was Jumānah bt. al-Musayyib b. Najabah b. Rabī'ah b. Riyāḥ of the Banū Fazārah. 'Abdallāh b. Quṭbah al-Ṭā'ī al-Nabhānī killed him.

Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was al-Khawṣā' bt. Khaṣafah b. Thaqīf b. Rabī'ah b. 'Ā'idh b. al-Ḥārith b. Taym Allāh b. Tha'labah of Bakr b. Wā'il. 'Āmir b. Nahshal al-Taymī killed him.

Ja'far b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was Umm al-Banīn bt. al-Shaqr b. al-Ḥiḍāb. Bishr b. Sawṭ al-Hamdānī[580] killed him.

---

578. There is some confusion about the name Abū Bakr and whether he was present at Karbalā'. According to Mufīd, Abū Bakr's actual name was Muḥammad, which may account for some of the confusion. See Mufīd, Irshād (trans.), 269.

579. Kāhin has been emended to Kāhil as written by Balādhurī and later by Ṭabarī, where Ḥarmalah b. Kāhil is reported as having killed a member of al-Ḥusayn's family. See Ansāb, II/2, 201; and Ṭabarī, II, 678.

580. Ḥawṭ has been emended to Sawṭ as written earlier by Ṭabarī. See p. 152, above.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Aqīl was killed. His mother was a slave wife. 'Uthmān b. Khālid b. Usayr al-Juhanī killed him.

'Abdallāh b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was a slave wife. 'Amr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Ṣaddā'ī shot him with an arrow and killed him. [388]

Muslim b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib was killed in al-Kūfah. His mother was a slave wife.

'Abdallāh b. Muslim b. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib was killed. His mother was Ruqayyah bt. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and her mother was a slave wife. 'Amr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Ṣaddā'ī killed him, but it was [also] said that Asīd b. Mālik al-Ḥaḍramī killed him.

Muḥammad b. Abī Sa'īd b. 'Aqīl was killed. His mother was a slave wife. Laqīṭ b. Yāsir al-Juhanī[581] killed him.

Al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī was considered to be too young. His mother was Khawlah bt. Manẓūr b. Zabbān b. Sayyār al-Fazārī.

'Amr b. al-Ḥasan was considered to be too young; he was left and he was not killed. His mother was a slave wife.

Of the mawālī who were killed was Sulaymān, the mawlā of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī. Sulaymān b. 'Awf al-Ḥaḍramī[582] killed him. Munjiḥ, the mawlā of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, was killed. [So] was 'Abdallāh b. Yuqṭur, the brother-in-nurture of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab al-Azdī: After the killing of al-Ḥusayn, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād searched for the missing Kūfan nobles. He did not see 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr. Some days later the latter came and visited him. He asked him, "Where were you, Ibn al-Ḥurr?" He answered, "I was sick." Ibn Ziyād remarked, "Sick in heart or sick in body?" He replied, "My heart was not sick, but as for my body God has granted me health." Ibn Ziyād declared, "You are lying. Rather you were with our enemy." Ibn al-Ḥurr said, "If I had been with your enemy, my position would have been seen, for such a position as mine would not have been hidden." Ibn Ziyād, then, did not notice him for some time. Ibn al-Ḥurr departed upon his horse. Ibn Ziyād asked where Ibn al-Ḥurr was, and was told that he had just left. He 581. Laqīṭ b. Yāsir al-Juhanī is not mentioned elsewhere.

582. Sulaymān b. 'Awf al-Ḥaḍramī is mentioned earlier, making critical remarks about the Kūfans during 'Alī's caliphate. See Ṭabarī, I, 3322.

ordered them to return Ibn al-Ḥurr to him, and the police caught up with him. They told him to answer the governor. Ibn al-Ḥurr [389] urged on his horse and said, "Tell him that, by God, I will never come willingly." He departed and came to the house of Aḥmar b. Ziyād al-Ṭāʾī.[583] His followers gathered with him at his house. He set off and came to Karbalāʾ. He looked at the places where people were slain and sought God's forgiveness for them. Then he went on until he stopped at al-Madāʾin.[584] About this, he recited:

A treacherous governor, the very reality of a treacherous man, says:
Should you not have fought against the martyr son of Fāṭimah?
O how much I regret that I did not help him!
Indeed, every soul that does not set upon the right course regrets.
Indeed, because I was not among his defenders,
I have a grief that will never depart.
May God constantly water with rain the souls of those who girt themselves to help him.
I stood at their graves and their field of death.
My heart almost burst, and my eyes shed tears.
By my life! They were active in battle, quick to war, noble defenders.
[390] They helped to support the son of the daughter of their Prophet, like lions from a covert, with their swords.
If they were killed, then every pious soul on the earth has become downcast in grief for that.
Never have men been seen nobler than they in the face of death, bright-faced generous lords.
Do you kill them unjustly and hope for our affection?
Leave a course of action that is not suitable for us.
By my life! You have antagonized us by killing them.
How many men and women of us detest you!

583. Aḥmar b. Ziyād al-Ṭāʾī is not mentioned elsewhere.
584. Al-Madāʾin is the site of the ancient city of Ctesiphon. See *EI*², s.v. al-Madāʾin.

Many times I intended to go with many supporters against an oppressive group who had deviated from the truth.
Refrain, otherwise I will come against you with ranks that [will attack] you more fiercely than the armies of al-Daylam.

In this year (61/680–81) Abū Bilāl Mirdās b. 'Amr b. Ḥudayr[585] from Rabī'ah b. Ḥanzalah was killed.

The Death of Mirdās b. 'Amr b. Ḥudayr

Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī reported: There has already been in this book an account of Abū Bilāl's revolt, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād's sending Aslam b. Zur'ah al-Kilābī[586] against him with two thousand men, their battle at Āsak[587] and the defeat of Aslam and his army by Abū Bilāl and his followers.[588] [391]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī:[589] When 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād learned of Aslam b. Zur'ah's defeat, he sent three thousand men against Abū Bilāl under the command of 'Abbād b. al-Akhḍar al-Tamīmī.[590] 'Abbād went in pursuit of Abū Bilāl until he caught up with him at Tawwaj[591] and drew up his ranks against him. Abū Bilāl Mirdās and his followers attacked them and were resolute. Then 'Abbād's army surrounded them, for they were only a small group. Abū Bilāl had said to his followers, "Whoever of you has come out 585. Abū Bilāl Mirdās b. 'Amr b. Ḥudayr is a Khārijite rebel. On his earlier exploits, see Ṭabarī, II, 185–87, and Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 40–42. His name is usually given as Mirdās b. Udayyah. Udayyah was his mother and 'Amr was his father. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 180.

586. Aslam b. Zur'ah al-Kilābī was a leading tribesman who supported Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. According to Wahb b. Jarīr, the leader of this expedition had been Ibn Ḥiṣn. See Ṭabarī, II, 187. However, Abū Mikhnaf's report is confirmed by Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 279; and Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 182.

587. Āsak is a town in Aḥwāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 61.

588. See Ṭabarī, II, 186–87.

589. Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī is one of the authorities of Abū Mikhnaf; he probably lived until the first half of the second (eighth) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 189.

590. 'Abbād b. al-Akhḍar al-Tamīmī was a supporter of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād; his mother's name was al-Akhḍar and his father's name was 'Alqamah. According to Balādhurī, he had four thousand men with him. See Ansāb, IV/1, 183.

591. Tawwaj is a town in a valley near Shīrāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 890.

in revolt in pursuit of worldly things, let him go, but whoever of you only wants the Hereafter and to meet his Lord, that was decreed earlier for him." He recited, "To him who desires the tillage of the Hereafter, We will give increase in his tillage. To him who desires the tillage of this world, We will give something of it, but he has no share in the Hereafter."[592] He stayed, and his followers stayed with him. Not one of them left him, and they were killed to the last one of them. 'Abbād b. al-Akhḍar and the army that was with him returned to al-Baṣrah.

'Ubaydah b. Hilāl[593] went there. There was a group of three men with him, and he was the fourth. He lay in wait for 'Abbād b. al-Akhḍar as the latter was approaching the palace of the governorship with his son, a young boy, mounted behind him. They said, "Servant of God, stop so that we may seek a legal decision from you." He stopped, and they said, "We are four brothers, and our brother has been killed. What do you think we should do?" He said, "Implore the governor to act." They answered, "We have implored him to act, but he has not answered us." He told them, "Kill the man then, may God destroy him." They attacked him announcing their battle cry. He pushed his son aside, and they killed him.

In this year (61/680–1) Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah put Salm b. Ziyād[594] in charge of Sijistān and Khurāsān.

[392] The Appointment of Salm b. Ziyād

According to 'Umar (b. Shabbah)—'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib b. Salm b. Ziyād:[595] Salm b. Ziyād visited Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah when he was a man of twenty-four years of age. Yazīd said to him, "Abū Ḥarb (i.e., Salm b. Ziyād), I will appoint you to the province of your two brothers,

592. Qur'ān, 42:20.

593. 'Ubaydah b. Hilāl was a prominent Khārijite who was eventually killed in 77 (696–97). See Ṭabarī, II, 1032.

594. Salm was a brother of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād; he died later while governor of Khurāsān for 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān between 65 (685) and 86 (705). See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 371–72.

595. Maslamah b. Muḥārib was a grandson of Salm; he was also an authority for historical reports.

'Abd al-Raḥmān[596] and 'Abbād."[597] Salm said, "Whatever pleases the Commander of the Faithful." So he put him in charge of Khurāsān and Sijistān. Salm despatched al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah al-Ḥārithī,[598] the grandfather of 'Īsā b. Shabīb,[599] from Syria to Khurāsān while he went to al-Baṣrah to make preparations. Then he set out for Khurāsān. Al-Ḥārith b. [Mu'āwiyah] seized[600] Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī, imprisoned him, beat his son Shabīb and put him in fetters.[601] Salm sent his brother Yazīd b. Ziyād[602] to Sijistān. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād wrote to his brother 'Abbād, with whom he was friendly, informing him of the appointment of Salm. 'Abbād divided up the contents of the treasury among his slaves, and there was still some left over. Therefore his herald proclaimed, "Those who want payment in advance should collect it." He paid in advance all those who came to him. 'Abbād, then, left Sijistān. When he was at Jīraft,[603] he learnt of the place where Salm was. Between them was a mountain, so he turned aside from it. On that night a thousand slaves of 'Abbād went away and the least that they had was ten thousand dirhams for 'Abbād. 'Abbād passed through Fārs[604] and then went to Yazīd. Yazīd asked him, "Where is the money?" He replied, "I was the com-

596. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was a brother of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, governor of Khurāsān for Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, and he was reappointed by Yazīd. It was said that he lived for a hundred years and spent a thousand dirhams every day. He died in al-Baṣrah. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 371.

597. 'Abbād is a brother of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, governor of Sijistān for Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, and he was reappointed by Yazīd; he died in 100 (718–19). See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 372–73.

598. Al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah was a supporter of Salm b. Ziyād, who died in 64 (683–84). See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 409–10.

599. 'Īsā b. Shabīb was one of the leaders who brought about the succession of Yazīd III in 126/744. See Ṭabarī, II, 1792.

600. The Arabic text has been emended. It was fa-akhadha al-Ḥārith b. Qays b. al-Haytham. This would have to mean Salm seized an unknown al-Ḥārith b. Qays b. al-Haytham when he had not yet reached Khurāsān. However, it is reported that, after the death of al-Ḥusayn, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ziyād had visited Yazīd and had left Qays b. al-Haytham as his deputy. See Ṭabarī, II, 189. Clearly it is al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah who seized Qays b. al-Haytham. Qays' son Shabīb is not mentioned elsewhere.

601. The Arabic is aqāmahu fī sarāwīl.

602. Yazīd b. Ziyād was killed in Sijistān in 64 (683–84). See Ṭabarī, II, 488.

603. Jīraft is a large town in Kirmān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 174.

604. Fārs is a region to the southwest of Iran. See EI[2], s.v. Fārs.

mander of a frontier post so that I divided whatever I came upon among the people."

Salm set out for Khurāsān. With him went 'Imrān b. al-Faḍīl al-[393] Burjumī,[605] 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī,[606] Ṭalḥah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khalaf al-Khuzā'ī,[607] al-Muḥallab b. Abī Ṣufrah,[608] Ḥanẓalah b. 'Arādah,[609] Abū Ḥuzzābah al-Walīd b. Nahīk,[610] who was one of the tribe of Rabī'ah b. Ḥanzalah, Yaḥyā b. Ya'mar al-'Adwānī,[611] who was an ally of the tribe of Hudhayl, and a large group of the horsemen and nobles of al-Baṣrah. Salm b. Ziyād had brought a letter from Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād for him to select a group of two thousand men. Others have reported that the group was six thousand. Salm chose the notables and the horsemen. Some people wanted to take part in the warfare (jihād) and asked him to take them. The first whom Salm wanted to take was Ḥanẓalah b. 'Arādah. 'Ubaydallāh asked him to leave him. Salm suggested, "Let him choose between you and me. If he chooses you, he is yours. If he chooses me, he is mine." He chose Salm.

The people spoke to Salm; they asked him to conscript them. Ṣilah b. Ashyam al-'Adawī[612] went to the office of conscription. The clerk would say, "Abū al-Ṣahbā' (i.e., Ṣilah b. Ashyam), shall I put your name down, for it is a mission in which there will be warfare and merit?" He would reply, "I will seek the decision of God and wait." When the arrangement for the enlistment of the people had been completed, he was still holding back. His wife

---

605. 'Imrān b. al-Faḍīl al-Burjumī was from al-Baṣrah; he had been in charge of Sijistān and Kirmān during the reign of 'Uthmān. See Ṭabarī, I, 2840–41.

606. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī was a tribal leader in Khurāsān. See Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution, 39.

607. Ṭalḥah was also called Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalaḥāt (the Ṭalḥah of the Ṭalḥahs). See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 416.

608. Al-Muḥallab b. Abī Ṣufrah was a great Arab general who transferred his allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr, but later returned to the Umayyads. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 98.

609. Ḥanẓalah b. 'Arādah was a tribal leader in al-Baṣrah; he is not mentioned elsewhere.

610. Abū Ḥuzzābah al-Walīd b. Nahīk was a tribal leader in Khurāsān; he is not mentioned elsewhere.

611. Yaḥyā b. Ya'mar al-'Adwānī was a writer of eloquent Arabic, who became qāḍī in Khurāsān. See Ṭabarī, II, 1131.

612. Ṣilah b. Ashyam al-'Adawī is not mentioned elsewhere.

Mu'ādhah bt. 'Abdallāh al-'Adawiyyah[613] asked him, "Are you going to enlist yourself?" He answered, "I will wait." Then he prayed and sought the decision from God. He saw in his sleep a man approaching who came and said to him, "Go out, for you will gain profit, prosper, and be successful." He went to the clerk and said, "Put my name down." The clerk replied, "We have finished, but I will not leave you out," and he put his and his son's names down. Salm sent him with Yazīd b. Ziyād; he went to Sijistān.

Salm set out; he took with him Umm Muḥammad bt. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ al-Thaqafī.[614] She was the first Arab woman to be taken across the river.[615] [394]

According to Maslamah b. Muḥārib and Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī[616]—'Uthmān b. Ḥafṣ al-Kirmānī:[617] When the governors of Khurāsān went on campaigns and winter came, they would return from their campaigns to Marw al-Shāhijān.[618] When the Muslims withdrew, the kings of Khurāsān met in one of the towns of Khurāsān near Khwārazm[619] to make agreements with each other; they would not attack each other; no one would provoke anyone else; and they would consult with each other about their affairs. The Muslims would ask their leaders to raid that town, but they would refuse. When Salm came to Khurāsān, he set out on a campaign and wintered in the place where he had been conducting the campaign.

Al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah urged and requested Salm to send him to that town. He despatched him with six thousand men. It is also reported that it was with four thousand men. He besieged the people in the town; he demanded that they obediently submit to him. They asked him to make peace with them, for, if he did so, they would give a ransom for their lives. He agreed to that; they made peace with him on the payment of some twenty million dirhams. Among the terms of the peace agreement was that he 613. Mu'ādhah bt. 'Abdallāh is not mentioned elsewhere.

614. Umm Muḥammad is only mentioned on this campaign.

615. This is a reference to the river Oxus.

616. Abū Ḥafṣ Al-Azdī was a narrator of historical reports, who was alive in 137 [754–55], for he reported events of that date. See Ṭabarī, III, 117.

617. 'Uthmān b. Ḥafṣ al-Kirmānī is not mentioned elsewhere.

618. Marw al-Shāhijān is the full name of Marw, one of the four great cities of Khurāsān, situated near the Murghāb river. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 507.

619. Khwārazm is to the east of the Oxus river.

should receive merchandise from them. He would take a head of cattle for half its price, a riding animal for half its price, and untanned leather for half its price. The value of what he took from them reached fifty million dirhams. As a result of this, al-Muhallab came to enjoy the favor of Salm. Salm chose from these the things that pleased him and sent them to Yazīd with the Persian governor (marzubān) of Marw[620] and he sent a delegation for that purpose.

According to Maslamah and Isḥāq b. Ayyūb:[621] Salm campaigned against Samarqand[622] with his wife, Umm Muḥammad bt. 'Abdallāh; she bore him a son. He named him Ṣughdī.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Al-Ḥasan b. [395] Rashīd al-Jūzajānī[623]—a shaykh of the tribe of Khuzā'ah—his father—his grandfather: I took part in the campaign in Khwārazm with Salm b. Ziyād. They made peace with him on the payment of much wealth. Then he crossed into Samarqand, and its inhabitants made peace with him. His wife, Umm Muḥammad, was with him and she bore him a son on that campaign. She sent to the wife of the leader of al-Ṣughd[624] to borrow some ornaments. The latter sent her her crown. Then they withdrew, and she took the crown.

In this year, Yazīd dismissed 'Amr b. Sa'īd from his position as governor of Medina and appointed al-Walīd b. 'Utbah.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—those who transmitted to him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah dismissed 'Amr b. Sa'īd on 1 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 21) and appointed al-Walīd b. 'Utbah as governor of Medina. The latter led the pilgrimages of the year 61/681 and the year 62/682. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah's governor of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah in this year was 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. His governor of Medina at the end of the year was al-Walīd b. 'Utbah, and Salm b. Ziyād was in authority 620. Marw refers to Marw al-Shāhijān. See note 618, above.

621. Isḥāq b. Ayyūb was a regular authority of the historian al-Madā'inī, who was alive after 125 (743); he reported events of that date. See Ṭabarī, II, 1741.

622. Beyond the Oxus river, the capital of Ṣughd; see EI[1], s.v. Samarḳand.

623. Al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd al-Jūzajānī was a regular authority of the historian, al-Madā'inī, who was alive after 132 (749–50); he reported events of that date. See Ṭabarī, III, 38.

624. Al-Ṣughd was east of the Oxus river on its lower course. See EI[2], s.v. Khwārazm.

over Khurāsān and Sijistān. Hishām b. Hubayrah was qāḍī of al-Baṣrah and Shurayḥ was qāḍī of al-Kūfah.

During this year, Ibn al-Zubayr made public his opposition to and repudiation of Yazīd; the oath of allegiance was given to him.

Yazīd's Dismissal of 'Amr b. Sa'īd as Governor of Medina and His Appointment of al-Walīd b. 'Utbah

The reason for Yazīd's dismissal of 'Amr and his appointment of al-Walīd and the reason for Ibn Zubayr's making public the call to himself are reported according to what Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī) has mentioned—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal[625]—his father:[626] When al-Ḥusayn was killed,[627] Ibn al-Zubayr arose among the people of Mecca and declared his horror at Ḥusayn's killing. He stigmatized the people of al-Kūfah in particular and blamed the people of Iraq generally. After praising [396] and glorifying God and calling for blessings to be with Muḥammad, he said, "The people of Iraq have been treacherous and liars except for a few. The people of al-Kūfah are the worst of the people of Iraq. They summoned al-Ḥusayn so that they might support him and put him in authority over them. When he came to them, they rose up against him and told him that either he should put his hand in theirs so that they could go with him to Ibn Ziyād b. Sumayyah peacefully in order that that man could carry out his judgment on Ḥusayn, or he should fight. By God! He saw that he and his followers were few among many. Even though God, the Mighty and Sublime, has not informed anyone of the future, it was clear that he would be killed. However, he chose a noble death rather than an ignoble life. May God have mercy on Ḥusayn and punish the killers of Ḥusayn. By my life! In their opposition and disobedience to him, there was a warning and 625. 'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal was an authority of Abū Mikhnaf, who probably lived until the first half of the second (eighth) century. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 193–94.

626. He was Nawfal b. Musāḥiq. He was said to have been in charge of Muslim b. 'Uqbah's police at the Battle of al-Ḥarrah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 392–93.

627. The following report up until Marwān's verse is given in almost the exact same words by Balādhurī. See Ansāb, IV/1, 304–5.

prohibition against them for men like him. However, what was decreed took place. If God wants something, He will never be thwarted. Now, after al-Ḥusayn, should we rely on these people? Should we believe their words? Should we accept their covenants? No! We do not regard them as worthy of that. Indeed, by God, they killed a man who stood in prayer at night for long hours, who fasted frequently during the day, who had more right to govern than they did, and one who was more entitled to it in terms of religion and outstanding merit. Indeed, by God, he would never exchange the Qur'ān for singing, nor would he exchange weeping out of fear of God for such [chanting], nor would he exchange fasting for drinking forbidden drinks, nor would he exchange gathering in religious groups to remember God for rushing off in pursuit of game." He was alluding to Yazīd. "They will meet destruction."[628]

Ibn al-Zubayr's companions rose to him and declared, "Man, make public your acceptance of the oath of allegiance to you, for no one remains now that Ḥusayn is dead who can dispute this [397] affair with you." The people had been giving the oath of allegiance to him secretly,[629] while he was saying publicly that he was seeking refuge at the Sacred Mosque. He told them not to be too hasty.

At that time 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ was governor of Mecca and he was very hostile toward Ḥusayn and his followers. Despite his hostility toward them, he treated them gently and kindly. When it was confirmed to Yazīd that there were groups that Ibn al-Zubayr had gathered together in Mecca, he made a vow to God that he would have him bound in a chain; he sent a chain of silver. The messenger passed by with it to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam in Medina.[630] He gave him news of what he had brought for Ibn al-Zubayr and of the chain that was with him. Marwān recited:

---

628. Qur'ān, 19:59.

629. Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 304, says that Ibn al-Zubayr had been receiving the oath of allegiance on the basis of a shūrā, the consultative committee set up by 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb in order to choose the Caliph. This is a rather surprising difference between the two versions.

630. Balādhurī says that the messenger visited both Marwān b. al-Ḥakam and al-Walīd b. 'Utbah. See Ansāb, IV/1, 304.

Take it. True It is not a course of action for a strong man.
Even a humiliated man would hesitate to accept it.[631]

The messenger left him to go on to Ibn al-Zubayr. He came to Ibn al-Zubayr and told him of his passing by Marwān and of Marwān's recitation of that verse. Ibn al-Zubayr declared, "No, by God! I shall not be that man who is humiliated." He politely sent the messenger back.

Ibn al-Zubayr became more powerful in Mecca and the people of Medina wrote to him. The people said that since al-Ḥusayn had been destroyed, there was no one who could dispute with Ibn al-Zubayr.

According to Nūḥ b. Ḥabīb al-Qūmisī[632]—Hishām b. Yūsuf[633]—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Karīm[634]—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far al-Madīnī:[635]

Hishām b. Yūsuf also transmitted to us the same words as in the account of 'Ubaydallāh according to 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab[636]—Mūsā b. 'Uqbah[637]—Ibn Shihāb[638]—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān:[639] Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah sent Ibn 'Iḍāh al-Ash'arī[640] and ['Abdallāh 631. The verse was quoted on p. 15, above, and is repeated in a fuller version with minor variations on p. 195, below.

632. Nūḥ b. Ḥabīb al-Qūmisī was a well-known traditionist, who died in 242 (856–57). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 481–82.

633. Hishām b. Yūsuf was a traditionist and qāḍī of Ṣan'ā' who died in 197 (812–13). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 57–58.

634. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Karīm was a traditionist but there are very few reports from him; he cannot be identified.

635. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far al-Madīnī was a traditionist, who lived in al-Baṣrah and died in 178 (794–95). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 174–76.

636. 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab was a descendant of Ibn al-Zubayr; he also was a poet and reporter of historical traditions, who was executed in 187 (803). See Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 296–99.

637. Mūsā b. 'Uqbah was a mawlā of the wife of Ibn al-Zubayr, and an expert on the campaigns of the Prophet; he died between 141 (758) and 145 (762–63). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 360–62.

638. Ibn Shihāb was the famous scholar Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī, who lived from 51 (671) to 124 (742). See EI[1], s.v. al-Zuhrī.

639. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān was the father of the Caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who became governor of Egypt in 65 (685) and died in 84 (703). See Ṭabarī, II, 1171.

640. Ibn 'Iḍāh al-Ash'arī was a supporter of the Umayyads. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 273.

b.] Mas'adah[641] and their followers to 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr in [398] Mecca to bring him a chain so that the oath of Yazīd needed to be fulfilled. He sent with them a chain of silver and a cloak of silk and woolen material. My father sent me and my brother with them. He said, "When the messengers of Yazīd convey the message, stand before him and let one of you recite:

Take it. True it is not a course of action for a strong man.
Even a humiliated man would hesitate to accept it.
O 'Āmir, the people have offered you a course of action.
It is a web spun on the spindle amid neighbors.
I see that, when you were the people's water carrier, to you it was said, 'Bring the bucket and take it away.' "[642]

When the messengers had delivered the message to Ibn al-Zubayr, we both stood before him and my brother said to me, "Do it for me." Ibn al-Zubayr listened to me and said, "Sons of Marwān, I have listened to what you have said and I know what you are saying. So tell your father:

I am of an origin (nab', tree) that is hard to break.
[It proves its firmness] when the [frail] reeds and the [hollow] 'ushar are easily bent [by the slightest breeze].[643]
I will not be tender toward anything except the right that I am demanding until the stone is tender to the tooth of one who chews."

['Abd al-'Aziz] commented: I do not know which of the two of them was more surprised.

'Ubaydallāh (b. 'Abd al-Karīm) added in his account on the authority of Abū 'Alī (i.e., 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab) that he reminded Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab b. Thābit b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr[644] of this account. He said that he had heard the same 641. The text has been emended to read 'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah, who was a prominent supporter of the Umayyads. See Ṭabarī, II, 703.

642. The first verse was quoted on pp. 15, 191, above.

643. The verse means that he is firm in his purpose.

644. Muṣ'ab was a son of 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab, an accomplished scholar, who lived in the first half of the third (ninth) century. See Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, trans. McGuckin de Slane, I, 186.

report on the authority of Abū 'Alī, but he did not remember its chain of authorities (isnād).

According to Hishām (b. Yūsuf)—Khālid b. Sa'īd[645]—his father, Sa'īd b. 'Amr b. Sa'īd:[646] When 'Amr b. Sa'īd saw that [399] the people looked up to Ibn al-Zubayr and were anxious to support him, he thought that these matters would end in his favor. He sent to 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, who was a companion of his; he had been with his father in Egypt. There he had read the books of Daniel.[647] At that time, Quraysh regarded him as a scholar. 'Amr b. Sa'īd asked him, "Tell me about this man. Do you see his ambitions being successful for him? Tell me about my leader (i.e., Yazīd). How do you see that his situation will work out for him?" He answered, "I can only see that your leader is one of those kings whose affairs are successful for them until they die while they are still kings." From that time 'Amr b. Sa'īd increased in vehemence against Ibn al-Zubayr and his followers despite the appearance of kindness and friendliness toward them.

Al-Walīd b. 'Utbah[648] and other members of the Banū Umayyah with him told Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah that, if 'Amr b. Sa'īd wanted to, he could apprehend Ibn al-Zubayr and send him to Yazīd.

In this year, I mean 61/680–1, Yazīd dismissed 'Amr [b. Sa'īd] from the Ḥijāz and appointed al-Walīd b. 'Utbah as governor of that place.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) reported according to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): Yazīd dismissed 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ at the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah in 61 (August 21, 681). He appointed al-Walīd b. 'Utbah who led the people on the pilgrimage in 61/681 and restored Ibn Rabī'ah al-'Āmirī[649] as his qāḍī.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: In the year 61/681, al-Walīd b. 'Utbah led the people on the pilgrimage. This is one of the things about which there is no dis-

---

645. Khālid b. Sa'īd only seems to have been mentioned here as a reporter of a family story about his grandfather, 'Amr b. Sa'īd.

646. Sa'īd b. 'Amr b. Sa'īd went to live in al-Kūfah; he was reported to have been the most learned of Quraysh. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 194.

647. This is probably a reference to the Old Testament.

648. The text says al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah but this seems to be a mistake.

649. Apart from his appointment as qāḍī, nothing more is known of Ibn Rabī'ah al-'Āmirī.

pute among the historians (ahl al-siyar). In this year (61/680–1), 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was governor of both al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. Shurayḥ was qāḍī of al-Kūfah and Hishām b. Hubayrah was qāḍī of al-Baṣrah. Salm b. Ziyād had authority over Khurāsān.

The Events of the Year 62

[400]

(SEPTEMBER 20, 681–SEPTEMBER 9, 682)

The Arrival of a Delegation of the People of Medina to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah

The reason for that was according to Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā (Abū Mikhnaf)—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq—'Abdallāh b. 'Urwah (b. al-Zubayr):[650] When Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah sent al-Walīd b. 'Utbah to the Ḥijāz as governor and dismissed 'Amr b. Sa'īd, al-Walīd came to Medina and seized and imprisoned many servants and mawālī of 'Amr. 'Amr spoke to him about them, but he refused to free them saying, "Don't worry, 'Amr." His brother Abān b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ[651] said to him, "Can 'Amr worry? If you caught hold of a burning coal, and he also caught hold of it, he would not let it go until you let it go." 'Amr went away traveling until he stopped two nights' journey away from Medina. He wrote to his servants and mawālī—there were about three hundred of them: "I am sending a camel, a provision bag and equipment for each man among you. The camels will be tethered in the market. When my messenger comes to you, break down the door of the prison. Then let every man among you get and mount his camel. Then come in my direction until you reach me." His messenger went and bought the camels. He made them ready with what was suitable for them and tethered them in the market. He went to the men in prison and informed them of 'Amr's directions. They broke down the door of the prison, went to the camels, mounted them and set off in the direction of 'Amr b. Sa'īd until they found him.

650. 'Abdallāh b. 'Urwah was a traditionist and nephew of Ibn al-Zubayr.

651. Abān was a brother of 'Amr, who was born in al-Kūfah. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 453–54.

When 'Amr b. Sa'īd went to Yazīd and entered into his presence, [401] Yazīd welcomed him and made him sit close. Then he reproved 'Amr b. Sa'īd for his inadequacy, for he had not done the things that Yazīd had ordered him to do concerning Ibn al-Zubayr. 'Amr had only carried out what he had wanted to. He replied, "Commander of the Faithful, one who was present would have seen what one who was absent could not have seen. The majority of the people of Mecca and Medina were inclined toward Ibn al-Zubayr; they favored him and gave their consent to him. They summoned each other both in secret and publicly. If I had struggled against him, I would not have had an army strong enough against him with these people. While he was being cautious toward me and on his guard against me, I was showing apparent kindness and friendliness so that I might deceive him in order to attack. However, I did restrict him and prevent him from many things which, if I had left them for him, would only have been of assistance to him. I positioned men in the roads and alleys of Mecca. My men did not let anyone enter Mecca until they had written down for me his name, the name of his father, from which part of God's land he came, what he brought, and what he wanted. If he was one of Ibn al-Zubayr's followers and one of those who I thought was coming to him, I would send him back ignominiously. If he was one of those whom I did not suspect, I would let him go. Now you have sent al-Walīd. Perhaps, as a result of his work and his effect, you will realize the merit of my efforts in your affair and, God willing, my sincere advice to you. May God act on your behalf and humble your enemy, Commander of the Faithful." Yazīd said, "You are truer than those who raised these matters about you and incited me against you. You are one of those whom

I trust, and whose help I hope for and whom I shall keep in order to repair damage, to undertake an important task, and to uncover the implications of great matters." 'Amr replied, "Commander of the Faithful, no one is more fitting to strengthen your authority, weaken your enemy, and do violence against those who oppose you than I am."

Al-Walīd embarked on seeking for Ibn al-Zubayr but he found that he was cautious and inaccessible.

Najdah b. 'Āmir al-Ḥanafī[652] came out in revolt in al-Yamāmah[653] after al-Ḥusayn had been killed. Ibn al-Zubayr also came [402] in revolt.

At the pilgrimage, al-Walīd led the procession (ifāḍah) from 'Arafah, and the general body of the people marched in the procession with him. Ibn Zubayr made the wuqūf[654] with his followers, and Najdah made the wuqūf with his followers. Then Ibn Zubayr led the procession with his followers, and Najdah led the procession with his followers. None of the three groups went in the procession of the others. Najdah met Ibn al-Zubayr so frequently that the people thought that he would give the oath of allegiance to him.

Then Ibn al-Zubayr worked a trick against the authority of al-Walīd b. 'Utbah. He wrote to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah: "You have sent us a stupid man who does not direct us to a straightforward situation and will not listen to the advice of the wise. If you sent us a man with an easy disposition and a gentle attitude, I would hope that affairs that have seemed difficult would become easy and what was at variance would become united. Consider that, for there is benefit in it for our leaders (khawāṣṣ) and our ordinary people ('awāmm), God willing. Peace be with you."

Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah sent to al-Walīd, dismissed him and sent 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān[655] [in his place].

---

652. Najdah b. 'Āmir al-Ḥanafī was a leading Khārijite, who at one time came to control nearly the whole of Arabia. He was killed after an internal dispute in 72 (691). See Wellhausen, Religio-Political, 47–50.

653. Al-Yamāmah was an area in central eastern Arabia. See EI[1], s.v. al-Yamāma.

654. The wuqūf is the ritual that involves gathering at 'Arafah in preparation for the procession (ifāḍah) into the sanctuary of Mecca during the night of the pilgrimage. See EI[2], s.v. Ḥadjdj.

655. 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān was a member of the Umayyad family, and cousin of Yazīd. Apart from this incident, he was reported to have

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq—Ḥumayd b. Ḥamzah,[656] a mawlā of the Banū Umayyah: An inexperienced young man came, who had no knowledge of affairs, who had not learnt the lessons of age, and who had not been trained by experience; he could hardly understand anything about his authority and his task. He sent a delegation from the people of Medina to Yazīd. Among them were 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl al-Anṣārī,[657] 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Amr b. Ḥafṣ b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī,[658] al-Mundhir b. al-Zubayr and many of the nobles of the people of Medina. They came to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and he treated them generously and well. He gave them gifts, and then they left him. They all came back to Medina except for al-Mundhir b. al-Zubayr. He went to 'Ubaydallāh b.
[403] Ziyād at al-Baṣrah. Yazīd had made a gift of a hundred thousand dirhams to him. When those members of the delegation returned to Medina, they stood among the people and publicly cursed and vilified Yazīd. They said, "We have come from a man who has no religion, who drinks wine, who plays lutes, who passes his time with songstresses, who plays with dogs and spends his evenings talking to robbers and young men. We ask you to bear witness that we repudiate him." The people followed them.

According to Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā (Abū Mikhnaf)—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq: The people went to 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanzalah al-Ghasīl and gave their oath of allegiance to him; they gave him authority over them.

According to Lūṭ (b. Yaḥyā Abū Mikhnaf)—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf:[659] Al-Mundhir came back from Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah and went to 'Ubaydallāh b.

---

had a daughter who married the Caliph al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 6.

656. A mawlā of the Banū Umayyah; Ḥumayd b. Ḥamzah is not mentioned except for this report.

657. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl al-Anṣārī was a leading man in Medina. His father had been killed at Uḥud and the Prophet said that he had seen angels washing his body. Hence al-ghasīl, the washed. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓala.

658. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Amr b. Ḥafṣ was a member of Quraysh who settled in Medina.

659. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was a descendant of the well-known Companion of the Prophet, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. This is the only time he occurs as an authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 211.

Ziyād at al-Baṣrah. He was generous and hospitable to al-Mundhir, for he had been a friend of Ziyād. Then a letter came to 'Ubaydallāh from Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. In this letter, Yazīd told 'Ubaydallāh of the situation concerning his followers in Medina; he ordered 'Ubaydallāh to bind and imprison al-Mundhir until Yazīd's order about him came. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād was reluctant to comply with his instructions because al-Mundhir was his guest. He summoned him and told him about the letter, which he read to him. He said, "You were friendly to Ziyād and you have become my guest. I am doing you a favor, for I want to act well in the whole matter. When the people gather with me, arise and say, 'Permit me to depart to my land.' When I say, 'No, rather stay with me, for you will have generous, munificent, and praiseworthy treatment,' say, 'I have an estate and work so that I must leave; permit me to go.' At that I will permit you to go. Then join your family." When the people gathered with 'Ubaydallāh, al-Mundhir arose and asked permission [to go]. He replied, "No, rather stay with me, for I will treat you nobly, generously, and [404] praiseworthily." Al-Mundhir said, "I have an estate and work so that I must leave. So permit me to go." 'Ubaydallāh gave him permission. He set out until he reached the Ḥijāz. There he joined the people of Medina; he became one of those who urged the people against Yazīd. At that time among the things he used to say was, "By God! Yazīd made a gift of a hundred thousand dirhams to me but what he did to me does not prevent me from telling you about him; I will speak truthfully about him. By God! He drinks wine and gets so drunk that he misses the prayer." Al-Mundhir vilified him with not only similar vilifications but also harsher ones than the ones made by his companions.

Sa'īd b. 'Amr was saying in al-Kūfah that Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah had been informed of what al-Mundhir had said and he had declared, "O God! I treated him praiseworthily and generously. Then he did what You have seen. Remember him for lying and disruption of relations."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sa'īd b. Zayd Abū Muthallim:[660] Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah sent for al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī and 660. Sa'īd b. Zayd Abū Muthallim was an otherwise unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 217.

said to him, "Go to the people of Medina and your own people; soothe them away from what they are intending to do. If they do not rise up in this matter, the people will not dare to oppose me. There are those of my clan who would not want to rise up in this discord (fitnah), for they fear destruction." Al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr departed and went to his people. He summoned the people generally to him. He ordered them to obey and to adhere to unity and he warned them against discord. He told them, "You have no power against the Syrians." ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ said, "Al-Nuʿmān, what is making you split our unity and corrupt our affairs that God has set right?" Al-Nuʿmān answered, "By God! It is as if I can see that which you are calling for (i.e., civil war) taking place, with men mounting their horses and striking blows against the heads of the other party and their faces. The mill of death revolves between the two parties. It is as if I can see you flying on your mule and setting your face in the direction of [405] Mecca, leaving these wretched people—meaning the Anṣār—behind to be killed in their alleys, in the mosques, and at the doors of their houses." The people struck out at him and he left. By God! It happened just as he said it would.

Al-Walīd b. ʿUtbah led the people on the pilgrimage in this year (62/682). The governors in Iraq and Khurāsān were the same in this year (62/681–2) as the governors that I mentioned in the year 61/680–1.

In this year (62/681–82) Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās[661] was born according to what has been mentioned.

---

661. It was through Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbas's line that the ʿAbbāsid caliphs were descended. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAbbāsids.

The Events of the Year 63

(SEPTEMBER 10, 682–AUGUST 29, 683)

Among the events that took place in the year of 63 was the expulsion by the people at Medina of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah's governor, ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān, from Medina, their public repudiation of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, and their siege of those of the Banū Umayyah who were in Medina.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq—Ḥabīb b. Kurrah:[662] When the people of Medina gave the oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl to depose Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, they attacked ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān and the Banū Umayyah, their mawālī and those from Quraysh who held their views, who were in Medina. There were about one thousand of them. They left in a group and stopped at Marwān b. al-Ḥakam's house. There the people put them under a token siege. The Banū Umayyah 662. Ḥabīb b. Kurrah was a mawlā of the Umayyads, who was alleged to have led the party in pursuit of Ibn al-Zubayr when the latter had fled from Medina to Mecca in order to avoid giving the oath of allegiance to Yazīd. See note 25, above. From his account of his mission, he was obviously trusted by the Umayyads in Medina.

summoned Ḥabīb b. Kurrah. Those of them who sent for him were Marwān b. al-Ḥakam and 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.[663] Marwān was the one who was organizing their affairs. As for [406] 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān, he was only a young lad without any judgment.

According to 'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal—Ḥabīb b. Kurrah: I was with Marwān, and he and a group of the Banū Umayyah wrote a letter for me to take to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān[664] took the letter until he had come with me to Thaniyyat al-Wadā'.[665] He handed me the letter and said, "I will give you twelve days to go and twelve days[666] to return. Come to me in twenty-four days at this place. God willing, you will find me sitting and waiting for you at this time." The letter said: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.... We have been besieged in the house of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. Good water has been stopped from getting to us, and we are having berries thrown at us. Help! Help!"

[Ḥabīb b. Kurrah] continued: I took the letter and went with it until I reached Yazīd. He was sitting on a chair with his feet in a brass basin filled with water; he was experiencing pain in them. It is said that he had gout. He read it and then, as we have been informed, he recited:

They have changed the clemency that was part of my nature.
Therefore, I have substituted harshness toward my people for gentleness.[667]

Then he asked, "Are not Banū Umayyah and their mawālī in Medina a thousand men?" I said, "Yes, by God, and more." He

663. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān was the eldest son of Caliph 'Uthmān. He does not seem to have been particularly pro-Umayyad, perhaps because he felt he had a better claim to the caliphate; he refused to give the oath of allegiance to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam when he became Caliph. He died in Minā. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 602.

664. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān became Caliph after his father; he ruled the Islamic Empire from 65 (685) to 86 (705). See *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.

665. Thaniyyat al-Wadā' was a pass (thaniyyah) overlooking Medina on the road to Mecca. It was given this name in pre-Islamic times because it was the place where people said goodbye to travelers. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 937.

666. The Arabic is "nights" not "days."

667. The verse is not identified.

demanded, "Were they not able to fight for an hour in one day?" I answered, "Commander of the Faithful, all the people united against them, and they had no power against such a gathering of [407] the people."

He sent for 'Amr b. Sa'īd and made him read the letter and gave him the news. He told him to go to them with the people. 'Amr answered, "I had kept a firm grip on that town for you, and I had controlled its affairs on your behalf. Now, when it has come to the blood of Quraysh being shed on the ground, I do not want to be responsible for that. Let someone who is less closely associated with them than I am be responsible for that."

[Ḥabīb b. Kurrah] continued: He sent me with that letter to Muslim b. 'Uqbah al-Murrī,[668] who was then a weak sick old man. I handed him the letter and he read it. He asked me the news, and I told it to him. Then he asked the same question as Yazīd, "Aren't the Banū Umayyah and their mawālī and supporters in Medina a thousand men?" I replied, "Yes, they are." He said, "Were they not able to fight for an hour in one day? These are not worthy to be helped until they strive for themselves to fight against their enemy and to strengthen their authority." Then he went and visited Yazīd. He said to him, "Commander of the Faithful, do not help these men, for they are contemptible. Were they not able to fight for one day, or half a day, or even an hour in a day? Leave them, Commander of the Faithful, until they strive for themselves to fight their enemy and to strengthen their authority. Then it will be clear to you which of them will fight and endure in obedience to you or which will give in." Yazīd exclaimed, "Shame on you! There would be no good in life without them. Depart! Keep me informed of what you do. Gather the people and march with them."

His herald went out and proclaimed: "Set out for the Ḥijāz with the condition of receiving your stipends in full and a grant of a hundred dīnārs that will be put in the hand of each man immediately." Because of that, twelve thousand men volunteered.

668. Muslim b. 'Uqbah al-Murrī was one of the leaders of the Syrian Arabs, who had served Mu'āwiyah at Ṣiffīn; he was a loyal supporter of Yazīd. See EI[1], s.v. Muslim b. 'Uqba.

[408] According to Ibn Ḥumayd[669]—Jarīr[670]—al-Mughīrah:[671] Yazīd wrote to Ibn Marjānah, "Attack Ibn al-Zubayr." He replied, "No, I will never bring two such actions together for that sinner as killing the son of the Apostle of God and attacking the House [of God]."

Marjānah was a truthful woman and after 'Ubaydallāh had killed al-Ḥusayn, she used to say to him, "Woe upon you! What have you done! What a crime you have committed!"

The account returns to that of Ḥabīb b. Kurrah, who reported: I came back to meet 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān at the place at that time or a little after it. I found him sitting under a tree with a cloak wrapped around him. I told him what had happened, and he was pleased with the news. We left and went into Marwān's house to the group of the Banū Umayyah. I told them the news that I had brought; they praised God, the Mighty and High.

'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal informed us that Ḥabīb had come back in ten days. Ḥabīb recounted: I did not leave until I saw Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah go out to inspect and look at the cavalry. He was wearing a sword and leaning on an Arab bow, and I heard him reciting:

Tell Abū Bakr:[672] When the nights have gone by and the people have descended on Wādī Qurā,[673]
If you see twenty thousand of the people, both mature and young, do you think that they have been gathered by a drunkard?
Or were they gathered by a wakeful man who has driven away sleep from himself?

669. Ibn Ḥumayd's full name was Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Rāzī. He was a prolific traditionist and one of the authorities whose transmission of the Sīrah of Ibn Isḥāq Ṭabarī used. He died in 248 (862–63). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127–31.

670. Jarīr's full name was Jarīr b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Rāzī. He was a traditionist, who moved from al-Kūfah to al-Rayy and became a qāḍī. He died in 188 (804). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 75–77.

671. Al-Mughīrah's full name was Abū Hāshim al-Mughīrah b. Miqsam. He was a traditionist from al-Kūfah, who died in 130 (747–48). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 235.

672. Abū Bakr is a reference to Ibn al-Zubayr.

673. Wādī Qurā was a valley between Medina and Syria with many villages in it. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 878.

I wonder about a man who strays from the truth (mulḥid)! I really wonder.
A man of deceit in religion, who slanders noble people.[674]

[409] 'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal reported that that army had departed from Yazīd with Muslim b. 'Uqbah in command. Yazīd had told him, "If anything happens to you, appoint Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī[675] as your deputy." He also instructed him, "Leave the people for three days. If they agree to your demands, so be it. Otherwise fight them and when you overcome them, give license to pillage the city for three days. Whatever property, silver coins, weapons, and food are found belong to the army. When the three days have passed, withdraw from the people. Look for 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, keep them away from him, give him kind treatment and make him stay close to you. He has not become involved in any of the things in which they have become involved. His letter has come to me." 'Alī did not know anything about what Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah had instructed Muslim b. 'Uqbah to do with regard to him. In fact when the Banū Umayyah left for Syria, Marwān's goods and wife, 'Ā'ishah bt. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān[676]—she was the mother of Abān b. Marwān—were entrusted to 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn.

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): When the people of Medina expelled 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad from Medina, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam asked Ibn 'Umar if he would hide his family with him. Ibn 'Umar refused to do that. Marwān spoke to 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. He said, "Abū al-Ḥasan (i.e., 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn), I have kinship with you. Let my women be with your women." 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn agreed to do that. Marwān sent his women to 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, and the latter left with his own women and with Marwān's women until he 674. Mas'ūdī quotes part of these verses. See Murūj, V, 161. Balādhurī gives more verses. See Ansāb, IV/1, 323.

675. Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī was a leading supporter of the Umayyads but after Yazīd's death he was tempted to transfer his allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr. However, he remained loyal to the Umayyads and was killed at the Battle of Khāzir fighting against Ibn al-Ashtar in 67 (686). See Crone, Slaves, 97, and *EI*², s.v. Ḥuṣayn Numayr.

676. 'Ā'ishah is not mentioned in any other respect than being a daughter of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, the third Caliph and also being the wife of Marwān. She bore Marwān several children. Her son Abān became governor of Palestine for his brother the Caliph 'Abd al-Malik. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 164, 166.

settled them at Yanbu'.[677] Marwān was grateful to 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn in addition to the old friendship that had been between them.

[410] The account returns to that according to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal: Muslim b. 'Uqbah advanced with the army. When the people of Medina heard of his coming, they attacked those of the Banū Umayyah who were with them and besieged them in the house of Marwān. They declared, "By God! We will not leave you alone until we overcome you and cut off your heads, or you give us a covenant and testimonies before God that you will not harm us. Also that you will not reveal the gaps in our positions and that you will not assist an enemy against us. In this respect, we will desist from doing any harm to you and will let you go out from our city." They gave them such a covenant and testimonies before God. They drove out the Banū Umayyah, who left Medina with their baggage until they met Muslim b. 'Uqbah at Wādī al-Qurā.

'Ā'ishah bt. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān left for al-Ṭā'if and she passed by 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. The latter was staying at a property of his outside Medina. He had withdrawn from it, as he was unwilling to have any association with their policy [amr]. He asked her to take his son 'Abdallāh with her to al-Ṭā'if. She took him to al-Ṭā'if until the affairs of the people of Medina were brought to an end.

When the Banū Umayyah reached Muslim b. 'Uqbah at Wādī al-Qurā, he summoned 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, first of all, and demanded, "Give me information about the situation that you left behind; advise me." He answered, "I cannot give you any information, for covenants and sworn testimonies were made by us that we would not reveal gaps in their positions or help an enemy." Muslim b. 'Uqbah upbraided him and asserted, "By God! If it was not for the fact that you are the son of 'Uthmān, I would cut your head off. By God! I will never pardon a Qurashī for it after you!" 'Amr b. 'Uthmān went out to his companions with the news of what treatment he had received from him. Marwān b.

677. Yanbu' was an estate near an oasis; it was located a day's journey from Mount Raḍwā and seven stages away from Medina. It was given to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and became the property of his descendants. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 1039.

al-Ḥakam said to his son ʿAbd al-Malik, "Go in before me. Perhaps he will be satisfied with you instead of me." ʿAbd al-Malik went in. Muslim b. ʿUqbah demanded, "Come, what information do you have? Give me information about the people and how you see the situation." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "Yes, I think that you should go with those who are with you and avoid this road to Medina. [411] When you come to the palms lower down, stop there. Your army will be shaded by their shade, and they can eat from the palm dates. When night comes, appoint successive guards from the people in the camp for the whole night. In the morning, perform the morning prayer. Then go forward with them. Leave Medina to your left and go round it until you come toward them through al-Ḥarrah[678] coming from the east. Then you will be facing the people. When they face you, the east will be in front of them. When the sun shines, it will shine over the shoulder of your followers; it will not harm them but it will fall on the faces of the people of Medina; its heat will harm them and the harm from it will affect them. As long as you are coming from the east, they will see the dazzling brightness of your helmets, javelins, spears, swords, breastplates, and armlets. However, as long as they are coming from the west, you will not see any brillance from their weapons. Then fight them and ask for God's help against them. Indeed, God will be your helper, for they have opposed the imām and left the unity of the community (jamāʿah)." Muslim exclaimed, "God bless your father! What a man was born to him! When you were born to him, he saw a successor in you." Then Marwān entered. Muslim b. ʿUqbah asked him, "What is it?" Marwān said, "Hasn't ʿAbd al-Malik come to you?" Muslim replied, "What a man ʿAbd al-Malik is! Seldom have I spoken to a man from Quraysh like him." Marwān said, "When you met [412] ʿAbd al-Malik, you met me." He answered, "Indeed."

Muslim b. ʿUqbah departed from that place and the people departed with him until he stopped at the place that ʿAbd al-Malik had told him. There he did what ʿAbd al-Malik had told him to do. Then he went on into al-Ḥarrah until he stopped there.

678. Al-Ḥarrah is where the battle took place. It is a name meaning parched dry ground with black stones as if they had been burnt by fire. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 247.

He had come toward them from the east. Muslim b. ʿUqbah summoned the people of Medina and announced, "People of Medina, the Commander of the Faithful, Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, claims that you are the origin of Islam. I am reluctant to shed your blood. I will give you three days' respite. Whoever reverts from error and returns to the truth, we will accept that from him. I will leave you and go against this man who deviates from the truth (mulḥid), who is in Mecca. If you refuse, we will be excused for our treatment toward you."

That was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 64 (July 20–August 17, 684). Thus did I find it in my text (kitāb). It is a mistake because Yazīd died in the month of Rabīʿ al-Awwal 64 (November, 683). The Battle of al-Ḥarrah was on Wednesday, 28 Dhū al-Ḥijjah 63 (August 27, 683).[679]

When the three days had passed, he said, "What are you going to do? Are you going to make peace or are you going to fight?" They answered, "No, we will fight." He pleaded with them, "Don't do this. Rather enter into obedience, and we will use our vehemence and our weapons against this man who deviates from the truth, to whom heretics and libertines have gathered from every side." They shouted at them, "Enemies of God, by God, if you want to pass across to them, we will not leave you until we fight you. We will not let you go to the Sacred House of God to terrorize its inhabitants, to act impiously there, and to violate its sanctity. No, by God! We will not allow this."

The people of Medina had made use of a ditch at the flank of Medina. A great group of them stationed themselves there. In command of them was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Azhar b. ʿAwf b. ʿAbd [413] ʿAwf,[680] who was the nephew of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī.[681] ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ was in charge of another quarter on

679. This correction seems to have been written by Ṭabarī.

680. The name given by Ṭabarī, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Zuhayr b. ʿAbd ʿAwf, is clearly defective and Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 324, has the correct name that is used here. This man took part in the campaign to Ḥunayn; see Ṭabarī, III, 2380.

681. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī was a famous Companion of the Prophet, who became very rich; he was the man who appointed ʿUthmān in the consultative council (shūrā) for the appointment of the third Caliph. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf.

the flank of Medina and Ma'qil b. Sinān al-Ashja'ī[682] was in command of another quarter on the flank of Medina. The commander of their whole army (jamā'ah) was 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl al-Anṣārī with the largest and most numerous of the quarters.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī mentioned that 'Abdallāh b. Muṭī' was in command of Quraysh among the people of Medina. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl was in command of the Anṣār and Ma'qil b. Sinān was in command of the emigrants.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal: Muslim b. 'Uqbah set forth with all of those with him. He advanced from the direction of al-Ḥarrah until he set up his tent on the road to al-Kūfah. Then he sent the cavalry against Ibn Ghasīl. Ibn Ghasīl attacked the cavalry with the foot soldiers who were with him until the cavalry was defeated. They went back to Muslim. The latter, with the foot soldiers, stood in their way and shouted at them. They went back and fought fiercely. Al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās b. Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib[683] came to 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl and fought well and fiercely alongside him with about twenty horsemen. He told 'Abdallāh, "Order those horsemen with you to come to me and position themselves with me. When I attack, let them attack. By God! I will not stop until I reach Muslim; either I will kill him or I will be killed." 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah ordered 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk[684] of the Banū al-Ashhal of the Anṣār to proclaim to the cavalry that they should position themselves with al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās. ['Abdallāh b.] al-Ḍaḥḥāk[685] proclaimed this among them and he joined them to al-Faḍl. When the cavalry [414] gathered around him, he attacked the Syrians; they were put to flight. He cried to his companions, "Don't you see them miserably retreating? Attack again, may I be a sacrifice for you! By God! If I 682. Ma'qil b. Sinān al-Ashja'ī was a Companion of the Prophet from the tribe of Ashja'; as such, he was an emigrant from outside Quraysh. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, II, 799, 820, 897.

683. Al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās was a member of the Banū Hāshim; little is heard of him apart from this incident.

684. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk is not mentioned elsewhere.

685. 'Abdallāh b. has clearly been omitted from the Arabic text.

see their leader, I will kill him or I will be killed. Perseverance for a time is followed by joy. Victory only comes after perseverance." Then he attacked and his companions attacked with him. The Syrian cavalry was separated from Muslim b. 'Uqbah, who was with about five hundred foot soldiers who were kneeling pointing their spears toward the people. Al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās went as he was toward Muslim's standard so that he might strike the head of the standard bearer. The man was wearing a helmet but al-Faḍl cut through the helmet and split his skull. He fell dead. Al-Faḍl shouted, "I am the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib." He thought that he had killed Muslim and declared, "By the Lord of the Ka'bah! I have killed the tyrant of the people." Muslim taunted him, "Your bottom missed the ditch,"[686] for that standard bearer was a brave servant of his called Rūmī. Muslim took his standard and called out, "People of Syria, is this the fighting of people who want to defend their religion and who want to strengthen the victory of their imām? May God abominate your fighting from today! How painful it is to my heart! How distressing it is to my soul! By God! Your reward for it will be nothing, for you will be deprived of your stipends and you will be posted to the most distant frontier posts. Attack with this standard. May God make your faces full of grief if you do not tuck up your trousers."[687] He went forward with the standard, and those foot soldiers attacked in front of the standard. Al-Faḍl b. 'Abbās was brought down and killed. There were only about ten yards between him and the tent ropes of Muslim b. 'Uqbah. Zayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf[688] and Ibrāhīm b. Nu'aym al-'Adawī[689] were killed with him together with many foot soldiers from the people of Medina.

[415] According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—another account from 'Awānah: Muslim b. 'Uqbah was sick on the day of the battle. He ordered a litter and a chair to be put between the two ranks. Then he said, "People of Syria, fight for your commander or leave." They advanced toward them. They did not set 686. Arabic proverb that is roughly equivalent to: "Look before you leap." See Bustānī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. 'st.

687. An idiom roughly equivalent to: "Pull up your socks."

688. Zayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf is only mentioned in connection with his death.

689. Ibrāhīm b. Nu'aym al-'Adawī is not mentioned elsewhere.

themselves against one of those quarters without defeating it. They did not fight for long until their opponents had turned and fled. Then he came toward 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah and fought the fiercest of battles against him. Those of the quarters who still wanted to fight gathered around 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah. They fought a fierce battle. Al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās b. Rabī'ah with a group of the nobles and horsemen of the people attacked, heading toward Muslim b. 'Uqbah while Muslim was sick on his litter. He called out, "Carry me and put me in the ranks." After they had carried him, they put him in front of his tent in the ranks. Al-Faḍl b. 'Abbās and those companions of his attacked until he reached the litter. Al-Faḍl was fair-skinned. When he raised his sword to strike him, Muslim shouted to his followers, "The fair-skinned slave will be my killer. Where are you, sons of free women? Thrust your spears at him!" They attacked and stabbed him until he fell.

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. Munqidh:[690] The cavalry and foot soldiers advanced with their equipment toward 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah al-Ghasīl and his foot soldiers until they were near him. Muslim b. 'Uqbah rode a horse of his; he went among the Syrians, urging them on and saying: "Syrians, you are not the best of the Arabs in lineage and descent, nor the most numerous of them, nor the ones with the broadest lands. God has only singled you out, as He has, with victory over your enemies and a good position with your imāms [416] because of your obedience and your integrity. These people and Arabs like them have changed, and God has changed toward them. Therefore, give the best obedience that you have, and God will give you the best victory and success that He can give you." He went back to his previous position and ordered the cavalry to advance against Ibn al-Ghasīl and his followers. When the cavalry began to advance against the foot soldiers, the latter raised their spears and swords in their faces. The cavalry were scared away, frightened off; they drew back in fear. Muslim b. 'Uqbah called out among them, "Syrians, God has not made anyone more entitled to the land than you. Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr, attack with your 690. 'Abdallāh b. Munqidh was an otherwise unknown authority of Abū Mikhnaf. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 107.

troops." He attacked with the people from Ḥimṣ.[691] He went toward them. When Ibn al-Ghasīl saw them approaching, marching under their standards toward him, he stood up among his followers and said, "Men, your enemy has achieved an attitude in the battle that it would have been more appropriate for you to have had to fight against them. I had thought that you would only have waited a short time before God made the decision between you and them, either for you or against you. Are you not people of clear sight, people from the place of emigration? By God! I do not think that your Lord has either become more pleased with the inhabitants of any Muslim land than He is with you, or more angry with the inhabitants of any Arab land than He is with these people who are fighting against you. Every man among you has only one death that he can die. By God! There is no better death than the death of [417] martyrdom. God has brought it to you. Seize it! By God! Not everything you want, you find!" Then he went forward a little way with his standard and stood there. Ibn Numayr came with his standard until he was close to it. Muslim b. ʿUqbah ordered ʿAbdallāh b. ʿIḍāh al-Ashʿarī to advance with a hundred archers until they were near Ibn al-Ghasīl and his followers. They began to shoot arrows at them. Ibn al-Ghasīl said, "Why are you being targets for them? Whoever wants to hurry to heaven, let him stay close to this standard." All of those who were prepared to face death came to him, and he said, "Accept the promise to your Lord. By God! I hope that soon you will be joyful." The people attacked one another, and for an hour of the day they fought the fiercest battle seen at that time. Ibn Ghasīl sent his sons forward in front of him, one by one, until they were killed in front of him while he was striking with his sword and reciting:

Destruction to those who want corruption and tyranny, who avoid the truth and the signs of guidance.
God will only destroy those who are disobedient.

He was killed and his brother on his mother's side, Muḥammad b.

691. Ḥimṣ is a town in Syria located in a rich agricultural plain on the eastern bank of the Orontes; it is bounded in the east by the desert and in the west by mountains. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥimṣ.

Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās,[692] was killed with him. He had gone forward and fought until he was killed. He declared, "I would not wish that the people of al-Daylam killed me instead of these people." Then he fought until he was killed. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī[693] was killed with him. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam passed by him. He was like an oblong stone of silver. Marwān said, "May God have mercy on you. How many pillars in the mosque have seen you standing long in prayer beside them!"

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah: Muslim b. 'Uqbah was sitting on a chair; men were carrying him while he was fighting against Ibn al-Ghasīl at the Battle of al-Ḥarrah. He was reciting:

Hāshim b. Ḥarmalah revived his father [418] at the Battle of al-Habātayn and the Battle of al-Ya'mulah.
Through him all the kings were scattered dead, and his spear deprived many mothers of their sons.
The man [destined to killing] does not wait long until he knocks him down.
He kills those who have guilt and those who have no guilt.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf: Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ[694] came out to fight on that day. When the Syrians fled, he went after them striking at them until the defeat overcame him. Then he went away with the others who went away. Muslim gave up Medina to pillage for three days; they killed the people and seized goods. That frightened the Companions of the Prophet who were there. Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī left and went to a cave in the mountain. One of the Syrians spotted him and came into the cave against him.

692. Muḥammad b. Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās's father had been a Companion of the Prophet from Medina; he reported traditions from his father and 'Umar. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 273; and Ṭabarī, I, 1757, III, 2403.

693. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī's father had been a Companion of the Prophet from Medina; he had been sent as his representative to Yemen just before the Prophet's death. See Ṭabarī, I, 1727–29.

694. Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was a son of the famous Companion of the Prophet, who later took part in Ibn al-Ash'ath's revolution. He was captured and executed by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf in 83 (702). See Ṭabarī, II, 1120.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥasan b. 'Aṭiyyah al-'Awfī[695]—Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī: The Syrian came in after me; he was walking with his sword. I drew my sword and walked toward him to frighten him so that perhaps he would leave me. However, he would do nothing but advance against me. I sheathed my sword and said, "If you stretch out your hand toward me to kill me, it is not for me to stretch out my hand toward you to kill you, for I fear God, the Lord of the universe."[696] He said, "Who are you, may your father be blessed?" I answered, "I am Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī." He said, "The Companion of the Prophet?" I said, "Yes." Then he went away from me.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah: Muslim b. 'Uqbah summoned the people to give the oath of allegiance at Qubā.[697] Safe-conduct was sought for two men from Quraysh, Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Zam'ah b. al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib [419] b. Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā[698] and Muḥammad b. Abī al-Jahm b. Ḥudhayfah al-'Adawī,[699] and also for Ma'qil b. Sinān al-Ashja'ī. They were brought a day after the battle. Muslim demanded, "Give the oath of allegiance." The two Qurashīs declared, "We give the oath of allegiance to you on the basis of the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet." Muslim asserted, "No, by God! I will never release you with that." He had them brought forward and their heads cut off. Marwān exclaimed, "Glory be to God! Are you killing two men of Quraysh who came to you to seek safe-conduct, and yet you cut their heads off?" Muslim pricked him in his hip with a cane and said, "And you too. If you say what they said, you will only see the sky for the time of a flash of lightning."

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf: Ma'qil b. Sinān came and sat with the people and he asked for a 695. Al-Ḥasan b. 'Aṭiyyah al-'Awfī was a traditionist, who was said to have died in 181 (797), but this would make him unusually old as an authority for Abū Mikhnaf. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 294; and Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 207.

696. Qur'ān, 5:31.

697. There is dispute about whether Qubā is the Prophet's mosque in Medina or a small village two miles south of Medina where an early mosque was built. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 23–24.

698. Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Zam'ah b. al-Aswad was only mentioned in connection with this incident, but his grandmother was Umm Salamah, wife of the Prophet. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 328.

699. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Jahm is not mentioned elsewhere.

drink to quench his thirst. Muslim asked him, "Which drink do you most like?" He answered, "Honey." Muslim ordered, "Give him a drink." Ma'qil drank until he had quenched his thirst. Muslim asked him, "Have you quenched your thirst with your drink?" He replied, "Yes." Muslim declared, "No, by God! You will never drink another drink after that except the boiling water in the fire of hell. Do you remember what you said about the Commander of the Faithful, 'I journeyed to him for a month, I spent a month returning from him and I have come back empty-handed. O God! Bring a change!' You were meaning Yazīd." He had him brought forward and his head cut off.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam: Muslim b. 'Uqbah sent 'Amr b. Muḥriz al-Ashja'ī,[700] and he brought Ma'qil b. Sinān to him. Muslim said, "Welcome, Abū Muḥammad (i.e., Ma'qil), I see you are thirsty?" Ma'qil said, "Yes." Muslim ordered, "Mix him some honey with the ice that you brought with us." Previously Ma'qil had been a friend of Muslim's. They mixed some honey with the ice for him. When Ma'qil had drunk, he said, "May God quench your thirst with the drink of heaven." Muslim asserted, "By God! You will never drink another drink after that until you drink the boiling water of hell." Ma'qil begged him, "I implore you before God and kinship."[701] However, Muslim said to him, "You are the one who met me at Tiberias[702] on the night when you had left Yazīd. You [420] said, 'We journeyed for a month and we came back from Yazīd empty-handed. We will go back to Medina and depose this sinner. We will give the oath of allegiance to one of the sons of the emigrants (Muhājirūn).' What have the tribes of Ghaṭafān and Ashja' to do with deposing and installing a caliph? I swore an oath that I would not meet you in a battle without cutting your head off." Then he ordered him to be killed.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah: Yazīd b. Wahb b. Zam'ah[703] was brought. Muslim demanded, "Give the oath of allegiance." He declared, "I give you the oath of 700. 'Amr b. Maḥriz al-Ashja'ī is not mentioned elsewhere, but belonged to the same tribe as Ma'qil b. Sinān, whom he was sent to fetch.

701. Both men came from different clans of the tribe Ghaṭafān.

702. Tiberias is on the southwest coast of the Sea of Galilee in Palestine.

703. Yazīd b. Wahb b. Zam'ah is not mentioned elsewhere.

allegiance on the basis of the Sunnah of 'Umar."[704] Muslim ordered him to be killed. Yazīd b. Wahb protested, "But I am giving the oath of allegiance." Muslim said, "No, by God! I will not save you from your fall!" Marwān spoke to him about the relationship that existed between the two of them. Then he ordered Marwān to be struck [with the fist] in the neck.[705] After that he announced, "Give the oath of allegiance on the basis that you are the servants of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah." Then he ordered Yazīd b. Wahb to be killed.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—'Awānah and Abū Mikhnaf[706]—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq: Marwān brought 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. When the Banū Umayyah had been expelled, 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn had protected Marwān's goods and wife; he had given her refuge. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn approached; he walked between Marwān and 'Abd al-Malik, seeking safe-conduct from Muslim. He came and sat down with Muslim between the two men. Marwān asked for a drink so that 'Alī might gain protection from Muslim.[707] A drink was brought for him, and Marwān drank a little from it. Then he handed it to 'Alī. When he put it to his mouth, Muslim ordered, "Don't drink our drink."

'Alī's hand shook; he did not feel safe for his life. He held the cup in his hand without drinking from it and without putting it down. Muslim said, "You only came between these two men to [421] seek safe-conduct from me. By God! If that matter were just going to be due to them, I would kill you. But the Commander of the Faithful has ordered me to treat you kindly. He told me that you had written to him. That is what brings you benefit from me. If you want, drink your drink that is in your hand. If you want, ask

704. In this context a particularly provocative remark because the Sunnah of 'Umar must refer to the consultative council (shūrā), which 'Umar introduced to appoint the next Caliph and which had been ignored by Yazīd.

705. This appears to be somewhat harsh treatment of an Umayyad as important as Marwān.

706. The text is qāla 'Awānah 'an Abī Mikhnaf ["Awānah reported on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf"]. This is highly unlikely as it has not occurred in the accounts given so far. I have followed Sezgin and changed the 'an to wa. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 193n.

707. The Arab custom of not killing a man who has shared one's food and drink seems irrelevant after the earlier incidents connected with Muslim b. 'Aqīl, but the others had been fighting against Muslim.

us for another." 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn said, "I want the one that is in my hand." He drank it. Muslim told him to come to him and he made him sit beside him.

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam: When 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn was brought to Muslim, he asked who he was. When they told him that it was 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, he welcomed him and made him sit with him on the couch and the cushions. He said, "The Commander of the Faithful told me to be kind to you but he also said that these wicked men would keep me occupied from you; they would stop my generosity to you." Then he suggested to 'Alī, "Perhaps your family are frightened?" He answered, "Yes, by God!" Muslim ordered his mule to be saddled. Then he took him and sent him back to his family.

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—'Awānah: 'Amr b. 'Uthmān [b. 'Affān] had not been among those of the Banū Umayyah who had left. One day he was brought to Muslim b. 'Uqbah, who said, "Syrians, do you know this man?" They answered, "No." He told them, "He is the wicked man who is the son of a good man. This is 'Amr, son of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, the Commander of the Faithful. Hey, 'Amr! When the people of Medina have the upper hand, you say, 'I am one of you.' When the Syrians have the upper hand, you say, 'I am the son of the Commander of the Faithful, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.'" He ordered his beard to be plucked out. Then he said, "The mother of this man used to put black beetles in her mouth. Then she would say, 'Commander of the Faithful, I challenge you to guess what is in my mouth.' And in her mouth was what was bad for her and what was painful for her." Muslim let 'Amr go. 'Amr's mother was from the clan of Daws.[708]

Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī reported according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—those who transmitted to him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: [422]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]:

Both Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī reported that the Battle of al-Ḥarrah was on 26 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 63 [August 28, 684].

Some of them say that it was on 25 Dhū al-Ḥijjah [August 27].

---

708. Daws is a clan of the tribe of al-Azd. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 601.

In this year (63/684) 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the people in the pilgrimage.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far[709]—Ibn Abī 'Awf:[710] Ibn al-Zubayr led the people in the pilgrimage in the year 63/684. At that time he was called "one who seeks refuge" [in the sanctuary of Mecca]. The people thought that a consultative council (shūrā) was the appropriate course of action (amr) to decide the Caliph.

On the night of the new moon of al-Muḥarram (August 29) we were in our house when Sa'īd,[711] the mawlā of al-Miswar b. Makhramah,[712] came to us and told us what Muslim had done to the people of Medina and what had been taken from them. A great catastrophe had come upon them. I saw the people draw their swords, become serious, make preparations, and realize that he was going to attack them.

A different account of the Battle of al-Ḥarrah and the killing of Ibn Ghasīl from the one that has been related on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf from those from whom he reported, has been mentioned. That is according to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr[713]—his father[714]—Wahb b. Jarīr[715]—Juwayriyyah b. Asmā'[716]—what he heard the scholars of Medina transmitting:[717] When Mu'āwiyah was close to death, he summoned Yazīd and said to him, "There may be 709. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far was a regular authority of al-Wāqidī; he must have lived in the middle of the second (eighth) century. See Ṭabarī, index; and Wāqidī, Maghāzī, index.

710. Ibn Abī 'Awf is never mentioned again and is unidentifiable; the isnād could be defective and the reporter could be a son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf.

711. Sa'īd is not mentioned in any other context.

712. Al-Miswar b. Makhramah was a younger Companion of the Prophet, who came to Medina when still a boy. He died defending Ibn al-Zubayr. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 151.

713. Aḥmad b. Zuhayr was an important traditionist and Ṭabarī's authority for the Baṣran tradition; he died in 280 (893). See Petersen, 'Alī and Mu'āwiya, 110.

714. He was Zuhayr b. Ḥarb, a traditionist, who died in 234 (848–49). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 342–43.

715. Wahb b. Jarīr was an important narrator of historical tradition that is rarely used by Ṭabarī; he died in 206 (821–22). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 161.

716. Juwayriyyah b. Asmā' was an important narrator of historical tradition from a school of history little used by Ṭabarī; he died in 173 (789–90). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 124–25.

717. This report combines two separate reports given by Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ. See Ta'rīkh, 237–38.

trouble for you one day from the people of Medina. If they do trouble you, then hurl Muslim b. 'Uqbah against them. He is a man whose sincere advice I have experienced."

When Mu'āwiyah died, a delegation of the people of Medina visited Yazīd. Among those who visited him was 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah b. Abī 'Āmir. He was a noble, an excellent man, a leader, and a man who worshiped God. With him were his eight sons. Yazīd gave him one hundred thousand dirhams. He also gave each one of his sons ten thousand dirhams, apart from the [423] robes of honor and transport for them. When 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah came back to Medina, he went to the people. They asked, "What was the situation back there?" He answered, "I have come to you from a man whom, if I only had these sons of mine, I would fight." They said, "We have been informed that he brought benefit to you, gave you gifts, and treated you generously." He replied, "He did that, but I only accepted that from him to make myself stronger through it." He incited the people, and they gave the oath of allegiance to him. Yazīd was informed of that and he sent Muslim b. 'Uqbah against them. The people of Medina sent men to every watering place between them and Syria; they poured a skin of tar into each one and spoiled it.[718] However, God sent down the rain on the Syrians, and they did not look for water to drink from a bucket [from the wells at the watering places] until they arrived at Medina. The people of Medina went out against them in many groups and in a manner the like of which has not been seen. When the Syrians saw them, they were terrified of them and were unwilling to fight them. Muslim was in severe pain. While the people were involved in fighting the Syrians, they heard the sounds of victorious cries of "God is greater" behind them in the hollow of Medina. The Banū Ḥārithah[719] had led the Syrians in against them while they were on the edge [of the trench]. The people were put to flight. More of the people at the trench were wounded than were killed. The Syrians entered Medina, and the people were defeated. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥanẓalah was 718. 'Uwwira in the text has been emended to 'awwarūhu following Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 238.

719. The Banū Ḥārithah are a subclan of the Aws in Medina; see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 158.

leaning on one of his sons snoring in his sleep. His son woke him. When he opened his eyes, he saw what the people had done. He ordered his eldest son to go forward until he was killed. Muslim b. 'Uqbah entered Medina. He summoned the people to give the oath of allegiance on the basis that they were servants of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, who would judge over their lives, their property, and their families as he wished.

The Events of the Year 64

(AUGUST 30, 683–AUGUST 17, 684)

Abū Ja'far reported: Among those events was the advance of the Syrians against Mecca to make war on 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr and [424] those who held the same view as he in refusing to accept Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. When Muslim b. 'Uqbah had finished fighting the people of Medina and the three days of the plundering of their property by his army, he set out with those of his army who were with him in the direction of Mecca.

This is according to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal: Muslim set out with the people toward Mecca with the intention of attacking Ibn al-Zubayr. He appointed Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī[720] as his deputy over Medina.

As for al-Wāqidī, he reported that Muslim appointed 'Amr b. Muḥriz as his deputy over Medina but he added that it was reported that he appointed Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī as his deputy.

720. Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī was a prominent supporter of the Umayyads, particularly of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. See Ṭabarī, II, 1164–65.

The Death of Muslim b. 'Uqbah and the Bombardment and Burning of the Ka'bah

The account returns to Abū Mikhnaf: When Muslim b. 'Uqbah reached al-Mushallal[721]—it was reported as Qafā al-Mushallal—death came upon him. That was toward the end of al-Muḥarram, 64 (toward the end of September, 683). He summoned al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī and said to him, "O son of a pack saddle of a donkey! If this matter were for me to decide, I would not have given you command over this army. However, the Commander of the Faithful has given you command after me, and the order of the Commander of the Faithful cannot be opposed. Take four pieces [of advice] from me: travel speedily; be quick in attack; keep the news unknown; and don't listen to a Qurashī." Then he died and was buried at Qafā al-Mushallal.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—'Awānah: Muslim b. 'Uqbah set off aiming for Ibn al-Zubayr. When he reached the pass of Harshā,[722] death came upon him. He sent for the leaders of the troops and said, "The Commander of the Faithful has instructed me, if death were to come to me, to appoint Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī to take over command of you. By [425] God! If the decision were mine, I would not do so. However, I am unwilling to disobey the order of the Commander of the Faithful at the time of my death." Then he summoned Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr and said, "O son of a pack saddle of a donkey! Remember my advice to you: keep the news unknown; never listen to a Qurashī; don't hold the Syrians back from their enemy; only stay three days before you attack Ibn al-Zubayr, the sinful man." Then he said, "O God! After testifying that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad is His servant and Apostle, I have never done anything that I like better than my killing of the people of Medina or anything that I hope to be of such advantage to me in the Hereafter." He went on, "The Banū Murrah will have my estate at Ḥawrān[723] as a gift for them but whatever so-and-so keeps 721. Al-Mushallal is a mountain near Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 542.

722. Harshā is a pass on the road to Mecca near al-Juḥfah; it is four stages away from Medina. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 19, and IV, 960.

723. Ḥawrān is a fertile district to the south of Damascus. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 358.

within her door belongs to her." He was referring to his slave wife. Then he died.

When he died, Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr departed with the people and advanced toward Ibn al-Zubayr and Mecca. The inhabitants of Mecca and the Ḥijāz had given the oath of allegiance to him.

According to Hishām—'Awānah: Before his will, Muslim said, "My son alleges that this slave wife has given me poison to drink. He is a liar. This disease attacks my family in our stomachs."

All the people of Medina came to him, that is, to Ibn al-Zubayr. Najdah b. 'Āmir al-Ḥanafī came to him with people from the Khārijites to protect the Sacred House. Ibn al-Zubayr said to his brother al-Mundhir, "There is nobody to undertake this task and to drive off these people except you and me." His brother, al-Mundhir, was one of those who had been present at the Battle of al-Ḥarrah and had then joined him. Ibn al-Zubayr despatched his [426] brother against them with the people. He fought against them fiercely for a time. Then one of the Syrians challenged al-Mundhir to single combat. The Syrian was on a mule of his, and al-Mundhir came out against him. Each of them struck the other a blow from which each fell dead. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr knelt down saying, "O Lord! Destroy it from its root and don't comfort it." He was praying against [the soul of] the one who had fought against his brother.

The Syrians made a dreadful onslaught against them, and Ibn al-Zubayr's followers were defeated. Ibn al-Zubayr's mule stumbled. He cried out, "How wretched!" He dismounted and shouted for his followers to come to him. Al-Miswar b. Makhramah b. Nawfal b. Uhayb b. 'Abd Manāf b. Zuhrah and Mu'ṣab b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf came to him and fought alongside him until they were both killed. Ibn al-Zubayr remained steadfast against the Syrians fighting against them until night. Then they withdrew from him.

This was during the first siege. They stayed there fighting against him for the rest of al-Muḥarram and the whole of Ṣafar (from the end of September until October 28). On Saturday, 3 Rabī al-Awwal, 64 (October 31, 683) they hurled [stones and wood] at the Sacred House with ballistae and they set it on fire. They began to recite:

A ballista with which we bombard the pillars of the mosque is like a raging stallion camel.[724]

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—Abū ʿAwānah: ʿAmr b. Ḥawṭ al-Sadūsī began reciting:

How do you see the work of Umm Farwah as she takes them between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah?[725]

He meant by "Umm Farwah" the ballista.

[427] Al-Wāqidī reported that when Muslim b. ʿUqbah had been buried at al-Mushallal on 21 al-Muḥarram (September 20), al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr set out. He reached Mecca on 24 al-Muḥarram (September 23). He besieged Ibn al-Zubayr for sixty days until news of the death of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah reached him at the beginning of Rabīʿ al-Ākhir (the end of November).

In this year (64/683) the Kaʿbah was set on fire.

The Cause of the Burning of the Kaʿbah

Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī) reported that the Kaʿbah was burned on Saturday, 3 Rabīʿ al-Awwal, 64 (October 31, 683), twenty-nine days before news of the death of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah came. The news arrived on Tuesday, 2 Rabīʿ al-Akhir (November 26).[726]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī)—Riyāḥ b. Muslim—his father: They were causing fires to be lit around the Kaʿbah. There was a spark, which the wind blew; it set fire to the veil of the Kaʿbah and burned the wood of the Sacred House on Saturday, 3 Rabīʿ al-Awwal (October 31).

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī—ʿAbdallāh b.

724. These verses are also quoted by Balādhurī from Abū Mikhnaf, who named the poet as al-Zubayr b. Khuzaymah al-Khathʿamī from Palestine; he was said to be also in change of the bombardment. See Ansāb, IV/1, 339.

725. This verse is also quoted by Balādhurī, who does not identify the poet. See Ansāb, IV/1, 340.

726. The Arabic is hilāl, literally "new moon," but this can also refer to the first two days of the month. Clearly it is the second day here.

Zayd[727]—'Urwah b. Udhaynah:[728] I came to Mecca with my mother on the day the Ka'bah was burned. The fire had reached it, and I saw that it was without its silk veil. I saw that the Yemenī corner of the Ka'bah[729] was black and had been cracked in three places. I asked, "What has happened to the Ka'bah?" They pointed to one of Ibn al-Zubayr's followers and said, "It has been burned because of this man. He put a firebrand on the tip of his spear; the wind made it fly off. It struck the veils of the Ka'bah between the Yemenī corner and the Black Stone."

In that year (64/683) Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah died. His death occurred in one of the villages of Ḥimṣ called Ḥuwwārīn in the land of Syria on 14 Rabī' al-Awwal, 64 (November 11, 683). He [428] was thirty-eight years of age according to the report of some.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā[730]—Hishām b. al-Walīd al-Makhzūmī: [Ibn Shihāb] al-Zuhrī wrote down the ages of the caliphs for his grandfather.[731] Among the things he wrote was: Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah died when he was thirty-nine years of age.

His rule was for three years and six months according to the report of some. It is also reported that it was eight months.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—those who transmitted to him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah died on Tuesday, 14 Rabī' al-Awwal (November 11).[732] His caliphate was for three years and eight months less three days. His son Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd said the funeral prayer for him.

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, he reported a different version of the age of Yazīd from that of al-Zuhrī. What Hishām reported in the version that has been transmitted to us is: Abū 727. 'Abdallāh b. Zayd is not mentioned by Ṭabarī elsewhere. However, it is possible that he is the traditionist 'Abdallāh b. Zayd b. Aslam who died in 164 (780–81). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 223–23.

728. 'Urwah b. Udhaynah is not mentioned in any other context.

729. The Yemenī corner of the Ka'bah is that corner facing Yemen. The Black Stone is in the corner to the right of it as one faces it. See *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba.

730. Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā was a well-known traditionist and a secretary. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 517–18.

731. There is some confusion as to whether this should be father or grandfather. In Ṭabarī, II, 199, Hishām b. al-Walīd reported that Ibn Shihāb answered questions about the ages of the caliphs for al-Walīd, which might mean Hishām's father.

732. Actually a Wednesday.

Khālid Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān succeeded to the caliphate on 1 Rajab, 60 (April 8, 680), when he was thirty-two years and some months old. He ruled for two years and eight months and died on 14 Rabī' al-Awwal, 63 (November 21, 682), when he was thirty-five years of age. His mother was Maysūn bt. Baḥdal b. Unayf b. Waljah b. Qunāfah b. 'Adī b. Zuhayr b. Ḥārithah al-Kalbī.

The Number of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah's Sons

Among Yazīd's sons were: Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, whose kunyah was Abū Laylā.[733] Of him the poet says:

[429] I see discord whose beginning has arrived.
After Abū Laylā the kingdom will be for him who conquers.

Khālid b. Yazīd, whose kunyah was Abū Hāshim. It was reported that he acquired the skill of alchemy.[734]

Abū Sufyān.[735]

The mother of both of these was Umm Khālid[736] bt. Abī Hāshim b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah b. 'Abd Shams. Marwān married her after Yazīd. Of her the poet says:

Rejoice, O Umm Khālid, sometimes the results of one who strives are for one who sits.[737]

'Abdallāh b. Yazīd who was reported to be the finest archer of the Arabs at his time. His mother was Umm Kulthūm bt. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir. He was called al-Uswār.[738] Of him the poet says:

---

733. Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd was ill when he succeeded his father; he survived only a few months before he died. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 356.

734. According to Balādhurī, Khālid b. Yazīd was also a poet and an astrologer; he is said to have remained silent when people with less knowledge spoke. He died during the caliphate of 'Abd al-Malik, from 65 (685) to 86 (705). See Ansāb, IV/1, 359–64.

735. Abū Sufyān is not mentioned in any other context.

736. Umm Hāshim has been emended to Umm Khālid as in the poem below and in Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 365.

737. Similar verse quoted by Balādhurī. See Ansāb, IV/1, 290.

738. Al-uswār means "horseman" in Persian. He was in fact, a famous horseman. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 367.

The people claim that the best of all Quraysh when they are mentioned is al-Uswār.

There were also 'Abdallāh al-Aṣghar,[739] 'Umar,[740] Abū Bakr,[741] 'Utbah,[742] Ḥarb,[743] 'Abd al-Raḥmān,[744] al-Rabī',[745] and Muḥammad.[746] Their mothers were various slave wives.

---

739. 'Abdallāh al-Aṣghar is not mentioned in any other context.

740. 'Umar was either struck by a thunderbolt or died of fright in a thunderstorm. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 368.

741. Abū Bakr had a reputation for liking to eat food. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 369.

742. The only report about 'Utbah is that he was said to have descendants in Syria. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 370.

743. Ḥarb is not mentioned in any other context.

744. 'Abd al-Raḥmān had a reputation for piety and generosity. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 368.

745. Al-Rabī' is not mentioned in any other context.

746. There are no further reports about Muḥammad other than that he had a son called Muḥammad by a slave wife. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 370.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XX

The Collapse of Sufyānid Authority and the Coming of the Marwānids

TRANSLATED BY G R HAWTING

The Events of the Year 64 (cont'd)

(AUGUST 30, 683—AUGUST 17, 684)

[429]

The Caliphate of Muʿāwiyah b. Yazīd

In this year, the oath of allegiance as caliph was given to Muʿāwiyah b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in Syria, and to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr in the Ḥijāz.[1]

When Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah died, al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr and the Syrians continued fighting against Ibn al-Zubayr and his companions in Mecca—according to Hishām's report from ʿAwānah[2]—for forty days. The Syrians had strenuously besieged Ibn al-Zubayr and his men and blockaded them. Then news of Yazīd's death reached Ibn al-Zubayr and his companions, but not al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr and his. [430]

1. For background to the following section see p. xiii of the Introduction. For more details on ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr, see the articles s.vv. in *EI*². For parallels and other accounts, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, IVb, 51–2; Masʿūdī, Murūj, V, 190–1; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 301–2; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 107–8; J. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 165–7; G. Rotter, Die Umayyaden und der zweite Bürgerkrieg, 53–9, 134ff. (with other references to sources and secondary literature).

2. For Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, important Kūfan scholar, d. ca. 206/821, see *EI*², s.v. Kalbī, and GAS, I, 268–71; for ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī, Kūfan collector of historical tradition, d. ca. 153/770, see *EI*², s.v., and GAS, I, 307–8.

According to Isḥāq b. Abī Isrā'īl—ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz b. Khālid b. Rustam al-Ṣanᶜānī Abū Muḥammad—Ziyād b. Jiyal:[3] While Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr was fighting against Ibn al-Zubayr, news of Yazīd's death arrived unexpectedly. Ibn al-Zubayr then shouted to the Syrians saying, "Your tyrant[4] is dead. Whoever of you wishes to enter what the people have entered into, let him do so; but whoever is unwilling, let him take himself to his Syria!" Consequently, they left off fighting him.

Ibn al-Zubayr said to al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr, "Draw close to me and I will speak with you." He did so and Ibn al-Zubayr spoke with him. The horse of one of them began to drop dung (yajfilu; a gloss in the text explains that the word jafl here refers to dung, rawth) and the pigeons of the sanctuary area[5] started to scavenge in the droppings. Al-Ḥuṣayn reined back his horse from them and Ibn al-Zubayr said, "What is the matter with you?" He replied, "I am afraid lest my horse kill the pigeons of the sanctuary area." Ibn al-Zubayr said, "You would refrain from this sin[6] and yet you wish to kill the Muslims!" Al-Ḥuṣayn answered, "I will not fight you; allow us to perform the ritual circumambulation of the sanctuary[7] and then we will leave you." He did so, and they departed.

ᶜAwānah b. al-Ḥakam said, according to the report of Hishām from him: When news of the death of Yazīd reached Ibn al-Zubayr, whom the Syrians, unaware of it, had strenuously

---

3. Isḥāq b. Abī Isrā'īl, d. 245/859 (Ṭabarī, III, 1121, 1440); the Leiden text gives the source of the report as Ziyād b. Jiyal, citing the reference in Dhahabī, Mushtabih, Leiden 1881, 88, to Ziyād b. Jiyal al-Abnawī as a Kūfan transmitter; the Cairo text has Ziyād b. Jabal.

4. Ar. ṭāghiyah: the word seems to be connected with an Aramaic or possibly Abyssinian root with the connotation of "great wickedness" and an association with idols (see A. Jeffery, Foreign Vocabulary, s.v. ṭāghūt); ṭāghiyah is often a designation of the Byzantine ruler.

5. Ar. al-ḥaram, here apparently the area surrounding the sanctuary (the Kaᶜbah or al-bayt); in a general sense, any sacred area (such as those at Medina or Jerusalem) may be referred to as a ḥaram.

6. Following the reading of the Cairo text a-tataḥarraju; Leiden has ataḥarraju, "should I refrain. . . ?"

7. The sanctuary, al-bayt, is usually in this context a reference to the Kaᶜbah (see EI², s.v. Kaᶜba); the ritual of ṭawāf, walking seven times around the outside of the Kaᶜbah, is performed in connection with pilgrimage to Mecca (see EI², s.v. Ḥadjdj).

besieged and blockaded, he and the Meccans began to shout out to them, "Why are you fighting? Your tyrant is dead!" At first they would not believe them, until Thābit b. Qays b. al-Munqaʿ al-Nakhaʿī[8] of the Kūfans arrived among the leaders of the Iraqis and passed by al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr. He was a confidant of his, there were marriage ties between them, and he had used to see him at Muʿāwiyah's court. Ibn Numayr recognized the excellence of his character, the strength of his Islam, and the nobility of his descent, and he asked about the news. Thābit told him about Yazīd's death and thereupon al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr sent to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, saying, "Let us meet tonight in al-Abṭaḥ[9] to discuss what concerns us." [431] When they met, al-Ḥuṣayn said to Ibn al-Zubayr, "If it be that this man is dead, then you, of the people, have the most right in this matter. Come, and we will give you the oath of allegiance, and then leave with me for Syria. This army which is with me consists of the foremost of the Syrians and their champions. By God, there are not two of them who will disagree about you if you will grant the men security and indemnity for the blood spilled between us and you and between us and the people of the Ḥarrah."[10]

Saʿīd b. ʿAmr[11] used to say that the only thing which prevented Ibn al-Zubayr's accepting the oath of allegiance from them and leaving for Syria was a foreboding [taṭayyur], because it was at Mecca where God protected him—that was from the army of Marwān[12]—and, by God, if ʿAbdallāh had gone

8. One of the ashrāf (tribal notables) of al-Kūfah exiled to Syria, where Muʿāwiyah was governor, by the caliph ʿUthmān; see Ṭabarī, I, 2917, 2921 and, on his name, Ansāb, IVb, 51.

9. Literally, "the hollow," a name applied to several places in and around Mecca, especially its central part; see Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 92–3, EI², s.v. Makka.

10. A reference to those killed at the battle outside al-Madīnah in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 63 (August, 683) by the army of which Ibn Numayr subsequently assumed command (see EI², s.v. Ḥarra).

11. A leading Umayyad, his father had been governor of Medina for a time; elsewhere Ibn al-Kalbī cites information from him through his son Khālid.

12. The sense here seems rather elusive. Marwān at this time has not yet been chosen as caliph, and, even as caliph, he never sent an army against Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca. It may be that we are to understand that Ibn al-Zubayr foresaw Marwān's being chosen as caliph [taṭayyur = "omen," "augury"], but that he would be inhibited in sending an army against him so long as he remained in Mecca, a sacred territory [ḥaram].

with them to Syria, no two of them would have disagreed about him. Some of Quraysh claimed that Ibn al-Zubayr said, "Shall I grant indemnity for this shed blood! Indeed, by God, I would not be satisfied if I killed ten for every man of those killed!"[13]

Al-Ḥuṣayn began to speak with him in private, but he answered publicly, saying, "No, by God, I will not do so." Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr said to him, "May God shame whoever, henceforth, counts you as a subtle or intelligent[14] man! I thought you had perception, but do I not address you privately while you address me publicly, and I call you to the caliphate, but you threaten me with death and destruction."

Al-Ḥuṣayn arose and left, called out to his men, and set out with them toward Medina. Ibn al-Zubayr, however, repented of what he had done and sent a message to him, "As for going to Syria, I will not do it, for I do not like to leave Mecca; but give me the oath of allegiance here and I will grant you security and act justly among you." Al-Ḥuṣayn answered, "What do you think I am to do if you will not come yourself while I have found there (in Medina and/or Syria) many mem-[432] bers of this family[15] who are seeking it and to whom the men will respond?" So he continued with his men and those with him in the direction of Medina.

ᶜAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ᶜAlī b. Abī Ṭālib[16] met him. With him he had dates of fodder quality and barley, and he was riding a camel of his. He greeted al-Ḥuṣayn, but the latter scarcely paid any attention to him. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr had a well-bred mare of his own, but his own dates and barley for the mounts had run out and he was worried. He was reviling his serving lad, saying, "Where will we find here fodder for our mounts?" ᶜAlī b. al-Ḥusayn said to him, "We have fodder with us, so feed your mounts from it." Thereupon he gave

13. The text seems slightly ambiguous as to whether Ibn al-Zubayr agreed to give indemnity or not; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 167, seems to draw the conclusion that he was willing to do so; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 107, has a lā, clearly understanding that he was not.

14. Read arīb for adīb (Add. et emend.).

15. I.e., the Umayyads.

16. I.e., ᶜAlī Zayn al-ᶜĀbidīn, regarded as the third Imām by the majority of the Shīᶜah.

his attention to ᶜAlī, and the latter ordered that the fodder he had with him be offered to him.

The people of Medina and the Ḥijāz became emboldened against the Syrians, who were humiliated so much that no man of them could go out alone without the bridle of his mount being seized and he pushed off it. Consequently, they gathered in their army camp and kept together. The members of the Umayyad family said to them, "Do not leave without taking us with you to Syria." So they did that and the army continued until it reached Syria. There, Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah had willed that the oath of allegiance be given to his son Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd, but the latter survived for only three months. According to ᶜAwānah, Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah designated his son Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd as caliph, but the latter only survived forty days.

ᶜUmar told me on the authority of ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad:[17] When Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd had been designated caliph, gathered together the officials of his father and the oath of allegiance given to him in Damascus, he perished there after forty days of his rule. His kunyah was Abū ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān and also Abū Laylā.[18] His mother was Umm Hāshim bint Abī Hāshim b. ᶜUtbah b. Rabīᶜah, and when he died he was thirteen years and eighteen days old.

In this year also, the Baṣrans gave the oath of allegiance to ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād[19] on the understanding that he would [433] remain in control of their affairs until the people settled on an imām[20] satisfactory to themselves. Then ᶜUbaydallāh sent a messenger to al-Kūfah summoning the Kūfans to do the 17. For ᶜUmar b. Shabbah, a Baṣran scholar, d. 264/877, see GAS, I, 345; for ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad, i.e., al-Madā'inī, d. ca. 235/850, see EI[1], s.v. Madā'inī; GAS, I, 314–5; Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung einiger historische Werke Madā'inīs in Ṭabarīs Annalen," Oriens, XXIII–XXIV (1974), 103ff.

18. The kunyah is the part of the name describing a man as "father of so-and-so" or "father of such-and-such," sometimes indicating real paternity, sometimes used as a sort of nickname (see EI[2], s.v. Ism); for discussion of the *kunyah*s of Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd, see H. Lammens, "Moᶜâwia II," 12–3, 17.

19. Son of Ziyād b. Abīhi, ᶜUbaydallāh had been made governor of Iraq by Yazīd (see EI[1], s.v.).

20. Here, as generally in this volume, indicating the supreme leader of the Muslims (see EI[2], s.v. Imāma).

same as the Baṣrans, but they refused and threw stones at the prefect who was over them. Next the Baṣrans, too, came out in opposition to ᶜUbaydallāh, civil commotion[21] sprang up in al-Baṣrah and ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād betook himself to Syria.

ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and the People of al-Baṣrah Following the Death of Yazīd[22]

According to ᶜUmar b. Shabbah—Mūsā b. Ismāᶜīl—Ḥammād b. Salamah—ᶜAlī b. Zayd—al-Ḥasan:[23] Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays[24] wrote to Qays b. al-Haytham[25] after the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah: "Greetings! Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah is dead. You are our brethren, so do not anticipate anything we might do before we have made a choice for ourselves."

According to ᶜUmar—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Ḥammād—Muḥammad b. Abī ᶜUyaynah—Shahrak:[26] Following the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah I saw ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād stand to deliver an official address. He praised God and extolled Him and then said:[27]

> Men of al-Baṣrah! Examine my origins and, by God, you will surely find that my father was an Emigrant

---

21. Ar. fitnah: of frequent occurrence in this volume, the word generally indicates a time of trouble and distress, sometimes with apocalyptic overtones; it is often applied to periods of conflict within the Muslim community (see EI², s.v.).

22. For parallel and variant accounts of the following, see Ansāb, IVb, 97–123; Naqā'iḍ Jarīr wa'l-Farazdaq, 112–7, 721–44; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 324–5; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 108–18; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 209–10, 401–11; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 68–78 (with further references).

23. I.e., al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (d. ca. 110/728; see EI², s.v.).

24. Of the clan of Fihr (of Quraysh), drawing support mainly from the "northern" tribal grouping of Qays in Syria, he had control of Damascus following the death of Muᶜāwiyah II, and he frequently appears in the following pages in connection with events in Syria (see EI², s.v.).

25. Of the tribe of Sulaym (Qays), a previous governor of Khurāsān, he was now one of the ashrāf of Muḍar in al-Baṣrah.

26. On the isnād, see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 70, n. 462.

27. For parallel versions of Ibn Ziyād's speech, see Ansāb, IVb, 115f.; Naqā'iḍ Farazdaq, 722; Murūj, V, 194 ff.; Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 130; for translations or summaries, Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 402; Lammens, L'avènement des Marwānides, 9f./49f.; and Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 70–2.

and that my birthplace and abode are among you.[28] When I became governor over you, the register of your fighting men was reckoned at only 70,000, but today it is counted at 80,000; and the register of your dependents[29] was only reckoned at 90,000, but today it is counted at 140,000. I have not left alone any suspicious person whom I feared on your behalf but he is in this prison of yours. The Commander of the [434]
Faithful, Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, has died and the Syrians have fallen into dispute among themselves. Today you are the biggest group of the people in numbers, the most spacious of them as to your courts, the least needful of them for others, and the most extensive of them as to territory.[30] Choose for yourselves a man whom you find pleasing for your religion and your community and I shall be the first to accept and follow him with whom you are pleased. Then, if the Syrians agree on a man whom you find acceptable, you will enter into that which the Muslims have entered. But, if you dislike that, you will act independently until you are given what you require. You need nothing from any of the men of the provinces, but the people cannot do without you.

The orators of the Baṣrans then arose and said, "We have given ear to what you have said, Oh amīr, and we do not know of anyone with more aptitude for it than you. Come, therefore, and let us give you the oath of allegiance." ᶜUbaydallāh replied, "I have no need for that. Choose somebody for yourselves." They insisted and he insisted until, when they had repeated it to him thrice and insisted again, he held out his hand and they gave him the oath of allegiance. After

28. Following the reading la-tajidunna muhājir abī (or wālidī) wa-mawlidī wa-darī fīkum, as in Ansāb and the Cairo text of Ṭabarī; the Leiden text has la-tajidunī a-hājara (uhājiru) wālidī. "Emigrant" would refer to his father's having left Arabia to settle in Iraq.

29. Following, with Rotter, the text of Ansāb (ᶜiyālatukum); the text of Ṭabarī here has ᶜummāl, translated by Lammens as employés; Wellhausen has mawālī.

30. I.e., with respect to the conquered land dependent upon it.

the oath of allegiance, however, they went away saying, "Surely the son of Marjānah[31] does not imagine that we will be led by him in both unity and dissension! He is wrong, by God!" Then they arose against him.

According to ᶜUmar—Zuhayr—Wahb—al-Aswad b. Shaybān—Khālid b. Sumayr: Shaqīq b. Thawr,[32] Mālik b. Mismaᶜ,[33] and Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir[34] came to ᶜUbaydallāh by night while he was in the government house,[35] and a man of the quarter of the Banū Sadūs[36] heard about that. This man said: I came and stuck close to the government house and they remained with him until the night had passed. Then they left with a mule heavily laden with treasures. I went up to Ḥu-[435] ḍayn and said, "Tell them to give me something from these treasures," but he said, "Go and ask your cousin."[37] So then I went up to Shaqīq and said, "Tell them to give me something from these treasures." In charge of the treasures was a mawlā[38] of Shaqīq called Ayyūb. Shaqīq said to him, "Ayyūb, give him a hundred dirhams!" but I said, "A hundred dirhams! By God, I will not accept that." He did not speak to me for a time but continued on his way for a while. Then I went up to him

---

31. A scornful name for ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, referring to his Persian mother Marjānah.

32. Of the Banū Sadūs, he was one of the ashrāf of Bakr b. Wā'il (Rabīᶜah) in al-Baṣrah and a contender for the leadership of Bakr there (see below, pp. 19, 25f.; P. Crone, Slaves on Horses, 120).

33. Of the Banū Shaybān, he was a rival of Shaqīq for the leadership of Bakr b. Wā'il in al-Baṣrah; he later negotiated the alliance between Bakr and Azd (see below, pp. 25f., 28; and see Crone, Slaves, 116).

34. Of the Banū Shaybān, he was another sharīf of Bakr b. Wā'il in al-Baṣrah (see Crone, Slaves, 113).

35. Ar. dār al-imārah; often, it seems to be synonymous with the governor's residence, but not always (e.g., pp. 40, 129 below, where there is mention of al-qaṣr, and 36, for Qaṣr al-Bayḍā', which seems to have been Ibn Ziyād's residence).

36. For the genealogy of the Banū Sadūs b. Shaybān, a fraction of Bakr b. Wā'il, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 153.

37. The text has "cousins" in the plural, but farther down the page the term reappears in the singular, and Ḥuḍayn seems to be referring to the relationship between the anonymous Sadūsī and Shaqīq b. Thawr.

38. A word which frequently indicates a client (an intermediate status between a slave and a free man) of a prominent Arab and/or a non-Arab adherent of Islam; however, the word does not necessarily tell us anything about the ethnic or religious derivation or status of the individual to which it is applied (see Crone, Slaves, 49 ff.).

again and said, "Tell him to give me something from these treasures." Shaqīq said, "Ayyūb, give him two hundred dirhams," but I said, "By God, I will not accept two hundred." Then he told him to give me three hundred, and then four hundred. When we reached al-Ṭufāwah,[39] I said, "Tell him to give me something," but he said, "If I do not, what do you think you will do?" I answered, "By God, I will go into the midst of the houses of our quarter, stick my fingers into my ears and then I will shout out at the top of my voice, 'Oh group of Bakr b. Wā'il,[40] here are Shaqīq b. Thawr, Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir and Mālik b. al-Misma', who have gone to Ibn Ziyād and made a pact about[41] your blood.' " Shaqīq said, "What is wrong with this man? May God do with him what He will! Woe to you! Give him five hundred dirhams." So I took it and went quickly on to Mālik. (Wahb said that he could not remember what Mālik ordered for the man.) Then I saw Ḥuḍayn and went in to him. He asked me what my cousin had done, and I told him and said, "Give me something from these treasures." But he said, "It was we who took this wealth and carried it to safety. We will have nothing to fear from the people." And he gave me nothing.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: According to Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā—Yūnus b. Ḥabīb al-Jarmī:[42] When 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād killed al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī (peace be upon him!) and his kin,[43] he sent their heads to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. At first, Yazīd was pleased about their killing and 'Ubaydallāh's standing with him improved as a result of it. It was not long, [436] however, before Yazīd began to repent of the killing of al-Ḥusayn, saying, "What would it have been to me if I had borne the injury and lodged him with me, allowing him to

39. There is no entry for al-Ṭufāwah in Yāqūt's Buldān; Ṭabarī has two further references to this place in connection with events in al-Baṣrah, III, 290, 1855, neither of which helps to identify it.

40. For this tribal confederation, of which Sadūs was a part, see EI², s.v.

41. Ar. iḥtalafū fī; Cairo ed. has ikhtalafū fī, "they have disputed about."

42. For Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar al-Muthannā, Baṣran scholar d. 209/824–25, see EI², s.v.; Yūnus b. Ḥabīb al-Jarmī was a Baṣran philologist and teacher of Abū 'Ubaydah.

43. A reference to the battle of Karbalā' in 680 when the Prophet's grandson, attempting a revolt against the caliph Yazīd, was killed by forces sent by the governor of Iraq, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād (see EI², s.v. Karbalā').

decide about what he wanted, even if it had been for me a loss and weakening of my authority, out of respect for the memory of the Prophet and regard for al-Ḥusayn's rights and kinship with him? God's curse on the son of Marjānah! It was he who drove him out and oppressed him. Al-Ḥusayn asked him to allow him to go back, but he would not, or to put his hand in mine, or to go to one of the frontiers of the Muslims where God might take him unto Himself, but he would not. He refused it, flung it back at him and killed him. He has made me hateful to the Muslims by killing him, and he has cultivated enmity for me in their hearts. Both the pious and the profligate hate me because of the gravity with which the people view my killing of al-Ḥusayn. What have I to do with the son of Marjānah, God's curse and hatred be upon him?"

Then ᶜUbaydallāh sent a mawlā of his called Ayyūb b. Ḥumrān to Syria to bring him news of Yazīd. One day, ᶜUbaydallāh was out riding and when he was in the Square of the Butchers he came unexpectedly on Ayyūb b. Ḥumrān, who had arrived back. Ayyūb came over to him and confided to him the news about the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah. ᶜUbaydallāh, therefore, abandoned that trip of his and went to his abode where he gave orders to ᶜAbdallāh b. Ḥiṣn, one of the Banū Thaᶜlabah b. Yarbūᶜ,[44] who gave the call for an assembly for prayer.

According to Abū ᶜUbaydah—ᶜUmayr b. Maᶜn al-Kātib: The man ᶜUbaydallāh sent to Yazīd was his mawlā Ḥumrān. ᶜUbaydallāh paid a visit to ᶜAbdallāh, son of Nāfiᶜ the uterine brother of Ziyād,[45] and he left on foot by an opening which led from the house of Nāfiᶜ to the mosque. When he was in the courtyard of the mosque, suddenly there was Ḥumrān, his mawlā, as dusk was falling at evening. Ḥumrān had been the [437] messenger of ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād to Muᶜāwiyah during his lifetime and to Yazīd. When ᶜUbaydallāh saw him, and he had 44. Part of the Banū Ḥanẓalah of Tamīm (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 69).

45. Read akhī for akhā (see Add. et amend.); in other words, it is Nāfiᶜ who is the uterine brother of Ziyād (the father of Nāfiᶜ was allegedly the famous "doctor of the Arabs," al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah, who is said to have been the master of the slave girl Sumayyah, the mother of Ziyād; see EI² Suppl., s.v.).

only just arrived,[46] he said, "How goes it?"[47] and he replied, "Good." ᶜUbaydallāh asked, "How are things where you have come from?" and Ḥumrān replied, "May I draw near you?" ᶜUbaydallāh gave him permission and he confided to him about the death of Yazīd and the disputes concerning the affairs of the people of Syria. Yazīd had died on a Thursday in the middle of the month of Rabīᶜ I of the year 64 (November 683). ᶜUbaydallāh immediately hastened to give the order for someone to call an assembly for prayer.

When the people had gathered, ᶜUbaydallāh mounted the minbar[48] and announced the death of Yazīd. He set about criticizing him on account of what Yazīd had intended for him before he died, as a result of which ᶜUbaydallāh had come to fear him. Al-Aḥnaf[49] then said to ᶜUbaydallāh, "There was an oath of allegiance to Yazīd on our necks, and it used to be said, 'Avoid (speaking evil of) the dead,' so avoid it."[50] Then ᶜUbaydallāh arose, telling them of the divisions among the Syrians. He said, "When I became govenor over you . . . ," and Abū ᶜUbaydah reported it as did ᶜUmar b. Shabbah from Zuhayr b. Ḥarb as far as: "And they gave him the oath of allegiance of their good pleasure and as a result of consultation." Then Abū ᶜUbaydah continued (ᶜUmayr's account?): But when they left him, they began to wipe their hands on the door and walls of the house, saying, "The son of Marjānah imagines we have given him authority over our affairs in this discord!" He continued: ᶜUbaydallāh did not remain as governor long before his authority began to weaken. He gave us orders which were not carried out, he expressed opinions which 46. See Add. et amend.

47. Ar. mahyam: a word said to be of Yemeni origin (see R. Dozy, Suppl., s.v.).

48. Often translated as "pulpit," it may better be envisaged as a podium, or even "throne," from which the caliph or his official delivered an important speech (a khuṭbah); it was a symbol of authority. On its origin and character, see C.H. Becker, "Die Kanzel im Kultus des alten Islam," in idem, Islamstudien, I, 450ff.; J. Sauvaget, La mosquée omeyyade de Médine, 138ff.; EI², s.vv. Khaṭīb, Khuṭba.

49. Al-Aḥnaf b. Qays al-Tamīmī, a leader of the Tamīm in al-Baṣrah, proverbial for his tact and diplomacy (see EI², s.v.).

50. See Gloss, s.v. f-n-n for the suggestion that fanan should here be read qabr and the subsequent translation; Naqā'iḍ Farazdaq, 722, also reads qabr.

were rejected, and he ordered the wrongdoer to be imprisoned, but the governor's assistants were prevented from reaching him.

According to Abū ʿUbaydah—Ghaylān b. Muḥammad—ʿUthmān al-Battī: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jawshan said:[51] I was walking in a funeral procession and when it reached the Camel Market suddenly there appeared a man on a grey mare, covered with weapons and with a banner in his hand. He was saying, "People, gather around me, for I am calling you to support that which nobody else does. I am summoning you to support 'He who takes refuge in the sanctuary area'[52] (meaning ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr)."

[438] A few men rallied to him and began clasping his hand.[53] We went on our way until we had performed the prayers over the bier, and when we came back we found that he had been joined by more than those we had seen previously. Then he made his way between the dwelling place of Qays b. al-Haytham b. Asmāʾ b. al-Ṣalt al-Sulamī and that of the Ḥārithiyyūn[54] toward the Banū Tamīm on the road which leads to them, and he said, "If anyone wants me, I am Salamah b. Dhu'ayb." (He was Salamah b. Dhu'ayb b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥakkim b. Zayd b. Riyāḥ b. Yarbūʿ b. Ḥanẓalah.)[55]

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah[56] met me at the Square and I told him the news about Salamah after I had got back. He

---

51. ʿUthmān al-Battī, d. 143/760, is well known as the recipient of a letter attributed to Abū Ḥanīfah; according to the version of this isnād in Naqāʾiḍ Farazdaq, 722–3, Abū ʿUbaydah heard Ghaylān giving the report to ʿUthmān al-Battī, but, given the latter's death date, this seems unlikely; for the reading Jawshan instead of Ḥawshab, see Add. et emend.

52. More commonly given as al-ʿāʾidh bi 'l-bayt, "he who seeks refuge in the sanctuary," the title is said to have been used by Ibn al-Zubayr after his flight to Mecca and before he began to take the oath of allegiance to himself.

53. Sc. in giving him the oath of allegiance.

54. For Qays b. al-Haytham, see above p. 6, n. 25; the Ḥārithiyyūn are possibly the descendants of al-Ḥārith b. Wāʾil of Rabīʿah (see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 73, n. 486).

55. A Tamīmī who elsewhere is called al-Faqīh. For his descent, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 504; Naqāʾiḍ Farazdaq, 723, has Malḥam for Muḥakkim.

56. Both Leiden and Cairo have ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Bakr, but the reading in Ansāb, IVb, 102, and Naqāʾiḍ Farazdaq, 723, is to be preferred. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah, Abū al-Ḥurr(?), was the brother of ʿUthmān and ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah of Thaqīf and an associate of ʿUbaydallāh's father, Ziyād; his family, with links to the Umayyads, was important in al-Baṣrah (see below, p. 36).

went to ᶜUbaydallāh and told him what he had heard from me. ᶜUbaydallāh sent for me, and when I went to him he said, "What is this which Abū al-Ḥurr[57] has reported to me from you?" So I told him the story to its end and then he gave the order and an assembly for prayer was proclaimed on the spot.

The men gathered and ᶜUbaydallāh began recounting the start of their joint concern—how he had appealed to them to choose whoever was pleasing to them and how he would give him the oath of allegiance together with them. "You refused to choose anybody but me, but now I have heard that you wiped your hands on the walls and door of the house and said what you said. I give orders which are not executed, my opinions are rejected, and the tribes obstruct my assistants from seizing those I seek. Now this Salamah b. Dhu'ayb is calling down discord upon you, desiring to split your community and that you will use the sword to smite each other's forehead."

Responding, al-Aḥnaf Ṣakhr b. Qays b. Muᶜāwiyah b. Ḥuṣayn b. ᶜUbādah b. al-Nazzāl b. Murrah b. ᶜAbīd b. al-Ḥārith [439]
b. ᶜAmr b. Kaᶜb b. Saᶜd b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm said while the men were gathered together, "We will bring you Salamah." They went off to get Salamah, but were surprised to find that his party had swollen and the division had widened beyond repair, and he refused to go with them. When they saw that, they held aloof from ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and did not go back to him.

According to Abū ᶜUbaydah—several transmitters—Sabrah b. al-Jārūd al-Hudhalī—his father, al-Jārūd: In his address ᶜUbaydallāh said, "Baṣrans! By God, we have been wearing clothes of silk, (fine) Yemeni material and smooth stuff so much that we have come to loathe it and our skins have become disgusted with it. Now we have to follow it with iron. Men of al-Baṣrah! By God, even if you united against the tail of a wild ass to break it, you could not do it." Al-Jārūd continued: By God, not even a practice arrow was fired before ᶜUbaydallāh fled and took refuge with Masᶜūd.[58] When Masᶜūd was killed, he betook himself to Syria.

57. The text has Abū al-Baḥr but, given the likely corruption of his name (see previous note), it seems likely we should read the kunyah as Abū al-Ḥurr with Ansāb.

(According to Abū ᶜUbaydah)—Yūnus (b. Ḥabīb al-Jarmī) said: In ᶜUbaydallāh's treasury on the day he addressed the people before the revolt of Salamah there were eight million dirhams or just under (ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī] said nineteen million), and he said to the people, "These are your spoils,[59] so take your wages and the sustenance for your dependents out of them." He ordered the secretaries to count the men and set forth the names and he made them be quick about it, even appointing somebody to keep them there at night in the revenue office, and they lit the candles. When they had finished their task and withdrawn, and then there happened Salamah's opposition to him, he refrained from dividing the money and took it with him when he fled. To this day it is still circulating in the family of Ziyād. If there is a marriage or funeral among them, the like of them is never seen among Quraysh, and among Quraysh there is no one more affluent or better dressed than they.

ᶜUbaydallāh summoned the heads of the government detachment of the Bukhāriyyah[60] and desired them to fight for him, but they refused; he summoned the Bukhāriyyah themselves and desired of them similarly but they said, "If our [440] commanders tell us to, we will fight for you." And the brothers of ᶜUbaydallāh said to him, "By God, there is no caliph for whom you can fight, to whom you can go back if you are defeated, and who can send you help if you ask him for it. You know that war is a matter of fortune, and we do not know but that perhaps fortune will be against you. We have amassed wealth among these people (of al-Baṣrah), and if they are victorious they will destroy both us and it, and no remnant will be left for you." His brother ᶜAbdallāh, a full brother by his father and his mother Marjānah, said to him, "By God, if you fight this people I will lean on the tip of the sword until it comes out of my back."

58. Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr, the leader of Azd in al-Baṣrah (see below).

59. Ar. fayʾ: technically the immovable booty (i.e., land) conquered in the wars of conquest, and the property of the Muslim state as whole rather than of the particular warriors who conquered it; here the word may be intended in an untechnical and general way or it may refer specifically to income raised from the conquered land (see *EI*², s.vv. Fayʾ, Ghanīma).

60. A force, originally of two thousand men, which Ibn Ziyād had raised in Khurāsān when he was governor there (see Ṭabarī, II, 170; Narshakhī, History of Bukhara, tr. R.N. Frye, 37). For the reading of the text, which seems to have gone astray here, see Add. et amend.

When ᶜUbaydallāh heard that, he sent to al-Ḥārith b. Qays b. Ṣuhbān b. ᶜAwn b. ᶜIlāj b. Māzin b. Aswad b. Jahḍam b. Jadhīmah b. Mālik b. Fahm,[61] saying, "Oh Ḥār,[62] my father advised me that, if I ever had need of flight one day, I should choose you, and my soul rejects any other." Al-Ḥārith replied, "They have deserved well of you[63] for the help which they gave your father as you know, and they deserved well of him, but they found neither with him nor with you any recompense. If you choose to flee to us there will be no place of refuge for you, but I do not know how I should get you to a safe place[64] if I took you out by day. I am afraid that I would not reach my tribe with you before we would both be killed. However, I will stay with you until, when the darkness of night brings obscurity[65] and the footfall (of the traveler) is quieted,[66] you will ride on my mount behind me so as not to be recognized. Then I will take you to my maternal relatives of the Banū Nājiyah."[67] ᶜUbaydallāh answered, "All right; whatever you think."

---

61. The Banū Jahḍam b. Jadhīmah (the Jahāḍim) were a section of Azd (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 211); al-Ḥārith was a uterine brother of al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah.

62. Shortening the name in the vocative in this way is called tarkhīm (see Wright, Grammar, II, 88).

63. See Gloss. s.v. b-l-w (the reference to ᶜUbaydallāh's father and his lack of gratitude refers to the time when he was governor of al-Baṣrah for ᶜAlī in the first civil war and Muᶜāwiyah tried to stir up trouble in al-Baṣrah; at that time, Ziyād received help from the Azd Sarāt in the town).

64. See Gloss. s.v. b-w-'. However, the sense still seems problematic. The Cairo text has wa-mā adrī kayfa ata'attā(ḥ) laka in akhrajtuka naharan. See also Add. et amend.

65. See LA s.v. d-m-s (VI, 88).

66. See E.W. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. h-d-'.

67. The Banū Nājiyah b. Jarm; for discussion of the genealogy of this group, for whom some canvassed a Qurashī descent, see I. Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 188-9 (Eng. tr., I, 173-4), Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 4-5, 75; see too L. Massignon, "Explication du plan de Baṣra," 158.

So he waited until, when one says, "Your brother or the wolf?"[68] al-Ḥārith carried him on his mount behind him. He had already removed those treasures and set a guard on them. Then he set off with him, passing with him by the men, who [441] were keeping watch out of fear of the Ḥarūriyyah.[69] ᶜUbaydallāh was asking, "Where are we?" and al-Ḥārith kept telling him. When they were among the Banū Sulaym[70] ᶜUbaydallāh said, "Where are we?" and he answered, "We are among the Banū Sulaym," to which he responded, "God willing, we are safe."[71] Then when he reached the Banū Nājiyah he asked, "Where are we?" and al-Ḥārith said, "Among the Banū Nājiyah," to which ᶜUbaydallāh said, "God willing, we have got away."[72] The Banū Nājiyah, however, asked, "Who are you?" and he answered, "Al-Ḥārith b. Qays." "Your nephew," they said.[73] One of them, however, recognized ᶜUbaydallāh, said, "The son of Marjānah!" and fired an arrow which stuck in his turban. But al-Ḥārith continued on his way with him and lodged him in a house of his own among the descendants of Jahḍam b. Jadhīmah. Next, he went on to Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr b. ᶜAdī b. Muḥārib b. Ṣunaym b. Mulayḥ b. Sharṭān b. Maᶜn b. Mālik b. Fahm.

The narrators of the Azd, Abū Mikhnaf and Muḥammad b. Abī ᶜUyaynah, said:[74] When Masᶜūd saw him he said, "Oh Ḥār, he has been granted refuge from the evils of the roads at night but we seek refuge with God against the evil which you have brought to us by night with him." But al-Ḥārith said, "I have only brought good to you by night. You know that your people saved Ziyād and fulfilled their obligations to 68. See LA s.v. d–m–s (VI, 88).

---

69. I.e., the Khawārij; the name is said to derive from that of the village near al-Kūfah, where the Khawārij established their camp at the time of their secession from ᶜAlī in the first civil war (see EI², s.v. Ḥarūrā').

70. Of Qays.

71. Ar. salimnā, a pun on the name of the Banū Sulaym.

72. Ar. najawnā, a pun on the name of the Banū Nājiyah.

73. Read ibn ukhtikum for ibn akhikum (see Add. et amend.), i.e., al-Ḥārith b. Qays is the son of a woman of the Banū Nājiyah.

74. The rather laconic note in Add. et emend. seems to suggest the isnād should be understood in this way (the text has "The Azd and Muḥammad b. ᶜUyaynah said:"); the latter was a nephew of al-Muhallab, and flourished in the late Umayyad period.

him, and this became among the Arabs a noble deed for them, which they could boast about over the others. Now you have willingly given the oath of allegiance to ᶜUbaydallāh, willingly after consultation,[75] and another oath of allegiance which was incumbent upon you before this one (meaning the oath of allegiance of the community)." Masᶜūd replied, "Oh Ḥār, do you think that we would fall out with our garrison comrades for the sake of ᶜUbaydallāh after the good we deserved on account of his father but then received no reward or thanks for it! I never considered that this would be your opinion." Al-Ḥārith answered, "Nobody would fall out with you on account of your fulfilling your oath of allegiance to the extent of bringing him to a place of safety."

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: According to ᶜUmar (b. Shabbah)—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt—Abū Labīd al-Jahḍamī—al-Ḥārith b. Qays:[76] He, that is ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, placed himself before me and said, "Truly by God, I realize the antipathy to me which has existed among your people." So I took pity on him and put him up behind me on my mule. It was nighttime and I took the direction of the Banū Sulaym. He asked me, "Who are these?" and when I told him, "The Banū Sulaym," he said, "God willing, we are safe." Then we continued on our way to the Banū Nājiyah who were sitting in assembly with their weapons by them, for at that time the people were sitting in their assemblies on watch. They said, "Who goes there?" I answered, "Al-Ḥārith b. Qays," and they said, "Pass, friend!" But when we passed on, one of them said, "By God, this is the son of Marjānah behind him!" and he fired an arrow and embedded it in the roll of his turban. ᶜUbaydallāh said to me, "Who are these, Oh Abū Muḥammad?" I replied, "Those who you claimed belonged to Quraysh[77]—these are the Banū Nājiyah," and he said, "God willing, we have got away." [442]

---

75. Read riḍan ᶜan for riḍan min (see Add. et emend.).

76. Wahb b. Jarīr was a Baṣran traditionist, d. 208/821; his father, Jarīr, d. 170/786, is the author of a book on the Azāriqah Khārijites (see below, p. 164, for Ṭabarī's citations, and see GAS, I, 310–1); note that Abū Labīd belongs to the Jahāḍimah, the clan of al-Ḥārith b. Qays.

77. See above, n. 67.

Then ᶜUbaydallāh said, "Oh Ḥārith, you have done well and acted excellently. Will you now do what I suggest? You know the standing of Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr among his people, his noble descent, his seniority, and the obedience which his people show to him? Well, how about taking me to him, and then I will be in his dwelling place which is in the midst of Azd? If you do not, your people's affair will be shattered over you." I agreed and took him there. Masᶜūd knew nothing about it until we went in to him, and on that night he was sitting kindling a piece of wood on a brick and struggling with his shoes, one of which he had removed while the other stayed on. When he looked into our faces, he recognized us and said, "He has been given refuge from the evils of the roads." I said, "Would you send him away after he has entered your house?" So he told him what to do, and ᶜUbaydallāh entered the house of ᶜAbd al-Ghāfir b. Masᶜūd,[78] whose wife at that time was Khayrah bint Khufāf b. ᶜAmr.

[443] On the same night, Masᶜūd, together with al-Ḥārith and a group of his people, saddled up and went around among Azd and their assemblies, saying, "Ibn Ziyād's absence has been noted and we fear that you will be held responsible for it, so come armed!" And the people did miss Ibn Ziyād, and said, "Where has he headed?" The answer was, "Nowhere but among the Azd."

(ᶜUmar b. Shabbah—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb)—Wahb—Abū Bakr b. al-Faḍl—Qabīṣah b. Marwān: They began to say, "Where do you think he has headed?" and an old woman of the Banū ᶜUqayl[79] said, "Where do you think he has headed! By God, he has thrust himself into the same thicket as his father did." When news of Yazīd's death reach Ibn Ziyād, there were sixteen million dirhams in the treasuries of al-Baṣrah, and he divided part of it among his father's descendants and carried off the rest with him. He had summoned the Bukhāriyyah to fight with him and also the descendants of Ziyād, but they refused.

78. I.e., Masᶜūd's son.

79. The Leiden edition is vocalized ᶜAqīl; the Banū ᶜUqayl (of Qays) seems more obvious; the Cairo text and Ansāb, IVb, 118[14] are unvocalized; Levi Della Vida preferred ᶜUqayl (see the note ad. loc. in the Jerusalem ed. of the Ansāb).

According to ᶜUmar—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—al-Aswad b. Shaybān—ᶜAbdallāh b. Jarīr al-Māzinī: Shaqīq b. Thawr sent to me, saying, "I have heard that this Ibn Manjūf[80] and Ibn Mismaᶜ have gone under cover of night to the dwelling of Masᶜūd to fetch Ibn Ziyād back to the government house[81] so they might unite these two forces[82] together, shed your blood and make themselves mighty. I had planned to send to Ibn Manjūf, put him in chains and send him away from me. So go to Masᶜūd, deliver my greetings to him and tell him that Ibn Manjūf and Ibn Mismaᶜ are doing such-and-such and he should send these two away from him." With Masᶜūd were ᶜUbaydallāh and ᶜAbdallāh the two sons of Ziyād. So I went to Masᶜūd and the two sons of Ziyād were with him, one on his right and the other on his left. I said, "Peace be upon you, Abū Qays,"[83] and he replied, "And upon you." Then I said, "Shaqīq b. [444] Thawr sent me to you to deliver his greetings to you and to say that he has heard . . . ." (He repeated the words exactly down to: "So send those two away from you.") Masᶜūd said, "By God, I will do that."[84] ᶜUbaydallāh then said, "How so, Oh Abū Thawr?" He forgot his kunyah, for he was only called Abū al-Faḍl.[85] And his brother ᶜAbdallāh said, "By God, we will not separate from you. You have given us shelter and promised us protection and we will not leave unless we are killed in your midst, which would be a disgrace against you until the Day of Resurrection."

---

80. Suwayd b. Manjūf b. Thawr al-Sadūsī, i.e., Shaqīq's nephew. For the rivalries within the family of Thawr, see Ansāb, IVb, 92.

81. Ar. al-dār.

82. Ar. hādhayn al-ghārayn; the word ghār has the double meaning of "army" and "pit" (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

83. Presumably Masᶜūd's kunyah?

84. Literally, "I have done that" (i.e., "done!") following the reading of the Cairo ed. and Bevan's proposal in the Add. et. emend. (faᶜaltu dhāka); the Leiden text has qultu dhāka, which is difficult to make sense of.

85. Ibn Ziyād seems to be addressing Masᶜūd, using a kunyah, although Masᶜūd has already been addressed by his kunyah as Abū Qays; then we are told that, presumably in his agitation, Ibn Ziyād had made a mistake in the kunyah; it should have been Abū al-Faḍl. It seems possible that the text is disordered; note how Shaqīq, sent to bring back Ibn Manjūf and Ibn Mismaᶜ, now seems concerned with the two sons of Ziyād.

(ᶜUmar b. Shabbah—Zuhayr)—Wahb—al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt[86]—Abū Labīd: The Baṣrans gathered and delegated their affairs to al-Nuᶜmān b. Ṣuhbān al-Rāsibī[87] and a man of the Muḍar[88] so those two could choose somebody for them and give him authority over them. They said, "Whomever you two are satisfied with for us, we will be satisfied with him." (According to other than Abū Labīd, the man of Muḍar was Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī.) The man of Muḍar thought that a candidate should be chosen from among the Banū Umayyah, while al-Nuᶜmān's view was that he should be from the Banū Hāshim.[89] However, al-Nuᶜmān said he did not think anyone had more right to authority than so-and-so, indeed a man from the Banū Umayyah. The Muḍarī said, "Is that what you think?" and al-Nuᶜmān answered, "Yes." The Muḍarī, therefore, said, "I have invested my authority in you and I will be satisfied with whomever you are satisfied with." Then they both went out to the people and the Muḍarī announced, "I will be satisfied with whomever al-Nuᶜmān is satisfied with. Whomever he names for you, I will be pleased with him." Then they said to al-Nuᶜmān, "What do you say?" He replied, "I do not consider fitting for it anybody other than ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, Babbah."[90] Thereupon the Muḍarī said, "This is not the one you named to me," but al-Nuᶜmān said, "Yes indeed, by my life, it was he!" And the people were pleased with ᶜAbdallāh and gave him the oath of allegiance.

According to my companions,[91] Muḍar called for support for al-ᶜAbbās b. al-Aswad b. al-ᶜAwf[92] while Yemen[93] called

86. Cf. p. 17 above, where Jarīr is cited in the isnād between Wahb and Ibn al-Khirrīt.

87. Of Quḍāᶜah; see p. 446 below, but cf. Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 76, n. 512, and Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 453, 485.

88. According to the genealogists, this is the "northern" descent group which includes Qays and Tamīm, but not Rabīᶜah.

89. Two families of Quraysh, the former that from which the three previous caliphs had come, the latter that of the Prophet, ᶜAlī and the future ᶜAbbāsid caliphs.

90. A Qurashī of the Banū Hāshim (on him, see W. Madelung, "ᶜAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr and the Mahdī," JNES, XL [1981], esp. 297 ff.).

91. Presumably it is Wahb b. Jarīr who is speaking!

92. Of Quraysh, he would be a nephew of ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. ᶜAwf and brother of Jābir b. al-Aswad, Ibn al-Zubayr's governor over Medina.

for support for ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal. So the people agreed to appoint Qays b. al-Haytham and al-Nuᶜmān b. Ṣuhbān al-Rāsibī as arbitrators to look into the question of the two candidates. Both the arbitrators agreed that they should confer authority on the man of Muḍar belonging to the Banū [445] Hāshim[94] until there should be general agreement on an imām. About that it was said:

> We have effected a deposition and appointed a governor
> while Bakr b. Wā'il > dallies[95] seeking someone with whom to make an alliance.

And when they gave Babbah authority over al-Baṣrah, he appointed Himyān b. ᶜAdī al-Sadūsī[96] over his police force.[97]

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: As for Abū ᶜUbaydah (according to the report of Muḥammad b. ᶜAlī from Abū Saᶜdān from him), he told the story about Masᶜūd and ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and his brother differently from the way in which Wahb b. Jarīr told it on the authority of those from whom he transmitted it. Abū ᶜUbaydah said: Maslamah b. Muḥārib b. Salm b. Ziyād[98] and others of Ziyād's family, reporting from those of them and their mawlās who were alive at the time (the family knows best its own story), told me that al-Ḥārith b. Qays never spoke to Masᶜūd but granted protection to Muṣᶜab al-Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 273, lists an ᶜAyyāsh among the offspring of al-Aswad but no ᶜAbbās. Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 77, n. 514, argues that ᶜAyyāsh is the correct form and should be read here. Other reports give the name of the candidate as ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Aswad (see below). Rotter thinks that this is the brother of ᶜAyyāsh, while Madelung, loc. cit., 301, seems to regard ᶜAbdallāh and ᶜAbbās as variant names for the same man (Zubayrī does not list an ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Aswad).

---

93. A name for the "southern" descent group according to the genealogists.

94. As a Qurashī, Babbah belongs to the wider group of Muḍar (see above, n. 88).

95. Literally "draw out its testicles" (see Gloss., with reference to Freytag, Proverbia II, 480, n. 263, and Lane, Lexicon, s.v. khaṣā). See below, p. 26, n. 128, for parallels.

96. Of Bakr b. Wā'il.

97. Ar. shurṭah, a small force controlled by the governor and distinct from the tribally based army.

98. Maslamah was the grandson of the brother of ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād; see Rotter, "Madā'inī," 117 (for Salm b. Ziyād, see below, pp. 70f.).

ᶜUbaydallāh, took 100,000 dirhams with him, and came with it to Umm Bisṭām, the wife of Masᶜūd and his own paternal cousin. With him were ᶜUbaydallāh and ᶜAbdallāh, the two sons of Ziyād. He asked permission to go in to her and when she granted it, al-Ḥārith said to her, "I have come to you about a matter in which you would become the leader of your women and secure the nobility of your people, and you would be paid on the spot wealth and riches. In particular, there is this 100,000 dirhams for you. Take it, it is yours, if you will take in ᶜUbaydallāh." But she replied, "I am afraid that Masᶜūd will not like it and will not accept him." Al-Ḥārith then said, "Clothe him in one of your garments, take him in to your house and leave Masᶜūd to us." So she took the money and did that. But, when Masᶜūd came, she told him about it and he seized her by the head, whereupon ᶜUbaydallāh and al-Ḥārith came out of her chamber and the former said, "Your cousin has granted me protection in respect of you. This is your garment I am wearing, your food in my belly, and your [446] house around me." Al-Ḥārith testified to the truth of that for him and they both mollified Masᶜūd until he agreed. Abū ᶜUbaydah said: ᶜUbaydallāh gave al-Ḥārith about 50,000 dirhams and he remained in Masᶜūd's house until Masᶜūd was killed.

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Yazīd b. Sumayr al-Jarmī—Suwwār b. ᶜAbd Allāh b. Saᶜīd al-Jarmī:[99] When ᶜUbaydallāh fled, the Baṣrans were for some time without an amīr and they differed as to whom they should give authority over them. Then they agreed on two men who would make a choice for them, and they would accept the choice if those two could agree on it. They agreed that Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī and Nuᶜmān b. Ṣuhbān[100] al-Rāsibī (Rāsib b. Jarm b. Rabbān b. Ḥulwān b. ᶜImrān b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍāᶜah) would choose someone they found acceptable. Those two mentioned two possibilities: ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbd al-Muṭṭalib (his mother was Hind bint Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb b. Umayyah,[101] he was nicknamed Babbah and he was the grandfather of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith[102]) and, alternatively, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Aswad al-Zuhrī.[103] When they had both agreed on those two, they decided on the public square[104] as the place for the selection and they arranged for the people to meet there so that they might come to an agreement on one of these two. So the people were gathered there and I was with them in the "brow"[105] of the square (its top part). Qays b. al-Haytham came forward, and then al-Nuʿmān afterwards, and they were preoccupied one with another. Al-Nuʿmān gave Qays to believe that he favored Ibn al-Aswad, but then said, "We cannot speak both together," and desired that he would make him the spokesman. Qays did so and they contracted one with another. And al-Nuʿmān imposed a promise on the people that they would accept whatever he thought best.

99. Abū ᶜUbaydah's sources seem to be Quḍāᶜī kinsmen of al-Nuᶜmān b. Ṣuhbān (see n. 87 above).

100. The text has al-Nuᶜmān b. Sufyān.

Then al-Nuʿmān went up to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Aswad, took his hand and began to lay conditions upon him so that the people [447] thought he was about to give him the oath of allegiance. But he left and took the hand of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith and started imposing conditions on him in the same way. Next he praised God and extolled Him, mentioned the Prophet and the rights of his family and relatives, and said, "Oh people, what do you have against a man descended from the paternal uncle of your Prophet and whose mother was Hind bint Abī Sufyān? He is a man of the Banū Hāshim and also son of a woman of those who possess the kingship."[106] Then he clasped him

101. Descended on his father's side from the Prophet's grandfather, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, Babbah's mother was the sister of the first Umayyad caliph, Muʿāwiyah.

102. Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nawfalī, a prominent Hāshimī of the early ʿAbbāsid period and transmitter of some historical material relating to al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr.

103. See n. 92 above.

104. Ar. mirbad; for a tentative sketch map of al-Baṣrah at this period, see Massignon, "Baṣra," 157; see also M. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 246.

105. Ar. qāriʿah (the gloss is in the text).

106. It is difficult to make sense of Ṭabarī's text here ("if he is one of them, he is the son of your sister"); Ibn al-Athīr has: qad kāna 'l-amru fīhim fa-huwa 'bnu ukhtihim ("authority belonged to them [the Umayyads] and he [Babbah] is the son of one of their women"); Ansāb, IVb, 104[22] (the same report as Ṭabarī from Abū ʿUbaydah) has: huwa Hāshimī wa-'bnu ukhti 'l-qawmi 'lladhīna 'l-mulku fīhim, the reading translated here.

by the hand, saying, "Indeed I approve of you for it," and they cried out, "We accept!" They brought ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith to the government house and he dwelled there. That was at the beginning of the month of Jumādā II, 64 (January, 684). He appointed Himyān b. ᶜAdī al-Sadūsī over his police force and summoned the people to come to give the oath of allegiance. They came and gave him it.

When he gave him the oath of allegiance, al-Farazdaq[107] said:

> I have given the oath of allegiance to many people and > I have fulfilled the pledge to them; > but to Babbah I have given the oath of allegiance > without repenting.[108]

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Zuhayr b. Hunayd[109]—ᶜAmr b. ᶜĪsā: The dwelling place of Mālik b. Mismaᶜ al-Jaḥdarī was in al-Bāṭinah[110] by the gate of ᶜAbdallāh al-Iṣbahānī in the quarter of the Banū Jaḥdar[111] near the great mosque. Mālik used to frequent the mosque. While he was sitting in it shortly after the affair of Babbah,[112] there was a man of the family of ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜĀmir b. Kurayz al-Qurashī[113] in the group in the mosque in which he was sitting, and news came of ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim's attack on Rabīᶜah in Herat.[114] A quarrel broke out and the Qurashī spoke rudely to Mālik, whereupon a man of Bakr b. Wā'il struck the Qurashī and those there of Muḍar and Rabīᶜah became incensed one with another.[115] The members of Rabīᶜah who were in the group were in the 107. I.e., the poet Hammām b. Ghālib, d. 110/728 or 112/730 (see *EI*², s.v. al-Farazdaḳ.).

---

108. Variants cited by Madelung, "ᶜAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr and the Mahdī," 302.

109. For the form of the name, see Add. et emend.

110. See Massignon, "Baṣra," 157.

111. The Banū Jaḥdar was Mālik's clan within the Banū Qays b. Thaᶜlabah (Shaybān); for its descent, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 155.

112. The Leiden text is corrupt here; see Add. et emend. for the text translated here, and cf. Ansāb, IVb, 105[211].

113. A former governor of al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān, related by marriage to the Umayyads (see, Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 147–9).

114. See pp. 73ff. below.

115. ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī (of Qays/Muḍar) had originally been given authority in Khurāsān by ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAmir; Mālik belonged to Bakr b. Wā'il of Rabīᶜah, the object of Ibn Khāzim's attack.

majority, but someone shouted out, "Come on Tamīm!" and a group of Ḍabbah b. Udd[116] who were with the judge heard [448] the shout, seized the spears and shields of the guards from the mosque,[117] bore down on the members of Rabīʿah and routed them. Ashyam b. Shaqīq b. Thawr al-Sadūsī,[118] who at that time was head of Bakr b. Wāʾil, heard about that and came to the mosque. He said, "Indeed, you shall not come upon anyone of Muḍar but you will kill him!" When Mālik b. Mismaʿ heard about it, he came in his indoor clothes[119] to pacify the people and they refrained from fighting one another. They remained like that for a month or less and then a man of the Banū Yashkur[120] was sitting in the mosque with a man of the Banū Ḍabbah, and they talked about the Bakrī's striking the Qurashī, and the Yashkurī boasted about it.

The Yashkurī then said that the blow had been received without retaliation[121] and thus annoyed the Ḍabbī, who struck him on the neck. The people in the mosque gave him a fatal blow, and he—I mean the Yashkurī—was carried dead to his people. Bakr then flew to their chief Ashyam b. Shaqīq and said, "Come along with us." But he answered, "No, rather I will send a messenger to them and if they give us our rights,[122] well and good, but if not, then we will go to them." Bakr, however, rejected that and went to Mālik b. Mismaʿ.

(Previously, Mālik b. Mismaʿ had had authority over them before Ashyam, but the latter had obtained the headship when he went to Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and Yazīd had written to ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād on his behalf, telling them to restore the leadership to Ashyam. The Lahāzim[123] (that is, the Banū Qays

116. Allies of Tamīm (see *EI*², s.v.; Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 240).

117. The min seems slightly odd; Ansāb, IVb, 106², omits it: (wathaba ʿalā) rimāḥi ḥarasi 'l-masjidi wa-tirasatihim.

118. The text reads Shaqīq b. Thawr, but cf. the next paragraph and the parallel in Ansāb, IVb, 106.

119. Ar. mutafaḍḍilan (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. mifḍal).

120. Subtribe of Bakr b. Wāʾil.

121. See Add. et emend. for the reading ẓalafan; perhaps Wellhausen's paraphrase (Kingdom, 405), based on the printed ṭilqan, indicating that the Yashkurī claimed the Qurashī had taken the blow without retaliating and was therefore dishonored, gives the intended sense?

122. Read shaniʾū for sayyabū (see Add. et emend.).

123. For the following see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 26–7, *EI*¹, s.v. Taimallāh b. Thaʿlaba, and *EI*², s.v. Bakr b. Wāʾil, 963b, at the bottom.

b. Thaʿlabah with their allies ʿAnazah, and Taym al-Lāt[124] with their allies ʿIjl) had refused unless they and the family of Dhuhl b. Shaybān with their allies Yashkur, and Dhuhl b. Thaʿlabah with their allies Ḍubayʿah b. Rabīʿah b. Nizār, all agreed—the four tribes balanced with the other four. This alliance had existed among the nomads of the Banū Bakr in the Time of Ignorance before Islam,[125] but Ḥanīfah had re-[449] mained apart from the other tribes of Bakr and had not joined this alliance in the Time of Ignorance because they were settled. Then they had entered Islam with their brothers ʿIjl and become Lihzimah.[126] Afterwards, they had accepted the decision of ʿImrān b. ʿIṣām al-ʿAnazī, one of the Banū Humaym, and restored the headship to Ashyam.)

Now, when this civil commotion broke out, Bakr considered Mālik b. Mismaʿ as of little account, for he lacked weight. He, therefore, gathered his men and made ready and sought of the Azd that they would renew the alliance which had existed between them previously in unity concerning Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah.

Concerning that, Ḥārithah b. Badr[127] said:

We have effected a deposition and appointed a governor
while Bakr b. Wā'il
dallies seeking someone with whom to make an alliance
And no Bakrī passes a night out of time, and comes to morning without recognizing the disgrace.[128]

Abū ʿUbaydah continued: While ʿUbaydallāh was in the abode of Masʿūd, he heard the news of the falling out of Bakr and Tamīm. He, therefore, said to Masʿūd, "Go and meet Mālik and renew the previous alliance between you." Consequently, Masʿūd met Mālik and the two of them began to 124. Text has Shayʿ al-Lāt.

125. Ar. jāhiliyyah (see *EI*², s.v. Djāhiliyya).
126. I.e., the angle of the lower jaw (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v., in supplement).
127. Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Ghuḍānī of Tamīm.
128. See above, p. 21; Ansāb, IVb, 106; Naqāʾiḍ Farazdaq, 112, 729; see too Mubarrad, Kāmil, 435.

discuss that pact.[129] However, a party on each side rejected their joint decision, and ᶜUbaydallāh, therefore, sent his brother ᶜAbdallāh together with Masᶜūd with plenty of money (so much that he spent more than 200,000 dirhams in that business) to ensure that the dissidents would give the two of them the pledge of allegiance.[130] ᶜUbaydallāh said to his brother, "Make sure of the feelings of the people (of Bakr) toward the people of Yemen." They renewed the alliance and wrote two documents between them, like the two documents they had written[131] between them in unity, and they deposited a document with Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr.

Abū ᶜUbaydah: One of Masᶜūd's descendants told me that the first of those named in the document was al-Ṣalt b. Ḥurayth b. Jābir al-Ḥanafī.[132] And they also deposited a document with al-Ṣalt b. Ḥurayth in which the first of those named was Ibn Rajā' al-ᶜAwdhī[133] of ᶜAwdh b. Sūd. Previously, there had been an alliance between them.

Abū ᶜUbaydah: Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ, Yūnus b. Ḥabīb, Hubayrah b. Ḥudayr,[134] and Zuhayr b. Hunayd claimed that Muḍar outnumbered Rabīᶜah in al-Baṣrah and that the group of the Azd was the last to settle there; they were where the garrison town of al-Baṣrah was founded and ᶜUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb moved into it those Muslims who adopted a fixed abode,[135] while the group of the Azd remained where they were and did not move. But they had come to al-Baṣrah subsequently at the end of the caliphate of Muᶜāwiyah and the beginning of that of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah. When they came there, the Banū Tamīm said to al-Aḥnaf, "Make an approach to these newcomers before Rabīᶜah anticipate us in it." But [450]

129. Read tarāssā (see Add. et emend., and Gloss., s.v. rassa).

130. Read yubāyiᶜuhumā (see Add. et emend.).

131. Read active for passive (see Add. et emend.).

132. For the suggestion that Ḥanafī be read Juᶜfī, see Add. et emend.

133. Naqā'iḍ Farazdaq has him as Abū Rajā', and, at p. 126, refers to his tomb at al-Baṣrah. ᶜAwdh b. Sūd is a tribe of Azd (for its descent, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 206).

134. See Add. et emend.

135. The printed text with its reference to the tribe of Tanūkh must be corrupt (see Add. et emend. which suggests the reading man tanakha with the interpretation adopted here; the reading is adopted in Naqā'iḍ Farazdaq, 729).

al-Aḥnaf answered, "If they come to you, then accept them, but otherwise do not go to them because, if you do, you will become followers of theirs." So Mālik b. Mismaʿ went to them, and at that time the chief of Azd was Masʿūd b. ʿAmr al-Maʿnī.[136] Mālik said to him, "Let us renew the pact which existed between us and Kindah in the Time of Ignorance and the pact of the Banū Dhuhl b. Thaʿlabah with Thuʿal of Ṭayyiʾ b. Udad."[137] Al-Aḥnaf said, "Indeed, since they went to them they will always be to them as following tails!"

Abū ʿUbaydah—Hubayrah b. Ḥudayr—Isḥāq b. Suwayd: When the Bakr were led[138] to seek the help of Azd against Muḍar and renewed their previous alliance and desired that they should set out, the Azd said, "We will not go with you unless the chief is one of us." So they made Masʿūd chief over them all.

Abū ʿUbaydah—Maslamah b. Muḥārib: Masʿūd said to ʿUbaydallāh, "Come with us so that we can restore you to the government house," but he answered, "I cannot do that, you go." So Masʿūd ordered his mounts, they fastened their equipment and saddles[139] on them, and he was engrossed in the preparations for the journey. They brought out a chair for [451] ʿUbaydallāh which was placed at Masʿūd's door and he sat in it. Masʿūd set off, and ʿUbaydallāh sent with him in charge of the horses some slaves of his to whom he said, "I do not know what is going to happen, so I am telling you that, if such-and-such happens, one of you is to bring me the news, but, whatever happens, make sure that one of you comes to me with news of it." What happened was the Masʿūd never came to a lane or passed by a tribe without one of those slaves bringing ʿUbaydallāh news of it.

---

136. The Banū Maʿn b. Mālik b. Fihr of Azd (Ansāb, IVb, 98[2-3]; elsewhere he sometimes has the nisbah al-ʿAtakī.

137. "Us" refers to Mālik's own tribe of Qays b. Thaʿlabah (of Shaybān/Bakr b. Wāʾil); Kindah is the important tribal group counted as "southerners" by the genealogists (*EI*², s.v.; Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 176, 233, II, 371); Dhuhl b. Thaʿlabah also belongs to Shaybān/Bakr b. Wāʾil; Thuʿal is Thuʿal b. ʿAmr, a subtribe of Ṭayyiʾ b. Udad, the important tribal group of the north Arabia-Mesopotamia area, counted as "southerners" by the genealogists (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 176, 249, 252, II, 555).

138. Read ujīʾat (see Add. et emend.).

139. Read wa-shawārahā (see Add. et emend.).

Masʿūd came to Rabīʿah[140] under Mālik b. Mismaʿ and together they took the lane to the public square, where Masʿūd continued until he entered the mosque and ascended the minbar. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith was in the government house, and he was told that Masʿūd had come with the people of Yemen and Rabīʿah and that trouble was going to be stirred up among the people. "So why do you not make peace between them or ride against them with the Banū Tamīm?" he was asked. He replied, "God damn them! By God, I will not corrupt myself by conciliating them." One of Masʿūd's men began to say:

Indeed, I will marry Babbah to a maiden in a tent who combs the head of her doll.[141]

This is what the Azd and Rabīʿah say, but as for Muḍar, they say that it is what his mother, Hind bint Abī Sufyān, used to say rocking him in his cradle.

When nobody prevented Masʿūd's ascending the minbar, Mālik b. Mismaʿ went out with his troop of armed men until he overlooked al-Jabbān[142] from the road to the public square [sikkat al-mirbad]. Then he began passing several of the dwellings of the Banū Tamīm and entered the lane of the Banū al-ʿAdawiyyah[143] opposite al-Jabbān and started to set fire to their dwellings because of the hatred which was in their hearts as a result of the Ḍabbī's killing the Yashkurī and Ibn Khāzim's slaughter of Rabīʿah in Herat. But while he was engaged in that, suddenly they came to him and said, "They have killed Masʿūd," and they said, "The Banū Tamīm have attacked Masʿūd." So he set off, but when he was near the mosque of the Banū Qays in the road to the public square, he came to a halt, hearing the news of the killing of Masʿūd. [452]

140. Ansāb, IVb, 107⁴, suggests that qadima should be read qaddama, i.e., Masʿūd sent Rabīʿah ahead.

141. See the note to Ansāb, IVb, 107⁹, and Madelung, op. cit., 297, for other citations and variants.

142. Al-Jabbān was one of the six cemeteries of al-Baṣrah (see Massignon, "Baṣra," 157, 161).

143. A subgroup of the Banū Ḥanẓalah of Tamīm (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 59, II, 136).

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Zuhayr b. Hunayd—al-Ḍaḥḥāk or al-Waḍḍāḥ b. Khaythamah, one of B. ᶜAbdallāh b. Dārim—Mālik b. Dīnār:[144] I was one of the youths who went to al-Aḥnaf, waiting to see what would happen. I came to him and then the Banū Tamīm came and said, "Masᶜūd has entered the govenor's residence, and you are our sayyid," but he answered, "I am not your sayyid, your sayyid is only Satan."

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Hubayrah b. Ḥudayr—Isḥāq b. Suwayd al-ᶜAdawī: I came with the onlookers to the place where al-Aḥnaf was staying. They came to him and said, "Oh Abū Baḥr, Rabīᶜah and Azd have entered the square," but he replied, "You do not have any more right to the mosque than they." Next, they came to him and said, "They have entered the government house," but he answered, "You do not have any more right to the house than they." Salamah b. Dhu'ayb al-Riyāḥī[145] then rushed up, saying, "Gather round me, Oh band of youths! This one is merely a coward[146] who is no good for you!" He summoned[147] the "wolves"[148] of the Banū Tamīm, and five hundred who were with Māh Afrīdhūn[149] stood ready with him. Salamah asked them, "Where do you want to go?" and they answered, "We want whatever you want." He said, "Forward, then!"

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Zuhayr b. Hunayd—Abū Niᶜāmah—Nāshib
[453] b. al-Ḥasḥās and Ḥumayd b. Hilāl: We two came to the place where al-Aḥnaf was staying near the mosque. We were among

144. This Mālik b. Dīnār is perhaps the well-known ascetic who died shortly before 131/748–9; however, the biographies of Mālik do not mention his involvement in these events, and it is difficult to see why he, a non-Tamīmī, should have participated (on him see Ibn Saᶜd, VII/2, 11).

145. See above, n. 55.

146. Read jibs (see Add. et emend. which, together with the parallel in Ansāb, IVb, 107[16], suggests the full text should read: "a coward who trails his ears").

147. Read fa-nadaba for fa-badarat (see Add. et emend.).

148. The Banū Kaᶜb b. Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah of Tamīm are called figuratively "wolves of ghaḍā" (see W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage, 230, n. 2; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ghaḍā); it may be that they, closely related to the clan of Salamah b. Dhu'ayb, are referred to here.

149. The Persian leader of the Asāwirah, former Sasanian troops who had gone over to the Arabs during the conquest of Iraq and become incorporated into Tamīm; for the reading of his name, cf. Add. et emend. It seems that the 500 who stood ready were Asāwirah.

those waiting to see what would happen. A woman came up to him carrying an incense burner[150] and she said, "What have you got to do with the leadership? Look after the incense burner, for you are just a woman!" He replied, "A woman's arse is more suitable for the incense burner." Then they came to him and said that the anklets of ʿUlayyah[151] bint Nājiyah al-Riyāḥī, the sister of Maṭar, had been seized from her very legs (others said ʿUzzah bint al-Ḥurr al-Riyāḥiyya).[152] Her dwelling place was on the street in the square of the Banū Tamīm overlooking the public washing place. And they told him, "They have killed the dyer on your road and the cripple who was at the gate of the mosque." And they told him, "Mālik b. Mismaʿ has gone into the lane of the Banū al-ʿAdawiyyah opposite al-Jabbān and set fire to some houses." But al-Aḥnaf answered, "Establish some proof of this, for without it it is illicit to fight them." So they bore witness to all that in front of him.

Then al-Aḥnaf said, "Has ʿAbbād come?" (He was ʿAbbād b. Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd b. ʿAmr b. Aws b. Sayf b. ʿAzm b. Ḥillizzah b. Bayān b. Saʿd b. al-Ḥārith al-Ḥabiṭah b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm.) They replied, "No," and he waited for a short time and then repeated, "Has ʿAbbād come?" Again they said, "No." Al-Aḥnaf said, "Is ʿAbs b. Ṭalq b. Rabīʿah b. ʿĀmir b. Bisṭām b. al-Ḥakam b. Ẓālim b. Ṣarīm b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAmr b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd[153] here?" and they answered, "Yes." So he summoned him, drew forth a ribbon from his head, got down on his knees, and fastened it on a lance which he gave to him. Then he said, "Go!" When he turned around he said, "O God, do not shame it today, for you never shamed it in the past." And the people cried out, "Zabrā'[154] is aroused!" Zabrā' was a slave girl of al-Aḥnaf and by her they were alluding to him. [454]

150. Cf. the note to Ansāb, IVb, 99[5], referring to the custom of the bedouin women of perfuming themselves with incense before cohabitation.

151. Or ʿAliyyah or ʿAblah (cf. Add. et emend. and Ansāb, IVb, 107[21]); note that she belongs to the same Tamīmī family as Salamah b. Dhu'ayb.

152. See Add. et emend. and Ansāb, IVb, 107[22], both of which suggest that Ṭabarī's text is inadequate here.

153. Of the Banū Saʿd of Tamīm.

154. The printed text has Zayrā', but see Add. et. emend. and the reference to Maydānī.

When ᶜAbs had set off, ᶜAbbād came with sixty horsemen. He asked what the people had done, and they told him that they had gone. "Who is in command?" he asked, and they told him, "ᶜAbs b. Ṭalq al-Ṣarīmī." ᶜAbbād said, "Shall I go under the banner of ᶜAbs!" and he and the horsemen went back to his people.

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Zuhayr—Abū Rayḥānah al-ᶜUraynī: On the day Masᶜūd was killed I was beneath the belly of al-Zard b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Saᶜdī's horse, rushing headlong until we reached the street of al-Qadīm.

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Hubayrah b. Ḥudayr—Isḥāq b. Suwayd: They advanced and when they reached the openings of the lanes they halted. Māh Afrīdhūn said to them in Persian, "What is the matter, Oh band of youths?" They replied, "They have met us with the points of their lances." He said to them in Persian, "Strike them with the fanjaqān"[155] (that is, Persian for "five arrows in a shot"). There were four hundred of the Asāwirah and they hit them with 2,000 arrows in one burst so that they retreated from the gates of the lanes and took up position by the gates[156] of the mosque. The Tamīmiyyah slowly advanced toward them, but when they reached the gates they halted. Māh Afrīdhūn asked them, "What is the matter?" They answered, "They have pointed the tips of their lances at us." He replied, "Fire at them too!" So they fired 2,000 arrows at them and pushed them back from the gates so that they entered the mosque and moved forward. Masᶜūd was on the minbar delivering a speech and inciting his men.

Ghaṭafān b. Unayf b. Yazīd b. Fahdah, one of the Banū Kaᶜb b. ᶜAmr b. Tamīm (Yazid b. Fahdah was a hero of the Time of Ignorance before Islam), began to fight and to urge on his own people, declaiming in the meter of rajaz:

Come on Tamim! It will be remembered.
[455] If Masᶜūd escapes it will be notorious.
So hold to the side of the maqṣūrah.[157]

(That is, he shall not flee and escape.)

155. See Gloss., s.v. banjakān.
156. Read abwāb as later in the line and as in Ansāb, IVb, 108[17].
157. The enclosed area in mosque reserved for the caliph or governor.

Isḥāq b. Suwayd[158] (continuing his account): They came on Masᶜūd while he was on the minbar urging on his men, and they dragged him down and killed him. That was at the beginning of Shawwāl, 64 (end of May, 684).[159] His people were useless and were routed. Ashyam b. Shaqīq rushed ahead of them, fleeing to the door of the maqṣūrah. One of them stabbed him, but he survived and escaped.

Al-Farazdaq said about that:

If Ashyam had not outstripped the points of our lances, and had missed the door when our fires ignited,
Then he would have accompanied Masᶜūd and his companion, and the guts and the innards would have spilled out.[160]

Abū ᶜUbaydah: Sallām b. Abī Khayrah reported to me, and I also heard it from Abū al-Khansā' Kusayb al-ᶜAnbarī, who was transmitting reports in the circle of Yūnus in the mosque. Those two said: We heard al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan[161] saying to his group in the mosque of the governor: Masᶜūd came from over here (he indicated with his hand the dwellings of the Azd) looking like a bird, wearing a qabā' of yellow brocade figured with black "eyes,"[162] ordering the people to abide by the accepted conventions[163] and avoid civil commotion: "Indeed, it is an accepted convention that you restrain yourselves."[164] And they were saying, "The moon, the moon!"[165] By God, it was only an hour before their moon became a small one and they came to him and dragged him down from the minbar where he was—God knows—and killed him. (In his report, Sallām said that al-Ḥasan had said, "The people came from over here" and that he had indicated with his hand the dwellings of the Banū Tamīm.)

---

158. Not Isḥāq b. Yazīd as printed.
159. Cf. the parallel passage in Ansāb, IVb, 108, which has Shaᶜbān.
160. Reading tamā'at lahu (see Add. et emend.).
161. I.e., al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (see n. 23 above).
162. Reading muᶜayyan (see Add. et emend.); for the qabā', usually a long outer garment, see Dozy, Vêtements, s.v.; EI², s.v. Libās, 733b.
163. Ar. sunnah.
164. See Gloss., s.v. akhadha.
165. Nickname for Masᶜūd, allegedly referring to his good looks (Ansāb, IVb, 98³); short for qamar al-ᶜIrāq (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 402).

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Maslamah[166] b. Muḥārib: They came to ᶜUbaydallāh and said, "Masᶜūd has gone up on to the minbar and no arrow[167] has been fired against him outside the government house." While things were like that, he conceived [456] the idea of going there. But then they came and said, "Masᶜūd has been killed!" and he set his foot in the stirrup and betook himself to Syria. That was in Shawwāl, 64 (May-June, 684).[168]

Abū ᶜUbaydah—Rawwād al-Kaᶜbī: Some men of Muḍar came to Mālik b. Mismaᶜ and besieged him in his residence, which they set on fire. Concerning that, Ghaṭafān b. Unayf al-Kaᶜbī recited in the meter of rajaz:

Ibn Mismaᶜ finds himself besieged, and wishes for other mansions and abodes,
But we have set the blaze around him.[169]

When ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād fled, they pursued him. But he outstripped the pursuers,[170] so they plundered what they found of his. Wāfid[171] b. Khalīfah b. Asmā', one of the Banū Ṣakhr b. Minqar b. ᶜUbayd b. al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAmr b. Kaᶜb b. Saᶜd, said about that:

How many a brutal and violent tyrant we have killed, we have seized his crown and pillaged his goods.
ᶜUbaydallāh was one of them when we plundered him,
and despoiled him of his horses and clothes,
On the day when our horsemen and his met.
If only Ibn Ziyād's flight had not saved him!

And ᶜArham[172] b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Qays, one of the Banū al-ᶜAdawiyyah, said concerning the killing of Masᶜūd, in a long poem:

---

166. Text reads Salamah b. Muḥārib, but cf. n. 98 above.

167. Read kuththāb: it can mean a practice arrow without head or feathers (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v., and cf. p. 13 above, jummāḥ).

168. Ansāb, IVb, 108,[22] has Shaᶜbān (again) with a note (by Balādhurī?) that some put ᶜUbaydallāh's departure and Masᶜūd's death in Shawwāl, but that Shaᶜbān is more correct (aṣaḥḥ).

169. Cf. Ansāb, IVb, 111[3].

170. Read ṭalaba (see Add. et emend.).

171. Ansāb, IVb, 111[4], and Naqā'iḍ Farazdaq, 735, prefer the reading Wāqid.

172. See Add. et emend.

And when Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr came against us, all we offered him to drink was a blade whetted and honed.
Masᶜūd hoped to be made amīr, but he was[173] killed. We have invested him with death.

Abū Jaᶜfar Muḥammad b. Jarīr (al-Ṭabarī) said: As for ᶜUmar (b. Shabbah), he reported to me concerning ᶜUbaydallāh's departure for Syria, from Zuhayr—Wahb b. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—al-Zubayr b. Khirrīt: Masᶜūd sent with Ibn Ziyād a hundred men of Azd led by Qurrah b. ᶜAmr b. Qays, and they brought him to Syria.

ᶜUmar: Abū ᶜĀṣim al-Nabīl reported to me—ᶜAmr b. al- [457]
Zubayr: and Khallād b. Yazīd al-Bāhilī, and al-Walīd b. Hishām—his paternal uncle—his father—ᶜAmr b. Hubayrah—Yasāf b. Shurayḥ al-Yashkurī; and (ᶜUmar b. Shabbah said) ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī) reported it to me too; they differed in their narratives and some of them added to the others' accounts: Ibn Ziyād left al-Baṣrah. One night he said: "Riding a camel has become burdensome to me; make me something soft on a beast with hoofs." So a rug was thrown over a donkey for him, and he rode on it with his feet almost making furrows in the ground.

The Yashkurī said: He was riding in front of me and he had been silent for a long time. So I said to myself, "This is ᶜUbaydallāh, governor of Iraq yesterday, now sleeping on a donkey. If he fell off it, he would treat it harshly." Then I said, "By God, if he is sleeping, I will certainly spoil his sleep for him." So I went up to him and said, "Are you sleeping?" "No," he answered. "Then what has made you so quiet?" I asked. He replied, "I was communing with myself." I said, "Shall I tell you what you were saying to yourself?" He said, "Go on then. I do not think you will be clever enough to get it." I said to him, "You were saying, 'Would that I had not killed al-Ḥusayn.'" "Not that," he said. I said, "You were saying, 'Would that I had not killed those whom I did.'"[174]

173. Cf. Ansāb, IVb, 111[2], where this hemistich is part of the verse of Ghaṭafān b. Unayf.
174. I.e., the Khawārij.

"Not that," he said. "You were saying, 'Would that I had not built al-Bayḍā'.' "[175] "Not that," he said. I said, "You were saying, 'Would that I had not appointed the dihqāns[176] to financial authority.' " "Not that," he said. I said, "You were saying, 'Would that I had been more generous than I was.' "

He answered, "By God, you have not spoken right or avoided mistakes by keeping quiet. As for al-Ḥusayn, he came wanting to kill me, but I preferred killing him to his killing me. As for al-Bayḍā', I bought it from ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUthmān al-Tha-[458] qafī[177] and Yazīd sent me a million which I spent on it. If I survive, it will be for my family; if I perish, I will not grieve over something in which I did not act harshly. As for giving authority over the finances to the dihqāns, ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah[178] and Zādhān Farrūkh[179] disparaged me before Muᶜāwiyah, going as far as taking even the husks of rice into account and making the total of the tax[180] of Iraq come to a hundred million, so that Muᶜāwiyah made me choose between taking responsibility for raising that amount or being deposed from office. I had no desire to be deposed, but, whenever I appointed one of the Arabs and the tax was insufficient[181] and I investigated him or imposed a fine on the leaders of his people or upon his clan, I caused them offense. But if I left them alone, then I abandoned God's property; and I know where it properly belongs. So I found the dihqāns more punctilious in collecting taxes, more trustworthy, and less de-

175. Qaṣr al-Bayḍā', ᶜUbaydallāh's residence in al-Baṣrah (see Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 793[4]).

176. Local gentry of the Sasanids in Iraq, who remained as a distinct group for some time after the Arab conquest (see *EI*², s.v. Dihḳān).

177. A Baṣran related to the Umayyads by marriage and a member of the tribe of Thaqīf from al-Ṭā'if, to which ᶜUbaydallāh's own grandmother, Sumayyah, belonged.

178. See above, n. 56.

179. This seems to be a common name for dihqāns in Arabic sources; the one in question here may be the same one who worked in the financial administration under al-Ḥajjāj and was connected with the change in the language of the administration from Persian to Arabic.

180. Ar. kharāj, presumably, inferring from the mention of the husks of rice, here a land tax estimated as a percentage of the produce (see *EI*², s.v. Kharādj).

181. Or "he withheld the tax," kasara/kusira 'l-kharāj (see Gloss., s.v. kasara).

manding than you Arabs. Even so, I made you responsible for them so that they would not oppress anyone. As for what you say about generosity, by God I never had any wealth but that I bestowed it generously on you. If I had wanted, I could have taken some of your wealth and favored some of you with it at the expense of others so that they would say, 'How generous he is!' but I treated you all the same. With me there were benefits for you all. As for what you say about 'Would that I had not killed those whom I did,' there is nothing which I have done, apart from my confession of God's unity,[182] which brings me nearer to God in my opinion than my killing of those of the Khawārij whom I killed.

"Now I will tell you what I really said to myself: I said, 'Would that I had fought the Baṣrans, for they took an oath of allegiance to obey me willingly.' I swear by God that that is what I wanted, but the family of Ziyād came to me and said, 'If you fight them and they defeat you, they would never allow anyone of us to remain; but, if you leave them alone, then any one of us could hide with his maternal relatives and his in-laws.' So I gave in to them and did not fight. And I was saying, 'Would that I had brought out the prisoners and cut off their heads.' But, since I have missed these two opportunities, would that I arrive in Syria before the Syrians have settled anything."

Some of them said: And he reached Syria and they had not decided on anything. Compared with him they were mere youths. But some of them said: And he reached Syria and they had settled matters. He, however, quashed what they had settled in favor of his own opinion.

In this year also the people of al-Kūfah drove ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth out,[183] removed him from authority over them, and agreed on the appointment of ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd.[184]

---

182. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. akhlaṣa; Qur'ān, sūrah 112 (Sūrat al-Ikhlāṣ), begins "Say: He is God, one!"

183. Of the Banū Makhzūm of Quraysh, he had governed al-Kūfah for Ziyād (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 333).

184. Of the Banū Jumaḥ of Quraysh (Zubayrī, op. cit., 391).

The Deposition of ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth by the People of al-Kūfah and Their Appointment of ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd as Governor over Them[185]

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: According to al-Haytham b. ᶜAdī—Ibn ᶜAyyāsh:[186] The first under whom the two garrison towns of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah were united as one governorate were Ziyād and his son. They killed 13,000 of the Khawārij and ᶜUbaydallāh put 4,000 of them in prison. When Yazīd died, ᶜUbaydallāh made an official address in which he said, "He for obedience to whom we fought is dead. If you give me authority over you, I will collect for you your spoils (fayʾ) and fight your enemies." He sent Muqātil b. Mismaᶜ[187] and Saᶜīd b. Qarḥā,[188] one of the Banū Māzin, with that message to the Kūfans, and his deputy over al-Kūfah was ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth. The two messengers announced their message, and then Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym al-Shaybānī[189] arose. He said, "Praise be to God who has given us respite from Ibn Sumayyah![190] No, nor anything else!"[191] Thereupon, ᶜAmr gave orders concerning him and he was seized by the collar and led off to prison, but Bakr hindered the arrest and Yazīd, fearing, escaped to his people. Muḥammad b. al-Ashᶜath[192] then sent to him saying, "Keep firm in your opinion," and messengers continually came to him bringing that message.

---

185. For parallel and variant accounts of the following events in al-Kūfah, see Ansāb, IVb, 97; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 109; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 95–6; when the narrative reverts to events in al-Baṣrah, see n. 22 above.

186. For al-Haytham b. ᶜAdī, d. 206/821 or 207/822, see GAS, I, 272 and *EI*², s.v.; for Ibn ᶜAyyāsh, d. 193/809, see Yāqūt, Irshād, II, 373–80.

187. Brother of Mālik b. Mismaᶜ (see above, p. 8).

188. In the report from ᶜAwānah, below and at Ansāb, IVb, 97[13], he is called Saᶜd; whether Saᶜīd here is merely a slip or genuinely represents the tradition of Ibn ᶜAyyāsh is not ascertainable. The Banū Māzin b. Mālik are of Tamīm.

189. Of Bakr b. Wāʾil, he was a member of a prominent family of al-Kūfah which provided governors and other high officials during the Umayyad period; he himself was to become governor of al-Rayy and al-Madāʾin for the Zubayrids (see Crone, Slaves, 119).

190. I.e., Ziyād b. Abīhi, but perhaps here indicating Ziyād's son ᶜUbaydallāh.

191. Ar. lā wa-lā karāmah, literally, "No, and no jar cover!" (see Lane, Lexicon, s.vv. ḥubb and karāmah, the latter in the supplement).

192. The leader of the Banū Kindah in al-Kūfah.

When ᶜAmr ascended the minbar, they stoned him and he went inside his residence. The people gathered in the mosque and said, "Let us appoint somebody to authority until a caliph is agreed upon," and they resolved on ᶜUmar b. Saᶜd.[193] But the women of Hamdān[194] came, weeping for al-Ḥusayn, while their menfolk were girt with swords, and they encircled the minbar. Muḥammad b. al-Ashᶜath said, "Our situation has changed." Kindah had been supporting the authority of ᶜUmar [460] b. Saᶜd because his maternal uncle was one of them, but now they all agreed on ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd, wrote to Ibn al-Zubayr about it, and he confirmed him in office.

As for ᶜAwānah b. al-Ḥakam, according to the report of Hishām b. Muḥammad from him, he said: When the Baṣrans gave the oath of allegiance to ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, he sent ᶜAmr b. Mismaᶜ[195] and Saᶜd b. al-Qarḥā al-Tamīmī as envoys from himself to al-Kūfah to tell the Kūfans what the Baṣrans had done and to ask that they give the oath of allegiance to ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād until the disputes among the people had been settled. ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth called the people together, praised God and extolled Him, and then said, "These two men have come to you from your governor, summoning you to a course of action by means of which God will give you one voice and smooth out what divides you. Listen to them, then, and accept what they say, for they have brought you true guidance." Then ᶜAmr b. Mismaᶜ arose, praised God and extolled Him, and referred to the Baṣrans and how they had agreed to make ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād governor until the people should concur as to whom they should give authority. "We have come to you so that we can work together and have a common governor, for al-Kūfah is part of al-Baṣrah and al-

193. ᶜUmar b. Saᶜd b. Abī Waqqāṣ (see Add. et emend.), of the Banū Zuhrah of Quraysh, a son of the important Companion of the Prophet; his mother was of Kindah (Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 264[12-13]).

194. A "southern" tribe with substantial settlement in al-Kūfah (see *EI*², s.v.; Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 277); Hamdānīs of al-Kūfah had been prominent in support of al-Ḥusayn while ᶜUmar b. Saᶜd was one of the leading opponents of al-Ḥusayn.

195. Brother of Mālik and Muqātil b. Mismaᶜ (see n. 187, above; appears variantly as ᶜĀmir).

Baṣrah part of al-Kūfah." Ibn al-Qarḥā arose and spoke in the same manner as his companion.

However, Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd al-Shaybānī (he was Ibn Ruwaym) stood up. He was the first of the people to stone the two envoys and he was followed by the others afterwards. He then said, "Are we to give the oath of allegiance to Ibn Marjānah? No, and nothing else!" That action increased Yazīd's status in the garrison town and elevated him. The delegation returned to al-Baṣrah and informed the people there of what had passed, and the Baṣrans said, "The Kūfans are casting him off while you are conferring authority on him and giving him the oath of allegiance!" Then they rose against him.

Whenever Ibn Ziyād was in difficulty, it led him to seek protection from the Azd,[196] and now, when the people rejected him, he sought the protection of Masʿūd b. ʿAmr al-Azdī.
[461] Masʿūd granted him protection and guarded him, and he stayed there for ninety days after the death of Yazīd and then left for Syria. The Azd and Bakr b. Wā'il sent some of their men with him and they brought him to Syria. When he set out he appointed Masʿūd b. ʿAmr as his deputy over al-Baṣrah, but the Banū Tamīm and Qays said, "We will not accept, we will not approve of, and we will not confer authority on anybody unless our community generally approves of him." Masʿūd said, "He has appointed me his deputy and I will never abandon it," and he went out with his clansmen to the governor's court (al-qaṣr) and entered it. Tamīm gathered around al-Aḥnaf b. Qays and said to him, "Azd have entered the mosque." He replied, "They have entered the mosque, so what? It is for you and them equally, and you enter it." They said, "And he has entered the governor's court and gone up to the minbar."

When ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād had departed for Syria, a group of the Khawārij had rebelled and established camp on the river of the Asāwirah,[197] and it was claimed that al-Aḥnaf sent to them, saying, "This man who has entered the governor's residence is your enemy as well as ours, so what is stopping you from making the first move against him?" A band of them, therefore, came and penetrated into the mosque while Masʿūd b. ʿAmr was on the minbar taking the oath of allegiance from those who came to him. A non-Arab called Muslim, who was a Persian and had come to al-Baṣrah and accepted Islam and then joined the Khawārij, shot at him, got him in the heart and killed him. The timorous ones among the people there then rushed out in a panic, saying, "Masʿūd b. ʿAmr has been killed! The Khawārij have killed him!" Thereupon Azd came out to attack those Khawārij. They killed some of them, wounded others, and drove them out of al-Baṣrah. After they had buried Masʿūd they were approached by some who told them, "Do you know that the Banū Tamīm are claiming that they killed Masʿūd b. ʿAmr?" So the Azd sent to ask if that was true and, indeed, some of them were saying it.

196. Cf. Ansāb, IVb, 98[1], istajāra fīhā, which seems better.

197. At al-Baṣrah near the house of Fīl the mawlā of Ziyād (Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 834).

Consequently, Azd met together, made Ziyād b. ʿAmr al-ʿAtakī[198] chief over them, and hurried off to the Banū Tamīm. [462] Qays came out with the Banū Tamīm, and Mālik b. Mismaʿ with Bakr b. Wā'il came out with Azd. Azd and its allies came toward the Banū Tamīm, and the latter went to al-Aḥnaf, saying, "Come out, for our people are here!" but he remained there doing nothing, and a woman of his people brought an incense burner and said, "Oh Aḥnaf, look after this!" meaning, "You are only a woman" but he replied, "Your arse is better suited for it." Never again did any one hear him use such a coarse expression, for he was known for his subtlety (ḥilm). He called for his banner and said, "Oh God, grant it victory and do not shame it. May its help mean that those fighting with it will not be defeated because of it and will not lose it by conquest.[199] Oh God, spare our blood and overcome our divisions." He then set out, and so did his nephew Iyās b. Qatādah[200] going ahead of him, and the people met and fought a great battle. Many from each party were killed and the Banū 198. I.e., Masʿūd's brother.

199. Cf. Ansāb, IVb, 99, which omits the troublesome middle phrase.

200. Text has ibn Muʿāwiyah for ibn Qatādah; Ansāb, IVb, 99[7-8], has ibn ukhtihi (for akhīhi) Iyās b. Qatāda b. Awfā min B. ʿAbd Shams b. Saʿd; so too Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 408.

Tamīm appealed to the others, saying, "For God's sake, Oh party of Azd, let the Qur'ān and whoever you desire of the people of Islam decide between us concerning our blood. If there is proof against us that we killed your fellow tribesman, then choose the best man among us and kill him in recompense for your fellow. But, if there is no proof, then we will swear by God that we did not kill and did not order or know of a killer for your man. If you do not want that, we will pay 100,000 dirhams in blood money for him. But make peace!"

Al-Aḥnaf b. Qays came with the leading men of Muḍar to Ziyād b. ᶜAmr al-ᶜAtakī and said, "Oh party of Azd, you are our neighbors in dwelling place and our brethren in warfare. We have come to you in your abode to dampen the fires of your hostility[201] and remove your hatred. The decision is entrusted to you, so decide[202] the fate of our mature men and our properties. The loss of anything we possess, if it would bring peace between us, would not seem too much to us." They answered, "Would you pay ten times the accepted blood money for our companion?" and he said, "It is yours." So the people left and they made peace.

Al-Haytham b. al-Aswad[203] said:

[463] The crier loudly proclaimed the death of Masᶜūd, and I said to him, "How much braver was the Yamanī than he who proclaims his death!
He fulfilled fourscore years, no one could defeat him, a hero[204] whom the summoner called to head legions of men.
He led[205] Ibn Ḥarb[206] when his ways had been barred, and he widened the escape passages, such widenings

---

201. See Gloss., s.v. ḥashsh; Ansāb, IVb, 99, reads li-nuṭfi'a ḥasīkatakum, "so that we may quench your rancor!"

202. Read ᶜawwilū ᶜalā (not quwlū ᶜalā) "decide on," as in Ansāb, IVb, 99.

203. A notable of the Banū Nakhaᶜ of Madhḥij (see Ansāb, IVb, 100[1-2]).

204. Ar. fatan; Ansāb reads ḥattā.

205. Ansāb reads awā, "he sheltered," for addā.

206. I.e., ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād counted as a descendant of Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb.

That the earth and its inhabitants could disappear in them, and he was surrounded by his helpers and partisans."

And ᶜUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr[207] said:

I never ceased to hope for Azd until I saw that they fell short of their ancestral glory.
Has Masᶜūd been killed and they never sought vengeance for him, and have the swords of Azd become like sickles?
What is the good of blood money which has brought humiliation to Azd?
Their living ones are reviled for it in the assemblies,
As gray-haired ones, as if their beards were (skins of) foxes with bells hung on their necks.[208]

The Baṣrans decided together to give authority to one of themselves to lead the prayer until an imām should be agreed upon. They appointed ᶜAbd al-Malik b. ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜĀmir[209] for a month and then they appointed Babbah, who was ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥarith b. ᶜAbd al-Muṭṭalib. He led them in prayer for two months until ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Maᶜmar[210] came to [464] them from Ibn al-Zubayr. He stayed for a month until al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah al-Makhzūmī came bringing orders for his removal from office. Al-Ḥarith then became prefect of al-Baṣrah, and he was (the one called) al-Qubāᶜ.[211]

207. ᶜUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr al-Juᶜfī of Madhḥij, as in Ansāb, IVb, 100[6] (see Add. et emend.; also see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 105 f., 219–21, Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 190).

208. The simile in the last two lines presumably indicates cowardice (the fox) and stupidity (the bells are the sort which are hung on the necks of livestock).

209. Of the Banū ᶜAbd Shams of Quraysh (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 149).

210. Of the Banū Taym of Quraysh (ibid., 189).

211. See Add. et emend. for the missing Abī in al-Ḥārith's name; another Qurashī (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 318 and n. 3, for an offered derivation of the name al-Qubāᶜ).

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: As for ᶜUmar b. Shabbah, he gave me a report about the tenure of authority by ᶜAbd al-Malik b. ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜĀmir b. Kurayz and Babbah, the killing of Masᶜūd , and the holding of office by ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh[212] which was different from Hishām's report from ᶜAwānah.

According to ᶜUmar b. Shabbah—ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū Muqarrin ᶜUbaydallāh al-Duhnī: When the people gave the oath of allegiance to Babbah, he appointed Himyān b. ᶜAdī over his police troops. One of the people of Medina came to Babbah and the latter ordered Himyān b. ᶜAdī to give the Medinese a lodging place close to himself. Himyān, therefore, went to a house which belonged to al-Fīl,[213] a mawlā of Ziyād, which was in the district of the Banū Sulaym,[214] thinking to turn everyone out of it so that he could lodge the Medinese there. But al-Fīl had fled and locked the doors, and the Banū Sulaym resisted Himyān and fought against him. They appealed for help to ᶜAbd al-Malik b. ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜĀmir b. Kurayz, who sent his Bukhāriyyah and his mawlās with weapons. They drove Himyān out and prevented him from taking the house.

Next day, ᶜAbd al-Malik went to the government house to greet Babbah and a man of the Banū Qays b. Thaᶜlabah[215] met him at the door. This man said, "You are the one who helped them against us yesterday!" and raised his hand and hit him. Thereupon a crowd of the Bukhāriyyah struck off the hand of the Qaysī and sent it flying. (It is also reported that the Qaysī escaped without injury.) Ibn ᶜĀmir was enraged. He went back, and Muḍar were stirred up on his behalf. When they met, Bakr b. Wā'il went to Ashyam b. Shaqīq and appealed for his help and he came bringing Mālik b. Mismaᶜ with him. He went up on to the minbar and said, "Any Muḍarī whom you find, crucify him!" (The family of Mismaᶜ claim that Mālik came on that day wearing his indoor clothes[216] and without weapons in order to deflect Ashyam from what he intended.)

212. Sic.
213. See n. 197 above.
214. Of Qays.
215. Of Bakr b. Wā'il, the clan of Mālik b. Mismaᶜ
216. Ar. mutafaḍḍilan (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. mifḍal).

Then Bakr went back. Bakr and Muḍar had previously held off from one another, but now Azd seized the chance to make an alliance with Bakr[217] and they went with Masᶜūd to the communal mosque. [465]

Tamīm fled to al-Aḥnaf, who fastened his turban to a spear which he then gave to Salamah b. Dhu'ayb al-Riyāḥī. The Asāwirah went ahead of him, and he entered the mosque while Masᶜūd was addressing the gathering. They dragged him down and killed him. The Azd, however, claimed that it was the Azāriqah[218] who had killed him. Then there was civil tumult (fitnah) in al-Baṣrah. ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Maᶜmar and ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām[219] acted as mediators between them, and eventually Azd accepted ten times the blood money for Masᶜūd. Then ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith remained in his house, professing his piety and saying, "I will not make righteous the people by corruption of myself."

According to ᶜUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan:[220] The Baṣrans wrote to Ibn al-Zubayr, who in turn wrote to Anas b. Mālik[221] asking him to lead the prayer for the people. He led the prayer for them for forty days.

According to ᶜUmar—ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): Ibn al-Zubayr wrote to ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Maᶜmar al-Taymī appointing him over al-Baṣrah. He sent the commission to ᶜUmar and he accepted it,[222] but as he was setting out, desiring to perform the minor pilgrimage,[223] ᶜUmar wrote to ᶜUbaydallāh[224] asking him to lead the people in prayer, and he did so until ᶜUmar came.

---

217. Ansāb, IVb, 105[16-17], seems to read better: thumma inna 'l-qawma taḥājazu wa 'nṣarafat Bakru wa 'l-Muḍariyyatu wa-taḥālafat Bakru wa 'l-Azd.

218. Extremist Khārijites, followers of Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq (see EI[1], s.v. Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraḳ).

219. Ansāb, IVb, 106[16], has ᶜAmr b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām; Naqā'iḍ Farazdaq, 738[11], has ᶜUmar b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān; possibly a descendant of Hishām b. al-Mughīrah of the Banū Makhzūm of Quraysh?

220. Al-Madā'inī?

221. Medinese Companion of the Prophet (see EI[2], s.v.).

222. Ar. wāfaqahu; Ansāb, IVb, 106[19], has fa-wafāhu, "it reached him," which seems better.

223. Ar. ᶜ*umrah*, a ritual which involves pilgrimage to Mecca but may be performed at any time of the year and does not include all of the ceremonies of the ḥajj.

224. ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh's brother (see Ansāb, IVb, 106[19-20]).

According to ᶜUmar—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father:[225] I heard Muḥammad b. al-Zubayr say: The people of al-Baṣrah agreed on a peace on condition that ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith al-Hāshimī governed them. He directed their affairs for four months, but Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq went in revolt to Ahwāz[226] and it was said to ᶜAbdallāh, "The men have devoured one another and women are seized from the roads but no one prevents it, and the result is that you are put to shame." He answered, "What is it that you want?" and they said, "That you put on your sword and act firmly with the [466] people." He said, "I will not make them righteous by my own corruption. Slave, bring me my sandals!" And he put on his sandals and betook himself to his family. The people appointed as governor ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Maᶜmar al-Taymī.

My father (Jarīr) said from al-Ṣaᶜb b. Zayd: The plague [al-jārif] broke out while ᶜAbdallāh was in authority over al-Baṣrah. His mother died in it. Nobody could be found who would carry her body for burial, so they had to hire four non-Arabs who carried her to her grave. And he was governor at that time!

According to ᶜUmar—ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad: While Babbah was in charge of al-Baṣrah, he had taken 40,000 dirhams from the treasury and deposited it with somebody. When ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh came as governor, he took and imprisoned ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith and tortured a mawlā of his to find out where that money was and compelled him to pay it back.

According to ᶜUmar—ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad—al-Qaflānī—Yazīd b. ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr: I said to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal, "When you had authority over us I saw that you acquired money but were wary about the shedding of blood." He replied, "The consequences of money are easier than those of blood."

In this year also, the Kūfans appointed ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd over their affairs. Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī reported from ᶜAwānah b. al-Ḥakam that when they rejected the two delegates from the Baṣrans, the Kūfan notables met and concluded a peace on condition that ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd should lead them in prayer (he was ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd b. Khalaf al-Qurashī, the "ball made by dung beetles"[227] referred to by ᶜAbdallāh b. Hammām al-Salūlī:[228]

225. See n. 76 above.
226. The province of southwestern Iran bordering Iraq.

Cling fast to Zayd if you catch him, and cure the widows of the dung beetles' ball,[229] for he was short of stature)[230] until the people should make [467] up their minds. He remained in office for three months after Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah perished and then ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī, al-Khaṭmi,[231] came to lead the prayer and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. ᶜUbaydallāh[232] to be in charge of taxes.[233] And the Kūfans, the Baṣrans, those Arabs in the region toward which prayer is performed,[234] the Syrians and the people of Mesopotamia all accepted Ibn al-Zubayr, except for the people of Jordan.

In this year also, the oath of allegiance as caliph was given to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam[235] in Syria.

The Rendering of Allegiance to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam in Syria

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saᶜd—Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar:[236] When the oath of allegiance was given to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-

227. According to Ansāb, IVb, 101[1], he was called duḥrūjat al-juᶜal because of his shortness.

228. On him see EI[2], s.v.; GAS, II, 324.

229. Cf. Ansāb, IVb, 101[3], V, 191[15]; "Zayd" is sometimes identified as a mawlā of Ibn Masᶜūd; "cure the widows of" may refer to their amorous infatuation with the governor.

230. Ar. wa-kāna qaṣīran ḥattā. . .: all parallels indicate that this must refer to ᶜĀmir's short stature, not the passage of time.

231. Of the Anṣār, among whom Khaṭmah b. Jusham is a subgroup of the Aws (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 182).

232. Of the Banū Taym of Quraysh, known as al-Aᶜraj (the Lame; see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 283–4).

233. Ar. kharāj, i.e., the governorship was divided into its political/religious and financial components.

234. The qiblah, i.e. (here), the Ḥijāz in general.

235. A leading Umayyad of the family of Abū al-ᶜĀṣ (see further EI[2], s.v. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam). For parallel and variant accounts of the following two sections see Ansāb, V, 127–46, Ibn Saᶜd, V, 27–9, Naqā'iḍ Akhṭal, 6ff., Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 170–83, Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 107(esp. 133 ff.)–51 (with further references).

236. On Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar al-Wāqidī, d. 207/822–3, see EI[1], s.v. al-

Zubayr, he appointed ᶜUbaydah b. al-Zubayr[237] over Medina and ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jaḥdam al-Fihrī[238] over Egypt, and he expelled the Banū Umayyah and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam to Syria. At that time, ᶜAbd al-Malik[239] was twenty-eight years old. When Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr and those who were with him reached Syria, he told Marwān of the situation in which he had left Ibn al-Zubayr and that he had summoned Ibn al-Zubayr to accept the oath of allegiance but he had refused. Ḥuṣayn said to Marwān and to the Banū Umayyah, "We can see that you are in great confusion, so put your affairs in order before he moves into your Syria against you and indiscriminate civil discord breaks out."[240] It was Marwān's opinion that he should set out and hurry to Ibn al-Zubayr to give him the oath of allegiance. Then ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād arrived, however, and the Banū Umayyah met with him. ᶜUbaydallāh had heard what Marwān wanted to do and he said to him, "I am ashamed at you for what you want! You are the senior man of Quraysh, and its sayyid. It will do what you do." And he said, "Nothing is yet lost." The Banū Umayyah and its mawlās supported him and the Yemenis[241] rallied to him, and he set out, saying, "Nothing is yet lost." He and those who [468] were with him came to Damascus, the people of which had given the oath of allegiance to al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī on the understanding that he should lead them in prayer and manage their affairs until the question of authority over the community of Muḥammad had been settled.

As for ᶜAwānah, according to Hishām's report from him, he said: When Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah had died and his son Muᶜāwiyah after him (I heard that after his accession Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah had given the command and a

---

Wāḳidī, GAS, I, 294–7; on Muḥammad b. Saᶜd, d. 230/845, see EI², s.v., GAS, I, 300–1.

237. ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr's brother (of the Banū Asad of Quraysh).

238. Also called ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. ᶜUtbah, of the Banū Fihr of Quraysh (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 445 and n. 1).

239. Marwān's son and successor; see EI², s.v.

240. Literally, "a blind and deaf fitnah."

241. I.e., the "southern" Arab tribes in Syria which were regarded as descendants of Qaḥṭān, or allies of these tribes.

communal prayer was proclaimed in Damascus.[242] He praised God and extolled Him and then said, "To come to the point, I have considered the matter of authority among you and I do not have the strength for it. I sought for you somebody like ᶜUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb [God's mercy be upon him] when Abū Bakr had recourse to him, but I have not found such a man. And I have sought for you six men to consult among themselves like the six appointed by ᶜUmar, but I have not found them. You are best fitted to decide your own affairs, so choose for them somebody you love." Then he went into his residence and did not again come out to the people, remaining absent until he died. Some authorities say that he was secretly given poison to drink, some that he was stabbed. We now return to the report of ᶜAwānah), ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād came to Damascus.

Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī was in authority there.[243] In Qinnasrīn, Zufar b. al-Ḥārith al-Kilābī[244] revolted and gave the oath of allegiance to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, and in Ḥimṣ, al-Nuᶜmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī[245] also gave Ibn al-Zubayr his allegiance. In Palestine, Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī[246] was governing, first for Muᶜāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān and then afterward for Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah. He was fervently for the Banū Umayyah and he was the sayyid of the people of Palestine. Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī summoned Rawḥ b. Zinbāᶜ al-Judhāmī[247] and said, "I am appointing you deputy over Palestine. Include this clan of Lakhm with Judhām[248] and 242. Here al-Sha'm presumably means Damascus, although above and below the town is called Dimashq.

243. The following paragraph summarizes the situation in each of the military and administrative districts (ajnād) of Syria: Damascus, Qinnasrīn, Ḥimṣ, Palestine and Jordan (see EI², s.v. Djund).

244. Al-Ḥārith rather than ᶜAbdallāh (see Add. et emend.); on him, see Crone, Slaves, 108–9; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 135–6; Ansāb, V, 132⁴, says that Zufar b. al-Ḥārith had revolted, wa-qad thāra Zufar.

245. Son of a Medinese Companion (on him see EI¹, s.v.; Crone, Slaves, 155; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 137).

246. Related to the Sufyānids by marriage, leader of Quḍāᶜah (see EI², s.v.; Crone, Slaves, 93–4; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 128 ff.).

247. One of two rivals for the leadership of Judhām (see next note); on him see Crone, Slaves, 99–100.

248. Tribes settled alongside each other in the Jordan/Palestine region and you will not be short of men. Since you are the most eminent [469] of them, you will have the backing of those of your people who are with you." Ḥassān b. Mālik then went to the district of Jordan and left Rawḥ b. Zinbāʿ as his deputy over Palestine. Nātil b. Qays,[249] however, revolted against Rawḥ b. Zinbāʿ, expelled him, proclaimed himself in authority over Palestine and gave the oath of allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr.

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr had written to his governor over Medina telling him to expel the Banū Umayyah from the town, and they were expelled with their dependents and women to Syria. They reached Damascus, where Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was.[250] The people were divided into two parties: Ḥassān b. Mālik in Jordan was fervently for the Banū Umayyah and propagandized on their behalf, while al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī in Damascus was fervently for ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and propagandized for him.

Ḥassān b. Mālik remained in the Jordan district and said, "Oh people of Jordan, what do you witness for Ibn al-Zubayr and those who were killed of the people of the Ḥarrah?"[251] They replied, "We bear witness that Ibn al-Zubayr is a hypocrite [munāfiq][252] and those of the people of the Ḥarrah who were killed are in hell." "And what do you witness for Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and those of you who were killed at the Ḥarrah?" he said. They answered, "We witness that Yazīd was in the right and that those of us killed are in heaven." He said, "And I witness that, if the religion [dīn] of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah was truth while he was alive at that time, it is still so today and his party [shīʿah] are in the right. And if Ibn al-Zubayr and his party were at that time in falsehood, he is today still in falsehood and so is his party." They told him, "You have spoken right. We give you the oath of allegiance on condition in alliance, with Judhām dominating; Lakhm seems already to have been assigned to Yemen, while Judhām's descent was still an open question, some claiming a Yemenī affiliation, others a "northern" (Maʿadd) (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 176, II, 264, 375–6; *EI*², s.vv. Djudhām, Lakhm).

---

249. Ibn Zinbāʿ's rival for the leadership of Judhām.

250. Ansāb, V, 132[10], reads wa-fīhim Marwān "and Marwān was among them," which seems better.

251. See n. 10 above.

252. On this word, see Jeffery, Foreign Vocabulary, s.v.

that we fight those of the people who oppose you and obey Ibn al-Zubayr, and on condition that we do not have either of these two lads to rule over us for we find that abhorrent (they meant the two sons of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, ʿAbdallāh and Khālid).[253] They are short in years and we dislike the idea that the others should come to us with a shaykh while we bring them a youngster."

Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays in Damascus was fervently for Ibn al- [470]
Zubayr, but the fact that the Banū Umayyah were present there prevented him from proclaiming it openly, so he worked secretly in support of him. However, Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal heard of it and sent a letter to al-Ḍaḥḥāk in which he stressed the legitimacy of the Banū Umayyah, reminded him of the importance of obedience and communal unity, the favor which the Banū Umayyah had shown him and the pains they had taken for him, and he called upon him to obey them. Further, he referred to Ibn al-Zubayr, disparaged him and abused him, mentioned that he was a hypocrite who had refused to accept two caliphs, and he told al-Ḍaḥḥāk to read out the letter to the people. Ḥassān then called for a man of Kalb, named Nāghiḍah,[254] and sent him off with the letter to al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays, but he also made a copy of the letter and gave it to Nāghiḍah saying, "So long as al-Ḍaḥḥāk reads out my letter to the people, that is all right, but if he does not, then you are to get up and read this letter out to them." In addition, he also wrote to the Banū Umayyah asking them to be present when the letter was read.

Nāghiḍah came to al-Ḍaḥḥāk with the letter and gave it to him. He also gave the Banū Umayyah their letter. On the Friday, al-Ḍaḥḥāk went up on the minbar and Nāghiḍah stood before him and said, "God save the governor! Call for the letter of Ḥassān and read it out to the people," but al-Ḍaḥḥāk said, "Sit down!" He sat down but then stood up a second 253. The two surviving sons of Yazīd by different mothers; the former is known as al-Uswār, the latter is famous as a (legendary?) alchemist (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 128–9 and on the latter, see *EI*², s.v. Khālid b. Yazīd).

254. Ansāb, V, 133¹, has "Nāʿiṣah, one of the descendants of Thaʿlab b. Wabarah, the brother of Kalb"; Ibn ʿAsākir and Ibn al-Athīr read Bāghiḍah. Goitein refers to LA, VIII, 368⁴, for the name Nāʿiṣah.

time, and again al-Ḍaḥḥāk said, "Sit down!" The same happened on a third occasion and when Nāghiḍah saw that he was not going to do what he asked, he got out the letter which he had with him and read it out to the people. Al-Walīd b. ᶜUtbah b. Abī Sufyān[255] then arose and said that Ḥassān spoke the truth while Ibn al-Zubayr, whom he reviled, was a liar. Next Yazīd b. Abī al-Nims al-Ghassānī[256] got up, proclaimed the truth of what Ḥassān had said and of his letter, and he abused Ibn al-Zubayr. He was followed by Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī,[257] who said exactly the same. But then ᶜAmr b. Yazīd [471] al-Ḥakamī[258] arose and he reviled Ḥassān and heaped praise on Ibn al-Zubayr.

Consequently, the people were in a tumult. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk ordered that al-Walīd b. ᶜUtbah, Yazīd b. Abī al-Nims, and Sufyān b. al-Abrad, who had asserted the truth of what Ḥassān said and reviled Ibn al-Zubayr, be imprisoned, and they were. The people assailed one another and Kalb attacked ᶜAmr b. Yazīd al-Ḥakamī, setting him on fire and tearing his clothes. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah arose and ascended two steps of the minbar. At that time he was still a boy. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays was on the minbar, but Khālid b. Yazīd delivered a very succinct speech, the like of which had never been heard, and the people fell quiet. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk came down from the minbar and led the assembly in the Friday prayer, and then went to his residence. The Kalb came and released Sufyān b. al-Abrad while Ghassān did the same for Yazīd b. Abī al-Nims, so that al-Walīd b. ᶜUtbah complained, "If only I were of Kalb or Ghassān, I would have been released!" However, the two sons of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, Khālid and ᶜAbdallāh, came with their maternal relatives of Kalb and got him out of the prison.

---

255. Former governor of Medina, member of the family to which the first three Umayyad caliphs had belonged, had unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the oath of allegiance for Yazīd from Ibn al-Zubayr and al-Ḥusayn following the death of Muᶜāwiyah (Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 132–3).

256. Leader (?) of the Ghassānī tribe, settled in Jordan before the Arab conquests (see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, index s.v.).

257. Later prominent in fighting on behalf of the Umayyads under ᶜAbd al-Malik and al-Ḥajjāj (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 286, 515).

258. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 172, makes him the son of the Umayyad Yazīd b. al-Ḥakam, but cf. Lammens, Marwānides, 29/69, n. 1, Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 139, n. 207.

That was the day which the Syrians call "the first day of Jayrūn."[259] The people remained as they were in Damascus, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk came out to the mosque of the town and took his seat there. He referred to Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah and disparaged him and then a young man of Kalb arose with a staff with which he struck him. The people were sitting in the groups girded with their swords and they attacked one another in the mosque and fought, the Qays appealing for support for Ibn al-Zubayr and assistance for al-Ḍaḥḥāk, while Kalb shouted for the Banū Umayyah, especially for Khālid b. Yazīd, since they felt family solidarity with Yazīd. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk retired into the government house.

Next day, he did not come out for the dawn prayer ritual. Some of the soldiers were fervently for the Banū Umayyah, [472] some fervently for Ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk sent for the Banū Umayyah and they went to him on the morrow. He apologized to them and mentioned the pains they had taken in showing favor to his mawlās[260] and to himself and said that he desired nothing which they disliked. He said, "So let us both write to Ḥassān and he will come from Jordan and camp at al-Jābiyah[261] and we will all go and join him there. Then we will give the oath of allegiance to one of you." The Banū Umayyah accepted that, and they and al-Ḍaḥḥāk both wrote to Ḥassān. And then the Banū Umayyah and the people came out, the banners were put in front, and they set out aiming for al-Jābiyah.

Thawr b. Maᶜn b. Yazīd b. al-Akhnas al-Sulamī[262] now came to al-Ḍaḥḥāk and said, "You summoned us to obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr and we gave you the oath of allegiance on that understanding. But now you are going to this Kalbī bedouin to make his nephew,[263] Khālid b. Yazīd, caliph." Al-Ḍaḥḥāk 259. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 172, n. 1, F. Buhl, "Zur Krisis der Umajjadenherrschaft im Jahre 684," ZA, XXVII (1912), 61; for a possible eschatological connection, see N. Wieder, The Judaean Scrolls and Karaism, London, 1962, 19.

260. See Crone, Slaves, 198; the parallel passage in Ansāb, V, 133[20-21], does not refer to the mawlās.

261. Former center of the Ghassānid "kings," about 50 miles south of Damascus (see EI², s.v. Djābiya).

262. Of Qays, killed at Marj Rāhiṭ (see below).

263. Read ibn ukhtihi.

said to him, "So what do you think?" and he answered, "I think we should proclaim openly that which we were keeping secret, summon to obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr, and fight for it." And al-Ḍaḥḥāk turned aside with those of the people who were with him and won them over. Then he continued journeying as far as Marj Rāhiṭ,[264] where he pitched camp.

There are variant accounts of the battle which took place at Marj Rāhiṭ between al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

According to Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar al-Wāqidī: Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was given the oath of allegiance in Muḥarram, 65 (August–September 684). Marwān was in Syria and did not concern himself with the matter until ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād encouraged him to do that when he came to him from Iraq. He said to him, "You are the senior man of Quraysh and its head, but al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays has authority over you!" That led to what followed. Marwān went against al-Ḍaḥḥāk with an army and slew him and his supporters. At that time al-Ḍaḥḥāk was obedient to Ibn al-Zubayr. There was a slaughter [473] of the Banū Qays at Marj Rāhiṭ such as had never occurred on any field.

According to Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar—Ibn Abī al-Zinād—Hishām b. ᶜUrwah:[265] Al-Ḍaḥḥāk was killed at the day of Marj Rāhiṭ while calling on people to accept Ibn al-Zubayr. We were told of it in a letter sent to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk's obedience to him and the rectitude of his views were referred to.[266]

Several authorities say that the battle of Marj Rāhiṭ between al-Ḍaḥḥāk and Marwān was in the year 64 (August 683–August 684).

I was told on the authority of Ibn Saᶜd—Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar—Mūsā b. Yaᶜqūb—Abū al-Ḥuwayrith: The people of Jordan and others said to Marwān, "You are a great shaykh, while the son of Yazīd is a boy and Ibn al-Zubayr is in middle age. Only iron will strike iron, so do not challenge him with 264. On the site, see EI², s.v.

265. Hishām b. ᶜUrwah b. al-Zubayr, d. 146/763, Ibn al-Zubayr's nephew (on him, see GAS, I, 88–9).

266. The text seems to be corrupt (see Add. et emend.).

this boy. Meet him head on and we will give you the oath of allegiance. Hold out your hand!" So he held out his hand and they gave him the oath of allegiance at al-Jābiyah on Wednesday when three days had passed of Dhū al-Qaʿdah in the year 64 (June 22, 684).

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Muṣʿab b. Thābit—ʿĀmir b. ʿAbdallāh: When al-Ḍaḥḥāk heard that they had given Marwān the oath of allegiance as caliph, he took the oath of allegiance from his supporters on behalf of Ibn al-Zubayr. Then they marched against one another and fought a great battle. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk and his men were killed.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Ibn Abī al-Zinād—his father: When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk[267] was governor over Medina, he was just a young man. He said that al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays had invited Qays and others to give the oath of allegiance to himself (al-Ḍaḥḥāk) and that he took the oath of allegiance from them as caliph. Zufar b. ʿAqīl al-Fihrī[268] said to ʿAbd al-Raḥman, "That is how we understood and heard it, but the descendants of al-Zubayr say that al-Ḍaḥḥāk only gave ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr the oath of allegiance and went out in obedience to him until he was killed. They lie, [474] by God! What led to that (his taking the oath of allegiance for himself) was that Quraysh summoned him to it. He at first refused, only agreeing to it reluctantly."[269]

---

267. The son of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays governed al-Madīnah for Yazīd (II) b. ʿAbd al-Malik (regn. 101–5/720–4).

268. Of the same Qurashī family as al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

269. The sense of the text here is somewhat uncertain, particularly with regard to the meaning and function of al-bāṭila in the first line of p. 474. My translation results from a comparison with the parallel passage in Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, VII, 6, which is virtually the same as far as wa-kharaja fī ṭāʿatihi, but then continues ḥattā qutila ʿalayhā qāla al-bāṭila wa'llāhi ya-qūlūna. This seems to show that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk is denying what the descendants of al-Zubayr say regarding al-Ḍaḥḥāk's allegiance. That Quraysh summoned al-Ḍaḥḥāk to take the oath of allegiance to himself and not to Ibn al-Zubayr is indicated by a further addition in the text of Ibn ʿAsākir: wa-lākin kāna awwalu dhālik an Qurayshan daʿathu ilayhā wa-qālat inta kabīrunā wa 'l-qā'im bi-dami 'l-khalīfati 'l-maẓlūm. . . . All this may, however, be merely an attempt to make sense of a garbled text. See further, Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 176, 178; Buhl, "Krisis," 53–4, 59 (based on Ibn Saʿd, V, 27–9); Lammens, Marwānides, 40–1/80–1; EI², s.v. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Kays; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 141, 143.

The Battle at Marj Rāhiṭ between al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam and Its Immediate Consequences

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: According to Nūḥ b. Ḥabīb—Hishām b. Muḥammad—ᶜAwānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī: When he headed for al-Jābiyah to meet Ḥassān b. Mālik, al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays turned aside with those who were with him and won them over.[270] Then he pressed on and pitched camp at Marj Rāhiṭ. There he publicly proclaimed the oath of allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr and renounced the Banū Umayyah. The majority of the men of Damascus, both Yemenis and others, gave him the oath of allegiance on that basis. The Banū Umayyah and their followers traveled on until they reached Ḥassān at al-Jābiyah. Ḥassān led their ritual prayers for forty days while the men consulted among themselves. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk wrote to al-Nuᶜmān b. Bashīr who was governor over Ḥimṣ, to Zufar b. al-Ḥārith who was over Qinnasrīn, and to Nātil b. Qays who was over Palestine, asking for help, for they were all in obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Nuᶜmān sent him Shuraḥbīl b. Dhī al-Kalāᶜ[271] to help him, Zufar sent the men of Qinnasrīn, and Nātil sent the men of Palestine. The forces joined al-Ḍaḥḥāk at the "meadow."[272]

At al-Jābiyah, the people had various wishes. Mālik b. Hubayrah al-Sakūnī[273] was a fervent supporter of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah's sons and wanted the caliphate to be among them; al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī eagerly desired the caliphate [475] for Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. Mālik b. Hubayrah said to al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr, "Come on, let us give the oath of allegiance to this lad whose father we begat. He is descended from one

270. This is the continuation of ᶜAwānah's account which broke off at p. 54 above.

271. Member of one of the two chief Ḥimyarī families of Ḥimṣ; one is to understand he was sent as leader of a force of men from Ḥimṣ (see Crone, Slaves, 94–5; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 131, 151, 187, 191).

272. Ar. al-marj, i.e., presumably Marj Rāhiṭ, although Lammens postulated an earlier engagement at Marj al-Ṣuffar.

273. Like his fellow Sakūnī, al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr, he was a leader of Kindah in Syria (Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 131 and index).

of our women[274] and you know that our present status derives from his father, and he will shortly place our yoke on the necks of the Arabs" (he meant Khālid b. Yazīd). But al-Ḥuṣayn said, "No, by God Eternal, the Arabs will not come to us with a shaykh while we go to them with a youth!" Mālik said, "You say this even though you (my female riding camel) have not reached Tihāmah and the girth has not yet reached the two teats!"[275] Those present said, "Gently, Oh Abū Sulaymān!" but Mālik said to al-Ḥuṣayn, "By God, if you give the caliphate to Marwān and his family, they will be jealous even of your whip, the lace of your sandal, and the shade of a tree where you seek shelter from the sun. Marwān is the father of a clan, the brother of a clan and the uncle of a clan, and if you give him the oath of allegiance you will be their slaves. Rather, accept the authority of Khālid, the descendant of a woman of your own blood." But al-Ḥuṣayn replied, "In a dream I saw a candlestick suspended from the heavens. Those who are now eager for the caliphate reached out for it but did not obtain it, but Marwān reached out for it and got it. By God, we will indeed appoint him as caliph." Mālik said to him, "Woe to you, Ḥuṣayn. Will you give the oath of allegiance to Marwān and the family of Marwān when you know they are a leading family of Qays?"

When they had made up their minds to give the oath of allegiance to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, Rawḥ b. Zinbāʿ al-Judhāmī arose, praised God and extolled Him, and then said, "Oh people, you talk about ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb,[276] his companionship with the Prophet and his precedence in Islam. He is just as you say, but Ibn ʿUmar is a weak man and no weak man can be master of the community of Muḥammad.

---

274. Khālid b. Yazīd's mother seems to have been a Qurashī, and Mālik's reference is to Khālid's grandmother, wife of Muʿāwiyah, who was a woman of Kalb (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 129).

275. See Freytag, Proverbia, II, 873, and I, 293 (Maydānī, Amthāl, under hā' and jīm). Two proverbs which seem together to mean "come on faintheart, things have not yet become impossible." Cf. p. 69 below, where they are attributed to Mālik as a response to Marwān.

276. Son of the second caliph, sometimes mentioned as a possible candidate for the caliphate although he seems to have been unwilling to accept nomination (see *EI*², s.v.).

As for what is said about ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and what is [476] claimed for him, by God it is just as they say as to his being the son of al-Zubayr, who was the disciple of the Messenger of God,[277] and of Asmā', who was the daughter of Abū Bakr the Righteous One, and 'mistress of the two girdles.'[278] Furthermore, he is just as you say regarding his precedence in Islam and his merit. But Ibn al-Zubayr is a hypocrite [munāfiq] who has rejected two caliphs, Yazīd and his son Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd, shed blood, and broken the staff of the Muslims.[279] A hypocrite cannot be the master of the affairs of Muḥammad's community. As for Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, by God, there has never been a split in Islam but that Marwān was one of those who repaired it. He fought for the Commander of the Faithful ᶜUthmān b. al-ᶜAffān on the 'Day of the House,'[280] and he fought against ᶜAlī b. Abī Ṭālib at the 'Day of the Camel.'[281] We think the people should give the oath of allegiance to the elder and consider the junior too immature." (By the "elder" he meant Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, and by the "junior" Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah.)

Agreement was reached on allegiance to Marwān, then to Khālid b. Yazīd as his successor, and then to ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd b. al-ᶜĀṣ as successor to Khālid, on condition that the governorate of Damascus should be for ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd b. al-ᶜĀṣ and that of Ḥimṣ for Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah. Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal, therefore, summoned Khālid b. Yazīd and said, "Oh my nephew, the people have rejected you on account of your

277. Ar. ḥawārī, a word which is used in the Qur'ān in its plural form to refer to the followers of Jesus and seems to be related to the Ethiopic word for "apostle" (Jeffery, Foreign Vocabulary, s.v.). It is not clear why al-Zubayr, among all the Companions of Muḥammad, should be designated as his ḥawārī.

278. Daughter of the first caliph Abū Bakr, Asmā' was married to al-Zubayr; her sobriquet is attributed to her having torn her girdle or waistband (niṭāq) in two at the time of the hijrah in order to provide the Prophet with a provision bag and a strap for his waterskin (see EI², s.v.).

279. A common expression indicating disruption of the community.

280. The traditional name for the attack against the third caliph ᶜUthmān in 656; he was killed in his "house" (dār) in Medina; Marwān is said to have been ᶜUthmān's secretary.

281. Traditional name for the battle near al-Baṣrah between the fourth caliph ᶜAlī and his opponents, among whom was Ibn al-Zubayr's father, at the end of 656 (see EI², s.v. Djamal).

lack of years. I myself do not want this matter to be entrusted to anybody but you and your family, and I will only give Marwān the oath of allegiance out of regard for you." Khālid b. Yazīd said to him, "No, rather, you were not strong enough for us." Ḥassān answered, "No by God, it was not that I was not strong enough for you but what I think is considered best for you." Then Ḥassān summoned Marwān and said, "Oh Marwān, by God not everyone is satisfied with you." Marwān [477] replied, "If God wishes to give it to me, none of His creatures can stop me getting it, but if He wishes to keep it away from me, none of His creatures can give it to me." Ḥassān said to him, "You have spoken the truth."

On the Monday, Ḥassān went up on the minbar and said, "Oh people, we shall, God willing, appoint a caliph on Thursday." On the Thursday, he gave the oath of allegiance to Marwān and so did the people. Marwān then journeyed with the people toward al-Jābiyah and pitched camp at Marj Rāhiṭ among the men of Jordan of the Banū Kalb[282] over against al-Ḍaḥḥāk. The Sakāsik, the Sakūn,[283] and the Ghassān joined him while Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal rode off to the Jordan district.

In command of the forces of his right wing (I mean of Marwān) was ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd b. al-ᶜĀṣ,[284] and of his left wing ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. Ziyād b. ᶜAmr b. Muᶜāwiyah al-ᶜUqaylī[285] led the right wing of al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and somebody else whose name I do not remember was over his left. Yazīd b. Abī al-Nims al-Ghassānī was not present at al-Jābiyah, for he was concealed in Damascus. When Marwān camped at Marj Rāhiṭ, Yazīd b. Abī al-Nims led a rising of the people of Damascus with its slaves,[286] got control there, and drove al-

282. I.e., the Kalb from the military district of Urdunn.

283. The Sakāsik (pl. of Saksak) and Sakūn were two tribes of Kindah (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 233, II, 503).

284. A leading Umayyad of the family of al-ᶜĀṣ (see EI², s.v. ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd al-Ashdaḳ).

285. Of the Banū Qays.

286. Ar. bi-ahli Dimashq fī ᶜabīdihā; the sense of this is unclear to me; the parallel passage, Ansāb, V, 136, merely says that Yazīd "got control over Damascus," Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 149, n. 254, interprets Ṭabarī's text to mean that Yazīd received help from the slaves living in Damascus; cf. Crone, Slaves, 264, n. 647, "with the help of the slaves of the Damascenes."

Ḍaḥḥāk's official out. He obtained possession of the storehouses and the treasury, proclaimed the oath of allegiance to Marwān and sent him help in the form of wealth, men and arms. That was the first success won for the Banū Umayyah.

Marwān fought al-Ḍaḥḥāk for twenty days and then the people of the "meadow" were defeated and slain. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk was killed and with him on that day were killed eighty of the most notable of the Syrians who supported him, all of whom "took the rug"[287] (those who "took the rug" drew two [478] thousand dirhams in pay). And there was a slaughter of the Syrians on that day such as had never occurred before, from all of the tribes. On that day there were killed with al-Ḍaḥḥāk a Kalbī of the Banū ᶜUlaym called Mālik b. Yazīd b. Mālik b. Kaᶜb[288] and also the standard bearer of Quḍāᶜah at the time when they had first entered Syria, the grandfather of Muddalij b. al-Miqdam b. Zaml b. ᶜAmr b. Rabīᶜa b. ᶜAmr al-Jurashī.[289] Killed, too, was Thawr b. Maᶜn b. Yazīd al-Sulamī, who had caused al-Ḍaḥḥāk to change his mind. A man of Kalb brought the head of al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and it is reported that when the head was brought to Marwān it troubled him and he said, "Now, when I am old and my bones are brittle and I have become thirsty like an ass,[290] I have started striking the detachments one with another."

It is reported that on that day, Marwān passed by one of the slain and said:

---

287. Ar. akhadha 'l-qaṭīfah, evidently an indication of status; the qaṭīfah here seems to be a riding rug; cf. p. 35 above, where it is reported that Ibn Ziyād had a qaṭīfah thrown over his mount while fleeing from Iraq.

288. For the Banū ᶜUlaym (of Kinānah/Kalb), see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 280, 283; ibid., II, 396, says that Mālik b. Yazīd fell at Ṣiffīn fighting for Muᶜāwiyah.

289. This name seems to be corrupt: I suspect it refers to Mudlij b. al-Miqdād b. Ziml al-ᶜUdhrī (of Quḍāᶜah; see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 331); according to Ibn Saᶜd, I/2, 67, the grandfather of Mudlij, Zamil (sic) b. ᶜAmr al-ᶜUdhrī, was given a banner for his people by the Prophet, subsequently was at Ṣiffīn with Muᶜāwiyah and then fought at al-Marj where he was killed.

290. Proverbial for "only a short life remaining"; the ass is reputedly the thirstiest of animals, and Marwān is saying that he only has left a time comparable to that between the two drinkings of an ass (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ẓama').

It was only their mutual hatred which led them to harm, whichever of the two Qurashī commanders triumphed.[291]

And when he was given the oath of allegiance and called upon the people to support him, he said:

When I saw that the affair would be one of plunder,
I made ready Ghassān and Kalb against them,
And the Saksakīs, men who would triumph, and Ṭayyi', who would insist on the striking of blows,
And the Qayn[292] who would come weighed down with arms,[293] and of Tanūkh a difficult lofty peak.[294]
(The enemy) will not seize the kingship unless by force, and if Qays approach, say, "Keep away!"[295]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā—one of the Banū ᶜAbd Wadd[296] of the people of Syria—someone who witnessed the killing of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays: There passed by us a man of Kalb called Zuḥnah b. ᶜAbdallāh. It was as if he were simply bombarding the earth with men. He never hit anybody without felling him and never struck anybody without killing him. I was looking at him, astonished at what he did and at his killing of men, when someone attacked him. Zuḥnah, however, felled him and left him. I [479]

291. See Ansāb, V, 137, n. i, for other citations.
292. Qayn are part of Quḍāᶜah (see EI², s.v. Ḳayn); all the tribal groups named as opponents of Qays are "southerners."
293. Ar. nukb (see Add. et emend.); i.e., like camels walking unevenly because weighed down on one side (see Gloss., s.v.).
294. Ar. mushmakhirr (see LA, IV, 429; TA, III, 316).
295. Ansāb, V, 138, n. m, for other citations.
296. The Banū ᶜAbd Wadd of Kināna/Kalb (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 280, 294).

went up and examined the slain man and was surprised to find that it was al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays. I took his head and brought it to Marwān who said, "Did you kill him?" "No," I said, "It was Zuḥnah b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Kalbī." It amazed him that I told the truth about it and did not claim it for myself, and he ordered that I be treated graciously and he rewarded Zuḥnah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Masāḥiq—Ḥabīb b. Qurrah: By God, on that day Marwān's banner was with me. Pushing the "shoe" of the scabbard[297] of his sword into my back, he said, "Move forward with your banner, you bastard! If they do not feel the edge of the swords, these men will be separated like the head is separated (from the body) or like the sheep are separated from their shepherd." Marwān had a force of 6,000. ᶜUbaydallah b. Ziyād was in charge of his cavalry and Mālik b. Hubayrah of the foot soldiers.

ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Nawfal said: They reported that Bishr b. Marwān[298] had a banner with him on that day. He was fighting with it and saying:

On the leader there is indeed a duty, that his spear is dyed in blood or is broken to pieces.[299]

On that day also ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz b. Marwān was thrown to the ground. And on that day Marwān passed by a man of [480] Muḥārib[300] who was fighting for Marwān in a small group beneath a banner. Marwān said to him, "May God have mercy on you! If you and your companions drew tight together, then I would see how few in number you are." The man replied, "Oh Commander of the Faithful, there is a reinforcement of angels with us, many times the number of those with whom you tell us to draw together." Marwān was delighted at that

297. Ar. naᶜl, i.e., "the iron or silver thing (or shoe) at the lower end of the scabbard" (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

298. Marwān's son, future governor of al-Kūfah.

299. See Ansāb, V, 139, n. r; cf. Sīrah (Cairo), II, 74 = tr. Guillaume, 377.

300. The Banū Muḥārib b. Khaṣafah of Qays (?) (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 92, II, 425).

and laughed and he reinforced the man with some of those who were around himself.

The men fled defeated from the "meadow" to their military districts. Those of Ḥimṣ came to Ḥimṣ, where al-Nuᶜmān b. Bashīr was in charge. When al-Nuᶜmān heard the news, he fled at night with his wife Nā'ilah bint ᶜUmārah al-Kalbiyyah together with his baggage and his children. All that night there was confusion, and next morning the people of Ḥimṣ looked for him. A man of the Banū al-Kalāᶜ[301] called ᶜAmr b. al-Khalī led the search for him. He killed al-Nuᶜmān and brought his head, together with Nā'ilah his wife and her children, and threw the head into the lap of Umm Abān, al-Nuᶜmān's daughter who was subsequently married to al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. But Nā'ilah said, "Throw the head to me for I have more right to it than she," and the head was thrown into her lap. Then they brought them along, together with the head, and reached Ḥimṣ with them, and the Kalbīs among the men of Ḥimṣ took charge of Nā'ilah and her children.

Zufar b. al-Ḥārith fled from Qinnasrīn and reached Qarqīsiyā. When he came there, ᶜIyāḍ al-Jurashī[302] was in charge and he prevented Zufar from entering. (ᶜIyāḍ was Ibn Aslam b. Kaᶜb b. Mālik b. Laghaz b. Aswad b. Kaᶜb b. Ḥadas b. Aslam, and Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah had appointed him prefect of Qarqīsiyā.) Zufar said to him, "I promise you on pain of having to divorce my wives and set free my slaves that once I have entered its bath I will leave the town." Once he had reached [481] the town and entered it, however, he never went into its bath but set himself up there and expelled ᶜIyāḍ. Zufar fortified the place and Qays gave him support.

Nātil b. Qays al-Judhāmī, the commander of Palestine, fled and joined Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca.

The Syrians agreed on Marwān's ruling them and gave him their support, and he appointed his officials.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—one of the Banū ᶜAbd Wadd of the people of Syria (i.e., the eastern ᶜAbd Wadd): After 301. One of the two leading Ḥimyarī families of Ḥimṣ; on Shuraḥbīl b. Dhī al-Kalāᶜ, see n. 268 above.

302. According to Ansāb, V, 301[5-6], he is ᶜIyāḍ b. ᶜAmr al-Ḥimyarī. Jurash was a tribe of Ḥimyar (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 278).

authority over Syria had been vested in him, Marwān left and went to Egypt. When he reached it, ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jaḥdam al-Qurashī was in authority, summoning the people to obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr. He went out to meet Marwān with those of the Banū Fihr who were with him, but Marwān sent ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd al-Ashdaq around behind. ᶜAmr entered Egypt[303] and stood on its minbar, where he delivered an official address to the people. Ibn Jaḥdam's supporters were told that ᶜAmr had entered Egypt and they turned back. The people recognized Marwān as amīr and gave him the oath of allegiance. Then he set out returning toward Damascus, but as he drew close to it he heard that Ibn al-Zubayr had sent his brother Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr toward Palestine.

Marwān despatched ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd b. al-ᶜĀṣ with a force against him, and he confronted Muṣᶜab before he could enter Syria. ᶜAmr fought against him and Muṣᶜab's men were routed. With Muṣᶜab there was a man of the Banū ᶜUdhrah[304] called Muḥammad b. Ḥurayth b. Sulaym, one of whose female relatives had married into the family of al-Ashdaq.[305] This man said, "By God, I never saw anyone like Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr for the fierceness of his fighting on horseback or on foot. I saw him on the road going on foot and urging on his men, and he punished his own feet so much that I saw that both of them bled." Marwān went on and established his residence in Damascus, where ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd returned to join him.

It is said that when ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād came from Iraq [482] to Syria, he found the Banū Umayyah at Palmyra. Ibn al-Zubayr had driven them out of Medina and Mecca and the Ḥijāz as a whole and they had settled in Palmyra, finding al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays governing Syria for Ibn al-Zubayr. When Ibn Ziyād came, Marwān wanted to ride to Ibn al-Zubayr, give him the oath of allegiance as caliph, and obtain a pledge of security for the Banū Umayyah from him. But Ibn Ziyād said to him, "I implore you by God not to do so! It is not a good idea that you, the shaykh of Quraysh, should rush to Abū

303. Text has Miṣr; presumably Fusṭāṭ is meant, as indicated by the subsequent reference to "its minbar."

304. Of Quḍāᶜah (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 565–6, EI[1], s.v.).

305. The family of the Umayyad ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd al-Ashdaq (see n. 284, above).

Khubayb[306] to give him the caliphate. Rather, summon the people of Palmyra, take the oath of allegiance from them, and then go against al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays with them and those of the Banū Umayyah who are with you and drive him out of Syria." ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ then said, "By God, ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād has spoken right! I say again that you are the sayyid of Quraysh and its branch, and of all the people you have the most right to stand in this matter. Only the claims of this lad (he meant Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah) are under consideration, but you marry his mother and then you will be his guardian."

Marwān, therefore, did that and married the mother of Khālid b. Yazīd, Fākhitah,[307] the daughter of Abū Hāshim b. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd Shams. Afterward, he gathered together the Banū Umayyah and they gave him the oath of allegiance as the one with authority over them, and the people of Palmyra also gave him the oath of allegiance. Then he set out with a great host against al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays, who at that time was in Damascus. When al-Ḍaḥḥāk heard what the Banū Umayyah had done and of their coming against him, he set off with those of the people of Damascus and others who followed him, including Zufar b. al-Ḥārith. The forces met at Marj Rāhiṭ, where they fought a great battle. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī and most of his men were killed, while the survivors fled and scattered.

Zufar b. al-Ḥārith and two youths of the Banū Sulaym took part in this and Marwān's mounted soldiers came seeking them. When the two Sulamīs were afraid that Marwān's horsemen would catch up with them, they said to Zufar, "Save yourself, for we are slain!" So Zufar left them and carried on [483] until he reached Qarqīsiyā, where Qays rallied to him and made him their chief. That was when Zufar b. al-Ḥārith said:[308]

306. The kunyah of Ibn al-Zubayr (who also had the kunyah Abū Bakr); Khubayb was his eldest son; he died after a flogging he received in Medina during the governorate of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz there.

307. Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 152, calls her Ḥayyah.

308. Ansāb, V, 141, note x, for other citations.

Show me my weapon you bastard[309] for I think the war will only increase in duration.
Secretly I heard that Marwān is seeking retaliation against my blood or cutting out my tongue.
But in the yellowy-white camels[310] there is salvation and in the land a refuge, when we have put upon them the reins.
Do not think me heedless if I am absent, and do not rejoice at meeting me if I come to you.
The pasture land might spring up on the ruins of the earth, but the souls' hatreds remain just as before.
Do Kalb depart and our spears not reach them, and are the slain ones of Rāhiṭ abandoned as they were?
By my life, the battle of Rāhiṭ has left for Ḥassān[311] a clear fissure ever-widening.
[484] After Ibn ʿAmr and Ibn Maʿn,[312] one after the other, and the killing of Hammām,[313] do I still hope for anything?
Never was anything hateful seen of me before this flight of mine and my leaving my two companions behind me,
On the evening when I was running in al-Qirān[314] and only saw people who were against me and not for me.
Does one single day, if I have spoiled it, dispel the goodness of my days and the merit of my deeds?
There will be no peace until the horsemen come with spears, and my wives take vengeance from the women of Kalb.

309. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. abū, for the statement that the exclamation is to be understood "may you have no father, for then you will need to exert yourself, relying on your own power!"

310. ʿIṣ is the pl. of aʿyāṣ, according to Lane meaning a dingy or yellowy-white camel said to be of a good breed.

311. I.e., Ibn Baḥdal.

312. Ziyād b. ʿAmr al-ʿUqaylī and Thawr b. Maʿn (see pp. 59–60 above).

313. Hammām b. Qabīṣah al-Numayrī, a leader of the Qays in Damascus (see Crone, Slaves, 98; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 44).

314. The context seems to indicate that al-Qirān is a place name. Lammens, Marwānides, [71] 111, has: Le soir, où, dans la plaine, je courais. . .

I wish I knew, will my raiding
Tanūkh and the tribe of Ṭayyi' achieve my cure?

Jawwās b. Qa'ṭal[315] answered him:

By my life, the battle of Rāhiṭ has left [485]
for Zufar a malady which lingers
And persists. Its seat remains between the ribs and in the gut. It defies the doctor attempting a cure.
It (the battle) causes weeping for the slain of Sulaym, 'Āmir and Dhubyān[316] with reason and it makes the mourners weep and wail.
He calls for arms but then recoils when he sees the swords of Janāb[317] and the sleek and powerful horses.
On them are the young men of courage[318] like lions of the forest,
when they advance toward the lofty spears.

'Amr b. al-Mikhlāt al-Kalbī, of Taym Allāt b. Rufaydah, also answered Zufar, saying:

Zufar the Qaysī wept for the destruction of his people with tearful eyes which will not cease to flow.
He orders mourning for those slain who were struck down at Rāhiṭ, and there answer him the small bird and the owl of the desert.
At Rāhiṭ we despoiled a protected area of the tribe of Qays which turned in fragments, and its women were made violable.
Hotly he mourns them while his tears flow, making Nizār wish that their nobility of spirit would [486] return.
Die with grief or live humbled and oppressed with the sadness of a soul whose grief never sleeps.

---

315. Of the Banū Ḥiṣn b. Ḍamḍam b. Janāb al-Kalbī (see Ansāb, V, 142, note y, for further citations).
316. All three Qaysī tribes.
317. I.e., the poet's clan.
318. Ar. fityān najdah, probably involving a play on the idea of "lion" (najīd).

When Quḍāᶜah brandish the spears around me, its noble steeds trample on the deeds of the unbroken mares.[319]
I have trampled with them on any tribe which has attacked me.
Who, then, when misfortunes arise, desires to accept them?

Zufar b. al-Ḥārith also said:

Is it God's decree that, as for Baḥdal and Ibn Baḥdal, he should live, while, as for Ibn al-Zubayr, he should be killed?
No, by the House of God, you will not kill him!
There was not yet a day glorious and triumphant
And not yet for the mashrafiyyah[320] sword above you rays like those of the rim of the sun when it begins to set.

ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥakam, the brother of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, answered him and said:

Will Kalb vanish when their spears have protected them and will they leave unavenged the slain of Rāhiṭ which are unburied?
May God revile Qays, Qays ᶜAylān, who neglected the borders of the Muslims and fled.
Be rivals of Qays in times of ease, but do not be their brother when the mashrafiyyah sword is drawn.

[487] Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr having given the oath of allegiance to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, and Mālik b. Hubayrah having gone back on what he had made out he was going to do as regards giving the oath of allegiance to Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, the rule had become firmly established with Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr had imposed

319. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. muṣᶜab.
320. A famous type of sword; the name is variously explained.

a condition on Marwān that he would settle those Kindīs who were in Syria in the Balqā' and make it a source of sustenance for them, and Marwān had agreed to that,[321] and the family of al-Ḥakam, when it became possible that the matter would be settled in Marwān's favor, had agreed to certain stipulations in favor of Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah. Then one day as Marwān was in session with his council and Mālik b. Hubayrah was sitting with them, he said, "Among those who allege that conditions have been agreed to is one who is a bekohled and perfumed woman" (he meant Mālik b. Hubayrah, for he was a man who perfumed and bekohled himself). Mālik b. Hubayrah said, "You say this while you (my female riding camel) have not yet reached the Tihāmah and the girth has not yet reached the two teats!"[322] Marwān said, "Gently, Oh Abū Sulaymān! We are only joking with you." Mālik said, "So that is it!"

ᶜUwayj al-Ṭā'ī said, praising Kalb and Ḥumayd b. Baḥdal:

The peoples have learned of the descent of Ibn Baḥdal and others upon them. If he lives he will do it again.
And they will lead the sons of the prominent man and those who join them from the fertile land for a month, he who leads them not flagging.
This because of this, and then I will scatter upon the people utterances many-edged.
If it were not for the Commander of the Faithful (restraining us),
Quḍāᶜah would be lords and Qays their slaves.

In this year also, the army of Khurāsān gave the oath of [488] allegiance to Salm b. Ziyād[323] following Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah's death, on the understanding that he would remain in charge of their affairs until a caliph was agreed upon.

---

321. Cf. Ansāb, V, 149, where it is Mālik b. Hubayrah who imposes the condition on Marwān; the Balqā' is the region west of the Jordan south of Jerash, see EI², s.v.

322. Cf. p. 57 above; here the proverb has a slightly different significance.

323. Brother of ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād.

And in it there occurred the troubles [fitnah] associated with ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim[324] in Khurāsān.

The Disturbances in Khurāsān Associated with ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim

According to ᶜUmar b. Shabbah—ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad—Maslamah b. Muḥārib:[325] Salm b. Ziyād sent ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim with the tribute he had received from Samarqand and Khwārazm to Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah. Salm remained as governor over Khurāsān until the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah and Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd, whose death he heard about. News came to him too of the killing of Yazīd b. Ziyād in Sijistān and the capture of Abū ᶜUbaydah b. Ziyād,[326] but he kept the news secret.

Ibn ᶜArādah[327] said:

Oh you king who causes his door to be barred, matters have occurred recently of great importance!
Those slain at Junzah and those at Kabul,[328] and Yazīd whose hushed-up affair has been made known.
Oh Banū Umayyah, the end of your rule is a corpse at Huwwārīn,[329] there remaining.
His fate came upon him while by his pillow

---

324. Of the Banū Sulaym/Qays (see *EI*², s.v.). For parallels and variants for the following section, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 413–4; Yaᶜqūbī, Taᶜrīkh, II, 301; Ibn Aᶜtham, V, 309–11; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 128–31; A.A. Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 105–9 (citing the ms. of Ansāb); C. E. Bosworth, Sistan, 48–9; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 88–93.

325. For the work of al-Madāᶜinī, which is Ṭabarī's source for events in Khurāsān, see Rotter, "Madāᶜinī," 122–8; for Maslamah b. Muḥārib, see n. 98 above.

326. For the events involving these two brothers of Salm in Sijistān and Afghanistan, see Bosworth, Sistan, 44; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 87–8.

327. Al-Saᶜdī (Ansab, IVb, 76); see Ibn Aᶜtham, V, 310, Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 128, for parallels.

328. A reference to the events in Sijistān and Afghanistan.

329. The place where the caliph Yazīd died, between Damascus and Palmyra, two stages from the latter (see Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 355; cf. Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 1).

was a cup and a wineskin filled to the brim and overflowing.
Many a plaintive singing girl weeps by his drunken companions, with a cymbal, now sitting and now standing.

Maslamah said: When the poem of Ibn ᶜArādah became known, Salm made the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah and Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd public and called on the men to give him the oath of allegiance, with general consent, until the affairs [489] of the people should be put in order with the choice of a caliph. They gave him the oath, remained two months in that situation, and then broke their agreement with him.

According to ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad—a shaykh of the people of Khurāsān: The people of Khurāsān never loved a governor as they loved Salm b. Ziyād. In those two years when Salm was there, more than 20,000 children were named Salm because of their love for Salm.

According to ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī—his paternal uncle: When the people of Khurāsān fell into disagreement and broke their oath of allegiance to Salm, he departed, leaving al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah[330] in his place. When Salm reached Sarakhs,[331] Sulaymān b. Marthad, one of the Banū Qays b. Thaᶜlabah,[332] met him. He asked him, "Who have you left behind over Khurāsān?" and Salm answered, "Al-Muhallab." Sulaymān said to him, "Was Nizār[333] so straitened that you made one of the Yemen prefect!" Consequently, Salm made Sulaymān prefect over Marw al-Rūdh, al-Fāryāb, al-Ṭāliqān and al-Jūzjān,[334] and Aws b. Thaᶜlabah b. Zufar,[335] the master of Qaṣr Aws in al-Baṣrah, prefect over Herat.[336]

330. Of Azd ᶜUman (Mazūn), founder of the fortunes of the Muhallabid family and of the Azd in Khurāsān (see *EI*², s.v.).

331. Between Tūs and Marw on the Tajand river (see G. Le Strange, Eastern caliphate, 395–6).

332. I.e., of Bakr b. Wā'il/Rabīᶜah (see n. 111 above).

333. I.e., the "northern" Arabs (Muḍar and Rabīᶜah).

334. Jūzjān is the district east of Marw al-Rūdh, and Fāryāb and ṬTāliqān were important towns in it (Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 423–5).

335. Another Bakrī (see *EI*¹ s.v. Taimallāh b. Thaᶜlabah; Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 215).

336. At that time counted as part of Khurāsān (see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 407 ff.).

Then he continued on his way. When he reached Nīsābūr[337] ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim met him. He asked Salm, "Who have you put in charge of Khurāsān?" When Salm told him, Ibn Khāzim said, "Could you not find a man among Muḍar[338] to appoint to office that you had to divide Khurāsān between Bakr b. Wā'il and Mazūn of ᶜUmān?"[339] And he said to Salm, "Write me a commission over Khurāsān." Salm answered, "Am I the prefect of Khurāsān?" but Ibn Khāzim persisted, "Write a commission for me and you will be free of blame." So he wrote a commission over Khurāsān for him. Ibn Khāzim then said, "Now help me with 100,000 dirhams," and Salm ordered that it be given him. Ibn Khāzim came toward Marw, and when al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah heard the news he went off, leaving behind a man of the Banū Jusham b. Saᶜd b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm.[340]

[490] (According to ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad)—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī—his father: When ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim went to Marw with Salm b. Ziyād's commission, the Jushamī opposed him and there was skirmishing between them. A shot hit the Jushamī with a stone on his forehead and they broke off the engagement. The Jushamī opened the way to Marw al-Rūdh for Ibn Khāzim, who entered it. Two days later the Jushamī died.

According to ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī—al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd al-Jūzajānī—his father: When Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah and Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd died, the people of Khurāsān rose against their officials and drove them out. Each tribal group seized control over a district and civil commotion broke out. Ibn Khāzim seized control of Khurāsān and war broke out.

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said:[341] According to Abū al-Dhayyāl Zuhayr b. Hunayd—Abū Naᶜāmah: ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim came and seized control over Marw. Then he went against Sulaymān 337. The garrison town of western Khurāsān (see Le Strange, Eastern caliphate, 383 ff.).

338. The division of Nizār (n. 329 above) with which Ibn Khāzim's own tribe, Qays, aligned itself, Bakr b. Wā'il belonging to Rabīᶜah.

339. I.e., Sulaymān b. Marthad, Aws b. Thaᶜlabah, and al-Muhallab.

340. Of Muḍar (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 59, 75).

341. Still citing al-Madā'inī.

b. Marthad and met him at Marw al-Rūdh, where he fought him for some days and Sulaymān b. Marthad was killed. Then ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim went against ᶜAmr b. Marthad[342] who was at al-Ṭāliqān with 700 men. News of ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim's coming against him and of his killing his brother Sulaymān reached ᶜAmr, who headed out to face him. They met at a river before Ibn Khāzim's men had all arrived, so ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim gave the order to those who were with him and they pitched camp. He too encamped and asked about Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb al-ᶜAdawī.[343] He was told that he had not come. But then, while he was in the same state, Zuhayr came. When he did, Ibn Khāzim was told, "Here, Zuhayr has come," and ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim gave the command, "Advance!" The forces met and fought together for a long time. ᶜAmr b. Marthad was killed and his men routed. They fled and joined Aws b. Thaᶜlabah in Herat while ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim returned to Marw.

The one who was in command when ᶜAmr b. Marthad was killed, according to what is narrated, was Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān al-ᶜAdawī. The poet said:

Do the days of war pass and you have not killed [491]
Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān in retaliation for ᶜAmr b. Marthad?

(According to al-Madā'inī): Abū al-Sarī al-Khurāsānī, one of the people of Herat, reported to us: ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim killed Sulaymān and ᶜAmr, the two sons of Marthad, the two Marthadīs of the Banū Qays b. Thaᶜlabah, and then returned to Marw. Those of Bakr b. Wā'il who were at Marw al-Rūdh fled to Herat. Those of Bakr b. Wā'il in the districts of Khurāsān crowded there, too, so that there was a large body of them there. Aws b. Thaᶜlabah was over them. They said to him, "Let us give you the oath of allegiance on the condition that you go against Ibn Khāzim and drive Muḍar out of Khurāsān completely." But he said to them, "That would be unjust, and those who participate in injustice are lost. Hold fast in this place of yours. If Ibn Khāzim leaves you alone, which I do not think he will do, then be satisfied with this district and let him and his business be." The Banū Ṣuhayb, mawlās of the Banū Jaḥdar,[344] however, said, "No, by God, we will not accept that we and Muḍar should be in the same land while they have killed the two sons of Marthad. If you respond to our offer, it still stands; otherwise, we will make somebody else our commander." He replied, "I am only one of you, so do what seems good to you," and they gave him the oath of allegiance.

342. Sulaymān's brother.
343. Of Tamīm.

Ibn Khāzim came toward them, having left his son Mūsā behind as his deputy. He continued his advance and pitched his camp on a dry river bed between his army and Herat. The Bakrīs said to Aws, "Go out and dig a trench outside the town and give battle to them in it so the town will be behind us." Aws replied, "Stick to the town, for it is well fortified and let Ibn Khāzim be in the place where he is. If he stays there much longer he will get worried and give you something to satisfy you. If you are forced to fight, then you will fight." But they refused, went out of the town and dug a trench outside it. And Ibn Khāzim fought them for about a year.

[492] Al-Aḥnaf b. al-Ashhab al-Ḍabbī claimed, and Abū al-Dhayyāl Zuhayr b. al-Hunayd told us: Ibn Khāzim went to Herat, where there was a large concentration of Bakr b. Wā'il who had fortified themselves with a trench and sworn together to drive out Muḍar if they won control of Khurāsān. He encamped facing them. Hilāl al-Ḍābbī,[345] one of the Banū Dhuhl of the Banū Aws, said to him, "You will only be fighting your brethren of your father's family.[346] By God, if you get what you want from them, then after them there will be no good left in life, you having killed at Marw al-Rūdh those of them whom you have killed. Why do you not give them something to satisfy them and settle this matter peacefully?" He replied, "By God, if I were to abandon Khurāsān to them, they would not be satisfied, and if they could drive you out of the world

344. See n. 111 above.

345. The Banū Ḍabbah b. Udd were allies of Tamīm (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 59, 89, II, 240; *EI*², s.v. Ḍabba).

346. Apparently a reference to the joint descent of Ibn Khāzim's tribe, Qays, and Bakr b. Wā'il from Nizār.

they would do so!" Hilāl said, "No, by God, I will not fire an arrow with you and nor will any man of Khindif[347] who obeys me until you send offering them conciliation."

Ibn Khāzim said, "Then you are my messenger to them. Give them satisfaction!" So Hilāl went to Aws b. Thaʿlabah and implored him by God and by ties of kinship, saying, "In God I ask you to remember Nizār,[348] that you avoid spilling its blood or setting it against itself." Aws replied, "You have encountered the Banū Ṣuhayb?" "No, by God," he said. "Well then, go and meet them." So Hilāl went out and met Arqam b. Muṭarrif al-Ḥanafī, Ḍamḍam b. Yazīd or ʿAbdallāh b. Ḍamḍam b. Yazīd and ʿĀṣim b. al-Ṣalt b. al-Ḥārith, both of them Ḥanafīs,[349] and a group of Bakr b. Wā'il. He addressed them in the same way as he had done Aws, and they said, "Have you encountered the Banū Ṣuhayb?" He answered, "God has made the matter of the Banū Ṣuhayb very important among you. No, I have never met them." They said, "Go and meet them." So Hilāl went to the Banū Ṣuhayb and spoke to them. They said, "If you were not a messenger, we would kill you." He said, "Is there nothing which will satisfy you?" "One of two things," they said. "Either you abandon Khurāsān and no [493] one calls for support for Muḍar in it, or else you remain but renounce all your livestock, weapons, gold and silver to us." Nothing but these two options?" he said. "No," they said. "God is our sufficiency and the best protector," Hilāl responded.

He went back to Ibn Khāzim who asked him, "Well?" "I have found our brethren actively rupturing the ties of kinship," he said. "I told you that Rabīʿah would never cease raging against its Lord since God sent the Prophet from among Muḍar,"[350] Ibn Khāzim said.

---

347. Khindif is shown as an ancestor of Tamīm and others including Ḍabbah (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 1, II, 347).

348. Rabīʿah (here Bakr) and Muḍar (here Qays and Khindif) are counted as descendants of Nizār.

349. The Banū Ḥanīfah were part of Bakr b. Wā'il; could this ʿĀṣim b. al-Ṣalt b. al-Ḥārith al-Ḥanafī be related to the al-Ṣalt b. Ḥurayth al-Ḥanafī named in connection with the document of alliance between Rabīʿah and Azd in al-Baṣrah (p. 27 above)?

350. Quraysh, the tribe of the Prophet, were counted as a part of Muḍar.

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī said: According to Sulaymān b. Mujālid al-Ḍabbī:[351] While Ibn Khāzim was at Herat, the Turks raided Qaṣr Asfād[352] and besieged its garrison. Some men of Azd were in it—the majority of its garrison—and the Turks defeated them. They sent to those of Azd in the surrounding area and they came to help, but the Turks defeated them. Then they sent to Ibn Khāzim and he dispatched Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān[353] to them with a contingent of the Banū Tamīm. Ibn Khāzim told him, "Watch out for the Turks' attacks when you see them, and bear down on them." Zuhayr advanced and came upon them on a cold day. His force pressed hard against them. The Turks could not withstand them and were defeated. They gave chase to the Turks until, when much of the night had passed, they reached a castle in the desert. The body of the force remained there while Zuhayr pursued the Turks with some horsemen, for he was knowledgeable about the roads. In the middle of the night, he returned because his hand had frozen to his spear from the cold. He summoned his slave lad Kaʿb, who went out to him and brought him in and began to warm up some fat for him which he put on his hand. They rubbed it in for him and lit him a fire, and eventually, his hand became soft and warm. Then he returned to Herat.

Concerning that, Kaʿb b. Maʿdān al-Ashqarī[354] said:

Help indeed came to you in a flash of lightning, armor and steel which Tamīm filled.
[494] They refused to add to their ranks the common folk which the villages gather, and the purity of their descent held them together on the day of the battle.

---

351. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 418, n. 1, argues that this report about the Turkish attack is out of place and refers to a later period; cf., however, Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 92; Sulaymān b. Mujālid was a contemporary of Abū Mikhnaf, often cited by him (Wellhausen, loc. cit.).

352. Evidently a fortified place, but to translate as "castle" might be misleading; possibly this place is to be associated with the district east of Nīshāpūr called variously Asfand, Ashbandh or Ashfand (Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 388); see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 92 for discussion.

353. See above, p. 73.

354. Poet of Azd (Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIII, 56–64; GAS, II, 377–8).

Their sustenance comes from the odors which female camels broad-girthed and high-humped give forth.

And Thābit Quṭnah[355] said:

May my soul be a ransom for horsemen of Tamīm for what there was of close confinement
At the Bāhilī's castle.[356] I saw myself defending when the defenders there were few,
With my sword, after my spear had been shattered upon them,
driving them back with a broad-bladed sword, Assaulting them in the thick black smoke with an assault
like that of those drinking from bowls of wine.
If it were not for God, who has no partner, and my striking the brow of the aspirant ruler, Then the women of the Banū Dithār[357] would have given up their souls before the Turks, displaying their anklets.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: According to Abū al-Ḥasan—al-Khurāsānī—Abū Ḥammād al-Sulamī:[358] Ibn Khāzim remained at Herat fighting Aws b. Thaʿlabah for more than a year. One day he said to his men, "Our position here confronting these opponents has dragged on for too long." They called out to them, therefore, "Oh band of Rabīʿah, you have sought protection behind this trench of yours. Out of all Khurāsān, are you satisfied with this ditch?" That caused them to remember their situation and the people called each other to fight. Aws b. Thaʿlabah said to them, "Stick to your trench and fight them as you have been doing. Do not go out to them in a body." But they disregarded him and went out against them, [495]

355. Poet of Azd (Aghānī, XIII, 49–56; GAS, II, 376–7).
356. I am unable to account for the designation al-qaṣr al-bāhilī.
357. I.e., the family of Shammās b. Dithār?
358. See Add. et emend. for the suggestion that there is a lacuna in this isnād; Abū al-Ḥasan must be al-Madāʾinī himself; for the identification of al-Khurāsānī as Abū Sarī al-Khurāsānī (above, p. 73), see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 91, n. 603.

and the forces met. Ibn Khāzim said to his men, "Make the day yours. The rule will belong to whoever triumphs. If I am killed your commander will be Shammās b. Dithār al-ᶜUṭāridī,[359] and if he is killed your commander will be Bukayr b. Wishāḥ al-Thaqafī."[360]

According to ᶜAlī—Abū al-Dhayyāl Zuhayr b. Hunayd—Abū Naᶜāmah al-ᶜAdawī—ᶜAbīd b. Naqīd—Iyās b. Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān:[361] On the day when Aws b. Thaᶜlabah fled and Ibn Khāzim defeated Bakr b. Wā'il, the latter said to his men when they met, "I am not steady in the saddle. Fasten me on to my saddle and know that I have upon me such weapons that I will not be killed even by that which would slaughter two camels. If you are told that I have been killed, do not believe it!"

The banner of the Banū ᶜAdī was with my father and I was on an incompletely broken-in horse.[362] Ibn Khāzim had said to us, "When you encounter the horses, stab them in their nostrils, for no horse will be stabbed in its nostril without either turning tail or throwing its rider." When my horse heard the clanging of the weapons it leaped with me over a river bed which lay between me and the enemy, and a man of Bakr b. Wā'il confronted me. I stabbed his horse in its nostril and it threw him. My father carried the banner with the Banū ᶜAdī, and the Banū Tamīm followed him from every direction. The two sides fought for an hour, and the Bakr b. Wā'il were defeated and eventually retreated to their ditch. They were assailed from both right and left and some men fell into the ditch and suffered a quick death. Aws b. Thaᶜlabah [496] fled with his wounds, while Ibn Khāzim swore that he would kill every captive brought to him before sunset. The last one to be brought to him was a man of the Banū Ḥanīfah called Maḥmiyah. Ibn Khāzim was told, "The sun has set!" but he replied, "Finish the execution!" and Maḥmiyah was killed.

---

359. ᶜUṭārid b. ᶜAwf was a subgroup of the Banū Saᶜd/Tamīm (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 77).

360. The nisbah al-Thaqafī seems to be a mistake; he was of Tamīm (Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 418, n. 2).

361. I.e., the son of the hero referred to above, nn. 353, 343.

362. See Add. et emend. and Gloss., s.v. ḥ-z-m.

A shaykh of the Banū Sa'd b. Zayd Manāt told me that Aws b. Tha'labah fled with his wounds to Sijistān, but when he got there or was near to it he died.

On the subject of the killing of Ibn Marthad and the affair of Aws b. Tha'labah, al-Mughīrah b. Ḥabnā',[363] one of the Banū Rabī'ah b. Ḥanẓalah, said:

In the war you were in the whole of Khurāsān killed, imprisoned and restrained.
And one day Ibn Khāzim confined you in the ditch and you found the trench no more than a tomb.
And one day you left Ibn Marthad in the dust, and you left Aws where he came and camped.

Abū al-Dhayyāl Zuhayr b. Hunayd told me on the authority of his maternal grandfather: Eight thousand of Bakr b. Wā'il were killed on that day.

Al-Tamīmī, one of the people of Khurāsān, told me on the authority of a mawlā of Ibn Khāzim: Ibn Khāzim fought Aws b. Tha'labah and Bakr b. Wā'il, and was victorious at Herat whence Aws fled. Ibn Khāzim seized Herat from him and appointed his son Muḥammad over it, attaching Shammās b. Dithār al-'Uṭāridī to him and placing Bukayr b. Wishāḥ over his police troop. He told them, "Show him the ropes, for he is the offspring of one of your women." (His mother was a woman of the Banū Sa'd[364] called Ṣafiyyah.) And he said to Muḥammad, "Do what they say." Then Ibn Khāzim returned to Marw.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year also, the Shī'ah[365] were stirred up in al-Kūfah and arranged to gather at al- [497]

363. Poet of Tamīm (Aghānī, XI, 162–71; GAS, II, 374–5).

364. The Banū Sa'd of Tamīm were the clan of Bukayr and of Shammās.

365. Literally, "party." In our sources for early Islam we read of several different "parties" (see, e.g., p. 50 above). The party of 'Alī eventually came to be called al-shī'ah without further specification and developed into the Shī'ite tradition of Islam, distinct from the Sunnī form of the religion. It is questionable whether in the time of the second civil war the word shī'ah was generally used with this distinct and specific meaning. In the following account I have sometimes kept the Arabic word with a capital S as is now customary, but sometimes it seems clear that the word has the general meaning "the Nukhaylah[366] in the year 65 (684-5) to set out against the Syrians and to seek vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn b. ᶜAlī.[367] They exchanged correspondence about that.

The Beginnings of the Movement of the Penitents [al-Tawwābūn] in al-Kūfah

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar al-Azdī: After al-Ḥusayn b. ᶜAlī had been killed and Ibn Ziyād had returned from his army camp at al-Nukhaylah and entered al-Kūfah, the Shīᶜah gathered, full of self-reproach and repentance. They thought they had committed a grave offense in inviting al-Ḥusayn to receive their support then failing to respond to him, and in letting him be killed so near to them while they never gave him any help. They thought their ignominy and sin which had resulted from his slaying would only be washed away by killing those who killed him or by dying in the attempt. Therefore, they had recourse to five leaders of the Shīᶜah in al-Kūfah: Sulaymān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzāᶜī,[368] who had been a Companion of the Prophet; al-Musayyab b. Najabah al-Fazārī,[369] one of the best of the supporters of ᶜAlī; ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl al-Azdī; ᶜAbdallah b. Wāl al-Taymī;[370] and Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād al-Bajalī.[371] Those five men then met at the abode of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, and they were among the party" or "our party," and it has been translated using such phrases.

---

For parallel and variant accounts of the following, see Ansāb, V, 203-13; Ibn Aᶜtham, VI, 47-53, 58-87; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 131-6, 144-56; Yaᶜqūbī, II, 306; Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 71-4 (Eng. tr. 121-4); S.H.M. Jafri, The Origins and Early Development of Shīᶜa Islam, 222-34; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 96-8.

366. Probably to the northwest of al-Kūfah on the Syrian road (see Ṭabarī, I, 3345).

367. See n. 43 above.

368. For him, see EI[1], s.v. Sulaimān b. Ṣurad, and Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 197, II, 518; for Khuzāᶜah, EI[2], s.v. Khuzāᶜa.

369. For him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 436; Fazārah b. Dhubyān are counted to Ghaṭafān/Qays (ibid., I, table 92).

370. Taym of Bakr b. Wā'il (see below, p. 84).

371. For him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 223, II, 487; for the Banū Bajīlah, ibid., table 221, II, 219, EI[2], s.v. Badjīla.

best of the supporters of ᶜAlī. With them were some of the members of the Shīᶜah, their pick and their leaders.

When they had gathered at Sulaymān b. Ṣurad's dwelling, al-Musayyab b. Najabah began to address those assembled. He [498] praised God, extolled Him and prayed for His Prophet, and then said:

> Now, we have been afflicted by the length of our lives and by exposure to all types of trials. We ask of our Lord that He does not make us one of those to whom He will one day say: "Did We not give you long life so that whoever would be admonished might be admonished therein? And the warner came to you."[372] Also, the Commander of the Faithful said, "The life in which God grants forgiveness to the son of Adam is sixty years,"[373] and there is not a man among us who has not reached that term. We were enamored of self-justification and praising our party until God put our best men to the test and found us sham on two of the battlefields[374] of the son of our Prophet's daughter. Before that, we had received his letters and his messengers had come to us offering forgiveness, asking us to help him again in public and in private. But we withheld ourselves from him until he was killed so near to us. We did not help him with our hands, argue on his behalf with our tongues, strengthen him with our wealth or seek help for him from our clans. What will be our excuse for our Lord and at the meeting with our Prophet[375] when his descendant, his loved one, his offspring and his issue has been slain among us? No, by God, there is no excuse unless you kill his murderer and those who assisted him or unless you are killed while seeking that. Perhaps our Lord will be

372. Qur'ān, 35:34.

373. "The Commander of the Faithful" here is ᶜAlī; for the ḥadīth in conjunction with the Quranic verse, see Bukhārī, Riqāq, bāb 5.

374. Apparently a reference to Karbalā' and the rising of Ḥujr b. ᶜAdī (see *EI*², s.v. Ḥudjr b. ᶜAdī).

375. At the Last Judgment, when the Prophet will intercede with God on behalf of the Muslims.

satisfied with us in that, for I have no security against His punishment after meeting Him. Oh people, appoint over you a man from among you, for you cannot do without a commander from whom you can seek help and a banner round which you can assemble. This is [499] what I have to say. I ask God's forgiveness for me and for you.

After al-Musayyab, Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād addressed the group. He praised God, extolled Him and prayed for His Prophet, and then he said:

God has led you to speak aright, and you have summoned us to matters in which we would be most rightly guided. You have praised God and extolled Him, you have offered prayers for His Prophet, and you have called us to fight against [jihād] the iniquitous ones [al-fāsiqīn] and to repent the great sin. We have listened to you, responded to you and accepted what you have said. You told us to appoint over us a man from among us from whom we could seek help and gather around his banner. That is a view in which we concur. If you are that man, you will be acceptable within our band. But if you and our companions are of the same opinion, we will appoint over this business the shaykh of the Shīᶜah and Companion of the Prophet who has precedence and seniority in Islam, Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, who is praised for his fortitude and his religion and trusted for his resoluteness. This is what I have to say and I ask God's forgiveness for me and for you.

Next, ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl and ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd spoke. They praised their Lord and extolled Him, and spoke in a similar fashion to Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād. They referred to al-Musayyab b. Najabah and his merits and to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad with his precedence in Islam, and they mentioned that they would be satisfied with his appointment. Al-Musayyab b. Najabah said, "Indeed you are right. My opinion is like yours: put Sulaymān b. Ṣurad in charge of your affairs."

Abū Mikhnaf said that he narrated this account to Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid, who said to him that Ḥumayd b. Muslim had told him: By God, I was there on this day—the day they put Sulaymān b. Ṣurad in charge—and at that time there were more than a hundred of us, warriors and prominent members of the Shīᶜah, in his dwelling place. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad spoke and made a forceful speech which he continued to repeat at every assembly until I learned it by heart. He began and said: [500]

> I extol God for His goodness and I praise Him for His blessings and His tribulations. I bear witness that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad was His messenger. Now, by God I fear that this time in which life has become so miserable and calamity so great and injustice so prevalent is assigned to be our last. What good is it for the most virtuous of this Party that we were yearning for the family of our Prophet to come,[376] offering them help and urging them to come, but when they came we were weak and feeble and spineless, we delayed and waited to see what would happen, until the descendant of our Prophet, his offspring and his progeny, flesh of his flesh and blood of his blood, was killed in our very midst? He called for help but received none, he asked for justice but was not given any. The impious ones made him a target for arrows and a butt for spears until they had broken him, assaulted him and stripped him. Rise up indeed, for your Lord has been angered. Do not go back to your wives and children until God has been satisfied! By God, I do not think He will be satisfied unless you fight against those who killed him or perish.[377] Do not fear death! By God, no man ever feared it without debasing himself. Be like those Israelites when their prophet said to them, "You have done evil to yourselves by your adoption of the Calf. Turn in repentence to your Creator and kill yourselves. That will be best for you with your 376. See Add. et emend. and cf. Ansāb, V, 205, bottom.

377. Text has tubīrū (?), "you destroy," the Ansāb reads tubīrūhu, "you destroy him" (i.e., he who killed al-Ḥusayn); the translation "or perish" is based on my suggested reading tabīdū.

Creator."[378] And do what that people did. They fell on their knees and stretched out their necks and accepted the judgment, until they understood that nothing would save them from the magnitude of their offense except patient acceptance of the slaughter. How [501] will it be with you, if you are summoned to something similar? Make sharp the swords, assemble the lances, and get ready against them what strength you can. Prepare for war [ribāṭ al-khayl] so you can be assembled when you are summoned to fight.[379]

Khālid b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl then stood and spoke, "As for me, by God, if I knew that my killing of myself would release me from my sin and my Lord would be pleased with me, I would kill myself! But that is something which was ordered to a people who were before us while we have been prohibited from it. I bear witness before God and those of the Muslims here present that, except for the weapon with which I shall fight against my enemy, everything I possess I make over as alms for the Muslims. With it I strengthen them in their fight against the unrighteous [al-qāṣiṭīn]."

Abū al-Muᶜtamir Ḥanash b. Rabīᶜah al-Kinānī[380] next stood and said, "And I bear witness similarly."

Sulaymān b. Ṣurad said, "It is enough that anyone who wishes to give something should bring his property to ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl al-Taymī (Taym of Bakr b. Wā'il), and when everything which you wish to donate of your property is assembled with him, we will equip the poor and needy of your followers with it."

---

378. Qur'ān, 2:51. This verse contains the word tawwāb, the self-designation of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and his followers. But in the Quranic verse it refers to God rather than human beings, hence it means something like "He who relents" rather than "the penitent." "Your selves" could equally be translated "your souls." According to traditional Muslim commentary on the verse, in response to the command of Moses, and in atonement for the sin of the Golden Calf, the Israelites began to kill one another until God allowed them to stop in response to Moses' intercession. A large number of the Israelites were killed.

379. See Add. et emend. for the dittography at p. 501, l. 3.

380. For Kinānah b. Khuzaymah (of Khindif), see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 371.

According to Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī: When Khālid b. Sa'd b. Nufayl said to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, "By God, if I knew that my killing of myself would release me from my sin and my Lord would be pleased with me, I would kill myself. But that is something which was ordered to another people who were before us while we have been prohibited from it," Sulaymān said to him, "This brother of yours tomorrow will be the prey of the first of the spear points." And when he donated his property as alms for the Muslims he said, "Rejoice at the great rewards of God for those who spread for themselves (a couch in Paradise)."[381]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Nufayl: I obtained a letter which Sulaymān b. Ṣurad had written to Sa'd b. Hudhayfah b. al-Yamān[382] at al-Madā'in and I read it at the time when Sulaymān was put in charge. The letter surprised me, and I took pains to learn it and have not forgotten it. He wrote to him: [502]

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! From Sulaymān b. Ṣurad to Sa'd b. Hudhayfah and those of the Believers who are with him, greetings! Now, this world is an abode away from which turns that which is honorable and to which tends that which is dishonorable. It has become hateful to those with understanding. The best servants of God have determined to depart from it and they have exchanged a fleeting little of this world for a never-ending abundance with God.
>
> The friends of God among your brethren and the Party of your Prophet's family have reflected upon the way they were put to the test in the matter of the Prophet's grandson. He responded when he was invited but received no answer when he called, wanted to go back but was detained, asked for safe-conduct but was denied it. He refrained from attacking the people al-

381. An allusion to Qur'ān, 30:43.

382. Of Fazārah ('Abs/Ghaṭafān); on him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 132, II, 495.

though they did not refrain from him, but attacked and killed him, then plundered and stripped him wrongfully and in enmity, heedless and ignorant of God. What they did offended God[383] and they will not return to Him. "Those who commit evil will know the reversal which they will endure."[384] When your brethren considered and thought about the end to which they were coming, they saw they had sinned greatly in betraying the pure and good one, in delivering him up and refraining from aiding and helping him. They saw there was no release for them and no repentance apart from killing his murderers or killing themselves so that their spirits would be consumed in it. Your brethren have thought seriously, and you should too and prepare. We have fixed for our brethren an appointed time for them to come to us and a place for them to meet us. Regarding the time, it is the first day of the month of Rabīᶜ II of the year 65 (November [503] 16, 684), and regarding the place where they will meet us, it is al-Nukhaylah.

You are they who have never ceased to be for us a party, brethren, and an alliance.[385] We have considered that we should appeal to you to join in this affair for which God desires your brethren, as they assert and proclaim to us, to repent. You are proper ones for seeking merit and soliciting reward and turning in repentance to your Lord from sin. Even if that involves your necks being cut, your offspring killed, your money spent and your clans destroyed, it did not harm those whose guilt was pardoned and who were killed that they are not "alive" today when they are with their Lord rewarded as martyrs. They met God patiently counting on His reward and He has given them the reward of the patient. (He was referring to Ḥujr [b. ᶜAdī] and his companions.) Nor did it harm your brethren who were slain patiently, crucified unjustly and maimed unlawfully that they are not "alive" and being put to the test by your sins. He let them choose, they met their Lord, and, please God, God has fully rewarded them.

383. See Add. et emend.
384. Qur'ān, 26:228.
385. See Add. et emend.

So be patient and may God have mercy on you in the face of wretchedness, harm and the occasion of misfortune! Turn to God in penitence from what is near at hand! By God, it is surely fitting that none of your brethren should have patiently endured any tribulation, desiring its reward, unless you would patiently endure something like it seeking its reward. And it is surely fitting that none (of them) should have sought God's acceptance by means of anything, even slaughter, if you would not seek God's acceptance by it. Fear of God is the best provision in this world, and apart from that everything perishes and passes away. So turn yourselves away from this world and be desirous of the abode of your well-being and the fight [jihād] against the enemies of God, the enemies of yourselves and of the family of your Prophet, so that you may approach God penitently and desiring Him. May God grant us [504] and you a good life, may He give us and you protection from the fires of Hell, and may He allot as our fate being killed in His path at the hands of the most hateful of His creatures and the bitterest in enmity toward Him! He has power over whatever He wants and achieves everything for His friends. Peace be upon you!

Ibn Ṣurad wrote the letter and sent ᶜAbdallāh b. Mālik al-Ṭā'ī[386] with it to Saᶜd b. Hudhayfah b. al-Yamān, and Saᶜd, after he had read his letter, sent it to those of the Shīᶜah in al-Madā'in. There were several groups of the people of al-Kūfah there who had found it pleasant and settled in it. Every time pay and provisions were distributed they came to al-Kūfah to collect what was due to them and then returned to their settlements. Sa'd read Sulaymān b. Ṣurad's letter to them and then he praised God, extolled Him and said, "Now, you were united together intent on helping al-Ḥusayn and fighting his enemies. The beginning of his murder did not take you unawares and God will recompense you with the best of rewards for your good intentions and the support which you had decided upon for him. Now your brethren have sent to you asking you for help and assistance and calling you in the truth and to that in which you hope there will be for you the best reward and portion with God. What is your opinion, and what do you say?" The people as a whole answered, "We will respond to their call and fight together with them. Our opinion of that is the same as theirs."

386. See p. 221 below, where he is appointed qāḍī by Mukhtār.

'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥanẓal al-Ṭā'ī al-Ḥizmirī[387] arose. He praised God and extolled Him and then said, "Now, we have responded to that which our brethren call us to and we have formed an opinion which is as theirs. Send me to them with some horsemen!" But Sa'd said to him, "Gently, do not rush; get ready for the enemy and prepare to make war on him, and then we will set out together."

Sa'd b. Hudhayfah b. al-Yamān then wrote to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and sent the letter with 'Abdallāh b. Mālik al-Ṭā'ī:

[505] In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! To Sulaymān b. Ṣurad from Sa'd b. Hudhayfah and those of the believers who are with him, greetings! We have read your letter and understood the matter to which you summon us and upon which the assembly [al-mala'] of your brethren concurs. You have been led to your destiny and the way made smooth for your right guidance. We are earnest and serious, getting ready and fixing the saddles and bridles. We are waiting for the affair to start and listening out for the summons. When the call comes we will proceed without delay, please God.

When Sulaymān b. Ṣurad had read the letter, he read it to his companions who rejoiced to hear it.

387. For Ḥizmir b. Akhzam, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 256.

(Our authorities) said: Sulaymān b. Ṣurad wrote a copy of the letter which he had written to Saʿd b. Hudhayfah b. al-Yamān for al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ʿAbdī[388] and sent Ẓabyān b. ʿUmāra al-Tamīmī[389] of the Banū Saʿd with it. Al-Muthannā wrote back to him, "I have read your letter and had it read out to your brethren. They have praised your reasoning and responded to you. Please God, we will meet you at the time you have appointed and the place you have mentioned. Peace be with you!" And at the bottom of his letter he wrote:

Consider! It is as if I had come to you marked out on a long-necked charger, snorting hoarsely, Long-backed, high-stepping, long-legged, urgent and champing at the bit,
With every youth whose gorge knows no fear, experiencing the sting of war without weariness,
A trustworthy brother whose rush has as its aim God, striking with the blade of the sword without sin.

According to Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl: The start of their affair was in the year 61 (680-81) when al-Ḥusayn was killed. From that time, the people never ceased gathering the instruments of war, preparing for fighting and summoning in secret the people of the Shīʿah and others to seek vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn. Group after group and band after band responded to them. Things continued in that way until Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah died on Thursday, the fourteenth of Rabīʿ I 64 (November 11, 683).[390] Between the killing of al-Ḥusayn and the death of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah there were three years, two months and four days. When Yazīd perished, the governor of Iraq was ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād who was in al-Baṣrah, while his deputy in al-Kūfah was ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth al-Makhzūmī. [506]

388. Of ʿAbd al-Qays (Rabīʿah) in al-Baṣrah; he subsequently worked there on behalf of al-Mukhtār.

389. A supporter of ʿAlī at Ṣiffīn, where he is described as a "raw youth"; at I, 3263, he is named as Ẓabyān b. ʿAmmār.

390. Thursday is a mistake for Tuesday; cf. p. 11 above.

Sulaymān came to his companions of the Shīᶜah and they said, "This tyrant is dead and the situation is now unstable. If you wish, we will rise up against ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth, drive him out of the governor's residence, proclaim that we are seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn, track down his murderers, and call the people to support the members of this family who have been expropriated and barred from their rights." They spoke about that and talked extensively.

But Sulaymān b. Ṣurad said to them, "Gently! Do not rush! I have reflected on what you say, and my opinion is that the murderers of al-Ḥusayn are the notables of the people of al-Kūfah and the champions of the Arabs. It is they from whom vengeance for his blood is to be sought. But if they knew what you want and that they are the ones sought after, they would come down heavily on you. And I have thought about those of you who have followed me and I know that if they [507] revolted, they would not obtain their vengeance, not obtain satisfaction for themselves, and not injure their enemy but be merely a slaughter for them. Rather, send your propagandists (duᶜāt) into the garrison town and summon this party of yours, and others not of it, to your affair. For I hope that today when the tyrant has perished the people will respond more quickly to your affair than before his death."

They did what he suggested and groups of them left as propagandists summoning the people. A large number responded to them after the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, many more than responded to them before that.

According to Hishām, Abū Mikhnaf said—al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd—a man of Muzaynah: I never saw anyone in this community more eloquent in speech or admonition than ᶜUbaydallāh b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Murrī.[391] He was one of the propagandists to the people of the garrison town in the time of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. Whenever a group of people assembled to hear him preach, he began by praising God and extolling Him and praying for the Messenger of God, and then he would say:

391. It is not clear to which Banū Murrah (or Murr?) he belongs.

Now, God singled out Muḥammad from all His creatures by his prophethood and distinguished him with every merit. He made you strong by following him, honored you by belief in him, spared by him the blood which you shed, and through him gave security to your perilous roads. "You were on the brink of a pit of hellfire but he rescued you from it. Thus God makes clear to you His signs, perhaps you will be led aright."[392] Has God created among the first and the last anyone with a greater right to authority over this community than its Prophet? And have the descendants of any one of the prophets and messengers or anyone else a greater right to rule over this community than those of its Messenger? No, by God, there has not been and there will not be. You belong to God. Have you not seen and have you not heard what evil was done to the son of your Prophet's daughter? Did you not regard how the people violated his sanctity, considered as weakness his solitariness, splattered him with blood, and pulled him down to the ground? In it they did not respect their Lord or al-Ḥusayn's kinship with the Prophet. They made him a target for arrows and left him a slaughter for the hyenas. Blessed are the eyes of him who has seen the like of him, and blessed is Ḥusayn the son of ʿAlī. What a man was he they betrayed! He was true and patient, trustworthy, helpful and resolute; he was the son of the first of the Muslims in Islam and the son of the daughter of the Messenger of the Lord of the Worlds. His defenders were few while his foes flocked around him, and his enemy killed him while his friend betrayed him. Woe to the killer and shame on the traitor! God will accept no plea from his killer and no excuse from his betrayer unless he sincerely turns to God in repentance, struggles against the murderers, and opposes the unrighteous [al-qāsiṭīn]. Perhaps on those conditions God will accept the repentance and disregard the offense. We call you to [508]

392. Qur'ān, 3:99.

> the Book of God, the Sunnah of His Prophet, the seeking of vengeance for the blood of his family, and the struggle [jihād] against the violaters of God's law and renegades [al-muḥillīn al-māriqīn]. If we are killed, that which God has prepared for us with Him is better for the godfearing; if we are victorious, then we will restore this authority to the family of our Prophet!

He used to repeat this speech to us every day until the mass of us had it by heart. When Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah perished, the people rose against ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth, expelled him from the governor's residence and settled on ᶜĀmir b. Masᶜūd b. Umayyah b. Khalaf al-Jumaḥī. He was the "ball made by dung beetles,"[393] about whom Ibn Ḥammām al-Salūlī said:

> Cling fast to Zayd if you catch him, > and cure the widows of the "dung beetles' > ball."

He was so short he was like a thumb, and Zayd was his mawlā and treasurer. He used to lead the people in prayer, and he took the oath of allegiance for Ibn al-Zubayr.

The companions of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad continued to summon their Shīᶜah and others of their garrison town, and their fol-[509] lowing became numerous. After the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, the people joined them more quickly than they had done previously; and six months after the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd[394] came to al-Kūfah. He arrived in the middle of Ramaḍān on a Friday.

ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī, al-Khaṭmī, came, sent by ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr with authority over the military affairs of al-Kūfah and the frontier regions controlled from it, and with him there also came Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. ᶜUbaydallāh al-Aᶜraj, sent by Ibn al-Zubayr with authority over the tax [kharāj] of al-Kūfah. ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī, al-Khaṭmī, arrived on Friday when eight days remained of Ramaḍān, 64 (May 15, 684). Al-Mukhtār arrived eight days 393. See p. 47 above; according to Ansāb, V, 191[20], Zayd was a mawlā of ᶜAttāb b. Warqā'.

394. Of Thaqīf from al-Ṭā'if; on him see EI[1], s.v., and below, pp. 105ff.

before ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. When he entered al-Kūfah, the leaders and prominent members of the Shīᶜah had assembled with Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. They did not consider al-Mukhtār of equal status with him. When al-Mukhtār called upon them to support him and to seek vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn, the Shīᶜah said to him, "This Sulaymān b. Ṣurad is the shaykh of the Party; they have yielded to him and agreed upon him." But al-Mukhtār began saying to the Shīᶜah, "I have come to you from the mahdī, Muḥammad b. ᶜAlī, Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah,[395] with his trust and confidence, chosen by him and as his wazīr.[396] And, by God, he kept on at them until a section broke away to join him, honoring him, responding to his call and expecting his success. Most of the Shīᶜah, however, were with Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, and he was the firmest of God's creatures against al-Mukhtār. Al-Mukhtār used to say to his companions, "Do you know what this one (meaning Sulaymān b. Ṣurad) wants? He only wants to go out and kill himself and you. He has no understanding of warfare and no knowledge of it." [510] Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd b. Ruwaym al-Shaybānī[397] went to ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī and said, "The people are saying among themselves that this Shīᶜah is going to rebel against you with Ibn Ṣurad and that there is another section of them with al-Mukhtār, the smaller of the two groups in number.

395. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah was a son of ᶜAlī by a woman from the tribe of Ḥanīfah, unlike al-Ḥasan, a-lḤusayn and the Imāms of most Shīᶜite groups, who were descended from ᶜAlī through his wife Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Prophet (on Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah, see *EI*¹, s.v.). It seems that it was in connection with the propaganda of Mukhtār and of the Tawwābūn that the term mahdī first became current. The term is used generally to refer to the Messiah figure of Islam, the Mahdī. Literally, the term may be translated as "the rightly guided one," and it is not certain how far, at the time of Mukhtār and the Tawwābūn, its eschatological associations had developed (see further *EI*², s.v. Mahdī).

396. The word is used here, as at other times in early Islam, with a religious connotation, referring to an individual acting as the representative of a prophet or religious leader; only in ᶜAbbāsid times, it seems, does the word come to be used only to mean a government official; see S. D. Goitein, "On the origin of the term vizier," JAOS, LXXXI (1961), 425–6 (= Goitein, Studies in Islamic History and Institutions, 194–6).

397. The leader of Bakr b. Wā'il in al-Kūfah (see Crone, Slaves, 119; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, index).

According to what the people are saying, al-Mukhtār does not wish to revolt until he sees what becomes of the affair of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. The latter's preparations have been made and he is ready to start his revolt at any time. If you think that you should get together the police force, the soldiers and the prominent ones among the people and then take the initiative in going against him, we will do so with you. Then, when you have pushed on to his dwelling place, you will appeal to him. If he responds, that is enough. But if he fights against you, you will fight him. You will have gathered your forces and got ready while he will be taken by surprise. I fear for you that, if he starts things against you and you leave him alone until he comes out against you, his power will have increased and his affair become grave."

ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd replied, "God prevents us from attacking them. If they attack us, we will fight them, but if they leave us alone, we will not seek to confront them. Tell me what they want." He replied, "They say that they seek vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn b. ᶜAlī." Ibn Yazīd answered, "Did I kill al-Ḥusayn? The curse of God on al-Ḥusayn's killer!"

Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and his companions wished to revolt in al-Kūfah. ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd went out and mounted the minbar. He stood among the people, praised God and extolled Him, and then said:

> Now, I have heard that some of this garrison town wish to revolt against us. I have asked what it was which called them to that and I was told they assert that they are seeking vengeance for the blood of al-> [511] Ḥusayn b. ᶜAlī. May God have mercy on that people! Their haunts have been shown to me and I have been asked to seize them. I was told, "Move against them before they move against you," but I rejected that and said if they fight me I will fight them, but if they leave me alone I will not seek them out. Why should they fight against me? By God, I did not kill Ḥusayn and I am not one of those who fought against him. I was stricken by his death, may God have mercy on him. If these people have no hostile intention (toward us), let them go out and openly reveal themselves so that they may move against he who fought against al-Ḥusayn, he who has come against them. I will help them against this murderer. This Ibn Ziyād, the one who slew al-Ḥusayn and slew your best men and your models, has set out against you. The latest information about him puts him at one night's journey from Jisr Manbij.[398] Fighting against him and being ready to face him is better and sounder than settling your grievances among yourselves, killing one another and shedding each other's blood. Then, when that enemy meets you afterwards, you are weak. By God, that is just what your enemy wants! He has come against you, the most aggressive of God's creatures toward you, he who, with his father, had authority over you for seven years, the two of them not refraining from killing the people of righteousness and religion. He, who killed you, by whom you were ruined, and who killed the one for whose blood you seek vengeance has come against you. So face him with your weapons and your strength. Use them against him, not against yourselves. I have not spared you good advice. May God join our forces together and preserve our *imām*s for us.

Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah said:

Oh people! The words of this flattering pacifier will surely not conjure away from you the sword and repression. By God, if someone attacks us, we will fight him, and, if we are sure that a people wants to attack us, we will seize the father for his child, the descendant for its begetter, the friend for the friend, and the ʿarīf for his ʿirāfah,[399] until they submit to the truth and humble themselves to obedience. [512]

Al-Musayyab b. Najabah rose up and cut off his speech, and said, "Son of the faithless ones! You threaten us with your sword and your repression. By God, you are too debased for that. We do not blame you for hating us, for we killed your father and your grandfather.[400] By God, I hope that God does not drive you out of the midst of the people of this garrison town before they add you to your father and grandfather and make three! As for you, oh governor, you have spoken appositely. By God, I think that whoever wants success in this matter should seek your advice and accept what you say."

398. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 107.

399. In the garrison towns the ʿirāfah (or ʿarāfah) was a unit of men grouped together mainly for distribution of pay (see F. M. Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 237–8).

Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah answered, "Yes by God, let him be killed. He started by dissimulating but then showed his true colors."[401] ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl al-Taymī came up to him and said, "Oh brother of the Banū Taym b. Murrah,[402] what is your opposition to that which concerns us and our governor? By God, you are no governor over us and you have no authority over us. You are only the head of the fiscal administration [amīr al-jizyah], so go back to your taxes [kharāj]. By the Eternal God, if you are a corrupt one, it was your father and grandfather, the faithless ones, who corrupted the affairs of this community. It was through them that discord came about. The calamity was their responsibility."[403] Then Musayyab b. Najabah and ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl went up to ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and said, "Regarding your opinion, Oh Governor, we hope, by God, that you will be praised for it among the populace and that you will be welcomed for what you meant and intended."

[513] Some of the people who were officials of Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah and a group of those who were with him were enraged and poured out abuse on everyone but him, while the people reviled them and argued against them. When ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd heard that, he came down from the minbar and entered his residence. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad left, saying, "ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd has duped the people of al-Kūfah. By God,

400. Ibrāhīm's father and grandfather were both killed fighting against ᶜAlī at the Battle of the Camel (see *EI*², s.v. Ṭalḥa b. ᶜUbayd Allāh).

401. It is not clear if the second sentence is a comment by Ibrāhīm on the behavior of ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd or a comment by the narrator on the behavior of Ibrāhīm.

402. According to p. 84, ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl himself was not of the Banū Taym b. Murra (Quraysh) but of the Banū Taym of Bakr b. Wā'il.

403. See Gloss. s.v. yad, and Lane, Lexicon, s.vv. dā'ir and sū'.

I will write to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr about that." Shabath b. Ribᶜī al-Tamīmī[404] came to ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and told him about that, and ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd rode out together with him and Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym and entered in to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah. And he swore to him by God that in making the speech which Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad had heard he only wanted to promote the welfare of the community and to pacify those who were at enmity. "Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith came to me telling me such-and-such, and I thought I should stand up among them to say what you heard, out of the desire that there should be no falling out, no breakdown of concord, and that this people's misfortune should not divide them." Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad relented and accepted his explanation.

Then the companions of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad came into the open, displaying their weapons, and making public the preparations they undertook and which benefited them.

In this year also, the Khawārij who had come to Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca, and fought alongside him against Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī, separated from him and went to al-Baṣrah, where they fell into dissension and developed into parties.[405]

The End of the Khārijites' Support for ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr in Mecca and the Dissensions among Them

I was told on the authority of Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: Ibn Ziyād, following Abū Bilāl's killing,[406] hunted down the Khawārij strenuously. Even before that he had not held back from them or spared them, but following the killing of Abū Bilāl he devoted himself to eradicating them and extir- [514]

404. On Shabath b. Ribᶜī al-Riyāḥī, leader of the Tamīm in al-Kūfah, see Crone, Slaves, 118; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, index.

405. For parallel and variant accounts of the following, see al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 604–9; Ibn ᶜAbd Rabbihi, ᶜIqd, II, 391–5; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 136–9; Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 27–32 (= Eng. tr. 45–53).

406. For Abū Bilāl Mirdās b. Udayya al-Tamīmī, leader of the Baṣran Khawārij killed in 61/680–81, see Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 25–7 (= Eng. tr. 39–43).

pating them. Thereupon, when Ibn al-Zubayr revolted in Mecca and the Syrians moved against him, the Khawārij gathered to consider what had happened to them.

Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq[407] said to them, "God sent down the Book to you and in it He imposed jihād as an obligation upon you and remonstrated with you with clear eloquence. The swords of the evil ones and those with enmity and oppression have been unsheathed against you. Now there is this one who has risen in Mecca, so let us go out together and we will come to the sanctuary and join this man. If he is of our opinions, we will join him in jihād against the enemy; if his opinions are different from ours, we will fight in defense of the sanctuary to the best of our ability and afterward consider our situation."

Consequently, they left and came to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who was delighted at their coming to him, indicated to them that he shared their views, and satisfied them unhesitatingly without any cross-examination. They fought together with him until the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah and the Syrians' departure from Mecca.

Then the Khārijīs met among themselves and said, "That which you did formerly was thoughtless and was wrong. You were fighting together with a man who perhaps does not share your views. It is not long since he and his father were fighting against you and calling out 'Vengeance for ᶜUthmān!'[408] Go to him, therefore, and ask him about ᶜUthmān. If he dissociates himself from him, then he is your friend, but if he refuses, he is your enemy."[409]

So they went to him and said, "Listen! We have fought [515] alongside you, but we did not examine you regarding your views to find out if you are with us or our enemies. Tell us what you say about ᶜUthmān!" He considered and saw that there were few of his supporters around him and so he said to them, "You have come to me and met me unexpectedly when I desired to leave. Come to me this evening so that I can tell you about that which you wish to know." They, therefore, went away while he sent to his supporters and said to them, "Put on your weapons and come to me all together this evening," and they did what he asked.

407. Of the Banū Ḥanīfah (Bakr b. Wā'il), he is the eponym of the Azāriqah sect of Khārijites (on him see *EI*¹, s.v.).

408. At the Battle of the Camel, those who were to become the Khawārij fought with ᶜAlī against ᶜĀ'ishah, Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, who claimed to be seeking vengeance for the murdered ᶜUthmān.

409. The notion of "dissociation" or "quittance" (barā'ah) is a key concept of the Khawārij, as of the Shīᶜah. Its correlative is wilāyah, "friendship."

When the Khawārij came, Ibn al-Zubayr's men had positioned themselves around him in two lines wearing their weapons, and a large group of them stood before him with spears in their hands. Ibn al-Azraq said to his followers, "The man is afraid of being taken unaware by you. He has decided to resist you and has prepared for you, as you see." Then Ibn al-Azraq approached Ibn al-Zubayr and said to him, "Oh Ibn al-Zubayr, fear God your Lord and hate the faithless one who claims everything for himself! Treat as an enemy he who was the first to make error into a model for behavior [sanna al-dalālah], introduced innovations and opposed the ordinances of the Book. If you do that you will satisfy your Lord and save yourself from painful punishment. But if you reject that, you will be one of those who 'enjoyed their share'[410] and wasted their good things in the life of this world. Oh ᶜAbīdah b. Hilāl,[411] describe to this man and those with him the undertaking we are engaged in and to which we are calling the people," so ᶜAbīdah b. Hilāl came forward.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū ᶜAlqamah al-Khathᶜamī—Qabīṣah b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān al-Quḥāfī of Khathᶜam: By God, I saw ᶜAbīdah b. Hilāl when he came forward and spoke. I never heard any speaker who spoke more eloquently or more appositely in what he said than he. He shared the views of the Khawārij. He united eloquence with significance of meaning and ease of vocabulary. He praised God and extolled Him, and then he said:

> Now, God sent Muḥammad, calling people to serve God and make pure the religion. He called people to [516]

410. Cf. Qur'ān 9:70, 46:19.

411. Of the Banū Yashkur (Bakr b. Wā'il), he was one of the four men who killed the leader of the force which had killed Abū Bilāl. On ᶜAbīdah, see Shammākhī, Siyar, 68 bottom.

that and the Muslims responded to him, and he worked among them, following the Book of God and His ordinance until God took him unto Himself. The Muslims then made Abū Bakr caliph and Abū Bakr appointed ᶜUmar as caliph after him. Both of them followed the Book and the example [sunnah] of the Messenger of God in what they did. Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds! Then the Muslims appointed ᶜUthmān as caliph, but he created reserved areas, favored kinship, appointed youths to positions of authority, abolished the lash and laid aside the whip, destroyed the Book, shed the blood of the Muslim, beat those who rejected oppression, granted shelter to him whom the Messenger had expelled, and beat those with precedence in merit, drove them out and dispossessed them. Not content with that, he seized the spoils [fayʾ] which God had given to them and shared it out among the godless ones of Quraysh and the shameless ones of the Arabs.[412] Hence a band of the Muslims whose oath God had accepted that they would obey Him, heedless in God of the censure of anybody else, came to him and killed him. We are friends to them, but dissociate ourselves from Ibn ᶜAffān and his friends. What say you, Ibn al-Zubayr?

412. ᶜAbīdah's list of ᶜUthmān's "crimes" can be found with some variants in different sources. In pre-Islamic Arabia, the "reserved area" (ḥimā) is said to have been an area of pasture land, sometimes associated with a deity or sanctuary, closed to individuals or tribes; animals grazing there could not be reclaimed by their owners. The Prophet is said to have forbidden the creation of any new ones in Islam, except by himself (see Goldziher, Muh. Stud., I, 235 (= Eng. tr. I, 214 f.), EI², s.v. Ḥimā; cf. Qurʾān, 5:102). The accusation of nepotism refers to ᶜUthmān's appointment of his own Umayyad relatives to positions of authority. He is further accused of refusing to carry out the statutory Islamic punishment of flogging for certain offences. The destruction of "the Book" probably refers to the charge that, in compiling the standard text of the Qurʾān, he caused variant texts to be destroyed. "Him whom the Messenger had expelled" refers to the Umayyad al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ᶜĀṣ, whom Muḥammad had forbidden to return to Mecca. "Those with precedence in merit" presumably refers to ᶜUthmān's treatment of opponents such as Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī (q.v., in EI²) and Kaᶜb b. ᶜAbdah al-Nahdī. In general, see EI¹ s.v. ᶜOthmān b. ᶜAffān.

Ibn al-Zubayr praised God and extolled Him, and then he said:

> I have understood what you have said. You referred to the Prophet and he was as you have said, even more than you described. I have understood what you said about Abū Bakr and ᶜUmar. You were right and hit the mark. I understood what you said about ᶜUthmān b. ᶜAffān, may God have mercy upon him, and I do not know the whereabouts of any creature of God today who knows more about Ibn ᶜAffān and his affair than I. I was with him when the mob criticized and censured him. He neglected nothing which the mob blamed him for but rebutted it. Then they came back to him with a letter[413] of his which they claimed he had written about them, ordering in it that they should be killed. He told them, "I did not write it. If you wish, then bring proof, and if there is not any, I will swear an oath to you." By God, they never brought him proof and did not ask him to swear, but fell upon him and killed him. I have heard what you have accused him of, but it was not like that. Rather, he always [517] > acted worthily and I bear witness to you and to those here present that I am a friend of Ibn ᶜAffān in this world and in the next, and a friend of his friends and enemy of his enemies.

The Khārijīs said, "May God dissociate Himself from you, Oh enemy of God!" while Ibn al-Zubayr said, "May God dissociate Himself from you, Oh enemies of God!"

Then the group split up. Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq al-Ḥanẓalī,[414] ᶜAbdallāh b. Ṣaffār al-Saᶜdī of the Banū Ṣarīm b. Muqāᶜis,[415]

---

413. A reference to the letter bearing ᶜUthmān's seal, intercepted by the rebels from al-Fusṭāṭ after ᶜUthmān's initial success in pacifying them. The real authorship of the letter is disputed (see N.A. Faris, "Development in Arab historiography . . . ," in B. Lewis and P.M. Holt (eds.), Historians of the Middle East, London 1962).

414. The nisbah al-Ḥanẓalī (of Tamīm) seems to be a mistake; see Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 27 n. 5.

415. Of Tamīm (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 538 for the Banū Ṣarīm b. al-Ḥārith of Muqāᶜis); he is the eponym of the Ṣufriyyah sect.

ᶜAbdallāh b. Ibāḍ, also of the Banū Ṣarīm,[416] Ḥanẓalah b. Bayhās,[417] and the sons of al-Māḥūz (ᶜAbdallāh, ᶜUbaydallāh and al-Zubayr) of the Banū Salīṭ b. Yarbūᶜ[418] departed and eventually reached al-Baṣrah. Abū Ṭālūt of the Banū Zimmān b. Mālik b. Ṣaᶜb b. ᶜAlī b. Mālik b. Bakr b. Wā'il, ᶜAbdallāh b. Thawr Abū Fudayk of the Banū Qays b. Thaᶜlabah, and ᶜAṭiyyah b. al-Aswad al-Yashkurī[419] went to the Yamāmah. There they joined Abū Ṭālūt in revolt, but afterwards agreed on Najdah b. ᶜĀmir[420] as leader. As for those of them from al-Baṣrah, they went to al-Baṣrah, sharing the ideas of Abū Bilāl.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā, and Abū al-Muthannā—one of his brethren of the people of al-Baṣrah: The Khārijīs of al-Baṣrah met and most of them said, "What if a party from among us rebel in the path of God, for since our companions rebelled there has been a period in which we have not been active? Our scholars would be in the world as a light to the people summoning them to the religion, and our men of piety and struggle would go out to join the Lord; they would be martyrs given their reward with God and truly alive."

So they appointed Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq. He took charge of three hundred men and came out in revolt. That was the time of [518] the rising of the people of al-Baṣrah against ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and the breaking down by the Khawārij of the prison gates and their escape from them. The people of al-Baṣrah were preoccupied with the fighting between Azd, Rabīᶜah, the Banū Tamīm and Qays over the shedding of Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr's blood and the Khawārij took advantage of their preoccupation with the fighting to prepare themselves and gather together. When Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq revolted, they followed him.

---

416. The eponym of the Ibāḍiyyah sect (on him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 113).

417. Also of Tamīm, he is possibly the eponym of the Bayhāsiyyah sect, but cf. EI², s.v. Abū Bayhās.

418. Also of Tamīm (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 508, for the Banū Salīṭ b. al-Ḥārith of the Banū Yarbūᶜ b. Ḥanẓalah).

419. All three of the Banū Bakr b. Wā'il.

420. Of the Banū Ḥanīfah (Bakr b. Wā'il), eponym of the Najadāt sect.

The people of al-Baṣrah made peace among themselves, appointing ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbd al-Muṭṭalib to lead them in prayer, and Ibn Ziyād left for Syria. The Azd and the Banū Tamīm made peace with one another, devoted themselves to the problem of the Khawārij, pursuing them and terrifying them so that those of them who remained in al-Baṣrah left and joined Ibn al-Azraq, except for a few of them of those who did not want to revolt at that time. Among these were ᶜAbdallāh b. Ṣaffār and ᶜAbdallāh b. Ibāḍ and some men with them who shared their views.

Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq reflected, and formed the opinion that the support of those who had not followed him was unnecessary and that there was no salvation for those who had not followed him. He said to his men, therefore, "God has honored you by your coming out in revolt. He has revealed to you what others have been blind to. Do you not know that you have come out in revolt only to seek His way [sharīᶜah] and His affairs? His affairs are a commander for you and the Book is an imām for you. You are only following His examples [sunan] and His paths." They replied, "Indeed, yes!" He said, "Is not your precept regarding your friend the precept of the Prophet regarding his friend, and your precept regarding your enemy the precept of the Prophet regarding his enemy? Your enemy today was the enemy of God and of the Prophet, just as the enemy of the Prophet was then he who is the enemy of God and of you today." They answered, "Yes." He said, "God, blessed and exalted is He, has revealed, 'An acquittal [barā'ah] from God and His Messenger to those of the polytheists with whom you have made a covenant,[421] and He has said, 'Do not marry polytheist women until they believe.'[422] Hence God has prohibited taking them as friends, living among them, allowing their witness, eating animals slaughtered by them, taking [519] knowledge of religion from them, marrying them and inheriting from them. God has insisted that we recognize this, and it is incumbent upon us that we make this religion known to those out of the midst of whom we have separated and that we do not hide what God has revealed. Moreover, God says, 'Those who hide what we have revealed of proofs and guidance, after we have made it clear to the people in the Book, God will curse them and the execrators will curse them.' "[423] All of his companions answered positively to this view.

421. Qur'ān, 9:1.
422. Qur'ān, 2:220.

Then he wrote, "From ᶜAbdallāh Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq to ᶜAbdallāh b. Ṣaffār and ᶜAbdallāh b. Ibāḍ and those of the people with those two. Greetings to those of the servants of God who are in obedience to God! The situation is thus. . . ," and he told the story and described the picture as above. He sent the letter to them both.

It was brought to them. ᶜAbdallāh b. Ṣaffār read it, then took it and put it behind him. He did not read it out to the people out of fear that they would split and fall into dispute. ᶜAbdallāh b. Ibāḍ said to him, "What is the matter? In your father's name, what is it that you should be afflicted so? Is it that our brethren have been struck down or some of them made prisoner?" Ibn Ṣaffār gave him the letter, and he read it and said, "Damn him! Whatever opinion he held, Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq was sincere. Even if the people in general were polytheists, he was the most correct in the views and decisions according to which he gave advice, and his mode of life was like that of the Prophet among the polytheists. But now he has lied and accused us of lying when he says that the people are infidels who have rejected the divine grace and ordinances, that they (Ibn al-Azraq's party) are dissociators from polytheism, and that we must shed the blood of the 'polytheists' and act similarly with their property, something which has been forbidden to us." Ibn Ṣaffār said to him, "God is quit [bari'a] of you, for you have fallen short, and God is quit of Ibn al-Azraq, for he has gone too far. God is quit of the two of you [520] together." But the other said, "God is quit of you and of him."

Then the Khārijites divided into subgroups. Ibn al-Azraq's power increased and his followers multiplied. He advanced toward al-Baṣrah until he was close to the bridge, and ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith sent Muslim b. ᶜUbays b. Kurayz b. Rabīᶜah b.

423. Qur'ān, 2:154.

Ḥabīb b. ᶜAbd Shams b. ᶜAbd Manāf against him with a company of Baṣrans.[424]

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: In the middle of the month of Ramaḍān this year, al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd arrived in al-Kūfah.[425]

The Arrival of al-Mukhtār in al-Kūfah

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: The Shīᶜah had been criticizing and blaming al-Mukhtār for his behavior in the affair of al-Ḥasan b. ᶜAlī—on the day when al-Ḥasan had been stabbed at Muẓlim Sābāṭ and carried to the White Palace at al-Madā'in[426] and then for what he had done in the time of al-Ḥusayn, when the latter had sent Muslim b. ᶜAqīl to al-Kūfah.[427] Muslim had stayed in the house of al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd (today it is the house of Salm b. al-Musayyab), and al-Mukhtār had given Muslim the oath of allegiance, with those of the people of al-Kūfah who gave it to him, had acted as his adviser, and had called upon those who took his orders to join Muslim's movement. On the day when Ibn ᶜAqīl came out in revolt, al-Mukhtār was in a settlement of his at Khuṭarniyah called Laqafā.[428] At the time of the midday prayer, news came that Ibn ᶜAqīl had manifested himself in al-Kūfah, for he had not 424. See below, pp. 164ff.

---

425. Parallels and variants: Ansāb, V, 214ff.; Ibn Aᶜtham, VI, 53–8, 73–7; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 139–43; Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 74–6 (= Eng. tr. 125–7); K.A. Fariq, "The story of an Arab diplomat," 7–17.

426. In the immediate aftermath of Muᶜāwiyah's march into Iraq in 40/661, panic broke out among al-Ḥasan's supporters in al-Madā'in/Ctesiphon, and al-Ḥasan, injured, was carried to the house of the governor, al-Mukhtār's uncle; al-Mukhtār, it is alleged, has suggested to his uncle that he use Ḥasan as a bargaining counter in his own negotiations with the triumphant Muᶜāwiyah (see Ṭabarī, II, 2).

427. Before setting out for al-Kūfah in 61/680, al-Ḥusayn is reported to have sent his cousin Muslim b. ᶜAqīl to ascertain the situation there; Muslim sent Ḥusayn a message of reassurance, leading him to set out on his ill-fated journey, but meanwhile was captured and executed by the new governor of al-Kūfah, ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād (see Ṭabarī, II, 227ff.).

428. For Khuṭarniyah, "one of the districts of Babylon," see Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 453; Abū Muslim is said to have come from there (Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 505); the reading Laqafā is uncertain.

revolted on the day he had arranged with his supporters, but only when he was told that Hāni' b. ᶜUrwah al-Murādī[429] had been beaten and imprisoned. Al-Mukhtār came with some of [521] his mawlās and reached Bāb al-Fīl[430] after the sunset prayer. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād had given a command over all of the people to ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth[431] to lie in wait in the mosque for the supporters of Ibn ᶜAqīl. While al-Mukhtār was waiting at Bāb al-Fīl, Hāni' b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Wadāᶜī[432] passed by and said, "Why are you waiting here? You are neither with the people nor in your camp." He said, "I was uncertain what I should do, on account of the gravity of the mishap which has befallen you."[433] Hāni' said to him, "By God, I think you are killing yourself!" Then he went into ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth and told him what he had said to al-Mukhtār and what al-Mukhtār had replied.

Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ—ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī ᶜUmayr al-Thaqafī: I was sitting with ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth when Hāni' b. Abī Ḥayyah reported to him these words of al-Mukhtār. ᶜAmr said to me, "Go to your cousin and tell him that his companion (Muslim b. ᶜAqīl) does not know where he is and that he should not lay himself open to any action (on the part of the authorities)." I stood up to go to him, but Zā'idah b. Qudāmah b. Masᶜūd[434] rushed up to ᶜAmr and said to him, "Is he going to come to you under safe-conduct?" ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth answered him, "As far as I am concerned he has safe-conduct from me, and, if he is brought up before the governor ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, I will stand as witness for

429. Muslim b. ᶜAqīl stayed in the house of this supporter of the Shīᶜah, subsequently executed together with Muslim, after leaving that of al-Mukhtār; Hāni' b. ᶜUrwah belonged to the Banū Murād of Madhḥij (on him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 279).

430. For an explanation of the name of this place in al-Kūfah, see Ṭabarī, II, 27.

431. See above, n. 183.

432. On him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 278; the Banū Wadīᶜah b. ᶜAmr belonged to Hamdān.

433. See Gloss. s.v. rajja; I have adopted the reading khaṭb from Ansāb, V, 215[5], in preference to the Leiden text's khaṭī'ah.

434. Like al-Mukhtār and the narrator himself, of Thaqīf. Subsequently, he is named as the one who killed Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr at the battle of Dayr al-Jāthalīq, shouting "Vengeance for al-Mukhtār!" (see Ansāb, V, 430).

him and intercede for him to the best of my ability." Zā'idah b. Qudāmah said to him, "God willing, that can only be good for him."

So I went off, with Zā'idah accompanying me, to al-Mukhtār, and we told him what Ibn Abī Ḥayyah had said and how ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth had answered, and we implored him for God's sake not to lay himself open to any action. Consequently, he came down to Ibn Ḥurayth, greeted him, and sat beneath his banner until morning. The people talked about al-Mukhtār's conduct, and ᶜUmārah b. ᶜUqbah b. Abī Muᶜayṭ[435] went off to [522] ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and told him about it. At daybreak, the gate of ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād was opened, the people were permitted to enter and al-Mukhtār was among those who went in. ᶜUbaydallāh summoned him and said to him, "Are you the one who came with the gang to help Ibn ᶜAqīl?" He answered, "No, but I came and camped beneath ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth's banner and passed the night with him until morning." And ᶜAmr said to Ibn Ziyād, "He has spoken the truth, may God preserve you!" But Ibn Ziyād took up his baton, aimed it at al-Mukhtār's face, and hit him in the eye and cut it. Then he said, "That is what you deserve! Indeed, by God, if it were not for ᶜAmr's testimony on your behalf, I would cut off your head. Take him off to prison!" So they took him off to prison and he was detained there. There he stayed until al-Ḥusayn was killed.

After al-Ḥusayn's death, al-Mukhtār sent to Zā'idah b. Qudāmah asking him to go to ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar[436] in Medina to ask him to write on his behalf to Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah (requesting Yazīd) to write to ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād ordering his release. Zā'idah rode to ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar and came to him and delivered al-Mukhtār's message to him. Ṣafiyyah, al-Mukhtār's sister who was married to ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar, found out about her brother's place of imprisonment and wept and grieved. When ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar saw that, he sent a letter with Zā'idah to Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, "Now, ᶜUbaydallāh b.

435. An Umayyad (family of Abū ᶜAmr), son of an opponent of the Prophet who was killed at Badr, a uterine brother of the caliph ᶜUthmān (Ansāb, IVb, 170; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 111).

436. See n. 276 above.

Ziyād has imprisoned my brother-in-law al-Mukhtār. I should like him pardoned and his condition improved. If you think, may God have mercy on us and on you, that you should write to Ibn Ziyād telling him to release him, I know you will. Peace be upon you!"

[523] Zā'idah went on his way with the letter and brought it to Yazīd in Syria. When he read it, Yazīd laughed and said, "Abū ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān[437] is interceding. He is the right one for that!" Then he wrote to Ibn Ziyād, "Now, release al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd when you have looked at my letter. Peace be upon you!" Zā'idah brought it and gave it to Ibn Ziyād, who called for al-Mukhtār and had him brought out. He told him, "I give you three days. If I find you in al-Kūfah after that, my undertaking toward you is void." Al-Mukhtār went off to get ready to leave and Ibn Ziyād said, "By God, Zā'idah risked himself against me when he went to the Commander of the Faithful to bring me a letter telling me to release a man whom I had decided to keep in prison for a long time. Fetch him to me!" But ᶜAmr b. Nāfiᶜ Abū ᶜUthmān, a secretary of Ibn Ziyād, went to him while he was being sought and told him, "Save yourself! Remember this as a favor you owe me." So Zā'idah went and hid himself on that day, and then he went with some members of his clan to al-Qaᶜqāᶜ b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī[438] and Muslim b. ᶜAmr al-Bāhilī[439] and they obtained safe-conduct from Ibn Ziyād.

Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: And on the third day al-Mukhtār left for the Ḥijāz.

Abū Mikhnaf said that al-Ṣaqᶜab b. Zuhayr reported to him from Ibn al-ᶜIrq, a mawlā of Thaqīf: I had come from the Ḥijāz and when I reached al-Basīṭah beyond Wāqiṣah,[440] I met al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd who was leaving for the Ḥijāz after Ibn Ziyād had freed him. When I met him I greeted him and 437. Ibn ᶜUmar's kunyah.

438. Of Dhuhl b. Thaᶜlabah/Shaybān (on him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 465).

439. Father of Qutaybah b. Muslim. Bāhilah were part of Qays; for Muslim, see Crone, Slaves, 136–7.

440. Al-Basīṭah is mentioned at Ṭabarī, I, 2222, as the place where Saᶜd b. Abī Waqqāṣ's army gathered en route to al-Qādisiyyah; evidently it is in the Najd, on the route from the Ḥijāz to Iraq.

turned to him, but when I saw how his eye had been cut I uttered the formula that we are God's creatures and shall return to Him. After I had commiserated with him, I asked him, "What is the matter with your eye, may God turn all evil from you?" He replied, "The son of the fornicator struck it with his baton so as to cause what you see." I said, "Whatever made him do that, may his fingertips be withered?" Al- [524] Mukhtār said, "May God kill me if I do not cut his fingertips, his veins and his limbs to pieces!" I was surprised at his words and I said to him, "How do you know you will do that, may God have mercy on you?" He replied, "Remember what I am telling you until you see it come true."

Then he began asking me about ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, and I told him, "He has taken refuge at the sanctuary and has said, 'I am only he who takes refuge with the Lord of this building.'[441] The people are saying that he is accepting the oath of allegiance in secret, but I do not think he will make his opposition manifest unless his strength increases and he finds he has a lot of allies[442] among the men." He replied, "Yes, indeed, there is no doubt about it! Indeed, he is the man of the Arabs today. Indeed, if he follows my footsteps and listens to what I say, then I will suffice him for the affairs of the people. But if he does not do it, then by God I am not less than one of the Arabs. Oh Ibn al-ᶜIrq, the time of commotion and distress [al-fitnah] has come like thunder and lightning. It is as if it has been sent and tramples down everything like a camel led by its noseband. When you see that and hear about it in a place where I have shown myself, say that al-Mukhtār with his troops of the Muslims is seeking vengeance for the blood of he who was killed unjustly, the martyr, the one slain at al-Ṭaff,[443] the lord of the Muslims and the son of their lord, al-Ḥusayn b. ᶜAlī. Then, by your Lord, I will surely kill, in recompense for his murder, the number of those who were killed in recompense for the shedding of the blood of John the Baptist."[444] I said, "Praise be to God, for these are wonders and things unheard of before!" He answered, "It is as I tell you. Remember what I have said until you see it come true." Then he urged on his mount and went on his way, and I went with him for a time asking God for his welfare and good companions.

441. See n. 52 above.

442. Add. et emend. suggests the deletion of one of the two illās ("unless"); possibly the second of them could be the accusative form of ill, "pact" (= "allies")?

443. I.e., al-Ḥusayn; the battle at Karbalā' is often called the battle of al-Ṭaff (see Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 539).

Then he halted and made me swear an oath when I left him. I took his hand and said goodbye and wished him peace [525] and left him, and I said to myself, "That which this man—meaning al-Mukhtār—tells me of what he claims is going to happen, is it a thing which his own prompting tells him of? By God, God does not acquaint anyone with knowledge of the hidden things. It is merely something which he wishes for and thinks is going to happen and it entails the ideas he has. But, by God, they are confused ideas. By God, not everything which a man thinks is going to happen does happen!" But, by God, I lived to see everything which he had said. By God, if that was the result of some knowledge which was vouchsafed to him, then it was confirmed; if it was an idea which he conceived and something he wished for, well it came about!

Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaqᶜab b. Zuhayr—Ibn al-ᶜIrq: I narrated this report to al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, who laughed and then said to me that he used also to say:

By a woman lifting her coats and calling out her woe
by the Tigris or around it.[445]

I asked him, "Do you think that this is something which he thought up himself and made a guess at, or is it the result of knowledge given to him?" He said, "By God, I do not know the answer; but how capable he was, whether he was a man of this world,[446] a kindler of war, or a fighter against enemies!"

444. In Muslim tradition, in response to the execution of John the Baptist (Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā') by the Jewish king, Jerusalem is sacked by Nebuchadnessar (Bukhtnaṣṣar) and 70,000 Israelites are killed (see, e.g., Ṭabarī, I, 713ff.).

445. On occasions, al-Mukhtār's dicta seem to be composed for their sound rather than their meaningfulness. Al-Ḥajjāj here seems to be laughing at al-Mukhtār's harmonious nonsense.

Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yūsuf al-Anṣārī, of the Banū Khazraj—ᶜAbbās b. Sahl b. Saᶜd: Al-Mukhtār arrived at Mecca where we were, and he went to ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr while I was sitting with him. Al-Mukhtār greeted Ibn al-Zubayr, who returned his greetings, welcomed him, and made room for him. Then Ibn al-Zubayr asked him, "Tell me about the condition of the people in al-Kūfah, Oh Abū Isḥāq." He replied, "In public they are supporters of their authorities, but in private they are opponents of them." Ibn al-Zubayr said to him, "That describes the slaves of evil; when they see their masters they serve and obey them, but when they are away they calumniate and curse them."

He sat with us for a while and then he leaned toward[447] Ibn al-Zubayr as if he would confide a secret to him, and he [526] said to him, "What are you waiting for? Hold out your hand. Let me give you the oath of allegiance and you give us what will please us. Seize control of the Ḥijāz, for the people of the Ḥijāz are all with you." Al-Mukhtār thereupon got up and went out. He was not seen again for a year.

Then, while I was sitting with Ibn al-Zubayr, behold, he said to me, "When did you last have news about al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd?" I said to him, "I have not heard about him since I saw him with you last year." He said, "Where do you think he went off to? If he had been in Mecca, he would have been seen there afterward." I told him, "I went back to al-Madīnah a month or two after I saw him with you, and I remained there for some months. Then I came to you and I heard a group of the people of al-Ṭā'if who had come to perform the minor pilgrimage [ᶜumra][448] claiming he had come to them in al-Ṭā'if asserting he was the lord of wrath and the extirpator of tyrants." Ibn al-Zubayr said, "God damn him! He has been sent as a liar and self-proclaimed soothsayer. If God extirpates tyrants, then al-Mukhtār is one of them."

---

446. See Add. et emend. for the reading dunyā.

447. See Add. et emend. for the reading māla.

448. The minor pilgrimage may be accomplished at any time of the year and involves fewer rituals than the ḥajj.

By God, it was not long after the conclusion of our talk before he appeared before us at the side of the mosque, and Ibn al-Zubayr said, "Speak of the devil![449] Where do you think he is heading for?" I said, "I think he is heading for the sanctuary." He came to the sanctuary and stood facing the (Black) Stone[450] and then he circumambulated the sanctuary seven times and then made a ritual prayer of two rakᶜas by the Ḥijr[451] and then sat down. Before long some men of his acquaintance, of the people of al-Ṭā'if and others of the people of the Ḥijāz, joined him and sat together with him, and Ibn al-Zubayr was kept waiting for his coming to him. Ibn al-Zubayr said, "What do you think he is up to that he does not come to us?" I said, "I do not know, but I will obtain information of him for you." He replied, "Whatever you wish." That had surprised him.[452]

So I got up and passed by as if I intended to leave the mosque, but then I turned in his direction and went toward him. I greeted him, sat down and took his hand, and then I [527] said to him, "Where have you been? Where did you get to after I met you? Were you at al-Ṭā'if?" He said to me, "I was at al-Ṭā'if and elsewhere." And he made his affair appear very mysterious to me. So I leaned toward him and, whispering, said to him, "Does someone like you keep away from someone like him to whom the people of nobility and the great families of the Arabs from Quraysh, the Anṣār and Thaqīf[453] have rallied? There is left no family or tribe whose leader or chief has not come and given the oath of allegiance to this man. It is surprising of you and your views that you should not have come to him and given him the oath of allegiance and taken 449. For the proverb, see Freytag, Proverbia, I, 505.

450. Unvocalized, the Arabic ḥjr in this context may refer to the Black Stone (al-ḥajar [al-aswad] or al-rukn) fixed in the southeast corner of the Kaᶜbah or to the semicircular area attached to the northwest side of the Kaᶜbah known as al-Ḥijr; since the circumambulation of the Kaᶜbah begins from the Black Stone, it seems that that is what is meant here, while the subsequent reference is to the Ḥijr. But there is a possible ambiguity.

451. The Ḥijr is regarded as a sacred area which at one time was a part of the Kaᶜbah; Ishmael (Ismāᶜīl) is said to have been buried there.

452. Cairo reads ka-inna dhālik aᶜjabahu "it was as if that had surprised him."

453. I.e., the peoples of Mecca, Medina and al-Ṭā'if.

your share in this business." He answered me, "Did you not see me go to him last year and advise him of my views, but he kept me out of his business? When I saw he had no need of me, I wanted to show him I had no need of him. By God, he needs me more than I do him!" I said to him, "You have said to him what you have said while he was conspicuous in the mosque. But these words should not be said unless the curtains are lowered on them and the doors locked on them. Meet him tonight if you wish, and I will be with you." He answered me, "I will. After we have performed the ʿatamah prayer[454] we will go to him and we will meet in the Ḥijr."

I got up from my place by him and went out and then returned to Ibn al-Zubayr. I told him about the words which had passed between us and he was pleased. And when we had made the ʿatamah prayer, we met in the Ḥijr and then we went off to the dwelling of Ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Mukhtār and I asked his permission to enter and he gave it to us. I said, "I will leave you two alone," but they said together, "We have no secret from you," so I sat down. When Ibn al-Zubayr had taken his hand, greeted him, welcomed him, asked him how he and his family were, and they had remained silent for a short while, al-Mukhtār spoke to him (and I was listening). After he had begun on the preliminaries of his speech and praised God and extolled Him, he said, "There is no point in verbosity or in stopping short of what is needed. I have come [528] to you to give you the oath of allegiance on condition that you will not take decisions without me and that I will be among the first of those to whom you give access, and that when you triumph you make use of me in the more meritorious of your operations." Ibn al-Zubayr said to him, "I will accept your oath of allegiance (only) on the stipulation that I will act according to the Book of God and the exemplary practice [sunnah] of His Prophet." He replied, "And from the worst of my slave lads you are taking the oath of allegiance on the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet! There is no share for me in this business which is not (also) for the farthest of mankind from you! No, by God, I will never give you the oath of allegiance except on these stipulations."

454. The prayer of nightfall, more commonly called ṣalāt al-ʿishāʾ.

ᶜAbbās b. Sahl said: I obtained the ear of Ibn al-Zubayr and said to him, "Buy his obedience [dīn] from him so that you can reflect what you will do." And Ibn al-Zubayr said to him, "What you ask for is yours," and he held out his hand, and al-Mukhtār gave him the oath of allegiance. He stayed with him and was present at the first siege when al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī came to Mecca. He fought at that battle and was one of the most valiant of the people at that time and the most capable of them. After al-Mundhir b. al-Zubayr,[455] al-Miswar b. Makhramah[456] and Muṣᶜab b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. ᶜAwf al-Zuhrī[457] had been killed, al-Mukhtār cried out, "To me, Oh people of Islam, to me! I am Ibn Abī ᶜUbayd b. Masᶜūd, and I am the son of the attackers, not of the fugitives. I am the son of those who advance not those who retreat. To me, Oh defenders and zealous protectors of your honor!"[458] And he stirred up the people and was resolute and fought a good fight. Then he remained with Ibn al-Zubayr during that siege until the day when the sanctuary was set alight—that was Saturday, Rabīᶜ I 3, 64 (October 31, 683). At that time, he fought in a band of about 300 men the best fight anyone of the people put up. He fought until worn out and then he sat down with his men surrounding him. When [529] he had rested he would get up and fight again. And he never went toward a band of the Syrians without fighting them until he had defeated them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yūsuf Muḥammad b. Thābit—ᶜAbbās b. Sahl b. Saᶜd: In charge of the fighting against the Syrians on the day when the Kaᶜbah was set alight were

---

455. ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr's brother; other reports contradict the view that he was killed in Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr's siege of Mecca (see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 54).

456. Of Quraysh (the Banū Zuhrah; see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 263), he is reported to have been held in respect by the Khawārij; again there is doubt about whether he was in fact killed in Ibn Numayr's siege (Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣāba, III, 858, Yaᶜqūbī, Taᵓrīkh, II, 282).

457. Of the Banū Zuhrah of Quraysh (Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 267–9), son of the "elector" of the shūrā appointed by ᶜUmar, ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. ᶜAwf.

458. See Gloss., s.v. w-t-r.

ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ,[459] myself and al-Mukhtār. And on that day there was not among us any man more valiant than al-Mukhtār. Before the Syrians learned about the death of Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah, he fought strenuously one day in particular. That was Sunday, Rabīᶜ II 15, 64 (December 13, 683). The Syrians had hoped to defeat us and had taken up positions against us on the roads leading into Mecca.

Ibn al-Zubayr came out, and many men gave him the oath of allegiance on the understanding that they would fight to the death. I went out with a band who were with me fighting on one flank, and al-Mukhtār was with another band fighting on another flank among a group of the people of the Yamāmah. They were Khawārij who were only fighting in defense of the sanctuary, and they were positioned on one flank. ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ was on another flank. The Syrians pressed hard against me and pushed me back with my men until I and al-Mukhtār with his men were gathered together in the same place. I never did anything without him doing likewise, while he never did anything which I did not try hard to do likewise. I never saw anyone more resolute than he. While we were fighting, lo, footmen and horse of the Syrian cavalry pressed against us and forced me and him to retreat, with about seventy of those prepared to accept hardship and suffering, to the side of one of the houses of the Meccans. And al-Mukhtār fought against them on that day. One man started to say to another:

The soul of a man who flees never finds refuge.

Al-Mukhtār and I sallied forth, and I said (to the Syrians), "Send a man from among you against me." One man came out against me and another against al-Mukhtār. I engaged my opponent and killed him while al-Mukhtār engaged his and killed him. Then we and our men gave a yell and pressed against them, and, by God, we fought against them until we had driven them out of all the roads, and then we went back to the two opponents we had killed. Behold, the man I had killed was very red in color like a Greek, while he whom al-Mukhtār had killed was very black! And al-Mukhtār said to [530] me, "Mark well, by God! I think that these two whom we killed were slaves. If these two had killed us, our clans and those who have expectations for us would have been distressed on our account. In my opinion, these two are no more than two dogs. After this day I will never go forth to fight a man unless he is someone I know." I replied, "And I, by God, will not go forth unless for a man I know."

459. Of the Banū ᶜAdī of Quraysh (Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 384f.).

Al-Mukhtār remained with Ibn al-Zubayr until Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah died, when the siege came to an end and the Syrians returned to Syria; the Kūfans resolved their differences by agreeing on ʿĀmir b. Masʿūd, after Yazīd's death, to lead them in the ritual prayer until the whole people should agree on an imām. It was no more than a month before ʿĀmir sent his oath of allegiance and that of the Kūfans to Ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Mukhtār was with Ibn al-Zubayr for five months and some days after Yazīd's end.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq—Saʿīd b. ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ: By God, I was with ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who was accompanied by ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān b. Umayyah b. Khalaf.[460] We were making the ritual circumambulation of the sanctuary when Ibn al-Zubayr looked, and there was Mukhtār! Ibn al-Zubayr said to Ibn Ṣafwān, "Look at him! By God, he is more wary than a jackal encircled by lions." He carried on his circumambulation, we accompanying him, and when we had finished and performed the ritual two rakʿahs[461] of prayer after circumambulation, we joined al-Mukhtār, who asked Ibn Ṣafwān, "What did Ibn al-[531] Zubayr say about me?" But he did not reveal it and said, "He only said good of you." Al-Mukhtār responded, "Yes, indeed, by the Lord of this building! Surely I am the equal of you two![462] By God, either he will follow after me or I will start a blaze against him!" And he remained with him for five months, but when he saw that Ibn al-Zubayr was not giving 460. Of the Banū Jumaḥ of Quraysh (ibid., 389–90).

461. A succession of specified ritual body movements and prayers (see EI[1], s.v. ṣalāt).

462. The suggested alternative reading in kuntu āmanu sha'nakumā with the translation "I do not trust the pair of you" is proposed in Add. et emend.; for the reading and translation adopted here see Gloss. s.v. sha'n.

him any position of authority, he started asking everybody who came from al-Kūfah the state of the people there and their condition.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ᶜAṭiyya b. al-Ḥārith Abū Rawq al-Hamdānī: Hāni' b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Wadāᶜī came to Mecca to perform the ᶜumrah of Ramaḍān. Al-Mukhtār asked him about his own state and that of the men of al-Kūfah and their condition. Hāni' told him about their concord and agreement to give obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr, except that there was a party of them, with the support of plenty among the people of that garrison town,[463] which, if there were somebody who would gather them for the propagation of their views, could devour the earth with them for as long as he wished.

Al-Mukhtār said to him, "I am Abū Isḥāq! By God, I am the one for them. I will unite them in the path of truth and with them I will drive out the retinue of falsehood and kill every obdurate tyrant." But Hāni' b. Abī Ḥayyah said to him, "Alas for you, Oh Ibn Abī ᶜUbayd! If it were possible for you not to involve yourself in error, then someone else would be their leader, for the lord of the time of commotion and distress [al-fitnah] is the closest of anything to the time of death and the worst of the people in deeds." Al-Mukhtār answered him, "I will not call them to commotion and distress but only to right guidance and community."

Then he arose, went out, mounted his camels and set off toward al-Kūfah. When he reached al-Qarᶜā',[464] Salamah b. Marthad, the brother of Bint Marthad al-Qābiḍī of Hamdān,[465] met him. He was one of the bravest of the Arabs and was an ascetic. When they met, they clasped hands and questioned each other. Al-Mukhtār told him the news of the Ḥijāz, then said to Salamah b. Marthad, "Tell me about the people in al- [532] Kūfah." He replied, "They are like sheep whose shepherd has gone astray." Al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd said, "I am he who will guide them right and reach their goal." Salamah said to 463. Read al-miṣr.

464. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 61.

465. Qābiḍ b. Zayd were a branch of Ḥāshid of Hamdān (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 454). This seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to Salamah. Probably "Bint" should be read "Thubayth b." (see p. 126 below).

him, "Fear God, and know that you die and are resurrected, are called to account and give recompense for your deeds—if they were good you receive good, if evil you receive evil!" Then they parted and al-Mukhtār went on until he reached the lake of al-Ḥīrah on a Friday.

There he dismounted, performed his ablutions in it, annointed himself lightly with oil, changed his clothes, put on a turban and girded his sword. Then he mounted his camel and passed the mosque of the Sakūn and the jabbānah of Kindah.[466] At every tribal council he passed, he greeted its people and said, "Rejoice at the victory and the prizing open. What you wish for has come to you." He went on until he passed by the mosque of the Banū Dhuhl[467] and the Banū Ḥujr,[468] but found nobody there; they had gone to the community prayer. He went on until he passed the Banū Baddā',[469] where he found ᶜAbīdah b. ᶜAmr al-Baddī of Kindah. He greeted him and said, "Rejoice at the victory, the ease and the prizing open! You, Abū ᶜAmr, are holding good opinions. God will not leave any of your offenses unpardoned or any sin unforgiven." ᶜAbīdah was one of the most resolute of the people, the most perceptive and the strongest in his love for ᶜAlī, but he had not refrained from drink. When al-Mukhtār addressed these words to him, ᶜAbīdah replied, "May God give you good rejoicing, for you have wished us joy! Can you interpret things for us?" "Yes," he answered. "Come to us tonight in the camping place." Then he passed on.

Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj[470]—ᶜAbīdah b. ᶜAmr: Al-Mukhtār said this to me and then said, "Meet me in the 466. For the topography of al-Kūfah, see Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kūfa" (sketch map at p. 36 of the reprint in his Opera minora) and *EI*², s.v. al-Kūfa. "The Lake of al-Ḥīrah" presumably refers to a body of water formed by the Euphrates as it empties itself into the swamps south of al-Ḥīrah. The name is not usual. The word jabbānah followed by the name of a tribe frequently occurs in connection with events in al-Kūfah. A jabbānah is a cemetery, but in al-Kūfah they seem to have been used as a sort of public square (see further *EI*², art. cit., p. 347a).

467. The Banū Dhuhl b. Muᶜāwiyah b. al-Ḥārith al-Akbar of Kindah (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 239).

468. The Banū Ḥujr b. Wahb b. Rabīᶜah of Kindah (ibid., II, 331).

469. The Banū Baddā' b. al-Ḥārith al-Akbar of Kindah (ibid., I, 218).

470. See Add. et emend.

camping place and tell the people of your mosque this from me,[471] that they are a people upon whom God has imposed [533] a covenant to obey Him by fighting against the violators of His law and seeking vengeance for the shed blood of the descendants of the prophets, and He will guide them to the clear light." Then he passed on, asking me the way to the Banū Hind. I told him, "Wait for me, I will guide you." I called for my horse which had been saddled for me and mounted it. I went with him to the Banū Hind.[472] Al-Mukhtār said to me, "Guide me to the abode of Ismāʿīl b. Kathīr!"[473] So I went with him to his dwelling and asked Ismāʿīl to come out. He saluted and greeted him, clasped his hands and wished him joy. He said to him, "You and your brother come to me tonight with Abū ʿAmr, for I have brought you everything you wish for." Then he went on his way, and I with him, until he passed the mosque of Juhaynah of al-Bāṭinah.[474] Then he passed on to Bāb al-Fīl, where he made his camel kneel and dismounted. He entered the mosque and the people showed him respect. They said, "This is al-Mukhtār, who has come." Al-Mukhtār stood beside one of the pillars of the mosque where he prayed until the service of ritual prayer was held, when he prayed together with the people. Then he went to another pillar and offered all the prayers of the interval between Friday noontime prayer and that of the afternoon. And, when he had prayed the afternoon prayer with the people, he departed.

Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Saʿīd—ʿĀmir al-Shaʿbī: Al-Mukhtār passed the circle of Hamdān in the mosque. He was wearing his traveling clothes and he said, "Rejoice, for I have brought to you that which will make you happy!" Then he passed on and came to his house; it is the house called the house of Salm b. al-Musayyab. And the Shīʿah were frequently visiting it and him in it.

---

471. Read ʿannī (see Add. et emend.).
472. The Banū Hind of Kindah (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 283).
473. See below, p. 182, for a report from him.
474. Apparently the Banū Juhayna b. Zayd of Quḍāʿah (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 265, EI² Suppl., s.v. Djuhayna).

Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj—ᶜAbīdah b. ᶜAmr and Ismāᶜīl b. Kathīr of the Banū Hind: That night we went to him as we had agreed. When we had entered in upon him and sat down, he questioned us about the affairs of the people and [534] the condition of the Party. We told him the Party had rallied to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzāᶜī and that it would not be long before he revolted. He praised God and extolled Him and made prayers for the Prophet, and then he said, "Now, the mahdī, son of the Legatee [waṣī], Muḥammad the son of ᶜAlī, sent me to you as a trustee, a helper [wazīr], a chosen one, and a commander. He ordered me to fight the wicked ones [al-mulḥidīn], to seek vengeance for the blood of his family and to defend the weak."

Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj: ᶜAbīdah b. ᶜAmr and Ismāᶜīl b. Kathīr told me that they were the first of God's creatures to respond, and they seized his hand and gave him the oath of allegiance. Al-Mukhtār began sending to the Party who had gathered with Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, saying to them:

> I have come to you from he who is in authority, the source of virtue, the legatee of the Legatee, and the Imām the mahdī, with an authority in which there is restoration of health, removal of the covering, fighting against the enemies, and fulfillment of favors. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, may God have mercy on us and upon him, is no more than a useless old man and a worn-out thing.[475] He has no experience of affairs and no knowledge of warfare. He only wants to get you to go out, and he will kill himself and you. But I only act following an example which was given to me and a command in which there was made clear to me the might of the one in authority over you, the killing of your enemies and the restoration of your spirits. Listen to what I say and obey my command, and then rejoice and spread the good news, for I am the best leader for the achievement of everything you hope for.

By God, he continued with these and similar words until he had won the support of a section of the Shīᶜah and they used to visit him frequently, honor him and recognize his authority. But most of the Shīʿah at that time, and their leaders, [535] were with Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, who was the shaykh of the Shīʿah and the senior one of them. They did not consider anybody as equal with him except that al-Mukhtār had won the support of a small section of them. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad was the most opposed of God's creatures to al-Mukhtār. At that time, everything was ready for Ibn Ṣurad and he wanted to take the offensive, but al-Mukhtār did not want to move or take any action, until[476] he should see how Sulaymān's affair turned out, hoping that the command of the Shīʿah would revert to himself and that they would reinforce him in attaining what he sought.

475. See Gloss., s.vv. ᶜ-sh-m, ḥ-f-sh.

When Sulaymān b. Ṣurad had left and gone toward Mesopotamia, ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, Shabath b. Ribʿī and Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym said to ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Khaṭmī and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh, "Al-Mukhtār is a greater threat to you than Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. Sulaymān merely went out to fight your enemies and humiliate them for you, and he has departed from your territories. But al-Mukhtār wants to attack you in your garrison town. Go to him, therefore, put him in irons, and keep him in prison so that the affairs of the people may be stabilized."

They went out against him, therefore, with some men. He was unaware until they had surrounded him and his house and forced him to come out. When he saw the crowd he said, "What is the matter with you? By God, you have seized the wrong man!"[477] Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh said to ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd, "Put him in shackles and make him walk barefoot." But ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd said, "Praise be to God, I will neither make him walk nor make him go barefoot. I will not do that with a man who has not manifested [536] any enmity to us or any hostility. We have only taken him out of suspicion." Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad said to him, "It is 476. Read ḥattā (see Add. et emend.).

477. See Add. et emend. for a suggested alternative reading (bi-ghirri mā); the printed text seems to give a more obvious meaning, however.

nothing to do with you.[478] Walk ahead of me! What are you and what is this we hear about you, Oh Ibn Abī ʿUbayd?" He answered, "What you have heard about me is nothing but lies. I take refuge in God from a treachery like that of your father and grandfather."[479] Fuḍayl said: By God, I was looking at him when he was brought out and I listened to these words when he spoke to him, only I do not know whether Ibrāhīm heard him say it or not. When he had said it he was silent.

Al-Mukhtār was brought a black mule to ride. Ibrāhīm said to ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd, "Will you not fasten him with fetters?" but he replied, "Prison is a sufficient fetter for him."

Abū Mikhnaf: As for Yaḥyā b. Abī ʿĪsā, he told me: I went in to him with Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī.[480] We were visiting him and looking after him, and I saw that he was in shackles. And I heard him saying, "Indeed, by the Lord of the seas, of the palms and trees, of the plains and deserts, of the godly angels, and of the goodly chosen ones, I shall slay every tyrant with every dangerous blade and sharp sword, in a band of the Helpers who are without the inclination of inexperienced ones or the dissociation of wicked ones, until, when I have erected the pillars of the religion and have repaired the scattering of the fissure of the Muslims and satisfied the thirst of the hearts of the Believers and achieved vengeance for the prophets, the continuation of this life will not be important for me and I will not mind death when it comes." Whenever we visited [537] him while he was in prison, he used to repeat these words to us until his release. And after Ibn Ṣurad had left, al-Mukhtār showed himself as courageous before his supporters.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year also, Ibn al-Zubayr demolished the Kaʿbah. Its walls had buckled as a result of the catapult stones which had been fired at it.[481]

Ibn al-Zubayr's Demolition of the Kaʿbah

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī—Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā—ʿIkrimah b. Khālid: Ibn al-Zubayr demolished the sanc-

478. Literally, "it is not your nest."
479. See n. 400.
480. The authority of Abū Mikhnaf; see index, s.v.
481. Parallels and variants: Ansāb, IVb, 55–6; Azraqī, 143.

tuary until he had leveled it to the ground, and he dug out its foundation and made the Ḥijr a part of it. The people used to make the ritual circumambulation outside the foundations and make the prayer while facing its site. He placed the Black Cornerstone by it in an ark [tābūt] in a strip of silk, and he put the sanctuary ornaments, and the clothes and perfumes which he found inside it, in the treasury of the sanctuary in the care of the doorkeepers, replacing them when he rebuilt it.

Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar—Maᶜqil b. ᶜAbdallāh—ᶜAṭā': I saw Ibn al-Zubayr demolish the whole sanctuary until he had razed it.

ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the people in the Pilgrimage of this year; his official over Medina was his brother ᶜUbaydah b. al-Zubayr; over al-Kūfah ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Khaṭmī, with Saᶜd b. Nimrān in charge of the judiciary, for Shurayḥ refused to act as judge, saying, according to what is reported, "I will not judge during the time of commotion and distress"; over al-Baṣrah, ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Maᶜmar al-Taymī, with Hishām b. Hubayrah[482] in charge of the judiciary; and over Khurāsān, ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim.

482. Morony, Iraq, 440, says he was a Ḍabbī.

The Events of the Year 65

[538] (AUGUST 18, 684–AUGUST 7, 685)

The Departure of the Penitents from al-Kūfah and Their Destruction by the Syrian Army at the Battle of ᶜAyn al-Wardah[483]

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yūsuf—ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf al-Aḥmarī:[484] When Sulaymān b. Ṣurad wanted to set out in the year 65 (684–5), he sent to his leading supporters and they came to him. At the new moon of Rabīᶜ II (November 15, 684) he left with his leading supporters, having arranged with the body of his followers to leave on that night for the camp at al-Nukhaylah. He journeyed until he had reached his army, and he went around among the men and his prominent supporters, and was displeased at the number of the men. He, therefore, sent Ḥakīm b. Munqidh al-Kindī and al-Walīd b. Ghuḍayn al-Kinānī[485] each with a detachment of horse, telling them, "Go and enter al-Kūfah and shout out, 'Revenge for al-

483. Parallel and variant accounts: Ibn al-Aᶜtham, VI, 58–73, 77–87; Ansāb, V, 208ff.; Ibn al-Athīr, IV, 144–57.

484. For him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 108; the Banū al-Aḥmar b. Zuhayr were of Azd.

485. Ḥakīm does not seem to be otherwise known; for al-Walīd, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 586.

Ḥusayn!' Go to the great mosque and shout that out." They left and they were the first of God's creatures to give the cry, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn!"

Ḥakīm b. Munqidh al-Kindī with his detachment of horse and al-Walīd b. Ghuḍayn with his, then, came and passed by the Banū Kabīr.[486] A man of the Banū Kabīr of the Azd, called ᶜAbdallāh b. Ḥāzim,[487] with his wife Sahlah bint Sabrah b. ᶜAmr of the Banū Kabīr (she was one of the most beautiful of them and beloved by him), heard the cry, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn!" He had not been among those who joined the Penitents or responded to them, but now he hurriedly got his clothes and put them on, called for his weapons and ordered his horse to be saddled. His wife said to him, "Alas for you! Have you gone mad?" He answered, "No, by God, but I have heard God's summoner and I will answer him. I will seek vengeance for the blood of this man until I die or God makes an end of my affair, whichever is more pleasing to Him." His wife said, "And to whom do you leave this little son of yours?" He replied, "To God alone who has no partner! Oh my God, I entrust to You my family and my children! Oh my God, preserve me in them!" That son of his was called ᶜAzrah and he survived until he was subsequently killed with Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr.[488] Ibn Ḥāzim went out and joined the Penitents. His wife remained at home weeping for him, and her female relatives joined her while he went on with the company. [539]

That night, the horsemen went around al-Kūfah and eventually came to the mosque after the ᶜatamah prayer. In the mosque there was a large number of people who had been praying, and they shouted out, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn!" Among them was Abū ᶜIzzah al-Qābiḍī.[489] Karib b. Nimrān was leading the prayer, and Abū ᶜIzzah said, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn! Where is the assembly of the people?" He was told, "At al-Nukhaylah," and he left and went to his family, where 486. Leiden and Cairo both read Banū Kathīr, but Caskel/Ibn Kalbī lists no such segment of Azd. See the note to Ansāb, V, 211[3,4]. Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 367, has two Banū Kabīrs of Azd.

487. Leiden and Cairo both read Khāzim. See Ansāb, V, loc. cit.

488. When ᶜAbd al-Malik took Iraq from the Zubayrids in 692.

489. See n. 465.

he got his weapons and called for his horse to ride. His daughter al-Ruwāʿ, who was married to Thubayth b. Marthad al-Qābiḍī, came to him and said, "Oh my father, what is happening? I see that you have girded on your sword and fastened on your weapons." He answered her, "Oh my daughter, your father is fleeing from his sin to his Lord." She began to weep and cry. His relatives by marriage and his cousins came to him, and he bade them farewell, then left and joined the company.

Before morning about the same number had joined Sulaymān b. Ṣurad as had been in his army when he came to it. Then, when morning came, he called for his register [dīwān] to see from it the number of those who had given him the oath of allegiance. He found (listed in the register as having promised [540] allegiance) 16,000, and he said, "For God's sake, only 4,000 have come to us out of 16,000."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: I said to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, "By God, al-Mukhtār is stopping the people from joining you. I was with him three days ago and I heard a group of his followers saying, 'We are two thousand men altogether.' " Sulaymān replied, "Supposing that is so and 10,000 do not join us, are not these here Believers, do they not fear God, and do they not call to mind God and the agreements and covenants which they gave to us freely that they would indeed wage jihād and render assistance?" He remained at al-Nukhaylah for three days, sending those of his companions he trusted to those who had not joined him, to remind them of God and of what they had freely given to him, and about a thousand came out to join him. Al-Musayyab b. Najabah came to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and said, "May God be merciful to you! Those who are reluctant will be of no avail to you, for only those whose own purpose caused them to come out will fight alongside you. Let us not wait for anyone, but seize the initiative!" He replied, "By God, your opinion is excellent."

Then Sulaymān b. Ṣurad stood up among the people, leaning on an Arab bow of his, and he said, "Oh people! Whomsoever desire for God's face and the rewards of the next world has caused to come out, he is one of us and we belong to him.

May God have mercy on him alive and dead! But whoever merely desires this world and its cultivation, by God we do not bring any spoils [fay'] to hand out or booty [ghanīmah] to distribute apart from the favor of God, the Lord of the Worlds. We have no gold or silver, and no silk or rich fabric. We have only our swords on our shoulders, our spears in our hands, and provisions enough to bring us to confront our enemy. Let he who had other intentions not accompany us!"

Şukhayr b. Ḥudhayfah b. Hilāl b. Mālik al-Muzanī[490] then arose and said, "God has given you right guidance and shown [541] you your arguments. By God, and there is no other than He, there is no good for us in the fellowship of anyone whose concerns and intentions are with this world. Oh people, only repentance from our sin and seeking vengeance for the blood of the son of our Prophet's daughter have caused us to come out! We have neither dīnār nor dirham with us, we bring only the blades of our swords and the tips of our spears." And from every side the people cried out, "We do not seek this world, and it is not for it that we have come out."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ismāʿīl b. Yazīd al-Azdī—al-Sirrī b. Kaʿb al-Azdī: We went to our companion ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl to bid him farewell.[491] He got up and we did so too; he went in to Sulaymān and we with him. Sulaymān had resolved to depart, and ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl advised him to set out against ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. Sulaymān and his leading companions said, "Our opinion is that we should do what ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl advises: set out against ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, the murderer of our lord and the one by whom we were destroyed." ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd said to him, and sitting around him were the leaders of his companions, "I have conceived an idea which, if it is right, then God will make it successful, but, if it is wrong, then it is mine. I will not withhold from you and myself sincere advice, right or wrong. We have only come out seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn. But his killers are all in al-Kūfah! Among them are ᶜUmar b. Saᶜd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, the leaders of the quarters, and the tribal notables. Why should we leave here and leave unavenged the killing and the crimes of violence?"[492] Sulaymān b. Ṣurad said, "What do you think?" and they answered, "By God, he has expressed a sound opinion and things are indeed as he has said. By God, Ibn Ziyād is the [542] only killer of al-Ḥusayn we shall encounter if we go off toward Syria. What we seek is to be found here in the garrison town itself."

490. One of the quṣṣāṣ with the Penitents (see below p. 145); the Banū Muzaynah are counted to Khindif (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 439).

491. I.e., ʿAbdallāh was getting ready to leave with the Penitents (see pp. 80ff. above).

But Sulaymān b. Ṣurad said, "I do not think that is right for you. He who killed your lord, made ready the armies against him, and said, 'I give him no safe conduct unless he surrenders and my jurisdiction is applied to him,' this one is the transgressor [al-fāsiq] the son of the transgressor, Ibn Marjānah, ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. So go out against your enemy in the name of God. If God grants you victory over him, we hope that those who come after him will be less powerful than he, and we hope that the people of your garrison town whom you have left behind will yield to you seeking your pardon. Then you will search for everybody who had a part in shedding the blood of al-Ḥusayn, and you will fight against him but not act unjustly. If you die as martyrs (fighting Ibn Ziyād), then you have fought against those who profane God's law [al-muḥillīn], 'What is with God is a blessing for the upright and the righteous.'[493] I desire that you will use your weapons and your strength against the first of the profaners and the unrighteous [al-muḥillīn wa-al-qāsiṭīn]. By God, if you fight tomorrow against the people of your garrison town, there will be no one who will not think that another man has killed his brother and his father and his close friends or that another man did not want to kill him. So seek guidance from God and set out." So the people prepared for departure.

When ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah heard about Ibn Ṣurad and his men going out, they considered their position and concluded they would go to them and urge them to stay and join forces. If they insisted on leaving, they would ask them to wait so they could raise an army to go with them and fight against their enemy with mass and strength. ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah sent Suwayd b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān[494] to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, and he told him that ᶜAbdallāh and Ibrāhīm [543] were saying, "We now wish to join you for something in which God may perhaps grant righteousness to us and to you." Sulaymān answered, "Tell them to come to us." And he said to Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād al-Bajalī, "You go and muster the people properly, for these two men have sent saying such-and-such." Then he called his leaders and they sat down around him.

492. See Gloss., s.v. w-t-r.
493. Qur'ān, 3:197.

They had been there less than an hour when ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd came with the Kūfan notables, the police force, and many of the soldiers, and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad with a group of his companions. ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd had said to each prominent figure who was known to have had a part in the shedding of al-Ḥusayn's blood, "Do not come with me to them," fearing they would see him and threaten him. While Sulaymān b. Ṣurad camped with his army at al-Nukhaylah, ᶜUmar b. Saᶜd slept only in the governor's residence [qaṣr al-imārah] with ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd, out of fear that the crowd would come to him in his dwelling place and attack him while he was unprepared and unaware, killing him. And ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd had told ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth, "If I am delayed, you lead the people in the midday prayer."

When ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad came to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, they went in to him and ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd praised God and extolled Him. Then he said, "The Muslim is the brother of the Muslim. He neither betrays him nor deceives him. You are our brethren, the people of our land, and the best loved of the inhabitants of a garrison town which God created for us. Do not cause us distress in your persons, impose your views tyranically upon us, or decrease our numbers by leaving our community. Stay with us so we can make things easy and get ready. Then, when we learn that our enemies have approached our land, we will go out together [544] and fight them." Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad spoke in a similar vein.

494. Apparently Suwayd b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Bujayr al-Minqarī [of the Banū Saᶜd/Tamīm]; see Crone, Slaves, 139.

Sulaymān b. Ṣurad praised God and extolled Him and then said to them, "I know that you two have been sincere in advice and diligent in counsel, but we are with God and belong to Him. We have come out in pursuance of a matter and we ask God for resolution in following His guidance and direction to the best attainment of it. Do you not see that we must go out if God wishes it?" ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd said, "Stay so that we can raise a concentration of soldiers to go with you and face your enemy en masse, united and with sharp swords." But Sulaymān said to him, "You go back and we will consider wherein we differ. Please God, our opinion will be made known to you."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ᶜAbd al-Jabbār (i.e. Ibn ᶜAbbās al-Hamdānī)—ᶜAwn b. Abī Juḥayfah al-Suwā'ī: Then ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah proposed to Sulaymān that he remain with them so they could confront the host of Syrians and they would make over the tax [kharāj] of Jūkhā[495] for him and his men alone to the exclusion of the other men. But Sulaymān said to them, "It is not for this world that we have come out to fight." They only made that offer because of what they had heard about ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād's approach toward Iraq. And Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad and ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd returned to al-Kūfah, while the band of Ibn Ṣurad decided to depart and head toward Ibn Ziyād. But when they made an inspection, they suddenly realized their party (shīᶜah) from al-Baṣrah had not come to keep the rendezvous, nor those of al-Madā'in. Some of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad's companions began criticizing those who had not turned up. But Sulaymān said, "Do not criticize them, for I am sure they would have rushed to join you if they had news of you and the time of your setting out. I am sure it is only lack of money and ill-preparedness which has kept them back and [545] detained them. Wait so they can smooth things out and get ready and come to you in strength. Then how swift they will be in following you!"

495. See Le Strange, Eastern caliphate, 42.

Then Sulaymān b. Ṣurad stood among the people to deliver an official address. He praised God and extolled Him, then said:

> Now, Oh people, God knows what you purpose and what you have come out to seek. There are merchants of this world and merchants of the next. As for the merchant of the next world, he is rushing toward it sustained by what it requires. He will not sell it for any price. He is seen only in the attitudes of prayer—standing, sitting, bowing and prostrating. He seeks neither gold nor silver, neither things of this world nor pleasure. And as for the merchant of this world, he is addicted to it and revels in it. He does not desire anything in exchange for it. You, may God have mercy on you, in this purpose of yours, must pray long in the depths of the night and frequently make reference to God in all circumstances. Offer to God (great is His name!) every blessing you can until you confront this enemy and this unrighteous profaner of God's law (al-muḥill al-qāsiṭ) and wage jihād against him. For you will not attain your Lord's favor by anything which He finds more worthy of reward than jihād and prayer. Jihād is the summit of the good works. May God place us and you among those of His servants who are righteous, resolute in struggle, and patient in the face of adversity. Tonight we are leaving this abode of ours, God willing. So get ready for it!

He left on the evening of Friday, the fifth of Rabīᶜ II of the year 65 of the Hijrah (Thursday, November 17, 684).

When Sulaymān and his companions had left al-Nukhaylah, Sulaymān b. Ṣurad summoned Ḥakīm b. Munqidh, who then proclaimed among the people, "Come on! Indeed, no man of you shall pass the night before reaching Dayr al-Aᶜwar!"[496] And they passed that night at Dayr al-Aᶜwar, but many of the men stayed behind. Then he went on until he came to al-

496. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 644.

Aqsās, Aqsās Mālik[497] on the bank of the Euphrates, where [546] he mustered the men, but about a thousand of them were missing. Ibn Ṣurad said, "I am pleased that those who have deserted you are not with you. If they had come out with you they would only have brought disorder. God did not like their being sent and He held them back and selected you for the merit of it. Praise your Lord, therefore." He left his camp by night and next morning they came to the tomb of al-Ḥusayn. There they remained for a night and a day praying over him and asking God's pardon for him. When the people reached al-Ḥusayn's tomb, they shouted out in unison and wept. Never was a day seen when there was more weeping.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ghaziyyah: When we came to the tomb of al-Ḥusayn (peace be upon him) the people wept together, and I heard most of the people expressing the wish that they had fallen with him. Sulaymān said, "Oh God, have mercy on al-Ḥusayn, the martyr the son of the martyr, the right-guided one (mahdī) son of the right-guided one, the righteous one the son of the righteous one. Oh God, we testify to you that we follow their religion and their path, and we are enemies of those who killed them, friends of those who love them." Then he departed and he and his companions encamped.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Aᶜmash—Salamah b. Kuhayl—Abū Ṣādiq: When Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and his companions reached the tomb of al-Ḥusayn, they cried in unison, "Oh Lord, we have betrayed the son of our Prophet's daughter! Pardon us for what we did in the past and relent toward us, for you are the relenting one and the compassionate one. Have mercy on al-Ḥusayn and his companions, the martyrs and the righteous ones. We bear witness before you, Oh Lord, that we are doing the same as what they were when they were killed. If you do not pardon us our sin and have mercy on us, then we are among those who are lost." They remained there a day and a night praying over him, weeping and abasing [547] themselves. And from that time onwards, the people did not cease to plead for mercy on him and his companions until they made the early morning prayer by his tomb on the following day, and that increased their fury. Then they mounted up and Sulaymān ordered the people to proceed. And no man would pass on until he had come to the tomb of al-Ḥusayn, stood in prayer over it, and asked for mercy on him and pardon for him. And, by God, I saw them thronging about the tomb of al-Ḥusayn more thickly than the people throng around the Black Stone.

497. Ibid., I, 337.

Sulaymān stood by al-Ḥusayn's tomb, and whenever a group prayed for him and asked for mercy on him, al-Musayyab b. Najabah and Sulaymān b. Ṣurad said to them, "Join your brethren, may God have mercy on you!" He continued in this manner until about thirty of his companions were left, and then Sulaymān and his companions made a circle around the tomb and Sulaymān said, "Praise be to God who, if He had wished, would have honored us with martyrdom with al-Ḥusayn. Oh my God, since you forbade us it together with him, do not forbid us it on his account after him." And ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl said, "Verily, by God, I consider al-Ḥusayn and his father and brother as the best of Muḥammad's community (who will be) imploring God's favor (on behalf of the Muslims) on the Day of Resurrection. Are you not amazed at the test to which this community has been subjected by its enemies? They killed two and brought the third to the brink of death." Al-Musayyab b. Najabah said, "I am one of those who will kill them. I dissociate[498] myself from whoever shares their views. Them I will treat as an enemy and fight."

All of the leaders spoke most eloquently. Al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah[499] was a companion of one of the leaders and notables, and it pained me when I did not hear him making a speech with the people in a manner similar to their speeches, but before long he delivered a speech which was not inferior to any of the others. He said, "God made these men, whose status you have mentioned relative to their Prophet, superior to anyone except their Prophet. A mob to whom we are enemies and with whom we recognize no ties killed them.

498. See n. 409 above.

499. For the name, see Add. et emend.; of ᶜAbd al-Qays (Rabīᶜah), he subsequently worked in al-Baṣrah on behalf of al-Mukhtār (Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 217).

[548] We have left our homes, our people and our properties seeking the extirpation of those who killed them. By God, even if the fight against them is where the sun goes down or the earth ends, it is incumbent upon us to seek it until we attain it. That is our booty and it is martyrdom, the reward for which is heaven." We said to him, "You have spoken the truth, you have achieved your end, and you have been granted success." Then Sulaymān b. Ṣurad traveled on from the tomb of al-Ḥusayn and we went with him. We took the road by al-Ḥaṣṣāṣah, then al-Anbār, then al-Ṣadūd, then al-Qayyārah.[500]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah and others: Sulaymān sent Kurayb b. Yazīd al-Ḥimyarī ahead over his vanguard.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥusayn b. Yazīd—al-Sirrī b. Kaʿb: We set out with some men of our clan. After we had come to the tomb of al-Ḥusayn, and Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and his companions had left it and followed the road, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAwf b. al-Aḥmar went before them on a worn-out clipped dark bay horse of medium size. He was reciting in rajaz:[501]

These mares set forth bearing us aloft in companies, like lions, carrying us as heroes.
By our setting out we want to confront our foes,
the unjust ones, the perfidious ones, the ones in error.
We have abandoned family and property,
our bashful, fair and pale-skinned women.
By it we will satisfy the Lord of blessings and beneficence.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Saʿd b. Mujāhid al-Ṭā'ī—Mu-[549] ḥill b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī: ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd wrote to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. (Muḥill said, I think:) He sent me with the letter

500. For Ḥaṣṣāṣah, see Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 274; for Anbār, see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and pp. 65–6; Ṣadūd does not seem to be listed in Yāqūt; for Qayyārah, Yāqūt, IV, 211.

501. For the verses, cf. Murūj, V, 215.

and I caught up with him at al-Qayyārah. He had gone ahead of his companions so it was thought he had outstripped them. He halted and signaled to his men, and they gathered around him. Then he read them his letter, which said:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. From ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and those of the Muslims with him, greetings! Now, this letter of mine to you is the letter of a sincere adviser and true pastor. How often a sincere adviser is suspected of treachery, and how often a deceiver is asked for sincere advice and loved! I have heard that you wish to go few in number against the numerous host. But he who wishes to remove the mountains from their places, his picks become blunt and he desists, and he is blameworthy both in his intelligence and his deeds. Oh people of ours, do not give your enemy encouragement against the inhabitants of your land! All of you are the pick (of our community), and when your enemy falls on you they will know that you are the most eminent of your garrison town, and that will give them encouragement against those you have left behind. Oh people of ours, "If they get the better of you, they will stone you or force you back to their confession and then you will never prosper!"[502] Oh people, today our hands are joined with yours and we have the same enemy. When we speak with one voice, we will conquer our enemy, but when we disagree, our power will be as nothing to those who are against us. Oh people of ours, do not consider as deceitful my sincere advice and do not oppose my authority. Come when my letter is read out to you! May God bring you to obedience to Him and turn you away from disobedience to Him! Peace be with you!

When the letter was read out to Ibn Ṣurad and his companions, he said to the men, "What do you think?" They said, "What do you think? We refused you and him this when we were in our garrison town and among our own people. And [550] now, when we have come out and accustomed ourselves to jihād and drawn close to the land of our enemy, this is no sound opinion!" Then they called to him, "Tell us what you think!" He said, "By God, I think that you have never been closer than you are today to one of the two good things, martyrdom and victory, and I do not think that you should turn away from the truth upon which God has united you and the blessings you desire. We and they are of different views. If they gain the upper hand, they will summon us to jihād alongside Ibn al-Zubayr, but I consider jihād alongside Ibn al-Zubayr as error. If we are victorious, we will return this authority to its rightful possessors; if we are struck down, then we are holding to our intentions to repent from our sins. We have one outlook and Ibn al-Zubayr another. We and they are, as the brother of the Banū Kinānah said:

502. Qur'ān, 18:19.

I see, woman, that your outlook is different from mine, so refrain from censure, for you have been changed and the outlook is different.

The people departed with him and they came to Hīt[503] where Sulaymān wrote:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To the governor ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd from Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and those of the believers with him, greetings! We have read your letter and understood what you have proposed. By God, what an excellent prefect you are, what an excellent governor, and what an excellent clan brother! By God, in whom we trust while absent, to whom we turn for counsel and advice, and whom we praise in every circumstance, we have heard Him say in His Book, "God has purchased from the believers their own selves and their property in exchange for the promise of heaven. . ." as far as His words ". . . so tell the believers the good news!"[504] The people have 503. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II, and p. 65.

504. Qur'ān, 9:112–3.

rejoiced at the oath of allegiance which they have sworn. They have turned away in repentance from their great sin and toward God, they have depended on Him and accepted what God has decreed. "Our Lord, we rely on you, turn to you in repentance and come to you."[505] Peace be with you! [551]

When he received this letter, Ibn Yazīd said, "The people are seeking death. The first you will hear of them will be the news of their death. I swear by God they will be killed nobly as Muslims! But, by He who is their Lord, before their enemy kills them their strength will have become great and those slain in their quarrel many."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar and ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ghaziyyah: We left Hīt and came to Qarqīsiyā.[506] When we drew close, Sulaymān b. Ṣurad halted and mustered us in good order until we had passed alongside Qarqīsiyā and camped close by it. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith al-Kilābī had fortified himself inside the town against our people and did not come out against them. Sulaymān called al-Musayyab b. Najabah and said, "Go to this cousin[507] of yours and tell him to send out a market for us. It is not him we want, we go only against these profaners of God's law." Al-Musayyab b. Najabah went to the gate of Qarqīsiyā and said, "Open up! Against whom do you fortify yourselves?" They asked, "Who is that?" He replied, "Al-Musayyab b. Najabah!" Al-Hudhayl b. Zufar went to his father and told him, "There is a man of good appearance who is asking to be allowed to enter to you. We asked him who he was and he said al-Musayyab b. Najabah."

Al-Hudhayl b. Zufar said: At that time I had no knowledge of the people and did not know who of them he was. Zufar said, "Do you not know, Oh my son, who this is? This is the champion of the whole of Muḍar al-Ḥamrā'.[508] If the number

505. Qur'ān, 60:4.

506. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and index (see also pp. 63ff. above).

507. Zufar and Musayyab both belong to Qays.

508. The meaning of Muḍar al-Ḥamrā' is obscure (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 417).

of its notables was only ten, he would be one of them. In [552] addition to that, he is an ascetic and pious man. Let him enter!" So I gave him permission to enter and my father seated him beside himself and questioned him courteously. Al-Musayyab b. Najabah asked, "Against whom do you fortify yourself? By God, it is not you we desire. All we require is that you help us against that unjust and profaning mob. Send out to us a market and we will only remain in your land for a day or so." Zufar b. al-Ḥārith said to him, "We only closed the gates of this town so that we might know whether it was for us that you came or somebody else. By God, we are not short of strength against your people so long as no trick takes us unawares. We do not want to be put to the test of fighting against you, for we have heard that you are righteous and of good and handsome conduct."

Then he called his son and told him to set up a market for them, and he ordered that al-Musayyab be given a thousand dirhams and a horse. But al-Musayyab said, "As for the money, I have no need of it. By God, it is not for money that we came out and it is not money which we seek. As for the horse, I will accept it, for perhaps I will have need of it if my horse goes lame or falls beneath me." And he took it away with him and returned to his companions. The market was sent out to them and they traded for their needs. After sending out the market, fodder and much food, Zufar b. al-Ḥārith sent to al-Musayyab twenty camels for slaughter, and to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad similarly. Zufar had told his son to ask about the prominent men in the army, and there were named to him ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl, ʿAbdallāh b. Wāl and Rifāʿah b. Shaddād. The commanders of the quarters were named too. He sent to those three commanders ten camels for slaughter each and plenty of fodder and food, and he sent out for the soldiers a large train (of animals) and a quantity of barley.
[553] The slave lads of Zufar then said, "Take and slaughter from this train (of animals) as much as you want, carry away as much barley as you wish, and provision yourselves with as much flour as you can." All day long the people continued stocking up. They did not need to buy anything from the markets which had been set up, for they were given enough in the way of meat, barley and flour, except that someone might buy a garment or a whip.

On the next morning, they set out again, and Zufar sent word to them, "I am coming out to you and will accompany you," and he came to them. They left in good order. Zufar went along with them and said to Sulaymān, "Five commanders have been sent out against you and have left al-Raqqah. Among them are al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī, Shuraḥbīl b. Dhī al-Kalāᶜ, Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī (the father of Mālik b. Adham),[509] Rabīᶜah b. al-Mukhāriq al-Ghanawī,[510] and Jabalah b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Khathᶜamī.[511] They have come against you like thorns and trees and there has come against you a great number and blades of iron. I swear by God that I have seen few men who are better prepared or equipped or more ready for every kind of good work than those I have seen with you. But I have heard that a number beyond all computation has been sent against you." Ibn Ṣurad answered, "We rely on God. Let those who place their trust place it in Him." Then Zufar said to him, "May I ask your opinion on a suggestion which I will put before you, by means of which God will perhaps achieve something good for us both? If you wish, we will open up our town to you so that you can come in and then we will act together for the same end. Alternatively, if you wish, you will encamp at the gates of our town and we and our army will come out alongside you. Then, when this enemy comes against us, we will fight them together." Sulaymān answered Zufar, "The people of our garrison town wanted us to act in a similar way to what you want, and they spoke like you and they wrote to us about it after we had left. But it was never agreeable to us and we will not do it." [554]

509. Of Qays; see Crone, Slaves, 168–9. The Leiden text here reads "Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī and Abū Mālik b. Adham." Since Adham's son was Mālik and not Abū Mālik it seems that a gloss has been interpolated and the wa-abū should be amended to huwa abū. In that case, there would be no implication that Mālik was present with his father. Cf. Ansāb, V, 209–10, where there is no mention of Mālik with Adham.

510. Of Qays; see Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 191.

511. Counted to Yemen (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 345, s.v. Hatᶜam b. Anmar), but also to ᶜAdnān ("northerners"); see EI², s.v. Khathᶜam.

Zufar said, "Consider the advice I have given you and accept it and take it. I am an enemy of that mob and I want God to give the victory to you. I am friendly toward you and I want God to encompass you with success. The enemy has left al-Raqqah. If you rush to ᶜAyn al-Wardah[512] ahead of them and put the town at your back, then the rustāq,[513] the water and the food will be in your hands, and you will have security in the region between your town and ours. By God, if I had as many horses as I have men, I would give you reinforcements. Move your camp this instant to ᶜAyn al-Wardah. The enemy is marching as an army, but you have horses, and, by God, I have rarely seen a group of horses more noble than they. Get them ready immediately and I hope you will get there before them and beat them to ᶜAyn al-Wardah. Do not fight them, firing and thrusting at them, in an open space, for they outnumber you and you will have no security if they can surround you. Do not stand still firing at them and thrusting at them, for you have nothing like their manpower, and if you leave yourselves open to them it will not be long before they rush on you. And do not form a line when they confront you, for I see no footsoldiers with you but see that you are all horsemen, while the enemy is coming against you with foot and horse. Their cavalry will protect their infantry and their infantry their cavalry, but you have no footmen to defend your cavalry. So meet them with squadrons and detachments of cavalry and distribute them between the right and left wings of the enemy. Place a cavalry squadron alongside another and then, if one [555] of the two is attacked, the other can dismount and both the men and the horses can be re-supplied from it. Whenever a detachment wishes to be increased, it can be, and, if it wishes to be decreased, it can be. But, if you fight in one line and the enemy's men advance on you so you are forced out of the line, it will be broken and that means defeat."

Then he stood and took his leave of the men and asked God to accompany them and grant them victory. The men 512. Identified as Ra's al-ᶜAyn, for which see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map III, and index.

513. Sasanid administrative term for a sub-district (see Morony, Iraq, 534, s.v. rōstāk).

praised him and called on God on his behalf, and Sulaymān b. Ṣurad said to him, "How good it was to stay with you! You showed generosity to us in our stay, were the best of hosts and gave us sincere advice in consultation." Then the people pressed on in their journey and began to double the distance between halts.

([ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ghaziyyah continued:] We passed by towns until we reached Sāᶜ,[514] and then Sulaymān b. Ṣurad organized the cavalry detachments as Zufar had advised. Then he pushed on to ᶜAyn al-Wardah, to the west of which he pitched camp. He got there before the enemy, and he and his men made their camp. He remained there for five days without moving, and they took their rest, relaxed and refreshed their horses.

Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—ᶜAṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith—ᶜAbdallāh b. Ghaziyyah:[515] The Syrians advanced with their host until they were a day and a night's journey from ᶜAyn al-Wardah.

ᶜAbdallāh b. Ghaziyyah: Sulaymān stood among us and praised God lengthily and extolled him lavishly. Then he mentioned the heavens and the earth, the mountains and the seas, and the signs of God they contain. He mentioned the favors and blessings of God; this world, from which he urged abstention; and the next, for which he excited desire. He mentioned more of this than I could keep track of or remember. Then he said, "Now, God has brought you your enemy toward whom you have persevered in journeying all night and all day seeking that in which you will display your sincere repentance and meet God seeking forgiveness. They have come to you, or [556] rather you have come to them on their own ground and domain. When you meet them, show your righteousness and be patient, for God is with those who are patient. Let no man turn his back unless it be turning to fight or joining another band.[516] Do not kill the straggler, do not finish off a wounded

514. On the river Khābūr (see the note to Ansāb, V, 210[7]; Ṭabarī's text seems to deny the possibility of Goitein's suggested alternative reading).

515. Is this the same authority as the previously named ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ghaziyyah (pp. 132, 141)? Subsequently, the name ᶜAbdallāh appears consistently (see especially p. 155 below).

516. Cf. Qur'ān, 8:16.

man and do not kill a prisoner of your confession unless he fights against you after you have captured him or he is one of those who slew our brethren at al-Ṭaff (may God have mercy on them!). This was the practice of the Commander of the Faithful, ᶜAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, regarding the people of this confession." Then Sulaymān said, "If I am killed, the commander of the people is al-Musayyab b. Najabah. If al-Musayyab falls, the commander of the people is ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl. If ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd is killed, the commander of the people is ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl. If ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl is killed, the commander of the people is Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād. May God have mercy on the man who fulfills the compact which God has made with him!" Then he sent for al-Musayyab b. Najabah with four hundred horsemen and he said to him, "Go off until you meet the first of their troops and raid them. If you observe a favorable result, carry on, but otherwise, come back to me with your men. And be sure not to dismount or allow any one of your men to dismount or go beyond that unless it is absolutely necessary."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: I was with those horsemen of al-Musayyab b. Najabah. We proceeded, traveling for the rest of that day and night. Just before dawn we camped and fastened the nosebags on our mounts. We snatched a brief doze, enough for them to chew just a little, and then we mounted them and rode on until, when the dawn appeared to us, we dismounted and performed the prayer, and then al-Musayyab went on with [557] us. He sent off Abū al-Juwayriyyah b. al-Aḥmar[517] with 100 men, ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar with 120, and Ḥanash b. Rabīᶜah Abū al-Muᶜtamir al-Kinānī with a similar number, remaining himself with 100. He said, "See whom you meet first and bring him to me." The first person we met was a bedouin herding donkeys (aḥmirah), and he was saying:

> Oh my property, do not hurry to my companions, > but graze freely, for you are the peaceful one > of the herd.

517. For the Banū al-Aḥmar, see n. 484 above.

Ibn Aḥmar said, "He means ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar. Oh Ḥumayd b. Muslim, rejoice at glad tidings, by the Lord of the Kaᶜbah!" Ibn ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar said to him, "What people do you belong to, Oh bedouin?" He answered, "I am from the Banū Taghlib." Ibn ᶜAwf said, "Please God, 'you will conquer' (ghalabtum), by the Lord of the Kaᶜbah."

Al-Musayyab b. Najabah reached us and we told him what we had heard from the bedouin. We brought the bedouin to him, and al-Musayyab b. Najabah said, "Indeed, I am pleased at your saying 'rejoice' and at your words 'Oh Ḥumayd b. Muslim!" for I hope that you will rejoice at what pleases you and it will only please you that you 'praise' (taḥmadū) your affair and 'achieve safety' (taslamū) from your enemies. This omen[518] is a good one, and the Prophet used to be pleased when he saw an omen." Then al-Musayyab b. Najabah said to the bedouin, "How far is there between us and the nearest to us of this enemy of ours?" He replied, "The nearest of their soldiers to you are those of Ibn Dhī al-Kalāᶜ. There is a dispute between him and al-Ḥuṣayn. Al-Ḥuṣayn claims command of the body of their forces, but Ibn Dhī al-Kalāᶜ told him he had no power over him. They have both sent letters to ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and they are awaiting his command. This force of Ibn Dhī al-Kalāᶜ is a mile away from you."

We left the man and hurried toward them. By God, they were completely unaware until we were on them and they were taken by surprise. We attacked the flank of their camp and, by God, we did not fight long before they were put to flight. We caused losses among their men, caused many wounds, and got possession of some of their mounts. They deserted their camp and left us free to plunder it. We took from it that which pleased us. Then al-Musayyab gave the call to us to go back, "You have won the victory, taken booty and are unharmed. Go back, therefore!" So we went back and came to Sulaymān. [558] ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād received news of what had happened, and he dispatched al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr quickly against us.

518. I.e., the omen derived from the correspondence between the names of those involved and nouns or verbs derived from the same stems; Aḥmar/aḥmira, Taghlib/ghalabtum, Ḥumayd/taḥmadū, and Muslim/taslamū.

He came with 12,000 men and we went out to meet them on Wednesday, the twenty-second of Jumādā I (January 4, 685). Sulaymān b. Ṣurad put ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl over his right wing, al-Musayyab b. Najabah over his left, while he stood fast in the centre. Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr came, having organized his army to meet us. He put Jabalah b. ᶜAbdallāh over his right wing and Rabīᶜah b. al-Mukhāriq al-Ghanawī over his left. Then they advanced against us, and when they drew near they summoned us to make common cause with them in accepting ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Marwān and to accept obedience unto him. We called upon them to hand over ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād to us so tht we could kill him in recompense for one of our brethren who had been killed, that they should cast off their allegiance to ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, and that those of the family of Ibn al-Zubayr who were in our land should be expelled. Then we would restore this authority to the family of our Prophet from among whom God brought us blessing and honor. The enemy refused our summons and we refused theirs.

[559] Ḥumayd b. Muslim: Our right wing attacked their left and defeated them, while our left wing attacked their right. Sulaymān in the center attacked the body of them, and we put them to flight and forced them back to their camp. We continued to have the upper hand over them until night fell and cut us off from them. Then we retired, having driven them back to their camp.[519] Next morning, Ibn Dhī al-Kalāᶜ came to them with 8,000 men ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād had sent to reinforce them. Ibn Ziyād abused Ibn Dhī al-Kalāᶜ and disparaged him, saying, "You acted like a novice, losing your camp and your weapons. Go to al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr. He is in charge of the men." So he joined him. Then they fell on us and we fell on them, and all day we fought against them such a fight as neither the white-haired old man nor the beardless youth had ever seen. Only the times of prayer caused us to break off fighting. When evening came and we separated, by God, they had caused us many wounded and we had inflicted wounds on them, too.

519. See Add. et emend. and Gloss., s.v. ajhara.

With us were three quṣṣāṣ,[520] Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād al-Bajalī, Ṣukhayr b. Ḥudhayfah b. Hilāl b. Mālik al-Muzanī, and Abū al-Juwayriyyah al-ᶜAbdī. Rifāᶜah was delivering stirring orations and urging on the men of the right wing unceasingly. Abū al-Juwayriyyah was wounded early on the second day and remained with the supplies. Ṣukhayr went around among us all night long saying, "Rejoice, servants of God, in His generosity and pleasure. All that is required from someone who is kept from meeting those he loves, entering heaven, and obtaining rest from the toils and injuries of this world, merely by the need for separation from this essence which is constantly urging him to evil, is that separation from it should be given generously and that he should meet his Lord joyfully."

We remained thus until next morning when Ibn Numayr and Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī appeared with about 10,000 men. They came out against us and we fought fiercely for the third day, Friday, until noon. Then the Syrians outnumbered [560] us and pressed down upon us from every side. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad saw what was happening to his men, and he dismounted and cried, "Oh servants of God! Whoever desires to come early to his Lord, repentance from his sin, and fulfillment of his undertaking, to me!" He broke the sheath of his sword and a large number of men dismounted with him, breaking their sword sheaths too. They went forward with him on foot and the enemy's horsemen sprang forward too so that they were intermingled with the foot soldiers. They fought against them until the men on foot attacked fiercely with drawn swords—they had broken the sheaths of their swords—and the cavalry attacked the enemy's horsemen, and they did not stand firm. They fought against them and killed a large number of the Syrians and wounded many.

When al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr saw the fortitude of our men and their bravery, he sent the foot soldiers to fire arrows at them while the horse and infantry surrounded them. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad was killed (may God have mercy on him). Yazīd b. al-Ḥuṣayn hit him with an arrow and he fell. He rose up again but then fell once more. After he was killed, al-Musayyab b. Najabah took the banner. He said to Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, "Oh my brother, may God have mercy on you! You spoke the truth and fulfilled your duty. Our's remains still." Then he took the banner, pressed forward with it, fought for a while and then retired. Then he pressed forward again, fought and retired. He did that repeatedly, pressing forward and retiring, and then he was killed. May God have mercy on him!

520. Literally, "storytellers," here they seem to be orators whose task it is to incite the men (see *EI*², s.v. Ḳāṣṣ).

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: At al-Madā'in I met a mawlā of al-Musayyab b. Najabah al-Fazārī with Shabīb b. Yazīd the Khārijite.[521] He told me the story as far as the report of the people of ᶜAyn al-Wardah.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: This Shaykh told me regarding al-Musayyab b. Najabah: By God, I never saw any man braver than he or than any of the band to which he belonged. I saw him on the day of ᶜAyn al-Wardah fighting [561] fiercely, and I did not think any one man could be tested as he was tested or cause so much damage to his enemy as he did. He killed many men. I heard him saying before he was killed and while he was fighting them:

She of the tumbling locks, pure of heart and breast, knows
That I, on the morning of fear and struggle, was braver than a pouncing lion,
A cutter down of my opponents, feared in all quarters.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father and maternal uncle—Ḥumayd b. Muslim and ᶜAbdallāh b. Ghaziyyah, and according to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf: When al-Musayyab b. Najabah was killed, ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl took the banner. He said (may God have mercy on him!), "My two brothers[522] are among those who 'some of them have fulfilled their vow and some of them wait (for its fulfillment), and they have not made changes (in their insistence on fulfilling 521. For Shabīb, see Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 42ff. (Eng. tr. 70ff.); EI[1], s.v.; Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 522.

522. I.e., Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and al-Musayyab b. Najabah.

it).' "[523] He advanced with those of Azd who were with him surrounding his banner, and, by God, that is how we were when three horsemen came to us, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Khaḍal al-Ṭā'ī, Kathīr b. ʿAmr al-Muzanī, and Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr al-Ḥanafī.[524] They had left with Saʿd b. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān and 170 men of al-Madā'in. Saʿd, on the day when he set out, had sent them ahead on spritely swift horses to follow in our tracks. He had told them, "Cover the ground quickly and join with our brethren. Tell them the good news about our joining them so they may be more resolute, and tell them also about the coming of the Baṣrans." (Al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ʿAbdī had set out with 300 Baṣrans and, five days after Saʿd b. Ḥudhayfah had left al-Madā'in, had advanced as far as the town of Bahurasīr.[525] His departure from al-Baṣrah previously had become known to Saʿd b. Ḥudhayfah before the latter left [562] al-Madā'in.)

When these three reached us they said, "Good news! Your brethren from al-Madā'in and al-Baṣrah have come to join you." ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl replied, "Now, if only they had come while we were still alive." Then they looked at us. When they saw the desolate state of their brethren and how many of us were wounded, they all wept and said, "We can see how much you have suffered. 'To God we belong and to Him we return!'"[526] By God, what they saw afflicted their eyes. ʿAbdallāh b. Nufayl said to them, "It was this for which we came."

Then we joined battle, and we only fought for a short while before the Muzanī was killed and the Ḥanafī stabbed. He fell among the slain but was then pulled out and saved. The Ṭā'ī, too, was stabbed and his nose cut off short, but he fought fiercely. He was a warrior and poet, and he began saying:

---

523. Qur'ān, 33:23.

524. For Siʿr's role in support of al-Mukhtār, see below pp. 189ff.; the other two do not seem to be known elsewhere.

525. On the west bank of the Tigris, slightly north of Ctesiphon (al-Madā'in); see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II and pp. 34–5.

526. A common formula acknowledging dependence on God, known as the istirjāʿ.

She of the sweet figure knows that I am not with the weak ones[527] or the cowardly
On a day, nor with the timid who stand aside.

Rabīᶜah b. al-Mukhāriq attacked us viciously and we fought fiercely. Then he and ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl exchanged blows, but their swords had no effect and they seized each other about the neck and fell to the ground. They got up and swapped blows again, and the nephew of Rabīᶜah b. al-Mukhāriq attacked ᶜAbdallāh b. Saᶜd, stabbed him in his gullet [thughrat naḥrihi] and killed him. ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar then attacked Rabīᶜah b. al-Mukhāriq, stabbed him and felled him. But he was not fatally hit and got up and assailed ᶜAbdallāh again while his companions stabbed ᶜAbdallāh and [563] downed him. However, ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf's men rescued him and Khālid b. Saᶜd b. Nufayl said, "Show me who killed my brother!" We pointed out Rabīᶜah b. al-Mukhāriq's nephew to him, and Khālid attacked him and got his sword from him, but his opponent seized him around the neck and he fell to the ground. Rabīᶜah's men attacked and so did we, but they outnumbered us and rescued their man and killed ours. There was nobody standing by our banner.

We called out to ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl after they had killed our champions. He had been surrounded alongside of us in a band of his followers, but Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād attacked and relieved him. He made toward his banner, which ᶜAbdallāh b. Ḥāzim al-Kabīrī[528] had hold of. Ibn Ḥāzim asked him to take the banner from him, but Ibn Wāl answered, "You take it for me, for I am in the same situation as you." Ibn Ḥāzim insisted, "Take your banner from me, for I wish to join in the jihād," but Ibn Wāl said, "What you are doing now is jihād and brings its rewards." We shouted out, "Oh Abū ᶜIzzah,[529] obey your commander, may God have mercy on you!" He continued to hold it for a short time, and then Ibn Wāl took it from him.

527. Read al-wanī (see Add. et emend.).
528. See nn. 486, 487 above (cf. Add. et emend.).
529. In view of the report on p. 125 above about ᶜAbdallāh b. Ḥāzim's son ᶜAzrah, it may be that the kunyah should be read as Abū ᶜAzrah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī al-Aʿwar (the one eyed)—a shaykh of the clan, who was with him on that day: Ibn Wāl said to us, "Whoever desires the life after which there is no death, the ease after which there is no exertion, and the joy after which there is no sadness, let him seek his Lord's favor by waging jihād against these profaners of God's law and by going[530] to Paradise, may God have mercy on him!" That was at the time of the afternoon prayer. He pressed hard against them, we with him, and, by God, we killed a number of men and pushed them back for a long while. But they redoubled their effort against us from all sides and pushed us back until they had us where we had started from. We were in a place where they could only come against us from one direction. Around evening, Adham b. Muḥriz al- [564] Bāhilī directed the fighting against us. He pressed hard against us with his cavalry and foot soldiers, and ʿAbdallāh b. Wāl al-Taymī was killed.

Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: During the time when al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf was governor, I heard Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī telling the tale to some of the Syrians. He said: I made my way toward one of the commanders of the Iraqis, a man whom they called ʿAbdallāh b. Wāl, and he was saying, " 'Do not count those as dead who are killed in the path of God. No, they are alive with their Lord, sustained (by Him). Rejoicing. . .' " to the end of the three verses.[531] That angered me, and I said to myself, "These people assign to us the status of polytheists, thinking that those among them whom we kill are martyrs." I then attacked him, and I was hitting at his left hand and I quickly cut it off. I drew close and said to him, "Indeed, I think you would like to be with your family now." He answered, "How wrong you are! Indeed, by God, I am glad that it was not your hand just now, unless there were in it for me a reward like there is for my hand." I said to him, "Why?" and he replied, "So that God would lay the responsibility for it on you and grant me the honor of the reward for it." That angered me so I gathered my cavalry and 530. Following the Cairo reading wa('l-rawwāḥ).

531. Qur'ān, 3:163–5.

footsoldiers and attacked him and his companions. I fought my way to him and stabbed and killed him as he unceasingly came at me. Afterward they claimed he had been one of the religious scholar [fuqahā'] among the Iraqis, frequently engaging in fasting and prayer, and giving legal rulings to the people.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—someone I trust—Ḥumayd b. Muslim and ᶜAbdallāh b. Ghaziyyah:[532] After the death of ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl, we looked and there was ᶜAbdallāh b. Ḥāzim fallen alongside him, but we thought it was Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād [565] al-Bajalī. A man of the Banū Kināna, called al-Walīd b. Ghuḍayn, said, "Hold your banner," but he (Rifāᶜah) replied, "I do not want it." I said to him, "We all belong to God! What is the matter with you?" He answered, "Let us go back, and perhaps God will gather us together again for a day which will be evil for them!" ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar rushed up to him and said, "You have ruined us! By God, if you give up and go back they will indeed be on our heels and we will not make even a farsakh before we are destroyed from behind, and, if any one of us does escape, the bedouin and the villagers will seize him and give him up to the enemy so that he will suffer death as a captive [ṣabran]. I implore you by God not to do it! Here the sun has set on us and night has enveloped us. Let us fight them on these horses of ours, for we now have some protection. When it becomes dark, we will mount our horses in the first part of the night and charge off with them. We will do thus, so when morning comes we will be journeying without haste. Each one of us will take with him a wounded man and wait for a companion, and groups of ten and twenty will travel together. The men will know the route they are taking and they will follow one another in it. But if we do what you say, no mother will see her son again nor any man know where he is going, where he falls and where he dies, and before next day we will be either dead or taken captive." Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād said, "Your opinion is most excellent!"

Then he went up to the Kinānī and said, "Will you hold it or shall I take it from you?" The Kinānī answered, "I do not want the same as you—I want to meet with my Lord, join my brethren and leave this world for the next, whereas you wish for the insubstantial things of this world, desiring survival and rejecting departure from this world. Indeed, by God, I wish you were guided aright!" Then he gave him the banner and departed to go forward, but Ibn al-Aḥmar said to him, "Stay and fight with us for a while and do not give yourself [566] up to destruction, may God have mercy on you!" And he kept on imploring him until he had persuaded him not to go.

532. The start of the following report seems to be corrupt; see Add. et emend., and cf. Ansāb, V, 210–1.

The Syrians began shouting to each other, "God has wrought their destruction! Advance on them and finish them off before night!" They started to advance, going forward as a powerful force, fighting against brave champions among whom there was no worthless man and none of whom were reluctant. They gained mastery over them and fought them furiously until the time of the evening prayer. Before evening the Kinānī was killed.

ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAzīz[533] al-Kindī came forward with his son Muḥammad, who was a small boy, and said, "Oh Syrians, is there anyone of Kindah among you?" Some men came forward from among them and said, "Yes, we are." He said, "Here is the son of your fellow-tribesman. Send him to your people in al-Kūfah. I am ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAzīz al-Kindī." They said to him, "You are our paternal cousin and you have a safe-conduct from us." But he said to them, "By God, I have no wish to be exempted from the destruction which has befallen my brethren, who were a light for our lands and peg for the earth, and in the likes of whom God was honored." His son began to weep, following his father, and ᶜAbdallāh said to him, "Oh my son, if there was anything preferable to me than obedience to my Lord, then it would be you." Seeing the anguish and tears of the son following his father, his Syrian fellow-tribesmen implored him (to accept their safe conduct), and the Syrians showed great tenderness for him and his son, so much so that they grieved and wept. Then he betook himself away from the flank from which his fellow tribesmen had come out to him and he struggled against the enemy line as evening came on and fought until he was killed.

533. Possibly to be read ᶜUzayr; cf. the ᶜUbaydallāh b. ᶜAmr b. ᶜUzayr al-Kindī mentioned in connection with the affair of Muslim b. ᶜAqīl (Ṭabarī, II, 255), but see Add. et emend. for p. 594.

[567] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj—Muslim b. Zaḥr al-Khawlānī: Kurayb b. Yazīd[534] al-Ḥimyarī went out to them on foot as evening fell with the banner of Balqā'[535] in a group of scarcely less than a hundred men, if it was less. They were talking about what Rifā'ah wanted to do when evening fell. Al-Ḥimyarī spoke to them, while men of Ḥimyar and Hamdān gathered around him, saying, "Servants of God, go to your Lord! By God, there is no substitute in anything of this world for the approval of God and turning to Him in repentance. I have heard that a group of you wish to return whence they came, to their mundane affairs, that they have put their trust in their things of this world and returned to their sins. As for me, by God, I will not turn my back on these our enemies until I reach the destination of my brethren." They responded to him and said, "We share your view," and he went on with his banner until he drew near the enemy.

Ibn Dhī al-Kalā' said, "By God, I think this is a Ḥimyarī or Hamdānī banner," and he approached and asked them, and they told him. He told them, "You have a safe conduct from us,"[536] but their leader said to him, "In this world we have a safe conduct, but we have come out seeking the safe conduct of the world to come." Then they fought against the enemy until they were slain.

Ṣukhayr b. Ḥudhayfah b. Hilāl b. Mālik al-Muzanī came out on foot with thirty men of the Muzaynah. He said to them, "Do not fear death in God, for He will meet you; do not go back to the worldly things which you left behind to come to God, for they have no permanence for you; and do not renounce the rewards of God which you desire, for what is with God is a blessing for you." Then they went on and fought until they were slain.

At evening, when the Syrians went back to their camp, Rifā'ah examined every man who had been wounded and every 534. Text reads Zayd, but cf. p. 134 above and see Add. et emend.

535. See p. 69 and n. 321 above.
536. Because he himself was a Ḥimyarī.

injured man who could not help himself and handed him over to his own group. Then he led the people on the way during the whole of that night until next morning he had reached al-Tunaynir,[537] where he crossed the Khābūr river and cut the [568] bridges, and he continued on his way cutting every bridge he came to. Next day, al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr sent out and found they had left, but he did not send anyone in pursuit of them. Rifāᶜah led the people, hurrying on, and he made Abū al-Juwayriyyah al-ᶜAbdī take up the rear with seventy horsemen to give cover. Whenever they came on someone who had fallen off, he picked him up, or, if they came on any equipment and goods which had fallen off, he took possession until he knew whose it was. If it was being sought or needed, he sent to Rifāᶜah and informed him.

They continued in this way until they came to Qarqīsiyā from the open land side, where Zufar sent them food and fodder as he had done on the first occasion. He also sent them physicians and told them, "Stay here with us as long as you like, and you will find generosity and liberality." They stayed for three days and then each man of them provisioned himself with as much food and fodder as he liked.

Saᶜd b. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān continued on his way until he reached Hīt, where the bedouin came to him and told him what had happened to Ibn Ṣurad's men. Thereupon he turned back. At Ṣandūdā'[538] he met al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ᶜAbdī and told him the news. They waited there until they heard the news that Rifāᶜah was approaching, and, when he drew near the place, they went out to receive him. The men greeted each other and wept for each other, and they told one another of their brethren's death. For a day and a night they remained there, and then the men of al-Madā'in returned to al-Madā'in, the Baṣrans to al-Baṣrah, and the Kūfans proceeded to al-Kūfah where they found al-Mukhtār imprisoned.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd b. Jābir b. Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī told us that he brought tidings of victory to ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, who 537. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 887.

538. Ibid., III, 420.

went up on the minbar, praised God and extolled Him, and then said:

[569] God has destroyed the spreader of disorder and commotion [fitnah] and the head of error among the leaders of the Iraqis, Sulaymān b. Ṣurad; Oh, the swords have left the head of al-Musayyab b. Najabah spinning like a top; Oh, God has killed two great heads among their leaders who wandered in error and led others into error, ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd, brother of the Azd, and ʿAbdallāh b. Wāl, brother of Bakr b. Wāʾil. After these there is none left with power or strength.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: I was told that al-Mukhtār waited about a fortnight and then said to his supporters, "Count the days for this warrior lord of yours, more than ten but less than a month. Then there will come to you false news of a forceful attack and a cutting blow and much killing and stoning. Whoever is for it, I shall be for it! Do not be deceived, I shall be for it!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd—Abān b. al-Walīd: While he was still in prison, al-Mukhtār wrote to Rifāʿah b. Shaddād after he came from ʿAyn al-Wardah:

> Now, welcome to the bands whose reward God made great when they set out and whose coming back He was pleased with when they returned. Verily, by the Lord of the building which He built, no one of you has taken a step or made a move but that God's reward for him is greater than sovereignty over this world. Sulaymān fulfilled his duty, and God took him and placed his spirit with those of the prophets, the righteous ones, the martyrs, and the upright. But he was never your lord, he with whom you would be rendered victorious! I myself am the designated leader, the trusted one, the commander of the army, the fighter against the tyrants, the taker of vengeance from the enemies of the religion, and the securer of the vital places. Make ready and stand prepared, rejoice and be glad! I call you to the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet, to the seeking of vengeance for the blood of the family, to the defense of the weak, and jihād against the profaners of God's law. Peace be with you! [570]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zuhayr al-ᶜAbsī: The people were talking about this business of al-Mukhtār, and ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad heard about it. They came out with the troops, went to al-Mukhtār and seized him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: When we were ready to go back, ᶜAbdallāh b. Ghaziyyah said, standing over the fallen, "May God have mercy on you! You have been true and borne your suffering patiently. We have been false and fled." And when we had set out next day, there was ᶜAbdallāh b. Ghaziyyah with about twenty men wanting to go back and meet the enemy. Rifāᶜah, ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar and a group of the leading men went and said to them, "We implore you by God not to make our flight more desolate or to weaken us further! We shall not cease to do good so long as there remain among us men with a firm purpose like you." They kept on at them imploring them in that way until they had caused them to change their minds, except for a man of Muzaynah called ᶜUbaydah b. Sufyān, who rode along with them until, when their attention was distracted, turned back and met the Syrians, threatening them with his sword and striking at them until he was killed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd al-Azdī—Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī: That man of Muzaynah was a friend of mine. When he went off I implored him by God, but he said, "You have never asked me for anything of this world when I have not recognized that I had a duty toward you to give it to you. But I am seeking God by that which you are asking of me now." He separated from me and met the enemy and was killed. By God, I wanted nothing more than to meet someone who could tell me about him and how he had fared when he met the enemy. [571]

In Mecca I met ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Juz' b. al-Ḥidrijān al-Azdī. A conversation developed between us in which a reference to that day occurred, and he said, "I marveled at what I saw on the day of ᶜAyn al-Wardah after the destruction of the army—a man came and threatened me with his sword and we set out toward him." When he reached the man he saw that he was wounded and was saying:

I am from God and to God I flee;
Oh my God, I proclaim your favor and I make glad!

"We said to him, 'Who are your people?' and he answered, 'The descendants of Adam.' We said, 'Who?' and he answered, 'I do not want to know you or you to know me, Oh destroyers of the sacred sanctuary.' Sulaymān b. ᶜAmr b. Muḥṣin al-Azdī of the Banū al-Khiyār[539] engaged him. At that time he was one of the bravest of our men. They wore each other down. Then the men came down on him from all sides and killed him. By God, I have never seen anyone more valiant than he." When he told me this, I being so anxious to find out about him, tears came to my eyes, and he asked me, "Was there any tie of relationship between you and him?" "No," I replied. "That was a man of Muḍar who was a friend and brother to me." He said to me, "May God cause your tears to continue! Do you weep for a man of Muḍar who was killed in pursuit of error!" I answered, "No, by God, he was not killed in pursuit of error but of a clear sign from his Lord and following divine guidance." He said to me, "May God thrust you into the same place as him!" I said, "Amen! And may He thrust you into the place where He has thrust al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr! And may He cause you to continue weeping for him!" Then we both stood up.

Among the poetry recited on that subject are the words of Aᶜshā Hamdān,[540] and this is one of the underground[541] poems which were composed at that time:[542]

---

539. See Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 347, s.v. Ḥiyar b. Saᶜd.
540. See *EI*², s.v.
541. See Add. et emend.
542. See R. Geyer (ed.), Gedichte von 'Abû Baṣîr Maimûn ibn Qais al-Aᶜshâ, London, 1928, 315 (among the poems of Aᶜshā Hamdān), Murūj, V, 220 (begins at l. 30).

An image of you has drawn near, Oh Umm Ghālib, [572] and you are given our greeting from a distant loved one.
You are still for me an object of distress and I am still pining on account of a grief which has assailed me from being separated from you.
Whatever I forget, I will never forget your turning in the morning, to us with the fair and comely maidens.
There showed herself to us, slim, narrow of waist, graceful of hips, full in the bottom,
Elegant and beautiful, a young girl whose youth is like the morning sun smiling between the clouds.
When the clouds and their shadows cover her, a small part of her still shows and she jealously guards what still shows.
This passion is for me craving and desire.
Love with it a beloved who is not near.
May God not disdain youth and its remembrance, or the powerful love of full-breasted women!
Our sweet rebukes increase just as my desire and my abundant tears for the dear friend who is near.
If I do not forget them, I will recall the pain of loss of a hidden treasure of noble [573] origin.
He made entreaties to God truthfully, and fear of God achieves the best of rewards.
And he abstained from this world and did not get involved in it, but turned in repentance to God, the Lofty, the Most High.
He abandoned this world and said, "I have cast it away, and, so long as I live, I will not return to it.
I am not concerned with that, the loss of which people think important, and strive to obtain it with all their effort."

It caused him to set out on the signposted roads, against Ibn Ziyād leading troops who put all to flight,
With a throng who were people of divine fear and understanding,
one who was active in courage and noble of lineage.
They passed on, leaving Ibn Ṭalḥah to his own thoughts, and answering not the governor who addressed them.
They journeyed on together with the seeker after piety, and another one repenting what he had done in the past.
[574] At ʿAyn al-Wardah, they met the army which was setting out against them, and they slaughtered them with cutting swords Of Yemen, smashing the fist, and sometimes with noble horses, well-bred and long in the body.
There came against them a host from Syria, and after it hosts from every side, like the breakers of the sea.
They did not cease until their noble ones were destroyed, and none of them escaped there except for a few.
The steadfast ones were abandoned, fallen, and the wind from the east and from all sides came to buffet them.
The Khuzāʿī chief[543] was pierced with a lance,
as if he had never once fought or made war.
The chief of the Banū Shamkh[544] the hero of his people

543. I.e., Sulaymān b. Ṣurad.
544. Subtribe of Fazārah (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, 525), i.e., al-Musayyab b. Najabah.

of Shanū'ah,[545] the Taymī,[546] the leader of the detachments, ᶜAmr b. Bishr, al-Walīd,[547] Khālid, Zayd b. Bakr, al-Ḥulays b. Ghālib,
And from Hamdān a striker from every segment, the noblest of those acquiring divine reward did not shrink when he pressed forward.
The leader of every clan has been struck down, and the one of noble descent in the piercing peak of glory.
They rejected everything apart from a blow, the fall of which would cleave the head asunder and a thrust with the piercing tips of the spears.
Saᶜīd,[548] on the day when he perished, full of vigor, was braver than a pouncing lion of Durnā.
Oh best of armies, for Iraq and its people, you have been given drink out of water skins pouring forth blood.
Our champions and our defenders did not withdraw when the war became vehement.
If they were killed, then that is the most noble of deaths, and one day every young man will be one of the dead.
They were not slain before they had hurled themselves in fury at a group of those who violate God's law, like the charging of billy goats.

Sulaymān b. Ṣurad and those of the Penitents who were killed with him at ᶜAyn al-Wardah were slain in the month of Rabīᶜ II.

In this year also, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam ordered the Syrians to give the oath of allegiance to his two sons ᶜAbd al-Malik

545. Azd Shanū'ah are one of the four branches of Azd, i.e., ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAwf b. al-Aḥmar (?).
546. ᶜAbdallāh b. Wāl.
547. Al-Walīd b. Ghuḍayn (?).
548. Saᶜīd b. Munqidh al-Hamdānī (?).

and ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz in succession to himself, and he appointed the two of them as his heirs apparent.[549]

Marwān's Designation of His Two Sons ᶜAbd al-Malik and ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz as His Heirs Apparent

According to Hishām—ᶜAwānah: After ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd b. al-ᶜĀṣ al-Ashdaq had defeated Musᶜab b. al-Zubayr, when the latter's brother ᶜAbdallāh sent him to Palestine,[550] he turned back to return to Marwān. At that time, Marwān was in Damascus, having won control over all Syria and Egypt. He heard that ᶜAmr was saying the rule would pass to him after Marwān and that he was claiming Marwān had made him a promise. Marwān, therefore, called Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal and told him that he wanted to take the oath of allegiance for his two sons ᶜAbd al-Malik and ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz in succession to himself and he told him what he had heard about ᶜAmr b. Saᶜīd. Ḥassān said, "I will deal with ᶜAmr for you!" When the people had gathered in front of Marwān in the evening, Ibn Baḥdal stood and said, "We have heard that there are some men who have fanciful desires. Stand and give the oath of allegiance to ᶜAbd al-Malik and to ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz after him!" So the people stood and gave the oath of allegiance down to the last man.

In this year too, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam died in Damascus at the beginning of the month of Ramaḍān (April 10, 685).[551]

[577]

The Death of Marwān

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saᶜd—Muḥammad b. ᶜUmar—Mūsā b. Yaᶜqūb—Abū al-Ḥuwayrith: When death came to Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd Abū Laylā, he refused to appoint anyone as caliph after him. Ḥassān b. Baḥdal desired that the authority after Muᶜāwiyah b. Yazīd should be made over to the latter's 549. For the following account, cf. Ansāb, V, 149–50.

550. See above, p. 64.
551. For what follows, cf. Ansāb, V, 159–60.

brother, Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah.[552] Khālid was a minor, and Ḥassān b. Mālik was the maternal uncle of his father, Yazīd b. Muᶜāwiyah.[553] Ḥassān gave the oath of allegiance to Marwān, but he wanted authority after him to be made over to Khālid b. Yazīd. When he and the Syrians gave the oath of allegiance to Marwān, it was suggested to Marwān, "Marry Khālid's mother [his mother was Umm Khālid, the daughter of Abū Hāshim b. ᶜUtbah][554] so you can diminish his importance and he will not seek the caliphate." So he married her.

One day, Khālid went in to Marwān, with whom there was a large group of people. Khālid was walking between the lines of people and Marwān said, "By God, I do not know anyone more stupid than he! Come up here, you son of a whore [yā 'bna al-raṭbati 'l-ist]." He was abrupt with him in order to diminish him in the eyes of the Syrians. Khālid returned to his mother and told her. She said to him, "You must not let this become known. Keep it quiet and I will deal with him for you." Marwān went to her and asked her, "Did Khālid say anything about me to you?" She answered, "Khālid say anything about you! Khālid has too much respect for you to say anything about you," and he believed her. She waited some days and then, when Marwān was sleeping with her, she suffocated him with a pillow and killed him.

Abū Jaᶜfar said: Marwān's death was in the month of Ramaḍān (April-May 685) in Damascus, and he was 63 years old, according to al-Wāqidī. Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, however, said that on the day of his death he was 61. It is [578] also said that when he died he was 71, also 81. His kunyah was Abū ᶜAbd al-Malik, and he was Marwān b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ᶜĀṣ b. Umayyah b. ᶜAbd Shams. His mother was Āminah bint ᶜAlqamah b. Ṣafwān b. Umayyah al-Kinānī. After the oath of allegiance was given to him as caliph, he lived for 9 months, and it is also said for 10 months, but 3 days.

Before his death, he had dispatched two expeditions, one of them to Medina under Ḥubaysh b. Duljah al-Qaynī,[555] the

552. See above, n. 253.
553. See above, n. 274.
554. See above, p. 65 and n. 307.
555. On him, see Crone, Slaves, 96–7; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, index; the Banū al-Qayn (or Bal-Qayn) b. Jasr of Quḍāᶜah (see EI², s.v. al-Ḳayn).

other to Iraq under ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād had got as far as al-Jazīrah when the news of Marwān's death reached him. The Penitents among the people of al-Kūfah had gone out against him seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn, and what happened to them has already been mentioned.[556] Please God, we shall report the remainder of the information about ᶜUbaydallāh until he was killed.

The Failure of the Syrian Expedition against Medina

In this year too, Ḥubaysh b. Duljah was killed.[557] According to what is reported from Hishām—ᶜAwānah b. al-Ḥakam, Ḥubaysh b. Duljah had got as far as Medina, where Jābir b. al-Aswad b. ᶜAwf,[558] the nephew of ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. ᶜAwf, had been given authority by ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr. Jābir fled from Ḥubaysh, but then al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah,[559] the brother of ᶜUmar b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah, sent an army from al-Baṣrah to fight Ḥubaysh b. Duljah. ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr had made al-Ḥārith prefect of al-Baṣrah. Com-[579] manding the army was al-Ḥantaf b. al-Sijf al-Tamīmī.[560] When Ḥubaysh b. Duljah heard about them, he left Medina to go out against them, and ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr sent ᶜAbbās b. Sahl b. Saᶜd al-Anṣārī[561] to govern Medina with orders to pursue Ḥubaysh b. Duljah until the army of al-Baṣrah under al-Ḥantaf, which had come to help Ibn al-Zubayr, should arrive. ᶜAbbās hurriedly set off following them and caught up with them at al-Rabadhah.[562] Ibn Duljah's men had advised him, "Leave 556. See above, pp. 124–59.

557. For what follows, cf. Ansāb, V, 150–9.

558. On him, see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 273 (and see n. 92 above).

559. His brother's name indicates that the Leiden text is lacking ibn ᶜAbdallāh after the name al-Ḥārith, and see p. 43 and n. 211 above.

560. Text reads al-Ḥunayf b. al-Sijf, but see the note to Ansāb, V, 151[12], and Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 297.

561. See Add. et emend. for the name and cf. pp. 111ff. above for a report from him; he was of the Banū Sāᶜidah/Khazraj (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 103).

562. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 748f: a settlement of Medina, 3 amyāl from Dhāt ᶜIrq, on the Ḥijāz road coming from Fayd toward Mecca.

them alone, do not rush into an engagement with them." He, however, said, "I shall not rest until I have eaten some of their muqannad" (meaning sawīq sweetened with qand).[563] He was killed by an arrow fired by an unknown man.[564] Also killed were al-Mundhir b. Qays al-Judhāmī and Abū ʿUqāb,[565] the mawlā of Abū Sufyān. Also with him on that day were Yūsuf b. al-Ḥakam and al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf,[566] and the two of them only managed to escape on the same camel. About five hundred of them were held in custody in the prison tent[567] of Medina. ʿAbbās said to them, "Throw yourselves on my judgment!" They did so and he cut off their heads. The fugitives from Ḥubaysh's army returned to Syria.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: He who killed Ḥubaysh b. Duljah the day of al-Rabadhah was Yazīd b. Siyāh al-Uswārī;[568] he shot him with an arrow and killed him. When they entered Medina, Yazīd b. Siyāh was sitting on a grey nag and wearing white clothes, but it was not long before his clothes became black, as I saw, from that which the people anointed him with and the perfumes they poured over him.

The Plague of al-Jārif in al-Baṣrah

Abū Jaʿfar said: In this year too there broke out in al-Baṣrah the plague known as the plague of al-Jārif. A great number of Baṣrans perished in it.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb [580] b. Jarīr: My father told me on the authority of al-Muṣʿab b. Zayd that al-Jārif broke out while ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh

563. The gloss on al-muqannad is in the text. Sawīq is a sort of broth made with barley or other flour (see EI[1], s.v. sawīḳ), qand is the solidified extract of sugar cane (cf. Eng. "candy").

564. Ar. sahmu gharb (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. gharb).

565. Cairo reads Abū ʿAttāb; he is missing from the parallel passage, Ansāb, V, 155–6.

566. The future important governor of Iraq, al-Ḥajjāj (see EI[2], s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj), and his father.

567. See Dozy, Suppl., s.v. ʿamūd, for the suggestion "prison tent." Ansāb, V, 156, has ʿamūd al-Rabadhah, and cf. the note ad loc. for the suggestion that it should be understood as the name of a place.

568. A descendant of the Persian cavalry troops which had gone over to the Arabs during the period of conquest (see n. 149 above).

b. Maᶜmar had authority over al-Baṣrah. His mother died in it and no one could be found to carry her bier, so they had to hire four non-Arabs. They carried her to her grave, and he was the governor at that time![569]

In this year also, the strength of the Khawārij in al-Baṣrah increased and Nāfiᶜ b. Azraq was killed.[570]

The Threat to al-Baṣrah from Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq and the Khārijites and al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah's Victory over Them

According to ᶜUmar b. Shabbah—Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—Muḥammad b. Zubayr: ᶜUbaydallāh b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Maᶜmar sent his brother ᶜUthmān b. ᶜUbaydallāh[571] with an army against Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq. He came up against them at Dūlāb,[572] where ᶜUthmān was killed and his army routed.

According to ᶜUmar—Zuhayr—Wahb—Muḥammad b. Abī ᶜUyaynah—Sabrah b. Nakhf: Ibn Maᶜmar ᶜUbaydallāh sent his brother ᶜUthmān against Ibn al-Azraq, but his army was routed and he was killed.

According to Wahb: My father told me the Baṣrans sent an army under Ḥārithah b. Badr.[573] When he met the Khawārij he said to his men:

Feed your guest with karnib and get water from a dūlāb, but depart wherever you wish.[574]

---

569. For ᶜUbaydallah b. ᶜUbaydallāh, see p. 45 and n. 224 above. Cf. p. 46 above, where this story is related of ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith Babbah and the authority for it is named as al-Ṣaᶜb b. Zayd.

570. See pp. 97–105 above for Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq's previous history. For the following, cf. Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien 32ff. (Eng. tr. 45ff); Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 80ff. Variants and parallels: Aghānī, VI, 3–7; Ansāb, IVb, 115, XI, 78–109; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 616–20, 623ff.

571. Ibn Maᶜmar al-Taymī (Quraysh). See p. 45 above for his brothers, but cf. Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 288, which, although mentioning ᶜUthmān b. ᶜUbaydallāh who was killed by the Ḥarūriyyah, does not refer to ᶜUbaydallāh b. ᶜUbaydallāh (ᶜUmar b. ᶜUbaydallāh is referred to in ibid., 189).

572. In the vicinity of Ahwāz (Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 622).

573. Of the Banū Ghudāna b. Yarbūᶜ b. Ḥanẓalah of Tamīm (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 316).

574. Karnib is a dish of dates mixed with milk; a dūlāb is a water wheel. Cf. p. 169 below.

According to ᶜUmar—Zuhayr—Wahb—his father and Muḥammad b. Abī ᶜUyaynah—Muᶜāwiyah b. Qurrah: We went with Ibn ᶜUbays to fight.[575] When we met the Khawārij in battle, Ibn al-Azraq was killed as well as two or three sons of al-Māḥūz, and Ibn ᶜUbays was killed. [581]

Abū Jaᶜfar (al-Ṭabarī): As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he reported a narrative about Ibn al-Azraq and the sons of al-Māḥūz from Abū Mikhnaf on the authority of Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī which is different from the narrative of ᶜUmar b. Shabbah from Zuhayr b. Ḥarb on the authority of Wahb b. Jarīr.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad's report: Because the Baṣrans were involved with the dispute between the Azd, Rabīᶜah and Tamīm which arose from Masᶜūd b. ᶜAmr's killing, the power of Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq increased and his followers became more numerous. He set out toward al-Baṣrah and, when he approached the bridge, ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith sent Muslim b. ᶜUbays b. Kurayz b. Rabīᶜah b. Ḥabīb b. ᶜAbd Shams b. ᶜAbd Manāf with the Baṣrans against him. He went out to meet Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq and began pushing him away from al-Baṣrah, keeping him out of its territory. Eventually he came to a place in the territory of al-Ahwāz called Dūlāb.

The men prepared to face one another and marched against each other. Muslim b. ᶜUbays put al-Ḥajjāj b. Bāb al-Ḥimyarī[576] over his right wing and Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Tamīmī, al-Ghudānī, over his left. Ibn Azraq had over his right wing ᶜAbīdah b. Hilāl al-Yashkurī[577] and over his left al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz al-Tamīmī. They met in battle and clashed and the men fought more fiercely than had ever been seen. Muslim b. ᶜUbays, the commander of the Baṣrans, and Nāfiᶜ b. al-Azraq, the chief of the Khawārij, were killed. The Baṣrans gave al-Ḥajjāj b. Bāb al-Ḥimyarī the command over them, while the Azāriqah appointed ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Māḥūz.

Then they began fighting again more fiercely. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Bāb al-Ḥimyarī, the commander of the Baṣrans, was killed, [582]

575. See pp. 104f. above and Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 437.
576. I am unable to identify him further.
577. See pp. 99f. above.

and so was ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Māḥūz, the commander of the Azāriqah. The Baṣrans made Rabīᶜah al-Ajdham al-Tamīmī[578] their commander, while the Khawārij made ᶜUbaydallāh b. al-Māḥūz theirs. They began fighting again and continued until evening. Some of them had experienced a reaction against this mutual hostility and a revulsion against the fighting, and were desisting and holding back from the others, when there joined the Khawārij a large detachment of theirs which had not taken part in the battle. They attacked in the sector of ᶜAbd al-Qays and the Baṣrans were defeated. Rabīᶜah al-Ajdham, the commander of the Baṣrans, fought and was killed, and Ḥārithah b. Badr took hold of the Baṣrans' banner. He fought for a time after his men had withdrawn, protecting their rear with the more resolute and steadfast of the men. Then he went off with the men and made camp with them at al-Ahwāz. Referring to that, the poet of the Khawārij[579] said:

Oh heart without hunger or thirst!
and Oh my heart which loves Umm Ḥakīm!
If she had been with me on the day of Dūlāb, she would have seen the thrusting in battle of a man not base.
In the morning (the slain of) Bakr b. Wā'il floated in the water, and we set the heads of the horses against Tamīm.
The first of our swords were directed against ᶜAbd al-Qays, and the shaykhs of the Azd ignominiously swam!

The Baṣrans heard about that and it terrified and frightened them. In view of the crisis, Ibn al-Zubayr sent al-Ḥārith b.
[583] ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah al-Qurashī, and he came and removed ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith from office. The Khawārij advanced toward al-Baṣrah, and then, when the Baṣrans were in this crisis, al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah[580] arrived, coming from ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and bringing his investiture over Khurāsān. Al-Aḥnaf said to al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabīᶜah and to the Baṣrans generally, "By God, only al-Muhallab is fit for this task!" The notables, therefore, went out and spoke with him about leading the fighting against the Khawārij. He, however, answered, "I will not! This which I have with me is the investiture by the Commander of the Faithful over Khurāsān, and I would never disregard his investiture and his command." Ibn Abī Rabīᶜah called him and spoke to him about it, but he answered in like manner. Ibn Abī Rabīᶜah and the Baṣrans then agreed that they would fabricate a letter from Ibn al-Zubayr:

578. Al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 616, and Ansāb, XI, 86, call him Rabīᶜ b. ᶜAmr al-Ajdham al-Ghudānī (the Banū Ghudāna b. Yarbūᶜ of Tamīm).

579. Elsewhere, this poet is variously named: Qaṭarī b. al-Fujāᶜah (al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 214, 618f.); Ibn Sahm al-Tamīmī (Ansāb, XI, 84); and Ṣāliḥ b. ᶜAbdallāh al-ᶜAbshamī (ibid., 88–9).

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. From ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr to al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, greeting! I praise God, other than whom there is no other god, hoping for His favor on you. Now, al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh has written to me that the renegade [al-māriqah] Azāriqah have smitten an army of the Muslims which was large and contained many of the notables, and he has reported that they have advanced on al-Baṣrah. I had sent you to Khurāsān and written an investiture over it for you, but since he has reported the matter of these Khawārij I have decided that you will be in charge of the fight against them. I hope that your omens will be good and a blessing for the people of your garrison town. The reward for that will be greater than for going to Khurāsān, so go against them rightly guided, fight the enemies of God and of you, and protect your rights and those of the people of your garrison town. Neither Khurāsān nor any of the other lands under our authority will pass you by, God willing. Peace and the mercy of God be upon you! [584]

He was brought this document and when he had read it he said, "By God, I will not go against them unless you make over to me what I win possession of, you give me out of the treasury the wherewithal to fortify those who go with me, and I can choose whomever I wish from among the champions, the leaders and the noble ones of the people." All of the men of al-Baṣrah conceded that to him, and he then said, "Write a contract for me with the fifths[581] to that effect!" They did so except for Mālik b. Misma' and a section of Bakr b. Wā'il, and al-Muhallab held that against them. Al-Aḥnaf, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān,[582] and the notables of al-Baṣrah said to al-Muhallab, "What does it matter that Mālik b. Misma' and those of his companions who follow him will not subscribe to you, when all the other people of al-Baṣrah have given you what you wanted in that respect! Can Mālik oppose the community of the people? Can he do that? Consider, man, make up your mind about your own business, and go against your enemy."

580. See above, p. 71 and n. 330.

Al-Muhallab did that and appointed commanders over the fifths. He made 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān commander over the fifth of Bakr b. Wā'il and al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl al-Sa'dī[583] over that of Tamīm. The Khawārij, under 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Māḥūz, advanced as far as the little bridge. Al-Muhallab went out against them with the notables, champions and prominent people among the Baṣrans, and drove them away from the bridge. That was the first thing the Baṣrans pushed them back from, and they would have needed nothing more to enter the town. They retired to the bigger bridge. Then al-Muhallab got his men ready and went against them with his horse and [585] infantry. When the Khawārij saw that al-Muhallab had kept up the pressure on them and reached their positions, they withdrew another stage beyond that, but he continued pushing them back and forcing them to withdraw, stage after stage and halt after halt, until finally they reached one of the halts of al-Ahwāz called Sillā wa-Sillabrā[584] where they stopped.

581. Al-Baṣrah was organized in five units, each containing a number of tribal fragments (see *EI*², s.v. al-Baṣra).

582. Of Taymallāh b. Tha'labah (Bakr b. Wā'il): Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 563 and Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, Index.

583. See p. 178 below, where he is given the more specific nisbah al-Quray'ī (of the Banū Sa'd/Tamīm): see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 300.

584. Variously written in different sources (see footnote to text).

When Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Ghudānī heard that al-Muhallab had been given command of the fighting against the Azāriqah, he said to those of his men with him:

Feed your guest with karnib and get water from a dūlāb, but depart wherever you wish, for the amīr is al-Muhallab.

Those who were with him then set off in the direction of al-Baṣrah but al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīʿah diverted them toward al-Muhallab. When al-Muhallab camped with his men, he dug a ditch around himself, posted lookouts, sent out spies and placed sentries. His army continued in its battle lines, with the soldiers organized according to their banners and fifths, and men were entrusted with watching the entrances to the ditch. And whenever the Khawārij wished to make a night attack on al-Muhallab, they found the issue was already decided and withdrew. They never fought anyone who was more resolute against them or more angry against their hearts than al-Muhallab.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAwf b. al-Aḥmar: One of those Khārijīs told him that the Khawārij sent ʿAbīdah b. Hilāl and al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz by night with two large troops of horse against al-Muhallab's camp. Al-Zubayr came from his right flank and ʿAbīdah from his left; they proclaimed the battle cry "God is most great!" and shouted out at the men, but found they were in good order and in their battle lines, on the watch and ready, and they could not fall on the army unaware or obtain any advantage over them. When they had withdrawn in order to go back, ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān called out to them saying: [586]

"You have found us holding firm and standing steady, not treacherously opened up nor tottering feebly.

Far from it! When we are shouted at we refuse to comply. Oh people of Hell, indeed, hurry to it soon, for it is your resting place and your abode!" They answered, "Oh wicked one, is Hell kept for anyone but you and your kind? It was prepared for the unbelievers and you are one of them!" He said, "Are you listening? I would emancipate every slave I possess if you entered Paradise and there remained between Safawān and the furthest boulder of land of Khurāsān any Magian, who marries his mother, his daughter and his sister, who would not enter it also!"[585] ᶜAbīdah answered him, "Be silent, Oh wicked one! You are merely a slave of the contumacious tyrant [al-jabbār al-ᶜanīd] and a wazīr of the iniquitous unbeliever [al-ẓālim al-kafūr]." Ibn Ẓabyān said, "Oh wicked one, you are the enemy of the Godfearing believer and the wazīr of the accursed Satan."[586] The men said to Ibn Ẓabyān, "God has given you success, Oh Ibn Ẓabyān. By God, you have given the wicked one the right answer and you have spoken the truth!"

Next morning, al-Muhallab brought out the men arraigned in their formations and fifths. Their positions were: the Azd and Tamīm on the right, Bakr b. Wā'il and ᶜAbd al-Qays on the left, and the Ahl al-ᶜĀliyah[587] in the middle, the center of the army. The Khawārij came out with ᶜAbīdah b. Hilāl al-Yashkurī over their right, and al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz over their left. They were better equipped and had more noble horses and more weapons than the Baṣrans because they had gone [587] through the land, stripping it bare and devouring everything between Kirmān and al-Ahwāz. They came wearing helmets which weighed down their heads, suits of armor which they trailed behind, and thigh pieces of chain mail which they fastened by iron hooks to their belts. The men met and fought a battle of the fiercest sort. For most of the day, they withstood one another, and then the Khawārij as a whole bore down on the Baṣrans in a way not to be stood. The Baṣrans panicked and turned tail in that flight in which a mother does not heed her child, until the fugitives reached al-Baṣrah, fearing they would be taken captive.

---

585. For Safawān, see Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 97f. (presumably the place meant here is the spring "one stage from the Mirbad gate of al-Baṣrah"). The Zoroastrian practice of endogamy frequently figures in Muslim polemic against the "Magians."

586. For the epithet "accursed" (al-rajīm), see Jeffery, Foreign vocabulary, s.v.

587. The name for one of the fifths of al-Baṣrah, consisting of various tribal groups, including Quraysh, sometimes explained (convincingly?) by reference to the connection between the tribes of which it was formed and the high ground of the Ḥijāz.

Al-Muhallab hastened and got before them to an elevated spot at the side away from the paths taken by the fugitives. Then he called out to the men, "To me, to me, Oh servants of God!" and a group of his own people rejoined him and a detachment of ᶜUmān.[588] About 3,000 of them joined him. When he saw those who had joined him, he was pleased with their company, and he praised God and extolled Him and then said:

> Now, many a time God assigns the larger number to their own devices and they are defeated, while He sends down His help upon the smaller number and they achieve the victory. By my life, now you are not few in number. I am pleased with your company. You are men of resolution and patience in the face of hardships and you are the true warriors of your garrison town. I do not want any of those who were put to flight to be with you, for they, if they were among you, would only cause you more confusion. I have decided that each one of you should pick up ten stones. Then go with us toward their camp, for just now they feel secure and their horsemen have gone off searching for your brethren. By God, I hope their horse will not return before you have sacked their camp and killed their commander!

They did what he asked, and then he headed back with them, and, by God, the Khawārij knew nothing until al-Muhallab attacked them with the Muslims on the edge of their camp. Then ᶜUbaydallāh b. al-Māḥūz and his men advanced [588] to meet them clad in full armor and fully armed. Each man of al-Muhallab's made for one of the enemy and took aim at his face with the stone he carried, so that he could stun him and afterward stab him with his spear or hack at him with his sword. Before they had fought for very long, ᶜUbaydallāh b. al-Māḥūz had been slain, God had smote the leaders of his men, and al-Muhallab had seized the enemy's camp with everything in it and inflicted a devastating slaughter on the Azāriqah.

588. The division of Azd known as Azd ᶜUmān (al-Muhallab's tribe).

Those who had gone off in pursuit of the Baṣrans now came returning to their camp, but al-Muhallab had put horsemen and footmen on the road to seize and kill them. They fell back in retreat, defeated, slain, fought against and vanquished, and went away to Kirmān and the outskirts of Iṣfahān, while al-Muhallab remained in al-Ahwāz. Al-Ṣalatān al-ᶜAbdī[589] said with reference to that day:

At Sillā wa-Sillabrā was the destruction of youths, who were noble and slaughtered ones whose cheeks were never comforted.[590]

When the Khawārij withdrew, indeed, men who had formerly been around five or six different campfires now gathered around a single one as a result of the rout and the paucity of their numbers until reinforcements joined them from al-Baḥrayn.

They retreated, then, in the direction of Kirmān and Iṣfahān while al-Muhallab remained in al-Ahwāz, and he continued there until Muṣᶜab[591] came to al-Baṣrah and removed al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah from office as governor. When al-Muhallab had achieved his victory over the Azāriqah, he wrote:

In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. To the governor al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh from al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, greetings! I give praise, hoping [589] that He will favor you, to God, other than whom there is no god. Now, praise be to God who granted victory to the Commander of the Faithful, vanquished the transgressors, sent down His punishment upon them, slaughtered them in every way and drove them away completely. I wish to inform the governor, may God favor him, that we met the Azāriqah at a place in the territory of al-Ahwāz called Sillā wa-Sillabrā. We marched against them and then struggled with them and fought a battle of the hardest sort for a long time

589. Qutham b. Khabīᶜah al-Ṣalatān of ᶜAbd al-Qays/Rabīᶜa (Caskel, II, 473, Aghānī, XXI, 28).

590. I.e., they were not properly buried.

591. Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr, sent by his brother to al-Baṣrah to be governor.

during the day. But then detachments of the Azāriqah gathered together and made attacks on parties of the Muslims and defeated them. Among the Muslims there was confusion, which I feared would become a real flight.[592] When I saw that, I repaired to an elevated place and went upon it. Then I called out, "To me, my clan in particular and the Muslims in general!" A number of groups willing to sell themselves in their desire for the favor of God, men of religion, fortitude and patience in the face of hardship, uprightness and fidelity, rejoined me. With them I headed for the enemy's camp, in which was the mass of their men, their keen blades, and their commander with, gathered around him, those of them possessed of merit and a firm purpose. We fought for a while, firing arrows and thrusting with spears, and then the two sides had recourse to swords, the fight with which was for an hour of the day hand-to-hand on foot. But then God sent down his aid to the Believers and smote the faces of the unbelievers. Their tyrant [ṭāghiyah] fell, together with many of their defenders and the purposeful ones among them, and God killed them in the battle. Then I sent the cavalry after their flight, and they were slain on the road and in the camping place and settlement. Praise be to God, the Lord of the Universe, and peace be with you, may God have mercy on you!

When al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah received this letter, he sent it to Ibn al-Zubayr and it was read out to the [590] people in Mecca. And al-Ḥārith Ibn Abī Rabīᶜah wrote to al-Muhallab, "Now, I have received your letter in which you mention the assistance which God gave you and the victory of the Muslims. I wish for you, Oh brother of Azd, the honor and glory of this world and the rewards and merits of the next. Peace be with you and may God have mercy on you." When al-Muhallab read his letter, he laughed and said, "Did you think he would acknowledge me as anything other than 592. See Gloss., s.v. ṣarra.

'brother of Azd'? The people of Mecca are no more than bedouins."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: Abū ᶜAlqamah al-Yaḥmadī[593] fought on the day of Sillā wa-Sillabrā in a manner unsurpassed by anyone else, and he began to call out to the young men of Azd and the youths of Yaḥmad, "Lend us your skulls for an hour of the day!" Some of them started to charge and fight and then go back to him, laughing and saying, "Oh Abū ᶜAlqamah, the cooking pots are loaned!" When al-Muhallab had triumphed and he learned of Abū ᶜAlqamah's resolution, he gave him 100,000 dirhams.

It is said that the Baṣrans had asked al-Aḥnaf, before al-Muhallab was chosen, to fight against the Azāriqah but that he advised them in favor of al-Muhallab saying, "He will be stronger than me in fighting them." And it is said that when al-Muhallab responded to their request to fight against them, he laid a condition on the Baṣrans that whatever land he conquered would be for him and those who went out to fight with him, his tribesmen or others, for three years, but that there would be nothing from him for those who deserted him. The Baṣrans agreed to that and he wrote a contract with them about that. They sent a delegation to Ibn al-Zubayr about the [591] matter, and he endorsed all those conditions in favor of al-Muhallab and authorized them. When a favorable response was received, al-Muhallab sent his son Ḥabīb with 600 horsemen against ᶜAmr al-Qanā[594] who was encamped with 600 horsemen behind the smaller bridge. Al-Muhallab gave orders that the smaller bridge be secured. Ḥabīb prevented ᶜAmr and his men from taking the bridge, and fought them and expelled them from the area between the two bridges. They were put to flight and evacuated the region of the Euphrates.

Al-Muhallab with those of his tribe who went to fight with him—12,000 men—and with 70 of the rest of the men, made ready and set out and stopped at the larger bridge. ᶜAmr al-Qanā was opposite him with 600 men. Al-Muhallab sent his son al-Mughīrah with horsemen and footsoldiers. The footmen put them to flight with their arrows while the horsemen gave chase. Al-Muhallab gave orders regarding the bridge, and it was made secure and he and his men crossed. At that time, ᶜAmr al-Qanā joined Ibn al-Māḥūz and his men who were at al-Maftaḥ.[595] He told them the news, and they set out and formed camp eight farsakhs from al-Ahwāz. For the remainder of the year, al-Muhallab remained where he was, levying dues from the districts of the Tigris and paying his men. When they heard that, reinforcements came from the people of al-Baṣrah and al-Muhallab entered them in the register and gave them pay, with the result that they increased to 30,000.

593. The Banū Yaḥmad b. ᶜAbdallāh are a subtribe of Azd (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 216).

594. ᶜAmr al-Qanā Abū al-Musaddī of the Banū Saᶜd b. Zayd Manāt of Tamīm (al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 682 and passim).

Abū Jaᶜfar said: According to the reports of these authorities, the battle in which the Azāriqah were routed and which caused their departure from the environs of al-Baṣrah and al-Ahwāz for those of Iṣfahān and Kirmān was in the year 66 (685–86), and it is said that when they departed from al-Ahwāz they numbered 3,000 and that in the battle between them and al-Muhallab at Sillā wa-Sillabrā 7,000 of them were killed.

Abū Jaᶜfar said: In this year too, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, before his death, sent his son Muḥammad[596] to Mesopotamia,[597] that being before he himself set out for Egypt. [592]

Ibn al-Zubayr's Dismissal and Appointment of Governors in al-Kūfah and Medina

In this year, ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr deposed ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd from al-Kūfah and gave ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ authority over it. He also removed his brother ᶜUbaydah b. al-Zubayr from Medina and gave authority over it to his brother Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr. He removed from office his brother ᶜUbaydah, according to the report of al-Wāqidī, because the latter had 595. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 586 (presumably Maftaḥ Dujayl on the river Kārūn in Aḥwāz is meant, rather than the village between al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ).

596. See EI[1], s.v. Muḥammad b. Marwān.

597. Ar. al-Jazīrah, i.e., the region between the upper reaches of the Tigris and Euphrates, with al-Mawṣil as its chief center, and expanding with conquest into Ādharbayjān, Armenia and the Caucasus.

delivered an official address to the people and had said to them, "You have seen what was done with a people concerning a she-camel, the value of which was 500 dirhams." He because known as "the valuer of the she-camel." Ibn al-Zubayr heard about that and said, "This is sheer affectation of speech."[598]

In this year also, ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr rebuilt the sacred sanctuary [al-bayt al-ḥarām], incorporating the Ḥijr within it.

Ibn al-Zubayr's Rebuilding of the Kaᶜbah

According to Isḥāq b. Abī Isrā'īl—ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz b. Khālid b. Rustam al-Ṣanᶜānī Abū Muḥammad: Ziyād b. Jiyal[599] told me he was in Mecca on the day when Ibn al-Zubayr was overcome, and he heard him say, "My mother Asmā' bint Abī Bakr told me that the Messenger of God said to ᶜĀ'ishah: 'If it were not that your people had only recently been in a state of unbelief, I would restore the Kaᶜbah on the foundations of Abraham and I would add to the Kaᶜbah part of the Ḥijr.' "[600] Ibn al-Zubayr gave the order for it and it was excavated, and they found rocks as big as a camel. They moved a boulder of them and a bright light flashed out. They re-established it on its foundation and Ibn al-Zubayr rebuilt it, giving it two doors, from one of which it was entered and from the other vacated.[601]

[593] Abū Jaᶜfar said: In this year ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the pilgrimage; over Medina was his brother Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr; ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ was over al-Kūfah at the end of the year; al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah al-Makhzūmī, called al-Qubāᶜ, was over al-Baṣrah, with Hishām b. Hubayrah in charge of its judiciary; and ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim was over Khurāsān.

---

598. Cf. Ansāb, V, 155, where this story is applied to the governor of Medina for Ibn al-Zubayr, ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUbaydallāh b. Abī Thawr. Presumably the reference is to the she-camel [al-nāqah] in the story of the people of Thamūd (Qur'ān, passim).

599. See n. 3 above.

600. For versions of the ḥadīth, see A.J. Wensinck, Concordance et indices de la tradition musulmane, s.vv. kufr, asas.

601. Cf. Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 143; ᶜAbd al-Razzāq, Muṣannaf, V, 9157.

In this year too, those of the Banū Tamīm who were in Khurāsān opposed ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim and warfare broke out between them.[602]

The Continuation of Tribal Warfare in Khurāsān under ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim

The cause, it is reported, was that those of the Banū Tamīm in Khurāsān had aided ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim against those of Rabīᶜah who were there and in the fighting against Aws b. Thaᶜlabah, and a number of them had been killed. Ibn Khāzim had defeated Aws b. Thaᶜlabah and Khurāsān had completely submitted to him. When it had done so and no one disputed it with him, Ibn Khāzim treated Tamīm harshly. He had assigned Herat to his son Muḥammad, appointed him over it, made Bukayr b. Wishāḥ commander of his police force, and attached Shammās b. Dithār al-ᶜUṭāridī to him. The mother of his son Muḥammad was a woman of Tamīm called Ṣafiyyah.

When Ibn Khāzim treated the Banū Tamīm harshly, they went to his son Muḥammad in Herat. But Ibn Khāzim wrote to Bukayr and Shammās, telling them to prevent the Banū Tamīm from entering Herat. Shammās b. Dithār, however, refused, and he left Herat and joined the Banū Tamīm. Bukayr, on the other hand, did prevent them from entering. [594]

According to ᶜAlī b. Muḥammad—Zuhayr b. al-Hunayd—shaykhs of his tribe: When Bukayr b. Wishāḥ prevented the Banū Tamīm from entering Herat, they remained in the district of Herat, and Shammās b. Dithār went out to join them. Bukayr sent, telling Shammās, "I will give you 30,000 dirhams and I will give every man of Tamīm 1,000 on condition they go away." They, however, refused, entered the town and killed Muḥammad b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim.

According to ᶜAlī—al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd—Muḥammad b. ᶜAzīz[603] al-Kindī: Muḥammad b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim went hunting at Herat after he had prevented the Banū Tamīm from entering the town. They ambushed him, seized him and put him in chains. They drank all night and every time one of them wanted to urinate he did so over Muḥammad Ibn Khāzim. Shammās b. Dithār said to them, "Since you have gone this far with him, why not kill him in retaliation for your two companions he killed by flogging?" (Shortly before that Muḥammad Ibn Khāzim had seized two men of the Banū Tamīm and flogged them to death.) So they killed him. Someone alleged to us, on the authority of one of their shaykhs who witnessed the killing of Muḥammad Ibn Khāzim, that Jayhān b. Mashjaʿah al-Ḍabbī tried to stop them killing him and threw himself over him. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim was grateful to him for that and did not kill him with those whom he killed on the Day of Fartanā.[604] ʿĀmir b. Abī ʿUmar claimed he heard the shaykhs of the Banū Tamīm alleging that it was two men of the Banū Mālik b. Saʿd called ʿAjalah and Kusayb who carried out the killing. Ibn Khāzim said, "How evil is that [595] which Kusayb has acquired [iktasaba] for his people, and ʿAjalah has hastened [ʿajjala] a calamity on his people!"

602. See pp. 70–9 above and nn. 324–5.
603. See Add. et emend.

According to ʿAlī—Abū al-Dhayyāl Zuhayr b. Hunayd al-ʿAdawī: When the Banū Tamīm had killed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim, they returned to Marw. Bukayr b. Wishāḥ went in pursuit of them and caught up with and killed a man of the Banū ʿUṭārid called Shumaykh. Shammās and his companions reached Marw, where they said to the Banū Saʿd, "We have taken your revenge for you. We have killed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim for the man of the Banū Jusham[605] who was struck down at Marw." Then they agreed to fight Ibn Khāzim and appointed al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl al-Qurayʿī to lead them.

(Zuhayr): Abū al-Fawāris told me from Ṭufayl b. Mirdās: Most of the Banū Tamīm agreed to fight against ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim.

(Zuhayr b. Hunayd): With al-Ḥarīsh there were warriors never surpassed, each of them a detachment on his own.

604. See p. 179 below, and Ṭabarī, II, 695–700, for the siege of Fartanā (Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 868).

605. See p. 72 above.

Among them were Shammās b. Dithār, Baḥīr b. Warqā' al-Ṣarīmī, Shuᶜba b. Ẓahīr al-Nahshalī, Ward b. al-Falaq al-ᶜAnbarī, al-Ḥajjāj b. Nāshib al-ᶜAdawī, who was one of the best marksmen among them, and ᶜĀṣim b. Ḥabīb al-ᶜAdawī.[606] Al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl fought against ᶜAbdallāh b. Khāzim for two years.

When the fighting and the enmity had dragged on between them, they became vexed. Al-Ḥarīsh went out and called to [596] Ibn Khāzim, and the latter went out to him. Al-Ḥarīsh said, "The war has dragged on between us. What is the point of my people and yours being killed? Come out against me in single combat and, whichever one of us slays the other, the land is his." Ibn Khāzim answered, "By your father, you have offered me a fair deal!" He came out against him and they skirmished with one another like a pair of stallions, neither of them managing to achieve what he wanted, but Ibn Khāzim showed a lapse of concentration and al-Ḥarīsh hit at his head and butted him in the face with the top of his head. The stirrups of al-Ḥarīsh snapped and he drew his sword. Ibn Khāzim clung on to the neck of his horse, heading back to his men with a blow inflicted by the head of al-Ḥarīsh. Next day, the fighting between the two sides began again and continued for some days after the blow (received by Ibn Khāzim). Then the two sides grew weary and split into three factions.

Baḥīr b. Warqā' went to Abrashahr[607] with a band (of followers), Shammās b. Dithār al-ᶜUṭāridī headed for another district (it is said that he went to Sijistān), and ᶜUthmān b. Bishr b. al-Muḥtafiz[608] betook himself to Fartanā and took up residence in a fortress there. Al-Ḥarīsh went to the district of Marw al-Rūdh, where Ibn Khāzim pursued him. He caught up with him at one of its settlements called Qaryat al-Malḥama or Qaṣr al-Malḥama.[609] Al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl had twelve men with him, for his followers had left him, and they were

606. These are all champions of Tamīm; for Baḥīr b. Warqā' al-Ṣarīmī (which seems more likely than the text's Ṣuraymī), see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 420–3; for the groups Ṣarīm, Nahshal, ᶜAnbar and ᶜAdawiyah of Tamīm, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, tables 76, 60, 81 and 68, 59.

607. I.e., Nīshāpūr (see Le Strange, Eastern caliphate, 383f.).

608. Of the Banū Muzaynah (see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 88).

609. See Add. et emend., which suggest the subsequent verses point to the name Qaṣr al-Milḥ.

in a ruined place where he had erected spears which he had with him and shields. Ibn Khāzim reached him and al-Ḥarīsh went out to him with his companions.

With Ibn Khāzim there was a mawlā of his who was very brave. He attacked al-Ḥarīsh and struck him, but al-Ḥarīsh did nothing. A man of the Banū Ḍabbah said to al-Ḥarīsh, "Do you not see what the slave is doing?" but al-Ḥarīsh [597] answered, "He is very well armed and my sword will be of no avail against his weapons, but find me a heavy piece of wood." So the man cut a heavy staff for him from a jujube tree (it is also said that he found it in the fortress) and gave it to him. With it, he then attacked and struck at the mawlā of Ibn Khāzim, who fell mortally wounded.

Next he went toward Ibn Khāzim and said, "What is it you want with me, when I have left the province to you?" He replied, "But you will return to it." Al-Ḥarīsh said, "I will not return." Then he made peace with him on condition that al-Ḥarīsh would leave Khurāsān for him and would not resume fighting against him, and Ibn Khāzim gave him 40,000 dirhams. Al-Ḥarīsh opened the gate of the fortress to him, and Ibn Khāzim entered and gave him gifts and undertook to clear his debts, and they talked together for a long time. The cotton cloth which was fixed on the head wound given Ibn Khāzim by al-Ḥarīsh flew off. Al-Ḥarīsh got up, picked it up, and put it back on his head. Ibn Khāzim said to him, "Your touch today is more gentle than your touch yesterday, Oh Abū Qudāmah!" He answered, "I excuse myself to God and to you. By God, if my stirrups had not snapped, the sword would have made a fine mess of your molars!" Ibn Khāzim laughed and departed from him, and the band of Tamīm broke up.

One of the poets of Tamīm said about that:

If you had been like al-Ḥarīsh, you would have been resolute, and you would have been the best of the warriors
in the fortress of al-Milḥ;
Then you would have given Ibn Khāzim to drink with lamentations a bowl of blood which would have left long evil thoughts for him.

Al-Ashᶜath b. Dhu'ayb, brother of Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb,[610] was killed in this war, and his brother Zuhayr said to him while still a spark of life remained, "Who killed you?" He answered, "I do not know. A man on a light brown nag stabbed me." Zuhayr then attacked every man whom he saw on a light brown nag. Some of them he killed, some of them fled. The men of the army shunned the light brown nags and they were left free in the army; no one would ride them.

Concerning the fighting against Ibn Khāzim, al-Ḥarīsh said:

Carrying the spear all night and all day [598] has kept the bone of my right hand out of joint.
For two years my eyes have not closed at any resting place, unless my fist made a pillow for me upon a stone.
My coat is of iron, and when night brings sleep, my covering is the saddle[611] of a full-grown stallion.

610. See p. 73 above.

611. See, however, Gloss., s.v. mijall, suggesting the reading maḥal, "vertebrae, dorsum."

The Events of the Year 66

(AUGUST 8, 685–JULY 27, 686)

Among the events of this year was the rising of al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd in al-Kūfah seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, and his expulsion of Ibn al-Zubayr's governor, ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ al-ʿAdawī, from the town.

Al-Mukhtār's Revolutionary Movement in al-Kūfah and His Appeal to the Shīʿah There

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj—ʿAbīdah b. ʿAmr and Ismāʿīl b. Kathīr of the Banū Hind:[612] When Sulaymān b. Ṣurad's followers arrived back in al-Kūfah, al-Mukhtār wrote to them:

> Now, may God increase your reward and lighten your burden in exchange for your separation from the un-> [599] righteous [al-qāsiṭīn] and your jihād against the profaners of His law [al-muḥillīn]! There was no expense in which you shared, no difficult path which you followed, and no step which you took, but that God has given you a higher place in the hereafter in reward for it and inscribed for you in recompense blessings which only God can number because they are so many. Rejoice! If I had come out to you, I would, with God's permission, have unsheathed my sword against your enemies everywhere from the rising to the setting of the sun, and I would, with God's permission, have made a pile of them, and I would have slain them as individuals and pairs. May God welcome those of you who have drawn near to Him and been rightly guided, and may He only dismiss those who disobey and reject His commands! Peace be with you, Oh people of right guidance!

612. See pp. 105ff. above and n. 425; for the following, cf. Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 74ff; Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 98–102; cf. the account of J.O. Blichfeldt, Early Mahdism, 122ff.

Sīḥān b. ᶜAmr of the Banū Layth of the Banū ᶜAbd al-Qays[613] brought them this letter, which he had put in the lining of his cap.[614] He brought the letter to Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād, al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ᶜAbdī, Saᶜd b. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, Yazīd b. Anas,[615] Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ al-Aḥmasī,[616] ᶜAbdallāh b. Shaddād al-Bajalī and ᶜAbdallāh b. Kāmil.[617] He read it to them, and in reply they sent Ibn Kāmil to al-Mukhtār, telling him to say, "We have read your letter and our position is whatever pleases you. If you want us to come to you and get you out, we will do so." Ibn Kāmil went to him, entered upon him in the prison, and reported to him what he had been sent to say to him. Al-Mukhtār was pleased with the assent of the Shīᶜah to him and he answered them, "You do not want to do this. I will get out in a few days."

Al-Mukhtār had sent a slave lad of his called Zirbiyyā to ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and had written to him, "I [600]

613. This seems to be the only reference to him (for the Banū Layth b. Ḥudād of ᶜAbd al-Qays, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 170).

614. Ar. qalansūwa, a tall Persian headpiece (Dozy, Vêtements, s.v.).

615. On him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 593, Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 190–1 (of Asad b. Khuzaymah of Khindif).

616. For the Banū Aḥmas b. Ghawth of the Banū Bajīlah, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, I, table 223.

617. On him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 113; he belonged to the Banū Shākir b. Rabīᶜah of Jusham/Hamdān (ibid., I, table 230).

have been unjustly imprisoned and the authorities hold false suspicions of me. Write on my behalf, may God have mercy on you, a courteous letter to these two evil doers.[618] Perhaps God will deliver me from their hands through your good will, your blessedness, and your favor. Peace be with you!" In response, ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar wrote to the two of them, "Now, you know the marriage ties which exist between me and al-Mukhtār b. Abī ᶜUbayd and you know the love which there is between me and the two of you. I implore you, by the ties of obligation which bind me and you two, that you release him when you have looked into this letter of mine. Peace be with you and may God have mercy on you!" When ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUmar's letter reached ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah, they called for guarantors for al-Mukhtār who would stand surety for his person. Many of his supporters came to him, and Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd b. Ruwaym said to ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd, "What are you doing with all of these as guarantors? Let ten of them who are well-known notables guarantee him, and let the rest of them go." And he did so.

After they had stood surety for him, ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah summoned him and made him swear before God, other than whom there is no god, He who knows what is hidden and what is seen, the Merciful and the Compassionate, that he had no intention of any mischief against them and that he would not rebel against them so long as they had authority. If he did, he would have to sacrifice 1,000 head of livestock before the door of the Kaᶜbah and all of his slaves, male and female, would be emancipated. He swore to them on those terms and then departed, went to his house and abode there.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Abī ᶜĪsā—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: Afterward, I heard al-Mukhtār saying, "God damn them! How stupid they are if they think I will fulfill these vows of theirs. As for my swearing to them before God, if I have taken an oath and I see a greater good, then I must [601] abandon what I have sworn and bring about the greater good, and expiate my oath. That I should rebel against them is a greater good than that I should desist from it, and I will expiate my oath. As for offering a thousand head of livestock, it is easier for me than spitting. Should the cost of a thousand head of livestock worry me? As for the freeing of my slaves, I wish it would give me success in my affair and then I would never own a slave again!"

618. I.e., ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah.

When al-Mukhtār took up residence in his house at the time of his coming out of prison, the Shīᶜah frequently visited him, were unanimous in accepting him and were satisfied with him. Those who took the oath of allegiance for him while he was in prison were five men, al-Sā'ib b. Mālik al-Ashᶜarī,[619] Yazīd b. Anas, Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ, Rifāᶜah b. Shaddād al-Fityānī and ᶜAbdallāh b. Shaddād al-Jushamī. The number of his supporters continued to increase and his authority to strengthen and grow stronger until Ibn al-Zubayr removed ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah from office and sent ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ to al-Kūfah to take over their function.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaqᶜab b. Zuhayr—ᶜUmar b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām: Ibn al-Zubayr summoned ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ, the brother of the Banū ᶜAdī b. Kaᶜb,[620] and al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah al-Makhzūmī. He sent ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ over al-Kūfah and al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah over al-Baṣrah. News of that reached Baḥīr b. Raysān al-Ḥimyarī,[621] who met them and said, "Oh you two, tonight the moon is in al-Nāṭiḥ,[622] so do not go." As for Ibn Abī Rabīᶜah, he complied with his advice, remained [602] a short while, then left to take up his office and had no trouble. As for ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ, he answered him, "Do we seek anything but thrusting [al-naṭḥ]?" And, by God, he met thrusting and being laid low [naṭḥᵃⁿ wa-baṭḥᵃⁿ]. ᶜUmar (b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām) said, "Misfortune matches words."

---

619. On him, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 499, and, for the Banū Ashᶜar b. Udad (of Yemen), ibid., I, table 273.

620. For the Banū ᶜAdī b. Kaᶜb of Quraysh, see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 346ff.

621. Apparently a former governor of the Yemen for Yazīd (Ṭabarī, II, 277).

622. I.e., star β in the second horn of Aries (the Ram), a bad omen.

ᶜUmar b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām: ᶜAbd al-Malik b. Marwān heard that Ibn al-Zubayr had sent officials out over his dominions, and he asked whom he had sent over al-Baṣrah. He was told, "He has sent al-Ḥārith b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīᶜah over it," and ᶜAbd al-Malik said, "There is no freeman in the wādī of ᶜAwf. He has sent ᶜAwf and he has sat down."[623] Then he said, "And whom did he send over al-Kūfah?" and they said, "ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ." ᶜAbd al-Malik said, "A brave man who has fallen many a time, and a valiant one, how he hates fleeing!" Then he asked, "Whom has he sent over Medina?" and was told, "He has sent his brother Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr." He said, "That is the raging lion. He is the real man of his family."

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ arrived in al-Kūfah in Ramaḍān of the year 65, on a Thursday when five days were left of the month of Ramaḍān (i.e. Thursday, May 4, 685). He said to ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd, "If you want to stay here with me, I shall value your companionship and treat you generously. But if you join the Commander of the Faithful ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, then he and those of the Muslims who accept him owe you a favor." To Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah he said, "Get yourself to the Commander of the Faithful!" Ibrāhīm departed and arrived in Medina, and he failed to deliver the full amount of the tax [kharāj] to Ibn al-Zubayr saying, "It was no more than a state of turmoil and disorder [fitnah]." But Ibn al-Zubayr took no action against him.

Ibn Muṭīᶜ remained governing al-Kūfah, controlling both prayer and taxation. He dispatched Iyās b. Muḍārib al-ᶜIjlī[624] [603] to command his troop of police, ordering him to act in an exemplary manner and to come down hard on any suspicious behavior.

According to Abū Mikhnaf: Ḥaṣīrah b. ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Durayd al-Azdī, who lived at that time and witnessed the 623. See Freytag, Proverbia, II, 531, 831, for variant explanations of the first part of the proverb (only the first part is given in Ansāb, V, 277). The significance of ᶜAbd al-Malik's use of it here, however, is not clear to me.

624. ᶜIjl are a subgroup of Bakr. See Add. et emend. for variant readings of Iyās's patronym.

killing of Muṣᶜab b. al-Zubayr, told me: I was present in the mosque where ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ arrived. He went up on the minbar, praised God and extolled Him, and said:

> Now, the Commander of the Faithful, ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, has sent me to govern your garrison town and your border regions. He has ordered me to levy the income due to you from the lands which you have conquered [fay'akum] and not to remove the surplus of that income away from you without your approval, (and to comply with) the dispositions which ᶜUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb made at the time of his death and the manner of conduct which ᶜUthmān b. ᶜAffān pursued regarding the Muslims. Fear God and stand upright, and do not fall into dispute or rely on the aid of the ignorant ones among you. Otherwise, blame yourselves and do not blame me! By God, I will surely come down hard on the rebellious miscreant and I will make straight the aversion of the doubting sneerer!

Al-Sā'ib b. Mālik al-Ashᶜarī arose before him and said:

> As for Ibn al-Zubayr's command to you not to take away the surplus of our income from our conquests without our approval, we bear witness before you that we do not consent to your taking the surplus of it away from us or to its being shared out other than among us; and we do not consent to any manner of conduct being followed among us other than that of ᶜAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, who provided us with an exemplary mode of doing things [sīrah] in this land of ours until his death, may God have mercy upon him! We have no need for ᶜUthmān's mode of conduct [sīrah] regarding our income from the conquered lands (fay') or our selves, for it was only arbitrary and willful; and we have no need for the mode of conduct of ᶜUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb regarding our income from the conquered lands even if it was less injurious to us (than ᶜUthmān's) and he did not fail to achieve some good for the people.

[604] Yazīd b. Anas said, "Al-Sā'ib b. Mālik has spoken truly and honestly. Our view is like his and we say the same as he!" Ibn Muṭīᶜ answered, "We will act among you with any mode of conduct you wish or incline to." Then he stood down. Yazīd b. Anas al-Asadī said, "You have brought to an end the (loss of our) surplus, Oh Sā'ib, may the Muslims never have to do without you! By God, I got to my feet and wanted to stand and speak to him in a similar vein, for I did not want God to entrust the refutation of him to any man of our garrison town who is not one of our party [shīᶜah]."

Iyās b. Muḍārib went to Ibn Muṭīᶜ and said, "Al-Sā'ib b. Mālik is one of the leaders of al-Mukhtār's supporters, and I do not trust al-Mukhtār. Send for him and let him come to you. When he does, confine him in your prison until the people's affairs are straightened out. My sources have come and told me that his enterprise is all set up for him and he has virtually come out in revolt in the garrison town." Ibn Muṭīᶜ sent to him, therefore, Zā'idah b. Qudāmah and Ḥusayn b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Bursumī of Hamdān,[625] who entered in upon him and said, "Give answer to the governor!" He called for his robes, ordered that his mount be saddled and made a lot of fuss about getting ready to go with them. When Zā'idah b. Qudāmah saw that, he recited God's words, "When those who disbelieve plot against you to hold you fast, kill you or drive you out, they plot; but God plots too, and God is the best of plotters!"[626] Al-Mukhtār understood and he sat down and cast off his clothes and then said, "Throw a rug over me. I think I must be ill, for I am shivering violently." Then he cited the saying of ᶜAbd al-ᶜUzzā b. Ṣuhal al-Azdī:[627]

"When a group of people reject a call made to them, and do not go to a misfortune, they are not afraid.

You two go back to Ibn Muṭīᶜ and tell him of the state I am in." Zā'idah b. Qudāmah said to him, "As for me, I will do 625. See Ṭabarī, II, 117: he was a member of Ziyād's shurṭah and was sent to summon Ḥujr b. ᶜAdī.

626. Qur'ān, 8:30.

627. Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 133.

so. You, Oh brother of Hamdān, ask pardon for me when we come to him, for that would be better for you." [605]

Abū Mikhnaf—Ismāʿīl b. Nuʿaym al-Hamdānī—Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh: I said to myself, "By God, if I do not give an account of this which is satisfactory to him, I will have no security that he will not triumph tomorrow and kill me!" So I said to Zāʾidah, "Yes, I will beg pardon for you from Ibn Muṭīʿ and I will tell him what you desire." Then we left al-Mukhtār's presence, and there we found his supporters waiting at his door and a great crowd of them in his house. We went towards Ibn Muṭīʿ and I said to Zāʾidah b. Qudāmah, "Indeed, I understood what you were saying when you recited that verse (of scripture) and I knew what you meant by it. I knew it was to stop him from leaving with us after he had put on his clothes and saddled his mount, and I knew when he cited that verse of poetry that he merely wanted to let you know that he had understood what you wanted him to understand and that he would not go to him." He denied that he had intended any of that, but I said to him, "Do not swear! By God, I am not going to report anything about you or him which the two of you would find offensive. I know that you feel concern for al-Mukhtār, feeling for him what a man feels for his cousin." So we came to Ibn Muṭīʿ and told him about his illness and what he complained of. He believed us and what we said.

Al-Mukhtār sent for his supporters and began to gather them in the houses round about him, intending to revolt in al-Kūfah in Muḥarram (August, 685). One of his supporters of Shibām[628] came, a great noble called ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ,[629] and he met Saʿīd b. Munqidh al-Thawrī,[630] Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr al-Ḥanafī, al-Aswad b. Jarād al-Kindī[631] and Qudāmah b. Mālik al-Jushamī.[632] They met together in the dwelling of 628. Shibām b. Asʿad of Hamdān (ibid., II, 529).

629. A man with a history of support for ʿAlid movements (Ṭabarī, I, 3411, II, 253, 257).

630. Of the Banū Hamdān.

631. Does not seem to be otherwise known.

632. This is Ṭabarī's only reference to him; from the Banū Jusham of Hamdān.

[606] Si^{c}r al-Ḥanafī and Ibn Shurayḥ praised God and extolled Him, and then he said:

> Now, al-Mukhtār wishes to revolt and we have given him the oath of allegiance, but we do not know whether Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah sent him to us or not. Let us go to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah and inform him of what al-Mukhtār has come to us with, of what he is summoning us to. If he says it is permissible to follow al-Mukhtār, we will do so, but, if he forbids it, we will keep away from him. By God, nothing of this world must be preferred by us to the safety of our religion.

They answered him, "God has guided you. You are right and correct. Lead us off if you wish." And they all agreed to set out on that day and did so, joining Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, with ^{c}Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ as their leader [imām]. When they came to him, Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah asked them about the circumstances of the people, and they told him about their state and what they were doing.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Khalīfah b. Warqā'—al-Aswad b. Jarād al-Kindī: We said to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, "We need to ask you something." "Is it a secret or a public thing?" he asked. "Indeed, no, it is a secret" we said. He replied, "Do not rush, then." We waited a short while and then he moved off to one side and called us, and we stood before him. ^{c}Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ began and spoke. He praised God and extolled Him, and then he said:

> Now, you are a family which God has singled out for virtue and ennobled with prophethood. He has made recognition of your legitimacy as leaders of this community a grave matter, and only those whose reason has been duped and whose share (in the hereafter) has been diminished are ignorant of your rights. You have been afflicted by (the killing of) Ḥusayn, may God have mercy on him, an affliction most sore, by which He has singled you out and by which the Muslims were enveloped.[633] Al-Mukhtār b. Abī ^{c}Ubayd has come to us claiming he has come from you, and has summoned us to the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet, seeking vengeance for the blood of the Family, and protection of the weak. We have given him the oath of allegiance on those terms. But then we considered that we should come to you and tell you what he has summoned us to and charged us with. If you tell us to follow him, we will do so, and, if you forbid us to join him, we will keep clear of him. [607]

633. Cf. the reading of the Cairo text.

Then we all spoke one by one as our companion had spoken, and Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah listened to us until, when we had finished, he praised God and extolled Him, prayed for the Prophet, and then said:

Now, concerning what you have said about the way God has singled us out in merit, "God imparts it to whomever He wishes, for God is possessed of great merit."[634] God be praised! And as for what you said about our affliction with the killing of Ḥusayn, that was ordained by Divine Wisdom;[635] it was an apocalyptic catastrophe [malḥamah] foreordained for him, it was an honor which God granted him by which the standing in the hereafter of a people who were with him has been exalted while others have been cast down. "God's command is carried out and God's command is preordained!"[636] Regarding what you have mentioned about the summons of he who has summoned you to seek vengeance for our blood, by God, I want God to aid us against our enemies by means of any of His creatures He wishes. This is what I say and I ask God's forgiveness for me and for you.

We left him, and we were saying, "He has given us permission. He has said, 'I want God to aid us against our enemies by means of any of His creatures He wishes.' If he had disapproved, he would have said, 'Do not do it!' "

634. Cf. Qur'ān, 3:66–7, 57:21, 29, 62:4.
635. Ar. al-dhikr al-ḥakīm, often an epithet for the Qur'ān.
636. Cf. Qur'ān, 33:37–8.

We went back and some of the Party, those of our brethren we had told of our departure and apprised of our feelings and who shared our views, were awaiting our return. Al-Mukhtār had heard about our departure and it troubled him, for he feared that we would bring him an order which would cause
[608] the Party to abandon him. He had wanted to bring them out in revolt before we got back, but that was not possible for him. He had been saying, "A few of you have wavered, vacillated and been disappointed. If they get what they want, they will draw near and repent, but, if they fail, are afraid, hinder and are dispelled, they will perish and fail."

Within a month or so, the party arrived back on their camels and went in to al-Mukhtār before going in to their stopping place. He asked them, "What is the news where you have come from? You have been tested and you have wavered." They answered, "We were told to help you!" Al-Mukhtār said, "God is most great! I am Abū Isḥāq! Assemble the Party before me!" Those who were at hand were assembled and he said, "Oh people of the Party, a group of you wanted to learn confirmation of what I have brought. They went to the imām of guidance, the acceptable noble one, the son of a better than Ṭashy and Mashy[637] except for the Prophet, the chosen one. They asked him about that with which I came to you and he told them that I am his wazīr and his helper, his messenger and his friend, and he ordered you to follow and obey me in that to which I summon you concerning fighting against the profaners of God's law and seeking vengeance for the blood of the chosen ones of the family of your Prophet."

ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ then rose to his feet, praised God and extolled Him, and said, "Now, Oh people of the Party, we wanted to obtain verification for ourselves in particular and for all of our brethren in general. We went to the rightly guided one [al-mahdī],[638] the son of ᶜAlī, and we questioned him about this war of ours and about that to which al-Mukhtār summons us, and he told us to help him and assist

637. The meaning of this phrase, if it has one, is very obscure (see Gloss. s.v. ṭashy).

638. See above, n. 395.

him and to respond to that to which he summoned us. We have returned with light spirits and glad hearts, from which God has driven all doubt, distaste and vacillation, and our minds are settled on fighting against our enemies. Let those of you who are here tell those of you who are absent about that! And prepare and make ready!" [609]

He sat down while we got to our feet one after the other and spoke in the same vein. And the Party united around al-Mukhtār and was favorably disposed to him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Wa'lah and (al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh) al-Mashriqī—'Āmir al-Sha'bī:[639] My father and I were the first to respond to al-Mukhtār.

When his plans had been laid and the time for his revolt drew near, Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ, Yazīd b. Anas, 'Abdallāh b. Kāmil and 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād said to him, "The notables [ashrāf] of al-Kūfah have decided to side with Ibn Muṭī' in opposing you, but, if we agree that Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar[640] should have our command, we might hope, with God's permission, for more strength against our enemies and that those who oppose us will not harm us. He is a valiant young man and the son of a noble and renowned man, and his clan is mighty and numerous." Al-Mukhtār answered them, "Go to him and summon him, and tell him what we are commanded in seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn and his family."

Al-Sha'bī: They went off to Ibn al-Ashtar, and my father and I with them. Yazīd b. Anas spoke for them and said, "We have come to you about something we wish to put before you and call you to. If you accept it, it will be beneficial for you; if you reject it, then we have brought you sincere advice about it and we should like you to keep it secret." Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar answered them, "For someone like me, there cannot worry him either evil aimed at him, or slander directed at him, or calumny against him by the people seeking favor with those in authority over him. Those are only little things 639. A famous Kūfan traditionist and jurist (d. ca. 104/722); see EI[1], s.v.

640. Son of a leading supporter of 'Alī, and leader of Madhḥij in al-Kūfah (see EI[2], s.v. Ibrāhīm b. Mālik).

of insubstantial importance." Yazīd said to him, "All we are summoning you to is the undertaking upon which the opinions of the assembly of the Party have agreed: to the Book of God [610] and the Sunnah of His Prophet, and to seeking vengeance for the blood of the Family, fighting against the violators of God's law, and defense of the weak."

Then Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ spoke, saying to him, "I am a sincere adviser to you and desirous of your prosperity. Your father, who was a sayyid, has died, but in you there is a successor to him, if you protect the rights of God. We have summoned you to an undertaking and, if you respond to us, the position of your father among the people will revert to you and you will restore something of it which has passed away. Only a small effort is enough for someone like you to reach the utmost goal. The foundations have already been laid for you." Aḥmar strove in his arguments, and all of the group approached Ibn al-Ashtar, appealing to him to join their undertaking and inciting him to it.

He said to them, "I have decided to respond to that to which you summon me regarding seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn and his family, on the condition that you give me charge over the business." They answered, "You are worthy of that, but there is no way we can agree to it, for this al-Mukhtār has come to us from the mahdī, and he is his messenger and charged with commanding the fighting. We have been told to obey him." Ibn al-Ashtar remained silent and did not answer them, and we left him and went back to al-Mukhtār, whom we told about the answer Ibn al-Ashtar had made to us.

Three days passed and then al-Mukhtār summoned about ten of the foremost of his supporters. (Al-Shaʿbī said that he and his father were among them.) He set off with us, going ahead of us and passing between the houses of al-Kūfah with us so that we did not know where he was aiming for, until finally he stopped at the door of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar. We asked if we could enter upon him and Ibn al-Ashtar gave us permission. Cushions were thrown down for us and we sat on them, while al-Mukhtār sat with him on his couch.

Al-Mukhtār said:

> Praise be to God, and I testify that there is no god but God! May He bless Muḥammad and grant him salvation! Now, this is a letter to you from the mahdī, Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful, the Legatee. Today he is the best of the people on earth and the son of the best of the people on the whole of the earth previously, apart from God's prophets and messengers. He asks you to help and support us. If you do, you will be happy; if you do not, then this letter will be a testimony against you and God will suffice the mahdī Muḥammad and his friends without any help from you. [611]

Al-Shaʿbī: Al-Mukhtār had handed the letter to me when he left his house, and when he had finished speaking now he said to me, "Give him the letter!" and I gave it to him. Ibn al-Ashtar called for a lamp, broke the seal and read it. This is what it said:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. From Muḥammad the mahdī to Ibrāhīm b. Mālik al-Ashtar, greetings! I praise God, other than whom there is no god, before you. Now, I have sent to you my wazīr, my trustee, my choice one, with whom I am pleased for myself. I have ordered him to fight my enemies and seek vengeance for the blood of my family. With him arouse yourself, your clan and those who obey you. If you help me, respond to my call, and assist my wazīr, you will obtain merit with me in recompense as well as the reins of the horses and every raiding army and every garrison town, minbar and border land which you conquer between al-Kūfah and the farthest part of the land of the Syrians on fulfilling that in the covenant of God. If you do that, you will obtain by it the highest mark of honor with God; but, if you refuse, you will experience a destruction from which you can never ask to be released. Peace be with you!

When Ibrāhīm had finished reading the letter, he said, "Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah has written to me, but whenever I wrote to him

[612] previously he only wrote to me using his personal name and his patronym." Al-Mukhtār said to him, "Well, that was then but now is now." Ibrāhīm asked, "Who knows that this is a letter from Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah to me?" and al-Mukhtār said, "Yazīd b. Anas and Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ and ᶜAbdallāh b. Kāmil and a whole group of them." [Al-Shaᶜbī said: But not my father and me!] And they said, "We testify that this is the letter of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah to you." At that, Ibrāhīm moved away from the center of the couch and caused al-Mukhtār to sit on it, saying to him, "Hold out your hand and I will give you the oath of allegiance and then he called for fruit, which we took, and he called for honeyed beverage which we drank. Afterward, we rose and Ibn al-Ashtar departed with us, riding with al-Mukhtār until he went in to his dwelling. Then when Ibrāhīm returned to his own dwelling, he took my hand and said, "Come back with me, Oh Shaᶜbī."

I went back with him and we went on until we entered his dwelling, when he said, "Oh Shaᶜbī, I have observed that neither you nor your father testified with the others. Do you think that they testified truthfully?" I answered him, "They testified as you saw, and they are the lords of the qurrā',[641] the elders of the garrison town and the champions of the Arabs. I do not think that men like them would speak other than truthfully." I said these words to him even though, by God, I was suspicious of their testimony. Nevertheless, the revolt was pleasing to me and I shared the view of the people and wished for the carrying through of that business, so I did not reveal to him what was in my mind. Then Ibn al-Ashtar said to me, "Write down for me their names for I do not know all of them." And he called for a sheet to write on and an inkwell and wrote on it:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate, this is what there bore witness to al-Sā'ib b. Mālik al-Ashᶜarī, Yazīd b. Anas al-Asadī, Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ al-

641. The derivation and meaning of this term have been debated. Traditionally it has been understood as referring to pietists among the early Muslims who memorized the text of the Qur'ān; but see *EI*², s.v. Ḳurrā', and cf. J. Wansbrough, The Sectarian Milieu, 69.

Aḥmasī, Mālik b. ᶜAmr al-Nahdī[642] . . . until he had completed the names of the whole group, and then he wrote: They have testified that Muḥammad b. ᶜAlī b. al-Ḥanafiyyah wrote to Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar asking him to aid al-Mukhtār and assist him in fighting against the profaners of God's law and in seeking vengeance for the blood of the family. And there testified in favor of these men who bore this witness Sharāḥīl b. ᶜAbd, who is Abū ᶜĀmir al-Shaᶜbī the jurisprudent [al-faqīh],[643] ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Nakhaᶜī,[644] and ᶜĀmir b. Sharāḥīl al-Shaᶜbī. [613]

I said to him, "What will you do with this, may God have mercy on you?" but he said, "Leave it be!" Then he summoned his clan, his brethren and those who obeyed him, and he began to visit al-Mukhtār frequently.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Abī ᶜĪsā al-Azdī: Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī[645] was a confidant of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar, who used to visit him frequently and go around with him. Ibrāhīm used to go off every evening at dusk, visit al-Mukhtār and stay with him until the stars were out. They remained like that, organizing their affairs until they had agreed they would revolt on Thursday night, the fourteenth of Rabīᶜ I, 66,[646] and they got their party (shīᶜah) and those who responded to them ready for that.

---

642. For the Banū Nahd b. Zayd, a Yemenī clan, see Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 443.

643. The father of al-Shaᶜbī the narrator.

644. This seems to be the uterine brother of Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, whose clan within Madhḥij was the Banū Nakhaᶜ (see Ṭabarī, II, 709).

645. Text has al-Asadī, but presumably this is the same Ḥumayd b. Muslim al-Azdī who is often cited as a source by Abū Mikhnaf.

646. Since much of the subsequent action takes place at night, the provision of equivalent A.D. dates presents a problem. The day according to the Hijrī (Muslim) calendar lasts for 24 hours from sunset to sunset. Hence expressions such as laylat al-khamīs, which, translated literally, would mean "Thursday night," may in fact indicate the previous night, in this case Wednesday–Thursday according to the A.D. calendar. Thursday 14 Rabīᶜ I 66 = Thursday, October 19, 685, but, since the night is specified, it may be that we should envisage the night of Wednesday, October 18.

About sunset, Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar arose and had the call to prayer made. Then he went forward and led us in the sunset prayer and afterward, after sunset, went out with us when you say, "Your brother or the wolf?"[647] He was heading for [614] al-Mukhtār and we proceeded, bearing our weapons. But Iyās b. Muḍārib had gone to ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ and told him, "Al-Mukhtār is going to come out against you tonight or tomorrow night." So Iyās came out with the men of the police force and sent his son Rashīd to al-Kunāsah[648] while he himself began to go around the market with the police force. Then Iyās b. Muḍārib went in to Ibn Muṭīᶜ and said to him, "I have sent my son to al-Kunāsah, and if I had sent one of your men into every jabbānah in al-Kūfah, together with a band of loyal men, the mischief makers would fear to come out against you."

Ibn Muṭīᶜ sent ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saᶜīd b. Qays[649] to the jabbānah of al-Sabīᶜ,[650] and said to him, "Guard me against your people. I shall not be approached from your direction. Direct the affairs of the jabbānah to which I have sent you. Indeed, nothing untoward shall occur there. They are weak and feeble."

He sent Kaᶜb b. Abī Kaᶜb b. al-Khathᶜamī[651] to the jabbānah of Bishr, Zahr b. Qays[652] to the jabbānah of Kindah, Shamir b. Dhī Jawshan[653] to the jabbānah of Sālim, ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf b. Sulaym[654] to the jabbānah of al-Ṣāᶜidiyyīn, and Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym Abū Ḥawshab to the jabbānah

---

647. See p. 16 above.

648. Originally the rubbish heap, west of the town, it had become a district with an important market, (EI², s.v. al-Kūfa, 347a).

649. Of Hamdān (Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, index).

650. The *jabbānah*s are prominent features in the topography of al-Kūfah. Possibly originally tribal cemeteries (cf. the Jabbān of al-Baṣrah, n. 142 above), they became focuses of tribal life and may perhaps be envisaged as public squares (see EI², s.v. al-Kūfah, loc. cit.)

651. For the Banū Khathᶜam, see EI², s.v.

652. Zahr b. Qays al-Juᶜfī of Madhḥij (Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, index) is said to have carried the head of al-Ḥusayn to Yazīd for ᶜUbaydallāh b. Ziyād (Ṭabarī, II, 374).

653. Of the Banū Kilāb (Qays), he was one of the leaders of the forces which killed al-Ḥusayn at Karbalā' (see Jafri, Shīᶜa Islam, 187, 189–91).

654. One of the leaders of Azd in al-Kūfah.

of Murād. He charged each of them to supervise his own people for him, that he should not be approached from that direction, and that he control the affairs of the area he was sending him to. He also sent Shabath b. Ribʿī to al-Sabakhah,[655] telling him, "When you hear the shouts of the rebels, head towards them."

Those people had gone off on the Monday and occupied those *jabbānah*s. Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar left his halting place [615] after sunset, intending to go to al-Mukhtār. He had heard that the *jabbānah*s were full of men and that the men of the police force had surrounded the market and the governor's residence.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Abī ʿĪsā—Ḥumayd b. Muslim: On Tuesday (i.e. the night of Monday–Tuesday) night after sunset, I went out with Ibrāhīm from his residence and we passed ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth's house. With Ibn al-Ashtar, we were a detachment of about a hundred. We were wearing mail covered by qabā's[656] and our swords. We had no weapons other than the swords on our shoulders and we had concealed the mail beneath our qabā's. When we had gone by the house [dār] of Saʿīd b. Qays,[657] and we had passed it going toward the house of Usāmah,[658] we said, "Lead us to the house of Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah,[659] then go on with us to Bajīlah, and let us go through their houses so we eventually emerge at the house of al-Mukhtār."

Ibrāhīm was a valiant and raw young man and had no objection to a confrontation with Ibn Muṭīʿ's men, and he said, "By God, I will go past the house of ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth toward the side of the governor's residence in the middle of the market. I will frighten our enemy by it and I will show them how insignificant we consider them." We took the di-

655. On the northeastern side of the town: see the map of Massignon, "Kūfa," Opera minora, III, 36.

656. For the qabā', see n. 162 above.

657. Saʿīd b. Qays al-Hamdānī al-Sabīʿī took part in the conquest of Iraq and was one of the first settlers at al-Kūfah. Here and subsequently, dār may mean some sort of residential complex rather than merely "house."

658. Presumably the Companion of the Prophet, Usāmah b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah, to whom ʿUthmān is said to have granted estates near al-Kūfah.

659. Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah al-ʿUdhrī, another participant in the conquest of Iraq who was given estates near al-Kūfah.

rection of Bāb al-Fīl by the house of Habbār.[660] Then he took the left-hand side of the house of ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth so that, when we had passed it, we found Iyās b. Muḍārib with his police with weapons displayed. He said to us, "Who are you and what are you?" and Ibrāhīm answered him, "I am Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar." Ibn Muḍārib said to him, "What is this troop with you and what do you want? By God, you are intent on mischief and I have heard that you come this way every evening. I will not let you pass before I have been with you to the governor and he makes up his mind about you." But Ibrāhīm said, "Damned bastard![661] Get out of our way!" He replied, "Never! By God, I will not."

With Iyās b. Muḍārib there was a man of Hamdān called [616] Abū Qaṭan, who had had authority in the police force and they respected him and liked him. He was a confidant of Ibn al-Ashtar, who said to him, "Oh Abū Qaṭan, draw close to me." Abū Qaṭan had a long spear of his with him, and he came close with the spear, thinking that Ibn al-Ashtar wanted him to intercede for him with Ibn al-Muḍārib so that he would let them go on. But Ibrāhīm said, seizing the spear from him, "This spear of yours is very long!" and he attacked Ibn Muḍārib with it, stabbing him in the gullet [fī thughrat naḥrihi] and bringing him to the ground. He said to one of his men, "Get down and cut off his head!" He did so and Ibn Muḍārib's men scattered and fled back to Ibn Muṭīᶜ. Then Ibn Muṭīᶜ sent Iyās b. Muḍārib's son, Rāshid b. Iyās, to command the police force in place of his father, and he sent Suwayd b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān al-Minqarī, the father of Qaᶜqāᶜ b. Suwayd,[662] to al-Kunāsah in place of Rāshid b. Iyās on that night.

Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar came to al-Mukhtār on Wednesday night (i.e. the night of Tuesday–Wednesday) and went in to him. He said to al-Mukhtār, "We have prepared the revolt for tomorrow, Thursday night (i.e. the night of Wednesday–Thursday), but something has happened which makes it 660. Read "the house of Ibn Habbār"; Ibn Habbār was also given estates by ᶜUthmān (Ṭabarī, I, 2376).

661. See Gloss., s.v. ghayr for the form of this curse.

662. Crone, Slaves, 139.

inevitable that we begin the revolt tonight." Al-Mukhtār asked, "What is it?" and Ibn al-Ashtar said, "Iyās b. Muḍārib intercepted me on the road, aiming to detain me, or so he claimed. But I killed him and that is his head with my men at the gate." Al-Mukhtār said, "God has proclaimed good news to you! This is a propitious omen and, God willing, the first of our conquests." Then he said, "Arise, Oh Saʿīd b. Munqidh, and kindle the fires among the brush piles and show them to the Muslims. And you, Oh ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād, arise and call out, 'Oh Manṣūr! Deal death!'[663] And you, Oh Sufyān b. Layl,[664] and you, Oh Qudāmah b. Mālik, arise and cry, 'Vengeance for al-Ḥusayn!' " Then he said, "Bring me my armor and my weapons!" They were brought and he began to don his weapons, saying:

A fair woman, a beauty at the camp's remains, [617]
With cheeks that are lucid and a firm backside, knows that on the day of fear, I shall be a bold champion!

Then Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar said to al-Mukhtār, "Those leaders whom Ibn Muṭīʿ stationed in the *jabbānah*s are preventing our brethren from joining us and are harassing them. If I were to go out with those of my men who are with me so I could reach my people, and all of my people who have given me the oath of allegiance could join me; and if I went with them around the districts of al-Kūfah proclaiming our slogan and those who wanted to join our revolt came out to me, and those of the people who could get to you; and if you kept those who got to you with those who are already with you and did not disperse them; then, if you are taken by surprise and attacked, you would have with you people who could defend you whilst I, if I had finished this task, could hasten to join you with horse and footsoldiers." Al-Mukhtār

663. This battle cry, subsequently used by the Hāshimiyyah, was allegedly used by the Prophet, (M. Sharon, Black Banners from the East, 176, n. 70); Lewis, "The regnal titles of the early ʿAbbāsids," 16ff., argues that the messianic title al-Manṣūr (designating the forerunner rather than the Messiah himself) generally had a South Arabian connotation; see too, Goldziher, "Pinehas-Manṣûr," ZDMG, LVI (1902), 411-2.

664. This seems to be the only reference to him in Ṭabarī's History.

said, "In that case, hurry and make sure that you do not go to their governor to fight him, and do not fight anybody so long as you are able to avoid it. Remember what I have charged you with, unless anyone attacks you first."

Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, with the detachment with which he had come, left al-Mukhtār and went to his own people. Most of those who had given him the oath of allegiance and responded to him joined him. Then he went with them about the lanes of al-Kūfah for a large part of the night, all the time keeping clear of the lanes where the enemy commanders were, and going toward those who had with them the groups which Ibn Muṭīᶜ had stationed in the *jabbānah*s and the debouchments of important roads, until he came to the mosque of the Sakūn. Some of the horsemen of Zahr b. Qays al-Juᶜfī, who had no commander and no one in authority over them, rushed at him, and Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar and his men fought hard against them and defeated them until they entered the jabbānah of Kindah. Ibrāhīm said, "Who is in charge of the [618] horsemen in the jabbānah of Kindah?" (He and his men pressed them hard, saying while doing so, "Oh God, you know that we are zealous for the family of your Prophet and seek vengeance for them. Give us aid against them and fulfill for us everything we ask for," until he and his men reached them, got in among them and defeated them.) He was told, "Zahr b. Qays," and he said, "Let us withdraw from them!" and they rode off in confusion. Whenever they came to an alley, a group of them went in and (the rest of them) left, continuing on.[665]

Then Ibrāhīm went off, continuing until he came to the jabbānah of Uthayr where he halted for a long time and called to his men with their battle cry. Suwayd b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān al-Minqarī heard where they were, and hoped he would fall on them and thus win the favor of Ibn Muṭīᶜ. Ibn al-Ashtar knew nothing until they were there in the jabbānah with him, but when he saw that, he called to his men, "Oh cohort [shurṭah] of God, dismount! You are more deserving of God's help than these evil doers who have waded in the blood of the family of the Messenger of God." They dismounted, and Ibrāhīm fought hard against them and attacked them until he had driven them from the ṣaḥrā'.[666]

665. I suspect the text is disordered here.

Suwayd's men turned in flight, jostling one another in confusion and blaming each other, and one of them said, "This is indeed something intended. They do not send any group to us but (Ibn al-Ashtar's men) defeat them."

